LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

What's fame? a fancy'd life in other's breath,
A thing beyond us, ev'n before our death.
Just what you hear, you have; and what's unknown,
The same, my lord, if Tully's, or your own,
All that we feel of it, begins and ends
In the small circle of our foes or friends;
To all beside, as much an empty shade,
As Eugene living, as a Caesar dead.

No. 1. PHILADELPHIA.—JANUARY. [1836.]

ARCADIA.

To Arcady, to Arcady,
Bear me, thou, whose power I own,
By whatever tide known,
Spirit of blest poesy!
Back, from this artificial age,
Hence, from this cold and sordid clime,
Where mortals scorn the poet's rage,
And honest poverty is crime,
Speed, to where nature wanders blithe and free,
To Arcady, to Arcady.
Space flies and fades, 'tis past, 'tis gone,
And time again is young:
'Tis won, the golden land is won,
In golden numbers sung.
Alight on some oak cover'd mountain,
There, the birth place of a god;
Or where bold Alcides trod,
Ere yon lake and ferny fountain
Saw his conquering arm oppose,
And vanquish all his winged foes.
Now to th' vale, where, with his shepherd's crook,
Divine Apollo, seated by yon brook,
Sang, to the listening swains,
His heavenly strains.

Lead now along Eurotas' royal tide,
Or by Alpheus, in whose glassy wave
Diana and her maids were wont to lave;
When the warm river god their forms descried,
And chased the flying nymph, coy Arethuse,
Beneath old ocean's bed,
Where'er her footsteps led,
Till in fair Sicily, thus sings the muse,
The lover in her cold embrace appears,
As, in her maiden grief, she flows a fount of tears.

Up the course of yonder stream,
Glittering in Apollo's beam,
Wend we now, to where resort
The Naiads in their wanton sport;
Tracing still the crystal rill,
Gurgling from the mossy hill,
Haply startling, as we pass,
Fair ephydriads from the grass,
'Till, upon some sudden turn,
We spy the genius by his urn.

1, 1836.

Now the forest we'll explore,
Dell and dingle wander o'er,
And for Pan or Dryad look
Into every bosky nook.
All around we meet the throng
Living in immortal song,
God and goddess yet are here,
Hamlet, fane and cot appear;
Flock and herd, and nymph and swain,
Crowding all the smiling plain.
Now to the warrior age, spirit, and tell
Where Mantinea stood;
Where he, the brave, the good,
The boast of Greece, Epaminondas fell:
And how the Grecian sun, thence, palely beam'd;
And, shorn of its renown,
How her bright day went down,
As clouds from Macedon and Rome
Obscured her heaven, and told her doom;
And the fierce Goth in tempest came,
And red-cross robbers rush'd in flame,
Till through her night an alien crescent gleam'd
From Grecian skies, shedding the withering war,
And Greece lay cold and stark beneath the scimitar.

Drooping spirit, raise thine eyes—
Lo, where Tripolizza lies,
Old Tegea, near the tomb
Where the Theban's laurels bloom,
On his own Mantinean field,
See where stalks the warrior's ghost,
Calling on yon embattled host
For native land to die, or ere they yield.
See you not their columns form,
Mark you not the rush, the storm,
Hear you not the shouts that speak
Triumph to the gallant Greek!
Hark! the distant hills around,
In echoes, join the glorious sound;
It is the voice of victory,
The Turk is fled, and Greece is free!

Now o'er temple, town and tower,
Floats the sign of Christian power,
And the palm is borne on high,
While the cross salutes the sky

Myrtle now, and olive wave
O'er each patriot martyr's grave,
While around the sacred cell
Blooms the yellow asphodel,
And on the cypress, green in grief,
Hangs the bay's exulting leaf.
Now again the grateful soil
Crowns the happy peasant's toil;
Ceres, from her affluent horn,
Fills the field with bending corn,
Vine and olive freely shoot,
Garden, orchard yield their fruit,
And flocks and herds again are seen
On the pastures flush and green.

Courted by the spicy gale,
Spirit, let us seek the vale,
Where, upon yon sloping ground,
Apollo's ruined fane is found.
There the scented citron glows,
And the sweet pomegranate blows;
There the orange buds unfold
Flowers of odour, fruit of gold.
On this bank of fragrant thyme,
Now the day is in its prime,
Let us seek the shade, and there
Woo, like Cephalus, the air,
And with fair anemones,
Ope our bosom to the breeze.
Almond here, and grape and fig
Tempt the hand from every twig.
Here a gentle rill is wending,
Vain Narcissus o'er it bending,
While the bank from which it gushes,
With the purple violet blushes.
Rose and hyacinth are springing,
Bees are humming, birds are singing;
All is fresh and sweet and gay,
As a poet's dream of May.
See, upon yon mossy rock,
Where a shepherd, near his flock,
Plucks the cistus, which his fair
Places in her sunny hair,
While she lists, with conscious ear,
To what her lovers love to hear.

Spirit, I must back again
To the haunts of worldly men.
Wonder not this lovely sight,
To my cot should speed my flight.
It may have a homelier dress,
But it holds my shepherdess;
And with love to aid, and you,
Bland magicians, it may do:
With love and you, the wilderness may be An Arcady, a golden Arcady.

From the Saturday Evening Post.
THE TWILIGHT HOUR.

At Twilight hour I love to steal,
Unseen, unheard, when none are near
To nurse the pensive pain, I feel,
And shed alone fond memory's tear,
At that loved hour sad thoughts arise,
Of friends by absence made more dear,
Fond cherished hopes, long severed ties,
And blighted feeling, cold and drear,
Then thought reverts to other days,
Sweet tones are heard, loved forms appear,
And memory tells of other lays Breathed to fond friendship's listening ear.
Yet do I love the twilight hour
For thou a soothing balm can bring,
And fancy's sweet and soothing power
Blunts kindly memory's poignant sting.

From the Saturday Evening Post.

LYDIA ASHBAUGH, THE WITCH.

* They remain these trifles to upbraid,
Out of the reach of spoil, and way of rage;
Though time with all his pow'r of years hath laid
Long batt'ry, back'd with undermining age;
Yet they make head only with their own aid,
And war with his all conqu'ring forces wage;
Pleading the heaven's prescription to be free,
And t' have a grant t' endure as long as he.

DANIEL.

Though the Appalachian steep do not rise to Alpine heights, nor do they aspire to vie with the towering Cordilleras, still they rise rock upon rock, wood crowned to awaken feelings of admiration and grandeur in the bosom which swells upon their rocky sides, or frowning brows. In infant years I gazed upon these fringed dells and beetling cliffs, and when more than half a century have passed away, my heart warms with the remembrance. Oft since have I revisited those mountains and oft have inwardly felt their immensity and unchangeableness—even their sterility seemed to mock the efforts of man, to give new features to works which rose with creation.

Rude and stern as are the lineaments of those children of ages, a smile sometimes breaks forth. In one of my rambling excursions I rose a mountain path but little frequented in the northern part of Franklin county, Pennsylvania. The day was an uncommonly clear and fine specimen of autumn. The air was bland and bracing, and at many openings of the forest I halted to gaze over the wide spread and farm decorated valley of Conedogwinat. As my narrow path merged into one of the public roads, a farm opened which fell partly down the mountain slope, and part opened on one of those fertile table lands so oft found along the Appalachian chains. Amid orchards, meadows, fields and gardens stood a stone house, which from the style of its architecture seemed anti-revolutionary, as did the barn and other out houses. The building stood in a mountain gap, from both sides of which fountains of purest limpid water gushed in abundant streams. It was and is a spot soft and beautiful amid scenes of grandeur, and from which spreads a landscape embracing much of Franklin and Cumberland counties, and far on the back ground rise the hills of Adams.

"How far to a public house?" I demanded of an old man I met opposite the Antique Mansion. "Not far to a private one," he pleasantly replied, "but several miles to a tavern—but if it is rest and refreshment you want, walk in, this house is mine." The manner of the patriarch and the allurements of the place were too seductive to be resisted and with some acknowledgements I entered.

Dinner being ready, we sat down, and from my seat the view swept along the mountain slopes until lost in the far south western horizon. Amongst the crags of a not very distant precipice a white spot met my eye. It seemed too small and shapeless for a house and as my entertainer showed himself communicative, I asked him to explain the phenomena. At the question, the whole family, the old man, his wife and half-dozen younger ones whom I afterwards found were their children, all exchanged looks with arch smiles. I sat rather confused until the old man seeing my embarrassment apologised, and observed—"That is a house or rather our temple where we peep into futurity—in that house resides an old lady who can see farther into time than most people can into the north mountain."

I at once perceived that some joke lay beneath, and determined to give my share, replied "She might do that and not be able to tell who would be president of the United States in 1975."

"Oh! Lydia Ashbaugh never consults her familiar on politics," subjoined the old man, "but a few of our young people and some of our old ones have learned their fortunes, and as mother Rarity, as she is an honest witch, tells often more than her inquirers like to hear."

An honest witch, exclaimed I; is a new character—I had thought the whole craft, honest or dishonest, had become extinct."

"You have just travelled far enough to find your mistake in the supernatural," replied mine host, "we have not only one but two species here in our back woods—Any of our girls who are young and beautiful, and more particularly if rich, they are witches." Here for the soul of me I could not help exclaiming, "and more than one of that species are present"—as I glanced my eyes upon two of the most lovely and blushing faces that ever perched on an Appalachian ghast.

"Yes!" continued the not displeased parent, "but we have another species not a jot more mischievous than the first, and in their way, as much sought after. When a woman is single, old, ugly, and of all things else, poor, she is a witch, and of these marks, mother Rarity possesses at least the three first, and the world gives her credit for the last, and the numbers are not small, who within ten miles of this spot most conscientiously believe that she can speak all languages, knows every thing, especially what is to be, and that she can be where she pleases, when she pleases."

Let none of the readers of the Post, believe in their own infallibility so far as to suppose, that when they undertake to climb a mountain they can leave human nature at the base; since, if I may decide this problem by my own example, I must confess I brought up all my share to the farm house, and consequently was seized with a most anxious desire to see a person answering so well to the witch of Endor; but concealing my wishes under an air of levity, I aided the merriment which went round at the expense of—But heavens, as we were in the midst of our mirth, the door was darkened and we all turned to see why, when to my sight appeared certainly the most extraordinary figure in the human form I had ever beheld. The family seemed in no ways either surprised or alarmed, but I showed at least so much of the first that the apparition fixing her eyes, which were of powerful expression, on mine, observed—

"So Mark Bancroft is come to the north mountain to laugh at mother Rarity," and she grinned "a ghastly smile."

It may well be supposed this introduction did not lessen my expressions of astonishment, and my old host appeared to enjoy my confusion.

"Yes! old man," continued the hag, "well will it be for you if I don't change you into a rock or bear."

But I could perceive a lurking smile on the most expressive countenance I had ever beheld, and by the ill suppressed titter of the young, indeed the old ones, could easily see that the witch and the family understood each other, and all alike laughed under the rose at the folly of some of their neighbours. This afforded me a clue which I was determined to pursue, and with a something of mock gravity begged pardon for my levity, and in turn, expressed my wonder how I could be known in a place so remote from my former walks.

"Oh! you are confounded," said the seer, "do you know that I was on the stone beside you when the old soldier related his tale."

"Not the least suspicion crossed my mind that I was in such good company," replied I, "but since I have learned the fact, very much rejoiced am I."

"To have an emissary of the — and her master invisibly near you, eh!" interrupted mother Rarity, with a look which I too well remember even to forget, but which I shall not attempt to describe; it was just such a look as we might expect a witch to give to a person whom she knew to be possessed of the true secret of her craft. With this look and no farther ceremony, mother Rarity made a sign to my host which he no doubt understood as he rose, and apologising to me, observed he would return in a few moments, vanished into a back apartment of the house. The eyes of the residue of the family followed them with faces, as much as to say "we know."

Not quite as soon perhaps, as he himself expected, the old farmer and his terrible neighbour emerged again into view. The emissary of the prince of the power of the air, as she issued from the council chamber, came close to me and in a half whisper observed, "Mark, do you remember Marriot Cleaveland," but not waiting an answer, glided out of the house, without turning her head, and with erect step was soon lost to my view amongst the orchard trees, over which a bye path led to her cottage. I was rivetted to the chair on which I was sitting; my eyes followed the receding apparition, whilst a crowd of confused recollections rushed on my mind. Things and persons long forgotten returned to memory, but with the incoherency of a dream. The family, who only heard the voice without distinguishing the words, all fixed their gaze on my abstracted countenance, with an inquiring scrutiny, but left me uninterrupted to reverie until some exciting thought roused me to the reflection, that I was on the blue mountain, and not on the banks of the Swatara, and awaking as if from a painful sleep, I looked round the room very much like a person who felt something abashed.

"Mother Rarity has touched you with her rod," at length observed the old farmer, smiling.

Very much relieved by a renewal of plain human conversation, I replied, "she has touched and taxed my memory not a little. How she has learned my name except by aid of her old friend, is more than my poor brain can divine, but let her knowledge come from whence it may, she certainly does know my name, and of those I knew in my infant years more than my name." Here I paused, and indeed while speaking, came to a resolution which, however, I kept to myself, and rising, requested the charge for my fare.

The old farmer smiled and replied—"Nothing."

"Cheaper than city hospitality," rejoined I, "now favor me with the name of the mountain farmer who sets no value on the produce of his farm."

"Saul Standley does set great value on the produce of his farm, and when I can exchange it by cheering the sojourner, my price is paid." To this bowing I made a suitable reply and was again on my road.

The bland air, every moment changing mountain scenery, and the rather singular incidents of the day, all excited rapid reflections as I slowly descended the mountain. "I have not left Saul Standley's lamlet to return, no more, nor have I seen mother Rarity for the last time," muttered I to myself. "There have been some curious links in that part of the chain of my fortune which have been unbound, and no doubt these yet on the wheel are as variously twisted, contorted and rough to handle—indeed I must have a peep into the coil."

Indulging the judicious hope of having discovered a telescope with which to penetrate the distant and dark regions of futurity and in scanning the delightful scenery around me, darkness was falling heavy over the deep vales before the thought came where I was to lay my head. Starting as from a dream, the landscape, late so resplendent, was shrouded in shades which every moment rendered more solemn. A dead silence gives a something of awful loneliness to my feelings. The path, for in fact I had in my musings left the main road, was barely visible under the black shades. Suddenly I was arrested by the sharp barking of a small dog, who rushed almost to my feet, but retreating as I advanced, led me into a small opening of the woods in which appeared a cabin from which issued a man, who scolding his little noisy sentinel, then invited me to walk in.

"It is late friend," said I, "and necessary to find a lodging," such as I have I am willing to give unto thee," replied the man, and ushered me into his cabin.

Here a scene opened to my view which with all I had before seen, was new. The man, much above the middle size, and under middle age, had at once the open countenance, yet something of stern, which those who are initiated can never mistake, and says to them very plainly, "this man has been an officer, and has seen service." Beside a table and cradle, sat altogether the most striking female form I had ever beheld. Her face was not only pale but deadly pale, and yet her powerful black eyes seemed to have engrossed the whole energy of a soul of uncommon power. Her dress, as indeed every thing in the cottage was perfectly neat and clean; but the dress of this woman, in quality, bespoke coarseness and poverty, whilst in its adjustment and the easy air of the wearer appeared a being in disguise, a cultivated being who had been driven by adverse winds to this remote shelter. While engaged in such common place conversation as rose from our mode of coming together, and while a full grown black man was setting our supper table, and while as far as politeness, perhaps further, would allow, I was examining around me, the lady, for lady she was, had drawn her nestling forth, just such a cherub boy as might be expected as the child of such parents.

"Captain Woolford," at last observed the black servant, pointing to the supper table, and standing with the manner of a well drilled soldier when addressing his officer. A frank welcome came rather from the countenance than from the words of my entertainers, on whose faces, I could perceive an expression of sadness. After supper I was shown into a small shed room and to a bed partaking of the general appearance of the house. The thin plank door permitted me to hear every word above a whisper, and though unwilling, I was compelled to be a listener to a conversation, which drew sleep from my eye lids, not only whilst it was carried on but for the residue of the night. My Scotch Irishified tone had led the unsuspecting husband and wife, no doubt into the belief that they could talk French in my hearing with impunity. While indeed spending the evening with these interesting people, I found something of foreign in the accents of the wife; I was now to find that she was in reality, though a native of Pennsylvania, a French woman by her mother, and a German by her father.

After my departure for some time, their words, though spoken with great energy, was inaudible, being spoken in tones little above a whisper, but as their minds become excited their voices were raised and assumed a painful earnestness.

"Oh my Caroline, my sweet little Frederic," at last burst from the man, "thy own wretchedness is nothing—but the villain—"

"Cannot forever prosper," replied the wife—"Prosper," interrupted the husband in bitterness, "yes! such is the world, he may prosper and we perish with our infant"—Silence for a few moments followed this denunciation of the moral government of the world, but was broken by the man exclaiming "Caroline do you really think this man received your father's money?"

"As firmly as I believe my own being, and to the amount of at least twenty thousand dollars, and careless as my poor father was in his money affairs I have no doubt but that some written instrument was once in existence—but alas! that fire." Here the hard breathing of the man and the sobs of the woman, were the only sounds I heard from them for several minutes. She first regained her fortitude, and resumed observing—

"As to the claim which is crushing us, it is no doubt a forgery, but heaven will!"

"Yes! heaven has"—interrupted the man, and with this passionate exclamation, his words were again followed by breathing almost convulsive, whilst his more reflecting wife continued in a tone which gradually calmed the husband.

"Oh! James why aggravate our situation by such language—heaven preserved thee on the battle field—open thy noble breast and see that scar, which to my eye—yes! to my heart has always been thy greatest beauty. Heaven gave thee life, reason, and an integrity of soul above all wrong—if my unnatural uncle has robbed us, and if he drives us from this cabin, have we not health, education, and this," pointing no doubt to the face of their sleeping babe.

Never did I hear such an alteration of voice as I now heard from Captain James Woolford as he exclaimed, "God of infinite goodness and mercy forgive me, for thou knowest why I am tired—my own Caroline, my little Fred, my soul, my character, yes my utter contempt of all he can do." There was evidently much of camp religion in Captain Woolford's change of feeling, but with even that mixture, the change was salutary, and tranquilized the wife and mother, with much sweetness added—"Glad indeed would I be to think that my—yes I'll say my wretched uncle, had as good cause to sleep soundly this night as we have." Soon all was silent and peaceful round the rustic dwelling, and I fully believed that the so recently distressed parents were wrapt in as profound forgetfulness of their misfortunes as were their sleeping boy, and my reflections on the mysterious ways of both guilt and innocence were at length interrupted, nor were they resumed until the increasing light of day roused me to a remembrance, that I was still an actor on a theatre where few knew the part they were soon to be compelled to act.

Habituated to early risings as I had been, my soldier host was up before me; and as I issued from the bed room was met by a man, on whose face no despondency appeared—on the contrary the first smile I had seen to unbend his features, beamed on me as he observed, "my friend you are not a prisoner of war but of peace, and cannot be discharged until after breakfast."

"Your commands must be obeyed," Captain Woolford I replied—"such captivity is not very distressing—and if it had the burthen, would have been removed by the entrance of the angel of the scene."

What means I should have adopted to obtain more insight into the peculiar causes of distress so imperfectly revealed the evening before I know not, as plans had been laid in my breast previously to remain in the vicinity some time, and of course, expected to receive what I desired from public gossip. Our meal completed, with such acknowledgements only which such people would receive, I departed.

Still early and in the deep mountain valley the sun's light came only by reflection, and the long shadows of one ridge fell with a solemn and every moment changeable effect on its western neighbour. My path led me under a projecting precipice, rendered more gloomy by a brow of cedars and thick underwood. Glimpses of numerous farms flashed amongst the branches and foliage at intervals, and I was thinking to myself how I should proceed to obtain quarters for a few weeks, when my cogitations were completely interrupted by a figure gliding as if issuing from the bosom of the mountain, and another Rarity stood before me. How long we stood staring at each other I know not. My feelings were those of unutterable surprise. The countenance of the woman, I remember strongly but shall omit the vain attempt at description; there was an expression of mischief and derision. Whether or not she was awaiting me to break silence, I had not sufficient reflection to determine, but with a curl of lip, which might indeed well have suited a witch, she roused me to something like common sense by observing "Mark Bancroft bewitched," and laughed, such a laugh—it was not loud but awful, but as her features regained composure I with a little of embarrassment replied, "good woman would you ought with me?"

"Good woman, alas!" she inwardly murmured, and remaining silent for some time; abstracted, as if some terrible recollection had risen, and as I stood the image of astonishment at the strange encounter with a being who it was evident knew my name, but of whom with every effort of memory I could recall no trace.

"Yes!" at length she replied in great earnestness of manner, "I have sought thee for a purpose which will speak to thy soul. When thou departed yesterday from the door of one of the best men in whose house thou hast ever entered, I followed thee, and saw thee entering the house of mourning, but"—and here again she paused, whilst I remained in mute and really painful suspense to learn to what the scene was to lead.

"I saw thee enter," at length she resumed the mansion of sorrow, and now invite thee to the Witch's cave." Before I could answer she beckoned, and following her round the projecting rocks and by means of the scattered shrubs some distance up the mountain, until our view overtopped the trees of the valley below, and we had reached a shelf from which a most delightful landscape spread far down the mountain vale. Raising her shrivelled right arm and pointing to a very large farm house, observed in a voice which thrilled to my heart.

"Yesterday thou statest at the board of innocence and worth, to day—for why I am bound, but not now to explain, thou must enter the doors of hardened villainy, but"—and her gritted teeth and face displayed a ferocity, I never could have thought was human. The paroxysm was, however, brief, and she resumed.

"Amuse thyself until the sun has commenced a downward course, and then approach, enter and seek refreshment in that house. Thy money will procure what nature demands, observe the master of the house, scan his features, and then think if you have ever before seen such—turn thine eye up the mountain side to the left. Mark that white spot; it is a cabin passed by a path. Follow that path over the mountain top. Then turn your view to the left again and you will see a dark roof—it is the cave of mother Rarity, but enter it not with day light." So saying she whirled round with the rapidity of a bird, while, "fail not" was the last words I heard from her shrivelled and compressed lips as darting round a projection of the rocky ledge, she disappeared.

"Strange! strange!" muttered I to myself "that I should be spell-bound by such a being, but I am, and must know why, and as if compelled by an irresistible power, followed her directions. The day was sultry and close for autumn weather, and fatigued with my rambles something after mid-day, I entered the house so terribly denounced by the mysterious woman. I was indeed met at the threshold by those harbingers of inhospitality, two fierce dogs, which were, however silenced by a man of middle age who advanced, and when the noise of his seninels were hushed, demanded my business in no inviting tone.

"My business," I replied, is to procure a dinner for which I expect to pay"—Umph, was the reply as he waved me in with a sweep of his brawny hand and arm—It is probable had no intimation been given of the man, I should have regarded his physiognomy in a high degree sinister, but influenced as I felt the glance of his dark and deep set eyes excited almost a shudder. He was taciturn and replied to my remarks by monosyllables, and to my few questions still more briefly. But he could not prevent nor suspect the true object of my visit, which in fact, I very faintly surmised myself. My dinner which was coarse being finished and paid for, I departed and as directed, ascended the mountain, ever and anon halting to behold the fine and every moment changing scenery, and ruminating on the singular lodging house I was approaching—but slow as I advanced, the afternoon seemed to lengthen as my curiosity became more intense, and the long shadows of even appeared to linger as if to mock my impatience. Before the sun had sunk behind the western mountains I found myself seated on a rock amid a grove of chestnut saplings above the cottage of the witch. As twilight fell black and heavy, the unbroken silence was awful. A storm would have given relief, but not a leaf moved, not a sound disturbed the fearful pause. As the moments of entering the lone habitation at length came round, I must confess the palace of an emperor would have been approached with less trepidation. But what must be must be, thought I, as a hand cold and hard touched my cheek. Starting to my feet, in the gloom of the now closing night, stood before me a form which could not be mistaken—it was the witch. "Enter and fear not," was her invitation as she turned and led me into the cave, for such in part was her dwelling.

A lamp shedding faint light over bare walls—walls of rough unhewn and unwashed logs. Combined with the circumstances which preceded, there was a chilling horror in the scene. Before me stood the tall form of the recluse, her hollow visage and grey locks bespeaking pain and sorrow. Mute we stood for a few moments, when in a totally changed voice she earnestly exclaimed:

"Lord I thank thee," and turning round flung open a door and to my utter surprise, on a table covered with green cloth stood two elegant silver candlesticks, with two brilliant candles shedding strong light over a white washed room. This room was without regular form as it was partly excavated from the natural rock. A bed stood on one side and clothing covered with dust hung on the walls, as did several picture frames, screened with black gauze, also rendered grey with dust. A large bible and several other books lay on the table. Opposite to the bed stood a book case, which from the workmanship was evidently a relic of a past century, but now appeared as if torn by an electric stroke, standing as if shattered by some explosive force.

"Look around," said the woman, "you are now in a room, no human being but myself has ever before entered. It was formed by Him, who also formed these mountains, and fashioned by these hands;" and she held up her long, bony, slender, embrowned and sinewy arms and hands before my face. I could bear in silence the scene no longer, and with something of irritation, observed, "Woman why all this? for what am I here?"

Her lips quivered but her looks quailed not as she steadfastly returned my fixed look, and replied by repeating, "for what am I here?" Iying energetic emphasis on I; and turning round while her eyes were still fixed on mine, she removed the veil from before one of the pictures. The moment the craze was removed I started back exclaiming with the utmost astonishment, "Sophia Markland." Before me appeared a half length portrait of a too well known face, but a face I had not seen for nearly thirty years; but the fine blue eyes, exquisite teint and expression, the glossy and abundant ringlets, and a thousand painful remembrances, all rushed upon my heart with electric rapidity. My hostess left me a few moments a victim to surprise indescribable, until I again half inwardly murmured, "poor murdered Sophia, where did heaven's vengeance sleep when thy betrayer and destroyer escaped?"

"Heaven's never slept," interrupted the woman, but like the spark which sifted that casket, "pointing to the shattered desk, the stroke may be delayed." She again paused and then continued, "what dost thou suppose was the final fate of Sophia Markland?" "Drowned in the Susquehanna, alas!" I replied. "In which her corpse was never found," rejoined the woman. "Not that I ever learned!"

"Or could learn," was the rapid interruption, "years of tears, pain, sickness, remorse, and all else, which can render life a punishment, would have been saved to the miserable Sophia, had the water been her friend as supposed. But Mark Bancroft, time presses—we cannot wait to trifle—turn your eyes from the unconscious picture and look on this face." I did turn, and scanned the wrinkled features in vain to surmise why the request. "The ruin is too complete," she at length exclaimed in bitterness, "nought of Sophia Markland," and she sunk into a chair, her head falling between her knees, with convulsive sobs—

A flash of lightning seemed to pass over my mind, and in its glare appeared the spirit of the long lost Sophia. I paced the room for some time at intervals repeating the name, and that of Eltham Heathfield, names too fearfully connected. I was now convinced that the wasted and withered form beside me, was what remained of the once most attractive and beautiful Sophia, but I suffered the storm of regret to spend its force, and then drawing a chair sat down beside the recluse, and in a soothing tone observed, "Sophia, for you are Sophia, remember the days of our youth." My words fell as calm on a wounded heart, and raising her head, she smiled as a sun beam from a summer cloud, and ejaculated—"Oh how delightful twenty-five long years have passed since the human voice has fallen on this heart in kindness."

She rose and passing into the outer room, bathed her feverish head with cool water, returned and sat down with a composure as if nothing extraordinary had occurred, but her eye falling perhaps accidentally, on the representation of what she had been, she started up, replaced the veil and again sat down, and pulling out a drawer of the table, drew forth a bundle of papers, bound with a blue ribbon, laid them between us with the mysterious observation, "heaven's vengeance reposes but sleeps not in that packet," and then continued, "I am now to explain, why we are both here? therefore hear the witch's story.—Fear no listeners. Those who are above the belief of witches, are above the meanness, and those who are not, would expect worse than the vengeance of heaven if they dared come near this cell in stealth."

"The history of my family I need not relate—all that is known to thee as well as to myself—nor need I recall the too much courted Sophia, but it is necessary I should relate circumstances, with which your were, with the world in general, only acquainted by common report. While in Philadelphia and near completing my education, I was accidentally introduced to a young man, whose name, Eltham Heathfield, will be ere long restored to your recollection. At the moment, considered beautiful, and greatly richer than I was in fact, was flattered, followed, envied and hated by most of my female friends, and pursued as prey by some of the other sex. Passions too powerful for reason, but with a heart in which neither affections or its opposite were moderate, it was not in my power to love otherwise than to excess. To most of the young gentlemen of my circle, I was only and merely acquainted by sight to most of them, my feelings at least were those of indifference. To all this, Eltham Heathfield was an exception. Mixing with the first society, his manners were polished—his coldness I then attributed to good sense—but I was to learn a deeper cause. A near relation of the family in which I boarded, Heathfield had unlimited admittance to my company and he profited of the advantage. Few words now are left—I was deeply, purely, and unchangeably as I thought, attached, and in the full confidence of full return was in the warmth of youth, planning how faithfully the duties of wife should be performed. No reason have I now to disguise and in the face of heaven I declare, I do not believe any other woman ever more sincerely looked forward to wedded happiness founded on faithful discharge of the highest obligations. These were dreams—youthful dreams—my guardian spirit slept and I became the slave of a powdered villain. My idol was changed to a demon. The visits of my destroyer were made at lengthening intervals—still, however, though rendered less happy I was unconscious of the gulf opening before me. Seated one evening on a sofa in the common parlor—the sun had set, but the candles not yet lighted, I felt something of undefined dis-dress, from which I was roused by a well known tread.—The figure glided in and without speaking presented a letter, which in the dim light I could but see, and also in silence, wheeled and in much astonishment I was again alone. "This is a new freak of Eltham," thought I, as ringing for a light, I rose and when the light came went up stairs to my own room. With an anxiety I could not repress or account, for the letter was opened, and with an effort yet to me inscrutable, it was read and thrown on the table. My very soul felt frozen. The whole horrors of my situation lay before me, painted in few words by my murderer—for to all purposes of earthly enjoyment death spread his veil over me from that fatal night,—a night on which no bed was pressed by the ruined Sophia. But every one has their own manner of meeting calamity. Happiness and the man who trampled on my heart were gone together—that heart was bruised, but not crushed—love was there replaced by hatred—undying hatred.—And here she paused and all the demon shook her frame and distorted her truly haggard features—but the storm had a pause and she resumed.

"Over a fallen daughter there was no mother to weep, and wither broken hearted—no sister to share the blight of lost reputation—no brother to pierce or be pierced by the foul betrayer—but there was a father, grey with age, and feeble in health to receive or reject an erring child.—To that father, I was determined to appeal—on earth he was the only hope, and failed me not in the hour of shame and sorrow. To my native home I fled, leaving my city friends to their surmises. On my father's breast I leaned and to his heart was taken, forgiven and consoled, as far as human consolation would soften misery like mine. In the very room where I was born, I became the mother of a son, whom erst I had hoped to bestow on a dotting husband and father.

"Utterly secluded, and seen only by my only parent, and a deaf and dumb servant girl, I nursed my babe, watering his innocent face with my tears. My father you know was a man of uncommon good sense, and I know he was also a man of kindest feeling, and why he sunk not to the grave under so much affliction from the hand of an only daughter, is altogether unaccountable, but he is still living, and with all the world but yourself believes the tale of my suicide in the Susquehanna. In open day my native farm is visible from this den. But I must haste to conclude my story of wretchedness.

"The name of my seducer was never repeated to my father—indeed the only stern command I ever received from him was not to name the monster—a command I had no inclination to disobey. Time passed and my boy began to lisp in our native tongue, when as was his daily custom, my father came in and sitting down began to play with little James, observing "we have a new neighbour, Thomas Milford has sold his farm to a new comer named Eltham Heathfield," and diverted by the child's gambols, the effect on me was unobserved. In fact my heart was frozen to every thing beyond the room, but even ice must yield. The cruelty that had been practised upon me now came home more terribly than ever. No exertion of mind would prevent me from contrasting what I might, what I ought to be as the mistress of the very farm on which you paid for a miserable dinner this day—yes! that sour miser—that suffering wretch, poor in possession of great wealth, is Eltham Heathfield. * * *

"Knowledge of his existing in our vicinity preyed upon me—I became fretful, irritable, and disrespectful to my protector, my father, and only friend. The face of my boy became even hateful—I thought I could trace a likeness which a disordered mind rendered striking. My father noticed, and attributing my altered conduct to sickness, but it was not sickness of body; it was worse; it was sickness of mind. At some moments I was conscious of my true situation, but in solitude, the brain was preyed upon by the horrid phantoms of its own creation."

Here she paused and sat as if listening to some distant voice—but it was the effect of overpowering remembrance, and as I sat the picture of anxious attention, she started and resumed.

"You are now to hear what will require all your confidence to believe possible. As the sun shone through a grated window I awoke, and starting up called to my child which I thought in the bed—no child was there. I then called to my father—the walls answered by echo. I stared around me, every thing was changed. Springing to my feet, I stood petrified and exclaimed, "this must be a dream," and to convince myself I was not dreaming actually struck the wall with my forehead. I was no longer deceived, but reason would soon again have deserted its post, had not a door opened and a woman, an entire stranger, but with a most benevolent look stood before me. I was motionless with unutterable wonder, as she advanced towards me taking my hand and leading me back to the bed, "am I in the regions of the dead?" I at length demanded.

"Poor sufferer," replied my protector, "you are still amongst the children of mortality—you are on earth—but lie down and be composed." I obeyed and she sat down by me, and in a most mild and tender tone I was comforted.

"My reason was restored—but many days elapsed before I learned that I had been five years in a mad house, in the state of ——— four hundred miles from my home. The first time I beheld myself in a mirror, I started back with horror. I could not have believed that death itself could have made such a change. My hair was now scanty and grey—all the most fearful ravages of age and distress were united. I requested a bible and one was given me. I read, reflected, and found that my intellects were restored, and then requested the presence of the attending physician. He came, and in him I met a gentleman, and man of real science on the subject he was appointed to superintend. In a few conversations he became convinced of my sanity. With the cunning of madness I had concealed my name, and though I made the physician a confident so far as to account for my recent situation, my name, place of birth or any circumstance which could lead to any knowledge of myself or connections, I concealed.

"Dead I am regarded, no doubt, by all who ever knew me," I inwardly reflected, "and dead I am determined to remain—no one can recognise Sophia Markland under this disguise. Tenderly—in reality, too tenderly nurtured, I was very unprepared to labor for a living, but I was determined to labor. Silent, submissive, and regarded as a repentant Magdalen, I found many compassionate hearts. How or by what possible means I had wandered over the space between the insane hospital and my native home, I never can know, as I never can remember; but over the same space I returned as a common female laborer, and still a young woman in years but blasted by misfortune. I re-crossed the Susquehanna, and again beheld my native mountains, perfectly mistress of my mother's language, the German; I assumed the name by which, when I am not known as mother Kariy, I have since passed. Performing the duty of a common servant, Lydia Ashbaugh has remained unsuspected in her own father's house—has attended in sickness and health, her own son, and wept over him bitter tears which fell unseen by mortal eye. In several instances my own tragic story has been related to me or in my hearing, with all its additions of falsity. Some of my clothing was found, according to the tale, on an island near Harrisburg, but my body even report never pretended to have found. Not a living soul out of this room, I sincerely believe, has the most distant suspicion that Lydia Ashbaugh is the ruin of Sophia Markland, and to my grave should the secret have descended, had not recent circumstances opened a scene which compels me to unmask to save my son from the fangs. But let me be cool,"—cool as far as passion could excite heat, she was not—but as before, I let the fire burn, and after another pause she again continued.

"Determined that my child should not, as far as I could prevent it, share his mother's shame and wretchedness, I left frequenting my father's house as James approached to manhood. This ground on which I reside was the property of my mother, and is of course now mine; have actually leased from my own father. First a ridiculous story was raised by ignorance that I was a witch, or worse. I had long ceased to laugh, but I smiled at the notion of supernatural association, and finding it threw an atmosphere of fear around me, I let it pass. The wise laugh and the fools dread, and so let them. The hour is hastening on when my real power will be shown in thunder."

"Amid all my trials and changes, from the moment I received the fatal letter from the hand of Eltham Heathfield, there is one passion which has never abated in my bosom. A voice has always seemed to whisper, "the day will come when you can take vengeance on that man." This voice I have heard in whispers in all hours of the day and night, in every season of the year; on the return of long suspended reason, it came again and animated me in toil. In search of this, good twenty-five years have I toiled, and am now very soon to reap the fruits, and astonishing as it may sound in your ears, in part by your aid—interrupt me not—you will soon hear and gladly will your aid be granted. But let me return back on time.

"Maria Heathfield, once the sister of an unworthy brother, was much the younger of the two. They were the only children of parents long departed, and to rid himself probably of superintending her education, Maria was sent to an aunt in Philadelphia, where at an age too little advanced to admit much reflection, she fell into company with an emigrant French gentleman, which eventuated in an attachment and marriage. In many respects Maria was fortunate in her connexions. M. Stephen Montault, was a gentleman in the proper meaning of the term. He was tender and affectionate to his wife, and transported with delight when their only child, a daughter, called Caroline, bloomed in sportiveness. Montault was for this country, rich, but remarkably confiding. This quality was cultivated to profit by Heathfield the brother, who in a very few years had contrived to borrow most of his brother-in-law's capital. But matters went smooth on the surface until the declining health and final death of Maria removed the tie between them.

Rendered wretched by the loss of his adored wife and becoming dissatisfied with the conduct of her brother, Montault demanded the return of his money, announcing his intention to remove to New York. Difficulties increased, and from a real friendship on the part of the Frenchman, open enmity succeeded, and legal redress threatened. Things were in this train, when in the dead of night the house of Montault was involved in flames.—The fire I believe was accidental, but his character exposed Heathfield to suspicion. The natural impulse of Montault in the alarm was to save his child, which he effected with great difficulty, and at the expense of his own life, scorched by the flames, a raging fever was the consequence, and from the moment of seeing his child in safety, Stephen Montault never was in a situation to give any direction as to his affairs, and on the sixth day after his last misfortune, was laid beside the remains of his wife.

Now all was changed with this family; Maria was an orphan, at the mercy of her unnatural uncle. He administered on the property, sold in due time the personal effects, and no doubt to blind the world, sent Caroline to Philadelphia, where, whatever was his motive, she received her education. A few things were saved from the fire, and amongst the rest, that desk, which after falling into other hands was sold to me for a trifle—but little indeed did I suspect its value. In that corner it stood many years, while other changes were in the womb of time. I never committed a theft but one, if that was really a theft—I stole my own picture and placed it over the desk, and there have they dust-covered remained, shut from every eye but mine.

While all these events were occurring, my son rose to manhood. The idol of my poor old father, James, received a tolerable education. In a mother's eye he was not only a fine, but an elegant young man, and little did he suppose that the heart of a fond mother beat in the bosom of the menial that took her highest pleasure in washing and arranging his clothing. Mystery indeed hung over his birth, though under the name of James Woolford, start not—Captain James Woolford is my son, and Caroline was once Caroline Montault; but be calm and listen. The last war called to the field many others, and amongst them my noble boy. Oh! how my bosom beat when honored with wounds and high in character, he returned into his native country. The train of circumstances which brought James and Caroline together, you will learn at a future day; suffice it to say that to my delight they became man and wife, but their uncle either felt or pretended to feel great indignation, and whatever was the motive, his enmity was durable and serious. The long minority of Caroline left her uncle undisturbed, and when her husband made demands on her property, they were met by the taunt that they had nothing to receive, but on the contrary a large claim against her father was urged. My son was irritated at what he regarded injustice, and unconscious of their real relationship, personal violence was only prevented by the interference of others. After the most diligent search, not a trace of a litigation could be found to substantiate the rights of Caroline to her father's property. Involved in lawsuits and persecuted by a haughty relation, this father and mother is now reduced to indigence, and despair; but how will their condition be changed to-morrow?"

Now beamed something of the once beautiful Sophia Markland. She rose to her feet—her eyes shot with a lustre, I could not behold without astonishment; but she checked her transports and again sat down, seizing at the same time the packet which during her harrowing narrative lay on the table. "You see that broken desk," said she, pointing to the ruined piece. "It shall be mended with clasps of silver."

If I was rivetted by any part of the scene I was still more so at what was now placed before me. With great composure Sophia unfolded the papers, and laid them on the table writing downwards—when done, she again addressed me in words not to be forgotten.

"You remember the thunder storm of last week," "well" I replied—"and well do I remember it," she subjoined, "never subject to dread of lightning and thunder, on the contrary, from a child I was rather delighted with the awful display, and on the night I have mentioned, I was sitting in that outer room viewing the flashes and hearing the echoes from mountain to mountain, when I was stunned by an explosion which seemed to burst from the earth and rend her bowels. My desolate dwelling was struck—you see that split beam. From that the shock fell upon the desk, and threw the fragments over the room. A remark I had once heard in Philadelphia now occurred to my mind. "It was that the same place or same object is never, or very rarely, if ever, affected twice by the electricity of the same storm, and that any object or place once touched by an electric shock, is rarely ever again subject to like accident. I therefore now regarded my cabin in safety, and as the storm passed away sought my lone couch, and with the elements was soon at rest."

"The next morning as day strengthened, I saw the effect of the stroke of the bolt. The desk was literally shivered, but those and some other papers arrested my attention, and on examination I found that the back part had contained a secret till or kind of drawer, which burst by the explosion, its contents lay scattered over the floor. After examining some loose fragments of no moment, I picked up the one containing these papers; and now let us glance upon their faces, and learn what they reveal, and here do you know that writing?" saying this she handed me the paper, and what was my astonishment to see a document written in a hand of great neatness and peculiarity, it was that of a teacher, under whose care I had myself learned to write—but of infinitely greater importance was its tenor. It was a duly executed mortgage, for the money lent by Stephen Montault to his brother-in-law, and the other documents in the same packet were bonds and other obligations which had been thus so remarkably preserved.

In mingled joy and astonishment, I read these precious records, handing them over to the exulting mother, who again folding them up very carefully while observing, "on to-morrow a meeting is to take place at Saul Standley's—who is not only justice of the peace, but a peace maker. Eltham Heathfield is to meet his injured son.—He shall have one chance more to recede and do justice. Let him refuse and all shall be revealed.—If, but I need not hope, his day is come, and my son and his wife and child shall be restored to their rights. You can attest to this hand writing come what will. Be at Standley's and before mid-day to-morrow."

The reader need not be told that I was at Standley's at the time appointed, and found by the manner of the old squire that I was expected. I was first on the ground but had not long to wait. Captain James Woolford was next. His noble countenance was care worn, and I could or thought I could see despair and anxiety contending, and dreaded the consequence on his mind of the revelation I knew was to be made. My lips were, however, sealed. The last words of Sophia Markland, to me on parting, were "let Heathfield do justice, and then what has passed must forever remain unknown to the world."

The distressed Woolford was too much occupied with his forebodings of evil to speak much, and I for a different reason was also silent, but watched with increasing anxiety the path over the field where I knew the witch would approach. Her figure at length appeared, and when at some distance Woolford observed her, and exclaimed "Good God is that woman to be here?"

I could not refrain from observing, "that woman will do you no harm." Woolford regarded me in silent displeasure, and conscious of my own imprudence, I felt too awkward to give excuse, nor really had I time, as Sophia entered, and to the surprise of the family, well and neatly dressed, and was quickly followed by Heathfield.

"What a meeting between a father and son," said I, mentally. A scowl of the most repulsive kind sat on the face of the father, and to the friendly greeting of the old magistrate he scarcely deigned to grumble a reply, and without sitting down, very roughly demanded, "what is the particular object of troubling me to come here, squire?" and without allowing the squire to explain, went on, "I was not obliged to come, nor have I much time to wait."

Every eye in the room was fixed on him, but there was one of intense scrutiny, and which as he closed his rude address to the magistrate drew his full attentions, as the question met his ear. "Eltham Heathfield, do you intend to do justice to your brother's child?" He evidently shrunk from the speaker, but attempted to conceal his feelings by turning to the squire and asking in a loud tone, "What has this hag to do with my affairs?" This to him fatal expression sealed his fate. Sophia had entered the house with her portrait carefully wrapped up, and as the insulting term hag fell from Heathfield, she laid the frame on a table as she rose. Her form always commanding, seemed to gain supernatural height. "Hag," she repeated as Heathfield quailed under her dreadful glance, "and are you prepared to learn who made me a hag?—Do you dare to look on that face?" and she unwrapped her portrait and set it before him. The very heart's blood of the man seemed frozen—his face assumed a hue incomparably more appalling than death. Every joint shook, and his tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth—not so Sophia, who with an expression of ineffable disdain again repeated "hag—yes! in madness, in sickness, in shame and in poverty, and even in want have I been for long and bitter years a hag, the scorn of the base and an object of pity to the good—long have I awaited this hour and now I hurl back on the head of my betrayer, the obloquy he has heaped on mine—once more Heathfield, are you ready to do justice to your brother's daughter?" What answer the crushed and confounded wretch would have made can never be known, as while his lips quivered, she was too much excited to wait and in a voice of still more dreadful import added, "No! under any circumstance can you do justice, but justice shall be done on you—behold that man and she pointed to Woolford, who with us all stood without power of words or motion, awaiting the termination of a scene in which so many developments seemed to rise as from the grave.

"Do you examine that face carefully, while I prepare something more for your comfort." The faces indeed of the father and son, for very different reasons were indeed steadfastly fixed on each other, as Sophia laying down her portrait, opened the packet, handing one paper after another to the old and astonished magistrate, and then again addressing Heathfield, observed, "A few fleeting moments and you might have retired to your home, and so would I have done to mine, and went to the grave unrevenged—for as the hour approached I shrunk from revealing to that injured man who was his father. But—but—I could not see him and his wife and child robbed. Behold your son and mine!"

In a moment the mother and son were in each others arms. The father heard no more—he fell writhing in agony, and—but let me draw a veil over the residue of this scene.

* * * * *

In a few days after the funeral of the uncle, Maria Woolford, for his mother and grandfather would not hear of his assuming the name of Heathfield, and her husband therefore was by her made master of the ample fortune of his father. The mother removed and resided with them, but remained secluded. With very great caution her existence was made known to her aged father, who in a few years breathed his last breath upon her bosom. In memory of their many vicissitudes and in the calm enjoyments of the goods of the earth, this family lives in tranquility and peace. The very name of Heathfield is a forbidden sound in their dwelling.

MARK BANCROFT.

MOONLIGHT.

The moon hath risen o'er the silent height
Of the blue vaulted heavens, and each star
Is faintly glimmering in its silver light,
That dimly shows the mountains' tops afar,
And lights the fleecy clouds, that form its car,
But not obscure its brightness, while around
The spell of silence hangs o'er earth and air,
And not a rude, intruding voice or sound,
Falls on the air, or mars the solitude profound.

O Nature! thou art lovely at this hour,
Whilst thou art sleeping 'neath this placid ray,
Thy charms are in their plenitude of power;
And tho' the bounding heart may beat more gay,
To view the opening of the joyous day,
There is a softer feeling rises now,
Tho' not unmix'd with sadness—and the play
Of vivid fancy's bright creative glow,
Gives place to higher thoughts—and nobler feelings flow.

Bright orb, thou art most lovely! who could gaze
With coldness or with carelessness at thee!
Or view the earth illumined by thy rays,
Nor feel the spirit for a moment free
From all terrestrial feelings—can it be,
That in thy bosom parted spirits dwell?
It may be fancy's whisper, but to me
It sounds scarce strangely, tho' my heart may swell
To think thou art the home of joy unspeakable.

This is but wild imagination's flight!
Yet a soft witchery is in thy beam,
That sheds its influence o'er the gloom of night,
And wraps my soul within its magic beam.
Till heaven and earth are mingled, and I seem
With airy beings of the land of thought,
To hold high converse, till I almost deem
They are indeed with life and being fraught,
And not in fancy's wild creative visions wrought.

Now come the gathering thoughts of other days,
And all the scenes that by-past hours have known;
And fancy sheds her reminiscent rays
Around the hopes and pleasures that have flown—
And gives again to being every tone,
That once was wont to wake our bosoms' swell,
When heard from lips of friends, that round us shone
Like lovely planets—till the parting knell
Gave token we should bid the last, the sad farewell!

This is the hour for silent thought, for sleep
And pure devotion—while thy placid ray
Keeps watch above the world, that rests in sleep—
When all the bustle and the glare of day,
And all unquiet thoughts have pass'd away—
Like sinking storms from Ocean's troubled breast,
When evening sunbeams o'er its waters play,
And all the raging of the winds suppress,
The waves in heavings soft, sink into quiet rest!

FROM SCHILLER.

Deep in the earth the golden seed is laid,
And spring shall yield young bud and waving blade,
In Time's fast-closing furrow what shall bloom?
Burst the dull earth, and spring from thy forgotten tomb?

"O, papa!" said a little girl the other day, "why won't you buy me one of those Highland shawls?" "I mean to buy one for a horse blanket," said he. "Well, I don't care," said the little girl, "the horse may wear it nights, but I'll have it to wear day times."

THE DROWNED FISHERMAN.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

In the immediate neighbourhood of Duncannon Fort, along that portion of the coast which contracts into the Waterford river, there are a number of scattered cottages standing either singly or in small clusters along a wild and picturesque sea-shore—more wild, perhaps, than beautiful, although the infinite number of creeks, and bays, and overhanging rocks, vary the prospect at every hundred yards; and I know nothing more delightful than to row during a long summer evening, from the time when the sun abates his fierceness until the moon has fairly risen upon the waters, nothing more delightful than to row—now in, now out, now under the hanging rocks, now close upon the silver-sanded bays, where thousands of many coloured shells form the most beautiful Mosaic beneath the transparent waters. So deep is the tranquillity of land and sea during those happy hours, that travellers would find it difficult to believe they were really floating beneath the shadow of the Irish coast; that the lovely village of Templemore smiling on the brink of the Waterford river, was inhabited by the "savage cut-throats," which it is the delight of a peculiar party to denominate the suffering peasantry of a land who for centuries have "laughed and laboured" upon worse food and worse treatment, than we in rich and happy England, bestow upon our dogs—oh, it makes my heart ache, and my blood boil, when I think of what I have seen, and contrast it with what I hear; when I remember that whether priest-ridden or law-ridden, the heads of either party have been fanatics or worse—but what have I to do with this? I love the green turf of my native country, I laugh at its follies, I weep over its sorrows and grieve for its crimes; ah! a woman's smiles and a woman's tears are alike useless—but what have you, gentle reader to do with that? I have never entered upon, and do not wish to enter upon, any subject that trenches on the political grievances of Ireland; I can only pray—which I do with all my heart and soul!—that times may mend, and speedily. I have endeavoured to win the suffrages of my dear English friends for the virtues and domestic privations of my humble countrywomen; and I have endeavoured to show to Irish people how their besetting sins of carelessness and inconsiderateness might be corrected—corrected without much trouble, and with great advantage to themselves; as far as Ireland is concerned I have no ambition beyond what I have stated, and having so said, I will tell my story:

"And what 'ud ail the boat but to do? Sure she's done, ay, and done a dale for us, this ten years; and as to the hole, Jemmy 'il plug his hat into it, or stick in a piece of sail cloth, and what 'ud ail her then, but sail God bless her!—like a swan or a curlew, as she always does!"

"Dermot—Dermot, darling! listen to me for one't!"

"Faith," replied Dermot to his better half, Kate Browne, while his keen blue eye twinkled with that mixture of wit and humour so truly Irish, "Faith, my dear, I'll accommodate you in any way I can, for I'll listen to you one't for three speakings—come, out with it, and don't stand twisting your face that was one't so purty as to win the heart and hand of the handsomest man in the parish, and that is—myself, Dermot Browne at your service, Mistress Kate Browne, madam! Don't keep lengthening your face to the length of a herring-net, but out with it!—out with it!—at one't!"

"Dermot, I've got the box of tools quite convenient; I brought it with me to the shore, and the last time I was in Waterford, I bought all sortings of nails, large and small; and there's plenty of board in the shed—and Dermot, mend the hole, and God bless you!—sure its the sore heart I'd have when you'd be on the wather, to think that any harm would happen you—it won't take you any thing like an hour —"

"An hour! God bless the woman, why a body would think you had never been a fisherman's wife! An hour would turn the tide—and the luck!—an hour! Why, the herrings out yonder would miss my company if I waited; and all for what? To go to the trouble of nailing a bit o' board on a mite of a hole, when it will be just as easy to stop it with a hat!"

"But not as safe, Dermot?"

"Be asy with your safety! You're always touching on that;—ay, will it, and as safe too; haven't I done it before?—Why turn up every one of the boats along the shore, and I'll bet you the cod I mean to catch against a branyan that there isn't as sound a boat as my own on the sands; doesn't Harrison's go without a rudder?—doesn't Michan's go without a mast—barring a gag of a gate-post that he pulled out of Lavery's field? I'm sure Michael Murphy's craft is bang full of drowsy holes like a riddle; and a good noggin he won on that, for he betted Lanty Moore that at the present time the keel of his boat had more holes in it than Lanty's English sieve which he had winnowing corn; and sure enough he won; for the holes in the sieve were all stopped up with the dirt! Lend a hand, old girl, and help me and the boy to shove her off!" He continued appealing to his wife, "What!—you won't? Why thin, Kate agna, what ails ye?—I've been your true and faithful husband next Candle-mass will be seventeen years, and you never refused me a hand's turn before!" Still Kate Browne moved not; and her husband, using, with his eldest son, considerable exertion to push off the boat, became annoyed at her obstinacy.

Kate saw, but, contrary to her usual habit, heeded not. She stood, with folded arms and tearful eyes, surveying the proceedings, without possessing the power of putting a stop to preparations, of the termination of which she had a fearful presentiment.

"Why, thin, look at your mother, Benje!" exclaimed Browne to his son, "sure she's enough to set a man mad, and her's the help that's as good as five—she has such a knowledge of setting every thing straight. Kate!" he exclaimed to his wife:—

"Let her alone, father dear," interrupted the boy, "let her alone, and don't vex her more, don't ye see there's a tear in her eye?"

"And how can I help that?" expostulated the father, looking kindly towards his wife at the same time; "them women are ever so hard to manage, and manage as ye will, ye can't find 'em out;—there's the sun shining above her head, the waters dancing and capering, like jewels at her feet, the herrings crying 'Come, and catch me,' and Benje, between you and I, as handsome a husband, and as fine, ay, and for the matter of that, as good a boy for a son as woman's heart could wish, and yet the tears are in her eyes, and the corners of her mouth drawn as far down as if she did nothing but sup sorrow all her life." Benjamin, the fisher's only child, made no reply; and, after a moment's pause, his father looked at him and said, "Why boy, you look as much cast down as your mother—stay on shore and good luck to you!"

"No, father, that I won't! I'll not put more to the trouble she's in, by letting you go by yourself; I wish from my heart the boat was mended, if it would make her easy."

"Don't bother about the boat, boy," replied Browne, "I never meddle or make with her house, or land business; hasn't she got a back door for the cabin?—a sty for the poor pig!—a chaney dish for the pratees, and a white table-cloth for saints-day and bonfire nights?—can't she stay at home and mind them, and let me and the cobble alone?" Benjamin loved the wild and careless spirit of his father better than the prudence and forethought of his mother; yet did he not forget that the very arrangements and luxuries to which his father alluded were solely the effects of her care and industry.

"Won't you say, God speed me, Kate?" inquired the fisherman as he pushed off his dangerous craft with a broken ear. "Won't you say, God speed me and the boy?" The women clasped her hands suddenly and fervently together, and dropping on her knees without moving from the spot on which she had been standing, uttered a few earnest words of supplication for their safety. Benjamin sprang on the shingles, and raising his mother affectionately in his arms, whispered—

"Keep a good heart, we will be back with such bounding fish, before morning, any how; and mother darling, if you see Statia Byrne, here is the neckerchief she promised to hem for me; tell her not to forget her promise." The kisses Mrs. Browne bestowed on her son were mingled with tears. She watched the boat until it had dwindled to a small speck on the horizon. As she turned to ascend the cliff, she saw the round laughing face of Statia Byrne peer from behind a rock, and withdraw itself instantly on being perceived. She called to her; and after a little time Statia came blushing, and smiling, and lingering by the way to pluck every sprig of samphire, every root of seapink, that grew within her reach.

"I just came down to gather a few bits of herbs for the granny's cures, and a few shells to keep the childre asy," said Statia—pulling her sea-pinks to pieces at the same time.

"And what does the granny cure with these?" inquired Mrs. Browne.

"Sorra a know I know," replied the girl, blushing still more deeply.

"Maybe," continued Mrs. Browne, gravely, "may be Stacy honey, there's a charm in them like the yarrow you put under your pillow last Holy-eve night?"

"Ah, thin, Mistress Browne, ma'am let me alone about the yarrow—sure it was only out of innocent mirth I did it, and no harm; and, any way, I've no belief in such things at all, at all."

"And why do you disbelieve them?" inquired the fisherman's wife. Statia made no reply. "I can tell you," she continued; "because though you neither spoke nor laughed that blessed night, my poor girl, after you placed the yarrow under your pillow—still you did not dream of Benje Browne. Stacy, Stacy, I mind the time myself when, if a spell worked contrary, I'd disbelieve it directly—its only human natur, darling."

Statia Byrne flung her handful of sea-pinks upon the shingles, and passed the back of her hand across her eyes, for they were filled with tears.

"You have thrown away the granny's pinks," said Kate, pointing to the flowers that the sea-breeze was scattering far and wide.

"Ah, thin, let me alone Mistress Browne dear!" exclaimed the girl. "And good bye, for the present, ma'am; I'm sure the child'll be woke before this, and mother is carding wool, so she'll want me now."

"Good bye, Statia—but stop child; Benje desired me to put you in mind, that you promised to hem the neckerchief for him; and tell your mother, jewel, that if she'll let you come down to my cabin to-night, when the grawls are all in bed, I'll be for ever obliged to her; Browne and the boy are out to sea, and there's something over me that I don't care to be quite alone this blessed night: so come down, a lannan, and then you can hem the neckerchief—before morning."

"I will, I will," said the maiden, with whom smiles had already taken the place of tears, for she loved Mrs.

Browne's cottage almost better than her own; "I will and I've learnt a new song; oh, I shall be so happy!" and she danced up the cliffs with all the light gaiety of fifteen!

The fisherman's wife, set her house in order and then commenced mending her husband's nets. It would have been evident to any observer, that her mind was ill at ease, for instead of pursuing her occupation with her usual steadiness, she frequently suffered the hard meshes to drop from her bony fingers, and the wooden needle to lie idle on her lap. She would rise and peer from her small window, or more frequently still from the open door, into the heavens, but there was no cause for disquiet in their aspect—the moon was in her full, calm glory; and the stars bright, glittering, and countless, waited round her throne as handmaids silently attending upon their mistress. She could see the reflection of the moonbeams on the far-way waters—but her ear, practised as it was, could hardly catch the murmur of the ocean, so profound was its repose; and yet Kate continued restless and feverish. Benjamin was her only surviving child—although five others had called her mother—and, indeed, while he was absent from her, she felt that undefined, but perfectly natural, dread which steals over a sensitive mind for the welfare of a beloved object, whenever the one is separated from the other.

It was a great relief to her spirits when she heard the light foot of Statia Byrne on her threshold, and she felt new-sprung hope within her heart when she looked into the bright eyes and observed the full smile of the joyous girl.

"They're all a-bed, and the baby went off to sleep without an hushon! and mother says, as your all alone by yourself, I might stay with you all night, Mrs. Browne, and so I will, if you please—and I've brought my needle; and—I'll hem the handkerchief, if you please—and then, maybe—maybe you'd show me how you mend nets—I should so like to mend Mister Browne's herring net; he gave mother (God bless him!) as many herrings last year as lasted all Lent!—I'm sure we can never forget it to him."

"Pray for him then, Stacy—pray on your bended knees—for Dermot and Benjamin Browne this night."

"Why so I will," rejoined the girl—astonished at the woman's earnestness of manner—"but the night is fine, the sky is blue, the waters clear as chrysal; they've been out many a night, when the winds do be blowing the waves into the sky, and I've wondered to see you heart-easy about them—what, then, ails you to night?"

"God knows!" replied Kate Browne, with a heavy sigh, "I think I'll go over my bades a bit; ough Stacy, darling, it's a fine thing to have the religion to turn to when our heart turns against every thing else." Kate sprinkled herself with holy water out of a small chalice, and knelt down, with a "decket" of beads in her hands, to "say her prayers; almost unwittingly, she repeated them aloud, but they had, in a degree, lost their soothing power, and she mingled the anxieties of earth with her petitions, not to heaven but to its inhabitants; her "mingled yarn" ran thus:—

"Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us,—Statia, open the door, agra, and listen, myself thinks the wind's rising—now, and in the hour!—the cat! avourneen, don't you see the cat at the herring-tub, bad luck to that cat!—now, and in the hour of death!" There was a long pause, and she continued murmuring her petitions, and speaking aloud her anxieties, while Statia went on hemming the handkerchief; at last she looked up at her young companion and inquired, "Where did I leave off, my darling, was it at 'Virgin most powerful,' or at 'Queen of Confessors'?"

"I did not hear," replied the industrious maiden.

"Hear what?" exclaimed Kate Browne, starting off her knees.

"Lord defend us, you startle the very life out of me!" ejaculated the girl, devoutly crossing herself.

"But what did you hear, Stacy?"

"Nothing. I told you I did not hear where you left off."

"Ough! ay, ay!" exclaimed Mrs. Browne, "God forgive me, I am a poor sinful thing; quite full of sin; I must give up the prayers for to-night, I can't steady my heart to them, good nor bad; there! finish your work and we'll go to bed, jewel—it is, as you say, a beautiful night, thanks be to God for his mercies! and I ought to have more faith."

Long did they both remain awake during that calm moonlight; the fisherman's wife muttering prayers and fears, and raising her eyes to the little window which opened at the foot of her bed, and from which, as she lay, she could catch a view of the distant sea—at last she fell off into a deep, deep sleep. But Statia, though free from all anxiety as to the fate of the absent, could not close her eyes—poor girl! her young imagination had passed a gulf of years, and she was thinking, that perhaps she might be to the young fisher what Kate was to the old; and she thought how good he was—and how handsome; and how happy she should be to mend his nets, and watch the return of his boat from the highest cliff that "toppled o'er the deep." The grey morning was stealing on the night, yet still Kate slept—and still Statia Byrne continued with her eyes fixed on the window, creating—not castles but—nets, and boats, and cottages in the air; when, suddenly, before the window stood Benjamin Browne—she had not seen his shadow pass—she had heard no step—no voice—no sound; nor did she see a figure, but there was his face almost pressed to the glass—his long uncurled hair hung down either cheek—and his eyes were fixed on her with a cold, unmoving, rayless gaze—she endeavoured to sit up—she felt suddenly paralyzed—she could not move—she tried to speak, to call Mrs. Browne who still slept heavily, heavier than before—she could make no sound—still her lover gazed—gazed on. And what occurred to her (for she afterwards declared, she never for a moment, was deprived of consciousness) as most strange was, that though the room within was dark, and his head obscured the window, still she could see his features (to use her own expressive phrase) "Clear like wax;" while as he gazed, their beautiful form assumed the long, pale hue of death—by a sudden effort she closed her eyes, but only for a brief, brief moment. When she re-opened them, he was gone—and she only looked upon the grey mingling of sea and sky; trembling and terror-stricken she at last succeeded in awakening her companion. Mrs. Browne heard her story with apparent calmness, and putting her lips close to the ear of the fainting girl, whispered—"HE IS DEAD!"

It was long, long before Statia recovered from her swoon, for when she did the morning sun was shining on her face—and she was alone, quite alone in the fisherman's cottage; at first, she thought she had fearfully dreamed but the realities around her recalled her to herself; she flew to the same cliff where, the evening before, unconscious of the strong affection which bound her almost childish heart to her young lover, she had watched his departure; and looking down on the beach, her painful vision was truly realized—Dermot Browne was leading his wife from a group of persons who were bearing the corpse of the young fisherman to the shore; in the distance could be seen the keel of the doomed boat floating upwards, while crowds of sea-birds overhead, screamed the youth's funeral dirge!

It might be about two months after this occurrence—which plunged the warm-hearted people of the neighbouring villages into deep sorrow—that Kate Browne visited the cottage of Statia Browne; it was the first time the bereaved mother had entered any cottage, save her own, since "her trouble." As soon as Statia saw her, she flung herself upon her neck and sobbed as if her heart would break; the fisherman's wife held her from her, and parting her hair from off her brow, said,

"Sorrow has worked with you, and left his mark upon your face, avourneen; and though my darlint, you did not dreme of him that's gone last Holy-eye, you've dreamed of him often since."

The poor girl wept still more bitterly.

"You must have been very dear, very dear entirely to him," continued Kate Browne, "for his blessed spirit found it harder quitting you than his own mother, who nursed him a baby at her breast; but whist, darlint, don't I love you better for that now? Sure every thing—let alone every one that he regarded—that his regard only rested on, is more to me than silver or gold, or the wealth of the whole world! Didn't the bright eyes of his spirit look from the heavens on you my jewel? And what I'm come here for, Mistress Byrne, ma'am, is, that as you have so many childre, (and God keep them to you!) maybe you'd spare Statia to bind my heart from breaking, and let her bide entirely with us—we have prosperity enough, for when the Lord takes one thing away, why he gives another—blessed be his holy name! And sure, since the boy's gone, nothing can equal Dermot's industry and carefulness, stopping every hole in every fisherman's boat—when he's ashore the hammer and nails is never out of his hand. Let her be to me as my own child, Mistress Byrne, and you'll have a consolation that will never leave you, no! not on your death-bed. Sure you'll see her every day the sun rises—let her bide with me, for I am very desolate!"

The mother, as she looked around upon seven rosy, healthy children, felt, that indeed her neighbour was desolate, and in a voice hoarse with emotion, she said, "Statia may go, and take our blessing with her if she likes!"

Many little voices wept aloud in that cottage, although they knew they should see their sister daily; but the maiden was firm in her resolve, and that night greeted, as a father, the father of him whom her young heart had loved with an entireness of affection which the heart can know but once.

Statia is now long past the age of girlhood, and it is pleasant to see how perfectly her simple life is an illustration of the pathetic exclamation of the Jewish damsel "Thy people, shall be my people, and thy God my God!" She manages admirably between her "two mothers," as she calls them, so that the one may not be jealous of the other; but though she has had many suitors for her hand, she has never forgotten—the drowned fisherman!

The Barrel-Organ Nuisance.—We overheard the following conversation a few days ago between two professors of the barrel organ:

"I say, Bill, ow is it as you always gets so much more nor me, ven your organ isn't worth so much as mine by five shillin' and you plays nothing but old Robin Gray, and the Duke of York's March, and God save the King, and the Undred-and-Fourth-Psalms, and sich like, vile I flares up with the Unters'-Chorus, and Ome sweet Ome, and Bonnets o' Blue, and lots o' good 'uns?"

"Vy, I'll tell you 'ow' it be; you see ven I goes to ire a horgan, I gets von as bad out o' ehune as I can, vile you does nothing but luk hout for a good un. So nobody takes no notice on you; but ven I begins to flare up with mine, the gemmen hops the vindy, and chucks me sixpence to go away."

PROVERBS IN POLITE ENGLISH.

There are occasions on which it is difficult to get through a sentence, either, in writing or conversation, but by the aid of that old-fashioned vulgarism, a proverb. The most profound thinker will be sometimes at a loss for an expression exactly adapted for the conveyance of an obstinate idea; the most accomplished and elegant writer will occasionally find the finest and choicest phraseology unsuited to his purpose. Let them paint an inch thick, to a plain bare proverb they must come. We can even imagine Coleridge coming to a pause in his full, deep, conversational chaunt—suddenly down-wheeling, like a falcon, from the realm of imagination wherein he had traced the infinite forms of loveliness, and embodied in discourse all that is most exquisite in ideal beauty—and, descending plump upon a commonplace maxim, and by acknowledging that "beauty" after all is but "skin deep." We can imagine Mr. Bulwer, whose pen is as a Prospero's wand, which Pucks and Ariels are proud to obey, discovering in a masterly essay upon human character and the influence of education and example, the inaptitude of loftier language than that in which his closing admission might be expressed—that "what is bred in the bone will never come out of the flesh."

But it must be owned that the homeliness and bad taste of many of these venerable conveniences preclude them very often from polite use. They are rough diamonds, and require polishing before they can be set with effect in a shining composition. We have just accidentally discovered, that this very desirable polish has been communicated to many of the choicest of our proverbs, by the fair hand of the author of "Brother Tragedians." Miss Isabel Hill is the lapidary of our proverbial literature. In a stray number of a departed periodical, we recently met with a string of proverbs translated into polite language, and they are so admirably rendered, with so much originality and humour, that we eagerly extract some specimens of them, in the conviction that they are still "as good as new"—for they cannot have been seen by many eyes in the obscurity of their original publication. Miss Hill says:—

"I differ from the million as to vulgarity of using old sayings: some of them are truly expressive and significant; it is only to the homeliness of their style that I object. My refined friend Leonine has indifferently reformed this." The following are among the specimens of Leonine's success in transmuting lead into gold.

"Coined metal impels the feminine horse.
It is painful to be in attendance for the pumps of departed individuals.

"Do not exclaim vociferously till you have passed beyond the forest.
No longer perform on the flageolet, no longer gallopade.

"Loveliness lies not beneath the superficies of the exterior cuticle.

"Let every man pursue the bent of his own genius, as the elderly matron observed while saluting her vaccine favorite.

"An equestrian mendicant will journey towards the realms of his Satanic Majesty.

"Too great a number of culinary assistants may impair the flavour of the consommé.

"An obese affliction is preferable to an emaciated one.

"Apply not the oleaginous product of Dairies to the incisors of your hunter.

"A pebble, in a state of circumvolution, acquires not the lichens of mural vegetation.

"Royalty may be contemplated with impunity, even by feline quadrupeds.

"Feathered bipeds of similar plumage will live gregariously.

"To that which the retina does not receive, the pericardium remains insensible.

"Why should the smaller domestic utensils accuse the larger of nigritude.

"A greater volume of aqueous fluid passes the machine for pulverizing wheat than its proprietor is aware of.

"Do not adopt a vehicular conveyance till you can afford anti-attrition.

"The taciturn female of the porcine genus imbibes the richest nutriment.

"The capital of the Papal states was not constructed in a diurnal revolution of the globe.

"Experienced warblers are rarely made prisoners by the husks of grain.

"An abrupt inclination of the head is equivalent to a sudden closing of the eye, to a racer laboring under a catact.

"One proper deviation from the straight line merits a similar event.

"By the same process that you heat kneaded dough, you amalgamate malt and hops.

"By the same method in which you formed your couch, so you may recline on it.

"A vacant tenement is superior to a vicious inhabitant.

"It is a sage infant who is intimately acquainted with his own paternal relative.

"The Internal Being is not so sable as limners have represented him.

"No ablution will convert an African into an Albinos.

"Inferior falcons will not extract the visual organs of their kind.

"He who treats the misfortunes of others as themes for risibility, may have that cackinnation transferred to the opposite side of his facial muscles.

"Elongated articles of table equipage are required by those who take petit soupers with the author of evil.

"In the absence of the miniature tiger, the muscular race will become festive.

"Do not calculate the number of your juvenile poultry before the process of incubation be completed.

"It is more pleasing to arrive at the termination of a banquet, than at the commencement of a journey."

But Miss Hill's ingenious friend Leonine deals sometimes "more cunningly" with us, and translates the most ill-favoured proverb into exceedingly delicious puzzles:—thus—

"That indispensable to gastronomy on which the smoke acts, will, if excellent, make an equally perfect quarter of a pint.

"Give some men a small island, and they will take a liquid letter.

"Wherever there is a testament there is a path.

"The artful person shall be captivated in his own Geneva.

"One fleecy animal cutaneously infected, will spread contagion through the coarser kind of mill-puff."

Are not all these vulgarities rendered into amenities of the most delicate and insinuating character? What a Reform of the Proverbs is here effected!—It is as though a Robin Roughhead should be changed by the touch of a subtle magician into a Lord Foppington. The fair Leonine has rendered us a lasting service.

The most fastidious of our readers, who might not like to remark that "Rome was not built in a day," can henceforth feel no hesitation in observing, that

"The capital of the Papal states was not constructed in a diurnal revolution of the globe;" nor can the most refined, though naturally shrinking from the indelicacy of the original, "it is ill waiting for dead men's shoes," detect the least tincture of coarseness in allusion to the pain of being "in attendance for the pumps of departed individuals."

CONSTANCE ALLERTON,

OR, THE MOURNING SUITS.

A Story of Domestic Life—By Miss Leslie.

But I have that within which passeth show.—Shakspeare.

Mr. Allerton, a merchant of Philadelphia, had for some years been doing business to considerable advantage, when a sudden check was put to his prosperity by the unexpected failure of a house, for which he had endorsed to a very large amount. There was no alternative but to surrender every thing to his creditors; and this he did literally and conscientiously. He brought down his mind to his circumstances; and as, at that juncture, the precarious state of the times did not authorise any hope of success if he recommenced business (as he might have done) upon borrowed capital, and gladly availed himself of a vacant clerkship in one of the principal banks of the city. His salary, however, would have been scarcely adequate to the support of his family had he not added something to his little stipend, by employing his leisure hours in keeping the books of a merchant. He removed with his wife and children to a small house in a remote part of the city; and they would, with all his exertions, have been obliged to live in the constant exercise of the most painful economy, had it not been for the aid they derived from his sister Constance Allerton. Since the death of her parents, this young lady had resided at New Bedford with her maternal aunt, Mrs. Ilford, a quakeress, who left her a legacy of ten thousand dollars.

After the demise of her aunt, Miss Allerton took lodgings at a private house in New Bedford; but on hearing of her brother's misfortunes, she wrote to know if it would be agreeable to him and to his family, for her to remove to Philadelphia, and to live with them—supposing that the sum she would pay for her accommodations, might, in their present difficulties, prove a welcome addition to their income. This proposal was joyfully acceded to, as Constance was much beloved by every member of her brother's family, and had kept up a continual interest with them by frequent letters, and by an annual visit of a few weeks to Philadelphia.

At this period Constance Allerton had just completed her twenty-third year. She had a beautiful face, a fine and graceful figure, and a highly cultivated mind. With warm feelings and deep sensibility, she possessed much energy of character—a qualification which, when called forth by circumstances, is often found to be as useful in woman as in a man. Affectionate, generous, and totally devoid of all selfish considerations, Constance had nothing so much at heart as the comfort and happiness of her brother's family; and to become an inmate of their house was as gratifying to her as it was to them. She furnished her own apartment, and shared it with little Louisa, the youngest of her three nieces, a lovely child about ten years old. She insisted on paying the quarter bills of her nephew Frederick Allerton, and volunteered to complete the education of his sisters, who were delighted to receive their daily lessons from an instructress so kind, so sensible, and so competent. Exclusive of these arrangements, she bestowed on them many little presents, which were always well-timed and judiciously selected; though, to enable her to purchase these gifts, she was obliged, with her limited income of six hundred dollars, to deny herself many gratifications, and indeed conveniences, to which she had hitherto been accustomed, and the want of which she now passed over with a cheerfulness and delicacy, that was duly appreciated by the objects of her kindness.

In this manner the family had been living about a twelvemonth, when Mr. Allerton was suddenly attacked by a violent and dangerous illness, which was soon accompanied by delirium; and in a few days it brought him to the brink of the grave.

His disease baffled the skill of an excellent physician; and the unremitting cares of his wife and sister could only effect a slight alleviation of his sufferings. He expired on the fifth day, without recovering his senses, and totally unconscious of the presence of the heart-struck mourners, that were weeping round his bed.

When Mr. Allerton's last breath had departed, his wife was conveyed from the room in a fainting fit. Constance endeavored to repress her own feelings, till she had rendered the necessary assistance to Mrs. Allerton, and till she had somewhat calmed the agony of the children.—She then retired to her own apartment, and gave a vent to a burst of grief, such as can only be felt by those in whose minds and hearts there is a union of sense and sensibility. With the weak and frivolous, sorrow is rarely either acute or lasting.

The immortal soul of Mr. Allerton had departed from its earthly tenement, and it was now necessary to think of the painful details that belonged to the disposal of his inanimate corpse. As soon as Constance could command sufficient courage to allow her mind to dwell on this subject, she went down to send a servant for Mr. Denman (an old friend of the family,) whom she knew Mrs. Allerton would wish to take charge of the funeral. At the foot of the stairs she met the physician, who, by her pale cheeks, and by the tears that streamed from her eyes, at sight of him, saw that all was over. He pressed her hand in sympathy; and perceiving that she was unable to answer his questions, he bowed and left the house.

In a short time Mr. Denman arrived; and Mrs. Allerton declaring herself incompetent to the task, Constance saw the gentleman, and requested him to make every necessary arrangement for a plain and respectable funeral.

At such times, how every little circumstance seems to add a new pang to the agonized feelings of the bereaved family. The closing of the window-shutters, the arrival of the woman whose gloomy business it is to prepare the corpse for interment, the undertaker coming to take measure for the coffin, the removal of the bedding on which the deceased has expired, the gliding step, the half-whispered directions—all these sad indications that death is in the house, fall not, however quietly and carefully managed, to reach the ears and hearts of the afflicted relatives, assisted by the intuitive knowledge of what is so well understood to be passing at these melancholy moments.

In the evening, after Louisa had cried herself to sleep, Constance repaired to the apartment of her sister-in-law, whom about an hour before she had left exhausted and passive. Mrs. Allerton was extended on the bed, pale and silent; her daughters Isabella and Helen were in tears beside her; and Frederick had retired to his room.

In the fauteuil, near the head of the bed, sat Mrs. Bladen, who, in the days of her prosperity, had been the next door neighbor of the Allerton family, and who still continued to favor them with frequent visits. She was one of those busy people, who seem almost to verify the justly censured maxims of Rochefoucault, that in the misfortunes of our best friends there is always something which is pleasing to us.

True it was, that Mrs. Bladen being a woman of great leisure, and of a disposition extremely officious, devoted most of her time and attention to the concerns of others—and any circumstances that prevented her associates from acting immediately for themselves, of course threw open a wider field for her interference.

"And now, my dear friends," said Mrs. Bladen, squeezing Mrs. Allerton's hand, and looking at Constance, who seated herself in an opposite chair, "as the funeral is to take place on Thursday, you know there is no time to be lost. What have you fixed on respecting your mourning? I will cheerfully attend to it for you, and bespeak every thing necessary."

At the words "funeral" and "mourning," tears pushed again from the eyes of the distressed family; and neither Mrs. Allerton, nor Constance could command themselves sufficiently to reply.

"Come, my dear creatures," continued Mrs. Bladen, "you must really make an effort to compose yourselves." "Just try to be calm for a few minutes, till we have settled this business. Tell me what I shall order for you.—However, there is but one rule on these occasions—crape and bombazine, and every thing of the best. Nothing, you know, is more disreputable than mean mourning."

"I fear then," replied Mrs. Allerton, "that our mourning attire must be mean enough. The situation in which we are left, will not allow us to go to any unnecessary expense in that, or in any thing else. We had but little to live upon—we could lay by nothing. We have nothing before-hand: we did not—we could not apprehend that this dreadful event was so near. And you know that his salary—that Mr. Allerton's salary, of course, expires with him."

"So I suppose, my dear friend," answered Mrs. Bladen; "but you know you must have mourning—and as the funeral takes place so soon, there will be little enough time to order it, and have it made."

"We will borrow dresses to wear at the —, to wear on Thursday," said Mrs. Allerton.

"And of whom will you borrow?"

"I do not know. I have not yet thought."

"The Liscom family are in black," observed Isabella; "no doubt they would lend us dresses."

"Oh! none of their things will fit you at all," exclaimed Mrs. Bladen. "None of the Liscoms have the least resemblance to any of you, either in height or figure. You would look perfectly ridiculous in their things."

"Then there are Mrs. Patterson and her daughters," said Helen.

"The Pattersons," replied Mrs. Bladen, "are just going to leave off black, and nothing that they have looks either new or fresh. You know how soon black becomes rusty. You certainly would feel very much mortified, if you had to make a shabby appearance at Mr. Allerton's funeral. Besides, nobody now wears borrowed mourning—it can always be detected in a moment. No—with a little exertion—and I repeat that I am willing to do all in my power—there is time enough to provide the whole family with genteel and proper mourning suits. And so you must get them at last, it is certainly much better to have them at first, so as to appear handsomely at the funeral."

"Oh!" exclaimed Mrs. Allerton, sighing, "at such a time, what consequence can we possibly attach to our external appearance? How can we for a moment think of it?"

"To be sure, my dear friend," said Mrs. Bladen, "you have had a very severe loss—very severe indeed. It is really quite irreparable; and I can sincerely sympathize in your feelings. Certainly every body ought to feel on these occasions; but you know it is impossible to devote every moment between this and the funeral to tears and sobs. One cannot be crying all the time—nobody ever does. And, as to the mourning, that is, of course, indispensable, and a thing that must be."

Mrs. Allerton wept bitterly. "Indeed! indeed!" said she, "I cannot discuss it now."

"And if it be not settled to night," resumed Mrs. Bladen, "there will be hardly time to-morrow to talk it over, and get the things, and send to the mantua-maker's and milliner's. You had better get it off your mind at once. Suppose you leave it entirely to me. I attended to all the mourning for the Liscoms, and the Weldons, and the Nortons. It is a business I am quite used to. I pique myself on being rather clever at it."

"I will then trust to your judgment," replied Mrs. Allerton, anxious to get rid of the subject, and of the light frivolous prattle of her so-called distant dear friend. "Be kind enough to undertake it, and procure for us whatever you think suitable—only let it not be too expensive."

"As to that," answered Mrs. Bladen, "crape is crape, and bombazine is bombazine; and as every body likes to have these articles of good quality, nothing otherwise is now imported for mourning. With regard to Frederick's black suit, Mr. Watson will send to take his measure, and there will be no further difficulty about it. Let me see—there must be bombazine for five dresses; that is, for yourself, three daughters, and Miss Allerton."

"Not for me," said Constance, taking her handkerchief from her eyes. "I shall not get bombazine."

"My dear creature!" cried Mrs. Bladen; "not get a bombazine! You astonish me! What else can you possibly have? Black gingham or black chintz is only fit for wrappers; and black silk is no mourning at all."

"I shall wear no mourning," replied Constance with a deep sigh.

"Not wear mourning!" ejaculated Mrs. Bladen. "What! no mourning at all! Not wear mourning for your own brother! Now you do indeed surprise me."

Mrs. Allerton and her daughters were also surprised; and they withdrew their handkerchiefs from their eyes, and gazed on Constance, as if scarcely believing that they had understood her rightly.

"I have considered it well," resumed Miss Allerton; "and I have come to a conclusion, to make no change in my dress. In short, to wear no mourning, even for my brother—well as I have loved him, and deeply as I feel his loss."

"This is very strange," said Mrs. Allerton. "Excuse me, Miss Constance," said Mrs. Bladen, "but have you no respect for his memory? He was certainly an excellent man."

"Respect for his memory!" exclaimed Constance, bursting into tears. "Yes! I indeed respect his memory! And were he still living, there is nothing on earth I would not cheerfully do for him, if I thought it would contribute to his happiness or comfort. But he is now in a land where all the forms and ceremonies of this world are of no avail; and where every thing that speaks to the senses only, must appear like the mimic trappings of a theatre. With him all is now awful reality. To the decaying inhabitant of the narrow and gloomy grave, or to the disembodied spirit that has ascended to its Father in heaven, of what consequence is the color that distinguishes the dress of those whose mourning is deep in the heart! What to him is the livery that fashion has assigned to grief, when he knows how intense is the feeling itself, in the sorrowing bosoms of the family, that loved him so well?"

"All this is very true," remarked Mrs. Bladen, "but still, custom is every thing, or fashion as you are pleased to call it. You know, you are not a quaker; and therefore I do not see how you can possibly venture to go without mourning on such an occasion as this. Surely you would not set the usages of the world at defiance."

"I would not," replied Constance, "in things of minor importance; but on this subject I believe I can be firm."

"Of course," said Mrs. Bladen, "you will not go to the funeral without mourning."

"I cannot go to the funeral at all," answered Constance.

"Not go to the funeral!" exclaimed Mrs. Allerton. "Dear Constance, you amaze me!"

"I hope," observed Mrs. Bladen, looking very serious, "there can be no reason to doubt Miss Allerton's affection for her brother?"

"Oh! no! no! no!" cried the two girls indignantly. "If you had only seen," said Isabella, "how she nursed my dear father in his illness—how she was with him day and night."

"And how much she always loved him," said Helen. "My dear kind sister," said Mrs. Allerton, taking the hand of Constance, "I hope I shall never again see you distressed by such an intimation."

Mrs. Bladen, reddened, looked down, and attentively examined the embroidered corners of her pocket handkerchief. There was a silence of a few moments; till Constance, making an effort to speak with composure, proceeded to explain herself.

"My brother," said she, "has finished his mortal existence. No human power, no human love, can aid him or soothe him now; and we will endeavor to submit with resignation to the will of Omnipotence. I hope—I trust we shall be able to do so; but the shock is yet too recent, and we cannot at once subdue the feelings of nature. It is dreadful to see the lifeless remains of one we have long and dearly loved, removed from our sight for ever, and consigned to the darkness and loneliness of the grave. For my part, on this sad occasion, I feel an utter repugnance to the idea of becoming an object of curiosity to the spectators that gaze from the windows, and to the vulgar and noisy crowd that assembles about a burying ground, when an interment is to take place. I cannot expose my tears, my deep affliction, to the comments of the multitude; and I cannot have my feelings outraged by, perhaps, overhearing their coarse remarks. I may be too fastidious—I may be wrong; but to be present at the funeral of my brother is an effort I cannot resolve to make. And, moreover—"

Here her voice for a few moments became inarticulate, and her sister and nieces sobbed audibly.

"And then," she continued, "I cannot stand beside that open grave—I cannot see the coffin land into it, and the earth thrown upon the lid till it is covered up for ever. I cannot—indeed I cannot. In the seclusion of my own apartment, I shall, of course, know that all this is going on, and I shall suffer most acutely; but there will be no strangers to witness my sufferings. It is a dreadful custom, that of females attending the funerals of their nearest relatives. I wish it were abolished throughout our country, as it is in many parts of Europe."

"But you know," said Mrs. Bladen, "that it is almost universal in Philadelphia; and, when we are in Rome we must do as Rome does." Besides which, it is certainly our duty always to see our friends and relatives laid in the grave."

"Not when we are assured," replied Constance, "that the melancholy office can be properly performed without our presence or assistance. Duty requires of us no sacrifice by which neither the living nor the dead can be benefited. But I have said enough; and I cannot be present at my brother's funeral."

She then rose and left the room, unable any longer to sustain a conversation so painful to her.

"Well, I am really astonished!" exclaimed Mrs. Bladen. "Not wearing mourning for her brother! Not go to his funeral! However, I suppose she thinks she has a right to do as she pleases. But, she may depend on it, people will talk."

Just then a servant came to inform Mrs. Bladen that her husband was waiting for her in the parlor.

"Well, my dear Mrs. Allerton," said she, as she rose to depart, "we have not yet settled about the mourning. Of course, you are not going to adopt Miss Constance's strange whim of wearing none at all."

"What she has said on the subject appears to me very just," replied Mrs. Allerton.

"Aunt Constance is always right," remarked one of the girls.

"As to Miss Allerton," resumed Mrs. Bladen, "she is well known to be independent in every sense of the word; and therefore she may do as she pleases, though she may rest assured that people will talk."

"What people?" asked Mrs. Allerton.

"Every body—all the world."

Mrs. Allerton thought how very circumscribed was the world in which she and her family had lived since the date of their fallen fortunes.

"It is well known," pursued Mrs. Bladen, "that Miss Constance is able to wear mourning if she choose it. But you may rely on it, Mrs. Allerton, that if you and your children do not appear in black, people will be ill-natured enough to say that it is, because you cannot afford it. Excuse my plainness."

"They will say rightly, then," replied Mrs. Allerton, with a sigh. "We certainly cannot afford it."

"How you talk!" said Mrs. Bladen. "Afford it or not, every body has to wear mourning, and every body does, from the highest down to the lowest. Even my washer-woman put all her family (that is, herself and her six children) into black when her husband died; notwithstanding that he was no great loss—for he was an idle, drunken Irishman, and beat them all around every day of his life. And my cook, a colored woman, whose grandfather died in the almshouse a few weeks ago, has as handsome a suit of mourning as any lady need desire to wear."

"May I request," said Mrs. Allerton, "that you will spare me on this subject to night. Indeed, I can neither think nor talk about it."

"Well, then," replied Mrs. Bladen, kissing her, "I will hope to find you better in the morning. I shall be with you immediately after breakfast."

She then took her leave; and Constance, who had been weeping over the corpse of Mr. Allerton, now returned to the apartment of her sister-in-law.

Released from the importunities of Mrs. Bladen, our heroine now mildly and sensibly reasoned with the family on the great inconvenience, and, as she believed, the unnecessary expense of furnishing themselves with suits of mourning in their present circumstances. The season was late in the autumn, and they had recently supplied themselves with their winter-outfit, all of which would now be rendered useless if black must be substituted. Her arguments had so much effect, that Mrs. Allerton, with the concurrence of her daughters, very nearly promised to give up all intention of making a general change in their dress. But they found it harder than they had supposed, to free themselves from the trammels of custom.

Mrs. Allerton and Constance passed a sleepless night, and the children "awoke to weep" at an early hour in the morning. They all met in tears at the breakfast table. Little was eaten, and the table was scarcely cleared, when Mrs. Bladen came in, followed by two shop boys, one carrying two rolls of bombazine, and the other two boxes of Italian crape. Constance had just left the room.

After the first salutations were over, Mrs. Bladen informed Mrs. Allerton that she had breakfasted an hour earlier than usual, that she might allow herself time to go out, and transact the business of the morning.

"My dear friend," said she, "Mrs. Doubleprice has sent you, at my request, two pieces of bombazine, that you may choose for yourself. One is more of a jet black than the other—but I think the blue black rather the finest. However, they are both of superb quality, and this season jet black is rather the most fashionable. I have been to Miss Facings the mantua-maker, who is famous for mourning. Bombazines, when made up by her, have an air and a style about them, such as you will never see if done by any one else. There is nothing more difficult than to make up mourning as it ought to be. I have appointed Miss Facings to meet me here—I wonder she has not yet arrived—she can tell you how much is necessary for the four dresses. If Miss Allerton finally concludes to be like other people and put on black, I suppose she will attend to it herself. These very sensible young ladies are beyond my comprehension."

"I am sure," said Ellen, "no one is more easy to understand than my dear Aunt Constance."

"And here," continued Mrs. Bladen, "is the double-width crape for the veils. As it is of very superior quality, you had best have it to trim the dresses, and for the neck handkerchiefs, and to border the black cloth shawls that you will have to get."

We must remark to our readers that at the period of our story, it was customary to trim mourning dresses with a very broad fold of crape, reaching nearly from the feet to the knees.

Mrs. Allerton on hearing the prices of the crape and bombazine declared them too expensive.

"But only look at this quality," persisted Mrs. Bladen, "and you know the best things are always the cheapest in the end—and, as I told you, nobody now wears economical mourning."

"We had best wear none of any description," said Mrs. Allerton.

"Ah!" cried Mrs. Bladen, "I see that Miss Constance has been trying again to make a convert of you. Yet as you are not quakers, I know not how you will be able to shew your faces in the world, if you do not put on black. Excuse me, but innovations on established customs ought only to be attempted by people of note—by persons so far up in society that they may feel at liberty to do any out-of-the-way thing with impunity."

"I wish, indeed," said Mrs. Allerton, "that some of these influential persons would be so public-spirited as to set the example of dispensing with all customs that bear hard on people in narrow circumstances."

The mantua-maker now made her appearance, and Mrs. Bladen exclaimed, "Oh! Miss Facings, we have been waiting for you to tell us exactly how much of every thing we are to get."

A long and earnest discussion now took place between Mrs. Bladen and the mantua maker, respecting the quality and quantity of the bombazine and crape.

Miss Facings having calculated the number of yards, Mrs. Bladen enquired if there was no yard measure in the house. One was produced, and the measuring commenced forthwith; Mrs. Allerton having no longer energy to offer any further opposition. She sat with her handkerchief to her face, and her daughters wept also. Mrs. Bladen stepped up to her, and whispered "You are aware that it will not be necessary to pay the bills immediately."

"Ah!" returned Mrs. Allerton, "I know not when they can be paid. But we will strain every nerve to do it as soon as possible. I cannot bear the idea of remaining in debt for this mourning."

Their business being accomplished, the shop boys departed, and Miss Facings made her preparations for cutting out the dresses, taking an opportunity of assuring the weeping girls that nothing was more becoming to the figure than black bombazine, and that every body looked their best in a new suit of mourning.

At this juncture, Constance returned to the room, and was extremely sorry to find that the fear of singularity, and the officious perseverance of Mrs. Bladen, had superseded the better sense of her sister-in-law. But as the evil was now past remedy, our heroine, according to her usual practice, refrained from any further animadversions on the subject.

Little Louisa, was now brought in to be fitted, and when her frock was cut out, Constance offered to make it herself, on hearing Miss Facings declare that she would be obliged to keep her girls up all night to complete the dresses by the appointed time, as they had already more work in the house than they could possibly accomplish.

Mrs. Allerton expressed great unwillingness to allowing her sister-in-law to take the trouble of making Louisa's dress. But Constance whispered to her that she had always found occupation to be one of the best medicines for an afflicted mind, and that it would in some degree prevent her thoughts from dwelling incessantly on the same melancholy subject. Taking Louisa with her, she retired to her own apartment, and the frock was completed by next day: though the overflowing eyes of poor Constance frequently obliged her to lay down her sewing. In reality, her chief motive in proposing to make the dress, was to save the expense of having it done by the mantua-maker.

Miss Facings took Mrs. Allerton's gown home with her, saying she would send one of her girls for the two others; and Mrs. Bladen then began to plan the bonnets and shawls. She went off to a fashionable milliner, and engaged a mourning bonnet and four mourning caps for Mrs. Allerton, and a bonnet for each of her daughters. And she was going back and forwards nearly all day with specimens of black cloth for the shawls, black stockings, black gloves, &c.

The girls, at their aunt's suggestion, hemmed the crape veils, and on the following morning, she assisted them in making and trimming the shawls. Still, Constance was well convinced that the expense of the mourning (including the suit bespoken for Frederick) would be greater than they could possibly afford. The cost of the funeral she intended to defray from her own funds, and she took occasion to request Mr. Denman to have nothing about it that should be unnecessarily expensive.

The hour arrived when the sorrowing family of Mr. Allerton were to be parted forever from all that remained of the husband, the father, and the brother. They had taken the last look of his fixed and lifeless features; they had imprinted the last kiss on his cold and pallid lips; and from the chamber of death, they had to adjourn to the incongruous task of attiring themselves in their mourning habits to appear at his funeral. How bitterly they wept as their friends assisted them in putting on their new dresses; and when they tied on their bonnets and their long veils, to follow to his grave the object of their fondest affection.

Constance, with an almost breaking heart sat in her chamber, and little Louisa hung crying on her shoulder, declaring that she could not see her dear father buried. But Mrs. Bladen came in, protesting that all the children must be present, and that people would talk if even the youngest child was to stay away. Mrs. Bladen then put on Louisa's mourning dress almost by force. When this was done, the little girl threw her arms round the neck of her aunt and kissed her, saying with a burst of tears, "When I see you again, my dear, dear father will be covered up in his grave." Mrs. Bladen then led, or rather dragged the child to the room in which the family were assembled.

Constance threw herself on her bed in a paroxysm of grief. She heard the slow tread of the company as they came in, and she fancied that she could distinguish the sound of the lid as it was laid on the coffin, and the screws that closed it forever. She knew when it was carried down stairs, and she listened in sympathetic agony to the sobs of the family as they descended after it. She heard the shutting of the hearse-door, and the gloomy vehicle slowly rolling off to give place to the carriages of the mourners. She started up, and casting her eyes towards an opening in the window-curtain, she saw Mr. Denman supping in the first coach the tottering steps of her half-fainting sister-in-law. She looked no longer, but sunk back on the bed and hid her face on the pillow. By all that she suffered when indulging her grief alone and in the retirement of her chamber, she felt how dreadful it would have been to her, had she accompanied the corpse of her brother to its final resting-place.

In about an hour the family returned, pale, exhausted, and worn out with the intensity of their feelings at the grave. And they could well have dispensed with the company of Mrs. Bladen who came home and passed the evening with them; as she foolishly said that people in affliction ought not to be left to themselves.

After some days, the violence of their grief settled into melancholy sadness: they ceased to speak of him whom they had loved and lost, and they felt as if they could never talk of him again.

The unfortunate family of Mr. Allerton now began to consider what they should do for their support. Constance was willing to share with them her little income even to the last farthing, but it was too small to enable them all to live on it with comfort. Great indeed are the sufferings, the unacknowledged and unimagined sufferings of that class who "cannot dig and to beg are ashamed"—whose children have been nursed in the lap of affluence, and who "every night have slept with soft content about their heads"—who still retain a vivid recollection of happier times, and who still feel that they themselves are the same, though all is changed around them.

Such was the condition of the Allerton family. "The world was all before them where to choose," and so low were now their finances, that it was necessary they should think and act promptly, and decide at once upon some plan for their subsistence. Constance proposed a school, but the house they now occupied was in too remote a place to expect any success. A lady had already attempted establishing a seminary in the immediate neighborhood, but it had proved an entire failure. Mrs. Allerton thought that in a better part of the town, and in a larger house, they might have a fair chance of encouragement. But they were now destitute of the means of defraying the expense of a removal, and of purchasing such articles of furniture as would be indispensably necessary in a more commodious dwelling; particularly if fitted up as a school.

Frederick Allerton, who was twelve years old, had just completed his last quarter at the excellent academy in which he had been a pupil from early childhood, and it was now found necessary, after paying the bill, to take him away; as the present situation of the family did not seem to warrant them in continuing him there any longer. He was, however, very forward in all his acquirements, having an excellent capacity, and being extremely diligent. Still it was hard that so promising a boy should be obliged to stop short, when in a fair way of becoming an extraordinary proficient in the principal branches appertaining to what is considered an excellent education. Fortunately, however, a place was obtained for him in a highly respectable book store.

There was now a general retrenchment in the expenditure of the Allerton family. One of their servants was discharged, as they could no longer afford to keep two—and they were obliged to endure many privations which were but ill compensated by the idea that they were wearing very genteel mourning. Again, as they had begun with black, it was necessary to go through with it.—They could not wear their bombazines continually, and as black gingham and chintzes are always spoiled by washing, it was thought better that their common dresses should be of Canton crape, an article that though very durable, is at first of no trifling cost.

In the mean time their only resource seemed to be that of literally supporting themselves by the work of their hands. Constance undertook the painful task of going round among their acquaintances, and announcing their readiness to undertake any sort of needle work that was offered them. Nobody had any work to put out just then. Some promised not to forget them when they had. Others said they were already suited with seamstresses. At this time the Ladies' Depository was not in existence; that excellent establishment, where the feelings of the industrious indigent who have seen better days are so delicately spared by the secrecy with which its operations are conducted.

At length a piece of linen was sent to the Allerton family for the purpose of being made up by them into shirts.—And so great was their joy at the prospect of getting a little money, that it almost absorbed the painful feelings with which for the first time they employed their needles in really working for their living.

They all sewed assiduously, little Louisa doing the easiest parts. The linen was soon made up, and they then obtained another piece, and afterwards some muslin-work. Constance, who was one of the most indefatigable of women, found time occasionally to copy music, and correct proof-sheets, and to many other things by which she was able to add a little more to the general fund. For a short time, her not appearing in black excited much conversation among the acquaintances of the family; but these discussions soon subsided, and after a while nothing more was said or thought on the subject.

But to pay for the mourning of Mrs. Allerton, and her children was a necessity that pressed heavily on them all, and they dreaded the sound of the doorbell lest it should be followed by the presentation of the bills. The bills, came, and were found to be considerably larger than was anticipated. Yet they were paid in the course of the winter, though with much difficulty, and at the expense of much comfort. The unfortunate Allertons rose early and sat up late, kept scanty fires, and a very humble table, and rarely went out of the house, except to church, or to take a little air and exercise at the close of the afternoon.

Most of their friends dropped off, and the few that seemed disposed to continue their acquaintance with people whose extreme indigence was no secret, were so thoughtless as to make their visits in the morning, a time which is never convenient to families that cannot afford to be idle. Mrs. Bladen, who though frivolous and inconsiderate was really a good-natured woman, came frequently to see them; and another of their visitors was Mrs. Craycroft, whose chief incentive was curiosity to see how the Allertons were going on, and a love of dictation which induced her frequently to favor them with what she considered salutary counsel. Mrs. Craycroft was a hard, cold, heartless woman, who by dint of the closest economy had helped her husband to amass a large fortune, and they now had every sort of luxury at their command. The Craycrofts as well as the Bladens had formerly been neighbours of Mrs. Allerton.

Mrs. Bladen and Mrs. Craycroft happened to meet one morning in Mrs. Allerton's little sitting room. Mrs. Craycroft came in last, and Mrs. Bladen after stopping for a few minutes, pursued her discourse with her usual volubility. It was on the subject of Mrs. Allerton and her daughters getting new pelisses, or coats as they are more commonly called in Philadelphia.

"I can assure you," said she, "now that the weather has become so cold, people talk about your going to church in those three-cornered cloth shawls, which you know are only single, and were merely intended for autumn and spring. They did very well when you first got them, for the weather was then mild, but the season is now too far advanced to wear shawls of any sort. You know every body gets their new coats by Christmas, and it is now after New Year's."

"We would be very glad to have coats," replied Mrs. Allerton, "but they are too expensive."

"Not so very," answered Mrs. Bladen. "To be sure, fine black cloth or cassimere is the most fashionable for mourning coats. But many very genteel people wear black levantine or black mode trimmed with crape. Hand-some silk coats would scarcely cost above twenty or twenty-five dollars a piece."

"We cannot afford them," said Mrs. Allerton. "We must only refrain from going out when the weather is very cold. I acknowledge that our shawls are not sufficiently warm."

"Did you not get new olive-colored silk coats, just before Mr. Allerton died?" enquired Mrs. Craycroft.

The abrupt mention of a name which they had long since found it almost impossible to utter brought tears into the eyes of the whole family. There was a general silence, and Mrs. Bladen rose to depart, saying, "I would recommend to you to get the coats as soon as possible, or the winter will be over without them. And I can assure you, as a friend, that people do make their remarks. I am going into Second street; shall I look among the best stores for some black levantine? or would you rather have mode? But I had best bring you patterns of both: and shall I call on Mrs. Facings and bespeak her to make the coats for you?"

"We thank you much," replied Mrs. Allerton, "but we will not give you the trouble either to look for the silk, or to engage the mantua-maker. We must for this winter dispense with new coats."

Mrs. Bladen then took her leave, saying, "well, do as you please, but people think it very strange that you should be still wearing your shawls, now, that the cold weather has set in."

Constance was glad that Mrs. Bladen had not in this instance carried her point. But she grieved to think that her sister and nieces could not have the comfort of wearing their coats because the olive colour did not comport with their mourning bonnets. For herself, as she had made no attempt at mourning, Constance had no scruple as to appearing in hers.

When Mrs. Bladen was gone, Mrs. Craycroft spoke again, and said, "I wonder how people can be so inconsiderate! But Mrs. Bladen never could see things in their proper light. She ought to be ashamed of giving you such advice. Now, I would recommend to you to have your olive silk coats ripped apart, and died black, and then you can make them up again yourselves. You know if you were not in mourning, you might wear them as they are; but as you have begun with black, I suppose it would never do to be seen in the coloured things also."

"I believe," replied Mrs. Allerton, "there is generally much trouble in getting articles dyed—at least in this city, and that they are frequently spoiled in the process."

"Your informants," said Mrs. Craycroft, "must have been peculiarly unlucky in their dyers. I can recommend you to Mr. Copperas, who does things beautifully, so that they look quite as good as new. He dyes for Mrs. Narrowskirt and for Mrs. Dinky. I advise you by all means to send your coats to him. And no doubt you have many other things, now lying by as useless, that would be serviceable if dyed black."

"I believe I will take your advice," answered Mrs. Allerton.

Mrs. Craycroft then proceeded:—"Situated as you are, Mrs. Allerton, I need not say how much it behooves you to economize in every thing you possibly can; now for instance, I would suggest to you all to drink rye coffee. And then as to tea, if you must have tea of an evening, I know a place where you can get it as low as half a dollar a pound—to be sure it is only hyson-skin. In your family a pound of tea ought to go a great way, for now, of course, you do not make it strong. And then, I would advise you all to accustom yourselves to brown sugar in your tea; it is nothing when you are used to it. Of course you always take it in your coffee. And there is a baker not far off, that makes large loaves of rye and Indian mixed. You will find it much cheaper than wheat. Of course you are not so extravagant as to eat fresh bread—

And as to the butter, if you cannot dispense with it altogether, I would suggest that you should use the potted butter from grocery stores. Some of it is excellent. I suppose that, of course, you have entirely given up all kinds of deserts, but if you should wish for any thing of the kind on Sundays, or after a cold dinner, you will find plain boiled rice, sweetened with a very little molasses, almost as good as a pudding. No doubt the children will like it quite as well. You know, I suppose, that if you defer going to market till near twelve o'clock you will always get things much cheaper than if you go in the early part of the day; as towards noon the market people are impatient to get home, and in their hurry to be off, will sell for almost nothing whatever they may chance to have left. In buying wood, let me recommend to you always to get it as green as possible. To be sure green wood does not always make so good a fire as that which is dry, neither does it kindle so well; but then the slower it burns, the longer it lasts, and it is therefore the cheapest. And always get gum back-logs, for they scarcely burn at all. I see you still keep your black woman Lucy. Now you will find it much better to dismiss her, and take a bound girl about twelve or thirteen. Then you know you would have no wages to pay, and your daughters, of course, would not mind helping her with the work."

During this harangue, the colour came into Mrs. Allerton's face, and she was about to answer in a manner that shewed how acutely she was wounded by the unfeeling impertinence of the speaker; but glancing at Constance she saw something in her countenance that resembled a smile, and perceived that she seemed rather amused than angry. Therefore Mrs. Allerton suppressed her resentment, and made no reply.

When Mrs. Craycroft had departed, the mother and daughters warmly deprecated her rudeness and insolence; but Constance, being by nature very susceptible of the ridiculous, was much more inclined to laugh and succeeded in inducing her sister and the girls to regard it in the same light that she did.

"After all," said Mrs. Allerton, "I think we will take Mrs. Craycroft's advice about the dying. The olive coats may thus be turned to very good account, and so may several other things that we cannot now make use of because of their colour. It is true that we can ill afford even the expense of dyeing them, but still we are really very much in want of such coats as we can wear in mourning."

Next day the olive pelisses, which were very pretty, and extremely well made, were carefully ripped apart, and the silk was conveyed to the dyer's, together with a small scarlet Canton crape shawl of Mrs. Allerton's, which she thought would be convenient in cold weather to wear over her shoulders when at home. The material of the dismembered coats was rolled up in as small a compass as possible, wrapped in papers, and carried one afternoon by Isabella and Helen. Mr. Copperas informed them that he only dyed on Thursdays, and as this was Friday afternoon, they had come a day too late to have the things done that week. Therefore the articles could not be put into the dye before next Thursday, and then it would be another week before they could be dressed.—Dressing, in the dyer's phraseology, means stiffening and ironing, and very frequently ironing only.

This delay was extremely inconvenient, as Mrs. Allerton and her daughters were absolutely very much in need of the coats; yet there was no remedy but patience. At the appointed time, two of the girls went to bring home the silk, but were told by a small, featured, mild-spoken quaker woman, employed to attend the customers, that "the things were dyed but not yet dressed."

"Will they be finished by to-morrow afternoon?" asked Isabella.

"I rather think they will not."

"By Saturday then?"

"It's likely they will."

On Saturday the girls went again. Still, the articles, though dyed, were not yet dressed; but they were promised for Tuesday—if nothing happened to prevent.

Every few days, for near a fortnight, some of the Allerton family repaired to the dyer's (and it was a very long walk), but without any success—the things, though always dyed, were never dressed. And when they expressed their disappointment, the quaker woman regularly told them, "these knows I did not say positive. We should never be too certain of any thing."

Finally the silk was acknowledged to be dressed, and it was produced, and paid for; but the crape shawl was missing. A search was made for it, but in vain; still the woman assured them that it could not be lost, as nothing ever was lost in James Copperas's house, adding, "I partly promise thee, that if I live, I will find it for thee by to-morrow."

Next day, when she had done sewing, little Louisa went again for the shawl. The woman now confessed that she had not been able to find it, and said to Louisa, "I think child I would not advise thee to trouble thyself to come after it again. It seems a pity to wear out thy shoes too much. One should not be too certain of anything in this life, and therefore I am not free to say that thy shawl is lost; but it seems to me likely that it will never be found."

"My mother will be sorry," said Louisa, "for she really wants the shawl, and I will regret to lose it."

The little girl then turned to depart, and had reached the front door when the women called her back saying,

"But thee'll pay for the dyeing?" [Fict.]

"What?" exclaimed Louisa, after you have lost the shawl!"

"But I can assure thee it was dyed," replied the woman. "It actually was dyed, I can speak positive to that, and we cannot afford to lose the dyeing."

Louisa, child as she was, had acuteness enough to perceive the intended imposition, and without making an answer, she slipped out of the door: tho' the woman caught her by the skirt, and attempted to stop her, repeating, "But we can't afford to lose the dyeing."

Louisa, however, disengaged herself from her grasp, and ran down the street for some distance, as fast as possible—afraid to look back lest the quaker woman should be coming after her for the money she had brought to pay for the shawl, and which she took care to hold tightly in her hand.

In attempting to make up the coats, it was found impossible to put the different pieces together to the same advantage as before. Also, the silk did not look well, being dyed of a dull brownish black, and stiffened to the consistence of paper. The skirts and sleeves had shrunk much in the dyeing, and the pieces that composed the bodies had been ravelled, frayed and pulled so crooked in dressing, that they had lost nearly all shape. It was impossible to make up the deficiencies by matching the silk with new, as none was to be found that bore sufficient resemblance to it. "Ah!" thought Constance, "how well those coats looked when in their original state. The shade of olive was so beautiful, the silk so soft and glossy, and they fitted so perfectly well!"

When put together under all these disadvantages, the coats looked so badly that the girls were at first unwilling to wear them, except in extreme cold weather—particularly as in coming out of church they overheard whispers among the ladies in the crowd, of "That's a dyed silk!"—

"Any one may see that those coats have been dyed."

They trimmed them with crape, in hopes of making them look better; but the crape wore out almost immediately, and in fact it had to be taken off before the final close of the cold weather.

Spring came at last, and the Allerton family having struggled through a melancholy and comfortless winter, had taken a larger house in a better part of the town, and made arrangements for commencing their school, in which Constance was to be chief instructress. Isabella and Helen, whose ages were sixteen and fourteen, were to assist in teaching some branches, but to continue receiving lessons in others. Louisa was to be one of the pupils.

About a fortnight before their intended removal to their new residence, one afternoon when none of the family were at home, except Constance, she was surprised by the visit of a friend from New Bedford, a young gentleman who had been absent three years on a whaling voyage, in a ship in which he had the chief interest, his father being owner of several vessels in that line.

Edmund Lessingham was an admirer of ladies generally; but during his long voyage he found by his thinking incessantly of Constance, and not at all of any other female, that he was undoubtedly in love with her: a fact which he had not suspected till the last point of Massachusetts faded from his view. He resolved to improve his intimacy with our heroine, should he find her still at liberty, on his return to New Bedford; and if he perceived a probability of success, to make her at once an offer of his hand. When Lessingham came home, he was much disappointed to hear that Constance had been living for more than a twelvemonth in Philadelphia; however, he lost no time in coming on to see her.

When he was shown into the parlour, she was sitting with her head bent over her work. She started up on being accosted by his well remembered voice. Not having heard of the death of her brother, and not seeing her in mourning, Edmund Lessingham was at a loss to account for the tears that filled her eyes, and for the emotion that suffocated her voice when she attempted to reply to his warm expressions of delight at seeing her again. He perceived that she was thinner and paler than when he had last seen her, and he feared that all was not right. She signed to him to sit down, and was endeavoring to compose herself, when Mrs. Craycroft was shown into the room. The lady started with surprise at seeing a very handsome young gentleman with Constance, who hastily wiped her eyes, and introduced Mr. Lessingham.

Mrs. Craycroft took a seat, and producing two or three morning caps from her reticule, she said, in her usual loud voice, "Miss Allerton I have brought these caps for you to alter; I wish you to do them immediately, that they may be washed next week. I find the borders rather too broad, and the head-pieces, though to be sure I did cut them out myself; so I want you to rip them apart, and make the head-pieces smaller, and the borders narrower, and then whip them and sew them on again. I was out the other day when you sent home my husband's shirts with the bill, but when you have done the caps I will pay you for all together. What will you charge for making a dozen aprons of bird's-eye diaper for my little Anna. You must not ask much for I want them quite plain—mere bibs—they are always the best for babies. Unless you will do them very cheap I may as well make them myself."

The face of Lessingham became scarlet, and starting from his chair, he traversed the room in manifest perturbation; sympathizing with what he supposed to be the confusion and mortification of Constance, and regretting that the sex of Mrs. Craycroft prevented him from knocking her down.

Constance, however, rallied, replying with apparent composure to Mrs. Craycroft on the points in question, and calmly settling the bargain for the bird's-eye aprons—she knew that it is only in the eyes of the vulgar-minded and the foolish, that a woman is degraded by exerting her ingenuity or her talents as a means of support.

"Well," says Mrs. Craycroft, "you may send for the aprons to-morrow, and I wish you to hurry with them as fast as you can—when I give out work I never like it to be kept long on hand. I will pay you for the other things when the aprons are done."

Mrs. Craycroft then took her leave, and Constance turned to the window, to conceal from Lessingham the tears that in spite of her self-command were now stealing down her cheeks.

Lessingham hastily went up to her, and taking her hand, he said with much feeling, "Dear Constance—Miss Allerton, I mean—what has happened during my absence? Why do I see you thus?—But I fear that I distress you by enquiring. I perceive that you are not happy—that you have suffered much, and that your circumstances are changed. Can I do nothing to console you or to improve your situation? Let me at once have a right to do so—let me persuade you to unite your fate with mine, and put an end, I hope forever, to these unmerited, these intolerable humiliations."

"No, Mr. Lessingham," said Constance, deeply affected, "I will not take advantage of the generous impulse that has led you thus suddenly to make an offer, which perhaps, in a calmer moment, and on cooler consideration, you may think of with regret."

"Regret!" exclaimed Lessingham, pressing her hand, between both of his, and surveying her with a look of the fondest admiration, "dearest Constance, how little you know, your own value—how little you suppose that during our long separation—"

Here he was interrupted in his impassioned address, by the entrance of Mrs. Allerton and her daughters. Constance hastily withdrew her hand and presented him as Mr. Lessingham, a friend of hers from New Bedford.

Being much agitated, she in a few minutes retired to compose herself in her own apartment. The girls soon after withdrew, and Lessingham, frankly informing Mrs. Allerton that he was much and seriously interested in her sister-in-law, begged to know some particulars of her present condition.

Mrs. Allerton, who felt it impossible to regard Mr. Lessingham as a stranger, gave him a brief outline of the circumstances of Constance's residence with them, and spoke of her as the guardian angel of the family. "She is not only," said her sister-in-law, "one of the most amiable and affectionate, but also one of the most sensible and judicious of women. And never have we in any instance acted contrary to her advice, without eventually finding cause to regret that we did so." And Mrs. Allerton could not forbear casting her eyes over her mourning dress.

Lessingham, though the praises of Constance were music in his ears, had tact enough to take his leave, fearing that his visit was interfering with the tea-hour of the family.

Next morning, the weather was so mild as to enable them to sit up stairs with their sewing; for latterly, the state of their fuel had not allowed them to keep fire except in the parlor and kitchen. Lessingham called and enquired for Constance. She came down, and saw him alone. He renewed, in explicit terms, the offer he had so abruptly made her on the preceding afternoon. Constance, whose heart had been with Lessingham during the whole of his long absence, had a severe struggle before she could bring herself to insist on their union being postponed for at least two years; during which time she wished, for the sake of the family, to remain with them, and get the school firmly established; her nieces, meanwhile, completing their education, and acquiring under her guidance, a proficiency in the routine of teaching.

"But surely," said Lessingham, "you understand that I wish you to make over to your sister-in-law the whole of your Aunt Ilford's legacy. You shall bring me nothing but your invaluable self."

Though grateful for the generosity and disinterestedness of her lover, Constance knew that the interest of her ten thousand dollars was, of course, not sufficient to support Mrs. Allerton, and her children without some other source of income; and she was convinced that they would never consent to become pensioners on Lessingham's bounty, kind and liberal as he was. She therefore adhered to her determination of remaining with her sister and nieces till she had seen them fairly afloat, and till she could leave them in a prosperous condition. And Lessingham was obliged to yield to her conviction that she was acting rightly, and to consent that the completion of his happiness should accordingly be deferred for two years.

He remained in Philadelphia till he had seen the Allerton family established in their new habitation, and he managed with much delicacy to aid them in the expense of fitting it up.

The school was commenced with a much larger number of pupils than had been anticipated. It increased rapidly under the judicious superintendence of Constance; and in the course of two years she had rendered Isabella and Helen so capable of filling her place, that all the parents were perfectly satisfied to continue their children with them. At the end of that time, Lessingham, (who, in the interval, had made frequent visits to Philadelphia;) came to claim the promised hand of his Constance. They were married—she having first transferred the whole of her little property to her brother's widow.

At the earnest desire of Lessingham, Mrs. Allerton consented that Louisa should live in future with her beloved aunt Constance; and consequently the little girl accompanied them to New Bedford.

Mrs. Allerton and her family went on and prospered—her son was every thing that a parent could wish—her children all married advantageously—and happily she has not yet had occasion to put in practice her resolution of never again wearing mourning: though principle, and not necessity is the motive which will henceforward deter her from complying with that custom.

THE GRAVES OF A HOUSEHOLD.

— BY FELICIA HEMANS.

They grew in beauty side by side,
They fill'd one house with glee—
Their graves are severed far and wide
By mount, and stream, and sea!

The same fond mother bent at night
O'er each fair sleeping brow,
She had each folded flower in sight—
Where are those dreamers now?

One midst the forest of the west
By a dark stream is laid;
The Indian knows his place of rest,
Far in the cedar shade.

The sea, the blue lone sea, hath one,
He lies where pearls lie deep;
He was the loved of all, yet none
O'er his low bed may weep.

One sleeps where southern vines are dress'd
Above the noble slain;
He wrapt his colors round his breast,
On a blood-red field of Spain.

And one o'er her the myrtle showers
Its leaves, by soft winds fann'd;
She faded 'midst Italian flowers,
The last of the bright band.

And parted thus, they rest who play'd
Beneath the same green tree,
Whose voices mingled as they play'd
Around one parent knee!

They that with smiles lit up the hall,
And cheer'd with song the hearth—
Alas for love, if thou wert all,
And nought beyond, on earth!

"NORMAN LESLIE."

A Chapter from Fay's new novel, lately published by the Messrs. Harper.

It was the first night of the carnival of Rome.—There was a masked ball. Lords, dukes, princes, and noble ladies thronged the splendid dome. A gorgeous tide of fashion heaved and swelled to its utmost height.

Could all the thoughts and feelings—all the burning passions—the cunning schemes—the bright hopes—the blank suspicions—the joy, the agony, that went on beneath those floating plumes and sparkling stars—could they be laid open to the day what clashing characters mingle in the whirl!—Hark to the young sweet voices—watch the actions of each passing incognito. Who are they? The husband is there watching his wife—the lover his mistress; jealousy rolls its eyes unseen; hate lurks beneath a painted smile; the very air is full of mysteries.

A gay harlequin and one in palmer's weeds met:
"Hist! Speak!"

"The bright stars above us," murmured one.
"And the hell beneath," replied the other.

"Right," said the first, in a secret whisper, "is he here?"

"By the virgin! I saw him. But there are two in the same dress, and it has thrown me off the track."

"Whist—look!"
"Can it be?"

"It is."
"The plume of the right one is touched with crimson."

"I will speak to him," said the palmer.
"In ten minutes meet me by the column where we parted."

"Off—he comes!" They separated.

"Holy mother!" cried a cavalier, muffled in a dark mantle, his broad hat looped up with a diamond, and shaded by a sable plume; "both—both are here. God! could I mistake! these two fraternal friends! See—see how the same stealthy pace shows in each the same quiet, soft, hellish hate! Now nerve me Heaven! Palmer's weeds and the many-colored harlequin—I shall not forget; and both on the bloodtrack after him. Be still deep fraught breast, thy time is almost come!"

Gliding swiftly after the first two speakers, the cavalier disappeared.

All eyes were turned upon him as he passed so princely was his port. The young knight won hearts in all directions. Beautiful he must have been, though the features could not be distinguished behind the vizor bars; his armour glittered in the almost noontide splendor; the plume floating over his helm was touched with crimson.

"From the Holy land, sir knight?" asked a palmer.
"Ah, good pilgrim."

"And the blood of the infidels on thy plume? I would, sir, knight, that they stained with blood wore all the red tokens as fairly as thou!"

"Ha!" cried the knight.
The palmer was gone. Again they separated.

A harlequin stood leaning against a column.
"Holy sir Palmer!"

"Merry fool!"
"Did you rightly guess?"

"When was I ever mistaken! I touched his master-cord, and it trembled beneath my hand. It is himself!"

"The red plume?"
"Ay, you cannot be mistaken."

A glitter from the mask of the harlequin showed the flash of fiery eyes.

"It is well."
"Can I aid you?"

"No alone—alone, I do it! Headless shall lie that lofty plume ere to-morrow's sun!"

The graceful and slender cavalier drew his dark feathers lower over his brow, and while the harlequin stole through the crowd, followed close on his track.

Two stately forms swept by in royal robes. The one, a man of imposing aspect, crowned, and in his hand a sceptre; the other, a lady, a diadem on her brow. On the monarch's arm hung a girl unmasked and beautiful as morning. The young knight saw her, and started abruptly with an exclamation of delight and amazement.

"Fair lady," he said after an interval, during which, with the license of the place, he had regarded her attentively, "may an honourable knight-errant lay at your feet his heart, and ever after do battle in your name?"

"No, sir, knight," said Flora, smiling, for it was she; "seek I pray you, some other love—some worthier."

"No other love," cried the knight, approaching with the most guarded respect, and yet with a tenderness, sincere, deep, and agitated, in his voice and manner, which did not escape the notice of her who had called it forth, "than Flora Temple—no worthier breathes the sweet air of Heaven?"

"How!" she replied, surprised and almost alarmed, "you know me?"

"There is not a page of my heart," replied the stranger, "where your name is not written, where your image is not engraved!"

The lovely girl turned pale and drew back, eyeing her companion from head to foot with keen scrutiny, and then shrunk with something of a tremor close to her father's arm.

"Nonsense, daughter," he said; "remember you are at Rome, and in a masked ball; these things mean nothing but jest."

The knight stood erect and silent, as if deaf to all but the voice of his lady love.

Mrs. Temple, ever childishly delighted with adventure and admiration, smiled on the proud form who stood thus glittering in his mailed suit, and who appeared to have thus publicly selected Flora as the peculiar object of homage. The attention of the father and mother was, however, immediately directed to the other attractions; and although the daughter hung on the arm of the former, she could receive the remarks of the knight, and even reply to them, without the danger of observation.

"Your noble father," said he at length, when he found another opportunity to address himself to her ear alone—"your noble sire, fair lady, mistakes. What I say means more than jest. Dost thou remember—"

He paused, and resumed again, in a tone yet lower and deeper,—

"Yes, dear, most beloved Flora! the bosom once more, after long and weary years, heaves at the sound of your voice, has learned nothing from absence but love, although more hopeless—but adoration, all hough offered in despair. Farewell again—now, perhaps, forever."

"Stay—stay!" she cried, pale as monumental marble, yet uttering not the least exclamation to render the interesting interview interrupted by others.

The knight obeyed.

"Something tells me," said she, after a short pause, and with a voice that trembled with emotion, "that I speak to one who I have met in a distant land."

"To an exile," added the stranger, "whose years of agony would be repaid a thousand fold, if but one kind word from your lips would bless with hope that deep and faithful love which absence could never weaken, nor even despair destroy."

"Mr. Leslie."

His very heart stood still. Those same eyes which had haunted him in the remotest climes were now turned on him with increased loveliness and feeling. At this moment the cavalier with the sable plume approached, and said,—

"Ho, sir knight—a word with you!"

He to whom this was addressed showed little inclination to accept an invitation so abruptly given, and was turning away disdainful reply, when the speaker shading his brows with one hand, half lifted the mask. Beneath it glanced the eye of the Countess D—

At such periods, years of thought flash over us in a moment. That remarkable face—he had first seen it with Howard and saved her from the mad steeds: it had floated afterwards, darkly, ominously, in his delirious dreams; then the haughty coldness with which it had mingled in the giddy circles at Florence—the firmness with which Morton had identified it at Cascine. The consummate skill which had guided her through his interviews with her, so as again to fling the suspicion from his mind; and now and here, beneath a mask, in man's attire, the same glance—but its coldness changed to fire—its meaning and its mystery unveiled, gleaming on him amid the riot and confusion of this magnificent scene! Even Flora was forgotten.

"Norman Leslie!" she said, after a gaze of singular agitation, "you are in danger!"

"How? from whom?"
"Your life—you are watched."

"My life I value not; but, mysterious woman you know me—you are then she? By Heaven!" he grasped her wrist, "you shall not leave me till—"

"For God's sake! I am your friend; stand aside but for one moment. Seem not to regard me.—Eyes are on us—eyes of hate, fire, and revenge. More presently."

She glided away, leaving Norman almost motionless with astonishment. He turned to Flora—she also was gone.

"Alms!" said a holy friar, beneath whose cowl might be detected the head of a profligate young noble; "alms, I pray you."

"Stand!" cried a stalwart figure, arrayed as a robber. Norman looked around. Nothing could he see but a wilderness of grotesque forms and masked faces.

Presently a hand touched his arm.

"Look not around," said the voice; "I am the sable plume. If you attempt to gaze, or follow, if you exhibit any sign to betray to others that I am addressing you, both of us are lost—nay, then, I will fly; you shall never hear of me again."

"Speak, again," said he.

"Beware the harlequin."

"The harlequin? There are twenty here."

"Then avoid them all—and the palmer—they seek thy life."

"And who are they?"

"The one is the subtle priest, the other—"

There was a pause.

"Nay, he has passed; yet he is almost now within reach of our lowest voice. The other is—move not, stir not—"

"Speak!"

"Clairmont."

It was with difficulty indeed that the advice contained in this last sentence was adopted. His heart leaped to his throat. His blood rolled and boiled in his veins.

"You know the secret of my life!" said he, however, without stirring.

"There was no answer."

"I will turn, if you speak not, and drag you before this whole multitude."

There was no answer. He changed his position. As he suspected, his informant had disappeared.—He sent a keen glance round amid the thousands. Palmers and harlequins were passing and re-passing him in every direction.

"Sir knight of the crimson plume," said a voice.

"Well my fair page?"

"Beneath the vase, on yon pedestal, lies a scroll. It is for you; but read it not till you are alone."

Bewildered, half believing himself in a romantic dream, he made his way to the spot designated, and with a cautious hand moved the small vase. Passing his fingers over the marble, he seized a strip of paper.

Trembling with curiosity, hoping that he was about to make the discovery which would lift him at once to bliss unattainable, he forgot the caution he had so singularly received respecting the harlequin; and, after wrapping around him a heavy black mantle which he had left in the corridor, without waiting for his carriage, he hastened—he almost flew into the street.

The moon was just emerging from a silver cloud that lay like a bar along the sky. Its light fell broadly down from the eaves of an immense palace. Pausing in a narrow lane, he held up the scroll. It contained only a line:—"By twilight, meet me to-morrow night, at St. Peter's, before the altar of St. Leo the Great. Your life—more than your life depends on it."

A short, deep exclamation at his side startled him; and the glimmer of the bright blade trembled in the moon beam.

"Ha! at last!" cried a well known voice, a dagger was lifted over his breast.

Off his guard, unarmed, utterly exposed, death once again gleamed before him: from which all his personal strength and courage would have been unable to defend him, when a figure darted upon them and threw a heavy cloak upon the arm of the assassin. Grasping him, thus entangled, Norman brought him to the ground, and tore off his mask. The face of Clairmont met his eyes. It was black with passion. He wrenched the knife from his hand—a dreadful feeling flashed across him; but muttering, "No—no blood!" he flung the blade fiercely away.

"Dog! assassin! you shall come with me!"

A crowd of revellers burst suddenly round the corner—several rushed to the spot. Norman stood alone. His victim, with a sudden and desperate struggle, had wrenched himself away, leaving only a few shreds, of various colors, in the hand of his foe.

An Extract from Clinton Bradshaw.

ADVENTURES OF AN EVENING.

Bradshaw and Willoughby exchanged smiles. They explained to Cavendish that they could not all go; and, after a good deal of trouble with him, he agreed to remain. They made their apologies to the ladies, and departed.

They were soon at the watch-house. At the door, they met Jones, with four other watchmen, going upon their mission to catch Adams. A few words were exchanged between them, when the watchmen entered the watch-house, to obtain for Bradshaw and Willoughby the necessary disguises.

The watch-house was situated in the centre of the city. It was the house where the watchmen met to receive the orders of the captain of the watch, and to which the rioters and marauders of the night were brought and locked up, to await a hearing before the magistrate, who always attended early in the morning. The room the young men entered was low and long; a dingy lamp of tin hung suspended from the ceiling. Along the walls were benches, permanently fixed, on which lay, at length, or reclined, in an attitude that pleased them, those watchmen who were not on duty. Behind the desk, near a fire-place, was a large square-shouldered man, with a dread-naught coat on; his cheeks were adorned with an immense pair of whiskers, and through his busy eyebrows his redish eye glowed like a cigar in a dark night, in the mouth of some sturdy smoker. This was the captain of the watch.

"Lawyer," said he to Bradshaw, "so you're going a larking to-night. I heard of your business with Adams last night; I wonder, being as you're a small man, that you came off so well. The fellow's a noted gallows bird, and fights like vengeance. He has sworn he won't be taken alive; you'll have tough times to-night."

"There is no harm in taking him dead, is there?" said Bradshaw.

"Not exactly," said the captain, hesitatingly; "but it would be best to take him alive."

Bradshaw did not mean all that might have been meant by this phrase; but he knew among whom he stood. He remarked,

"I have no enmity against the fellow; but he's a great rascal, and he ought to be taken. Jones here has a large family, and is a good watchman, and I want him to get the reward." So saying, the young men, who had put on dread-naught coats and old hats, and the watchmen, departed together. They reconnoitred in the neighbourhood of the alley for some time before they entered it. Several squads of young men, frequenters of the neighbourhood, passed them; but they were much more peaceable than usual; the late transactions having quelled their turbulence. It must have been after one, when they entered the lane. Loose clouds had been floating in the heavens since dark; after midnight, they gathered in huge masses, and the wind began to blow roughly.

"What think you of the business, Squire?" said Jones in a whisper to Bradshaw, as they approached the house where Bradshaw had contended with Adams—"had we best enter the house?"

"Kentuck," whispered Bradshaw, as they advanced towards the grocery, "what do you think of this business?"

"First rate," was the reply, "I'm for going the whole hog. Suppose, we turn thief takers, and rival Vidocq or old Hays?"

"We will, if we succeed, but remember this is our first attempt. Have you pistols?"

"Yes, two of them, and a dirk."

"So have I. Let's have the word Kentuck for our watch-word, and if I hear you call it, or you me, we must come to the rescue. I've no idea of having my profile spoilt, or of being carried out feet foremost; and, therefore, if any of these fellows flash their knives dangerously it will be worse for them."

The grocery store was a high frame building; on one side of it was a vacant lot, and on the other a frame house not quite so high, and divided from it by an alley of about seven feet in width. Bradshaw and Kentuck entered, and passing up by a counter, they took their station near a stove. Seated by the stove, were two young men, who looked at the new comers, and stretched out their persons so as to take up as much room as possible. The one by Willoughby, put his feet on the only chair that was between them. As soon as Kentuck observed it, he said, "My good fellow, if you'll let your carcass occupy but one chair, I'll take a seat"—and without waiting for the removal—he lifted the chair, let the fellow's leg fall, and sat down. The man stared at Kentuck, who returned his glance with the mildest expression in the world, which the fellow observing, and mistaking for "no fight," said, "Do you want a fuss here, my young lark?"

"Why, I don't much care," said Kentuck, in a drawing tone. "If there's a fuss, I shall be into it to a certainty; and if there ain't a fuss, I shall sit still. I tell you what it is, stranger, I'm all the way from old Kentuck; you've heard of such a place, may be? It's a place for varmin's, wild varmin's, I tell you. The word there, is go a-head. You've heard tell of people licking their weight in wild cats, hain't you? I've seen it done. May be I could do it—should like to try? You've heard tell of rowing a man up salt river, hain't ye? Well, I've seen it done; there's no joke in it. Did you ever see a man bite the head of a nail off? Bring me one."

While Willoughby spoke this, he stretched his legs out, and looked the man in the face with the most imperturbable indifference.

"You're a picture," said the fellow, struck with his don't care manner.

"Now, ain't I?" said Kentuck. "I'm not one of your pictures to hang around a girl's neck, though; I am a full length painting. One of your pictures that may dangle in a strange kind of frame, some of these days—two posts upright, and one across, with a rope and the picture at the end of it, so well done, that the whole people are admiring the execution. Do you take, stranger?" The fellow nodded, and grinned. "Well, it's no matter—while we live, be merry. What'll you take to drink?"

"If you're for drink," said the fellow, "I'll take a little whiskey."

"Ay, of the mountain dew," said Cavendish.

"What's this landlord's name?"

"Scratch, they call him."

"Here, Scratch," called out Willoughby, to an old man by the door, who was keeping a sharp eye upon his moveables—"let's have some of your very best; no deception, old boy, or you'll get scalped, just as a wild Indian scalps a fellow. They learnt the trick to the Kentucks, and we can do it like lightning. I'll bet you a treat for the company, that I'll take this Kentuck," (and he thrust his hand into his pocket, and produced a curiously wrought, large knife,) "I'll take this Kentuck, and with one sweep, just one, round your head, I'll leave you, old Scratch, in the condition for a namesake, with no more hair upon your crown, than there is on the back of my hand. What say you?"

"Sir, the liquor's good," said Scratch, "and I want no such experiments."

"Old boy, you'd scarcely feel it. It's a mere circumstance, you'd look just as well with a scratch; and who knows but that you might get a pension by the scalping? But, no matter, if ever you want it done, you must call on me. Stranger," continued Willoughby, turning to the fellow beside him. "I've been a river character, a wild woods river character; I've seen sawyers, and swamps, and snags, and alligators, and every thing. Why, the sprees you have here, in your lanes and alleys, are nothing to Natchez under the Hill, or the swamps at New Orleans. They'll dirk a fellow there just to keep their hands in. I've seen knives there flash around like sunbeams, and I just set among 'em as I set now and looked on."

"What brings you all the way here?" asked the fellow who had just taken his liquor, and who felt warmed towards Willoughby.

"Why, when I was last at New Orleans, I took the sea, round from there, and landed at New York, looked round there a spell, cut up in other places, and at last came here. I happened to get the word, while I was in this here city, that an old comrade of mine had got into hardships somewhere down this way, and I thought I'd just take a look after him."

"What's his name?"

"Adams," replied Willoughby. "Do you know such a man, stranger?"

"What, besides Adams, is his name?"

"Henry Adams," said Bradshaw, who observed that Kentuck was at fault. "He's been a high boy in his generation. The word reached us to day that he'd got into a bad fix. It wasn't to-day, exactly, it reached us, but last night. You see, we took a spree, and got lodged in the watch-house. While they were talking with us, the watchmen came in, and told about some fellow having a fight here last night with Adams, and how Adams got hurt—knocked down two or three times about a girl, at a place they called old Moll's. He described the place pretty exact, and I know it must be in this lane."

"What kind of a looking man is this Adams, that you speak of?" inquired Scratch.

"He's a thick-set, bull-necked fellow," said Bradshaw, "with black hair and eyes. He was lately in jail. I went there to see him; but they wouldn't let me in."

Old Scratch hesitated a moment, seemed perplexed, and remarked, unawares—

"He says he has known men like you, but none that they call Kentuck."

"My old boy," said Kentuck, "can't a man change his name, and have what these lawyers call an alias. You don't think a free rover sails always under the same flag, do you?"

"No," said the old fellow, with a grin, "I guess not. But what do you want to see him for?"

"To see him for!" exclaimed Willoughby. "The devil! Why, don't you know that the watchmen and constables are after him, hunting high and low?"

"Yes," said Bradshaw, who was satisfied that Adams was in the house; "they'll be down upon you presently, and raise the devil. We want to get him off somewhere if we can. We heard the watchmen say, the other night, they would turn over every stone in the city for him."

"Blood and thunder!" exclaimed Scratch,—"can't a man do for a friend, without always getting into trouble!"

"Scratch," said Bradshaw, "they'll blow you sky high if they find him; and they'll take him, besides. He's a fellow that'll tell on any body to get himself off. By thunder, I don't want him to tell on me. I want to hide him."

"It will be hard work to move him," said old Scratch. "He's very bad; he's got his foot twisted all out of place; his head and shoulder is terribly bruised. Come on; let's see if we can't do something for him. Mind, I depend on you as his true friends. You're on no account to reveal the place where you find him."

So speaking, Scratch led the way to the back part of his house, and then, by a rickety pair of steps, to the second story. His house was uninhabited, save by himself, and those outlaws whom he harboured. All his goods that were of any value, were in the front part of his shop; they consisted, principally, of liquors which, together with a few dry goods, and a barrel or two of fish, and some cordage, comprised his stock in trade. The second story had two or three rooms in it, which, as the doors were open, the young men could observe were filled with all kinds of rubbish, of the most inflammable materials.

"You see," said Scratch, chuckling, "they may hunt the hare, but they can't find him. If them dogs of constables press too heavy on me, do you see?—I can just let a candle fall in yon old tar barrel, and if they don't scamper like old rats, what's that to me?"

Bradshaw and Cavendish felt in a quandary, as to how they should act, on seeing Adams; but, as they could not communicate with each other, by a tacit understanding, they determined to follow to his hiding-place, and trust to circumstances. The watchmen would, doubtless, keep their station until they heard the signal, or the young men left the grocery. If Adams was much disabled, they could easily take him; but the main point was to prevent the interference of old Scratch and his company, before they could communicate with the watchmen; however, on went the landlord, and they followed after. He led the way to the corner of the building, next to the vacant lot, beside the tar barrel to which he had pointed, and to which a board, that seemed to be nailed against the wall to repair a dilapidation, a narrow door opened, which led by a ladder to a kind of third story or cock-loft. On entering the apartment, it appeared long and narrow, with the ceiling unplastered and slanting, which was, in fact, formed by the roof of the house. There was no flooring on the rafters, only, here and there, a board laid across in different directions. Treading a board that appeared to lead to the sky-light, the landlord opened a door close to the eaves, which they had to stoop to enter, and Bradshaw and Willoughby found themselves in a miserable room, if room it might be called, on the floor of which, on a mattress, lay Adams. The ruffian's encounter with Bradshaw had been no child's play; he looked squalid and feverish. He was so altered from sickness, and his wounds, Bradshaw scarcely knew him. The Kentuckian eyed his broad chest, bony arms, and bull neck, and wondered how Bradshaw could have contended, successfully, with such superior strength. The landlord, with the candle which he held in his hand, lit one which stood by the bed-side of Adams, and then stepped behind the young men. Willoughby had to stoop very much, in consequence of his height, and the lowness of the room. Forgetting, for a moment, this necessity, as he stepped forward, he struck his head against the roof with such force, as to throw him off his balance. In the impulsive effort to recover himself, he threw out his hand, and struck from the head of Bradshaw the watchmen's hat and false whiskers. Snatching a pistol from his bed-side, and aiming it at the head of Bradshaw, Adams exclaimed, in the same instant that he fired—"We're betrayed!" The ball grazed the left temple of Bradshaw, and ploughed its way right over the top of the landlord's head. The bone of his skull was thick enough to resist its entrance—but it nearly did for him what the Kentuckian offered to do with his knife. Uttering a yell of pain, old Scratch descended the ladder with all possible speed, and fastened the door after him. Bradshaw threw himself upon Adams just as he was cocking another pistol, and he had scarcely time to force his hand in a harmless direction, when he pulled the trigger, but it only snapped. Willoughby sprang upon the body of the ruffian, as he attempted to fire, and said—"I'm the strongest—let me hold him. Run, Bradshaw, and bring the watch."

Quick as thought, Bradshaw hastened down the ladder. He found the door fast; but, placing his body against the wall, and his feet against the door, with main force, after a powerful effort, he burst it open, and tumbled into the room. Within ten feet of him, near the tar barrel, stood old Scratch, with the light in his hand. Bradshaw rushed past him, and descended the steps, into the grocery. There were several persons around the stove, who evidently had been startled by the report of the pistol. Bradshaw looked round to see if there was any back way, through which he could pass out; for he reflected, without his false whiskers and hat, he might be known to some of them, as the one who had hurt Adams. He saw no way of passing out, but by the front door. As he rapidly advanced to do so, the fellow who had been conversing at the stove with Kentuck, asked—"Where's the other fellow? Who fired the pistol? Where's your whiskers and hat, my lark?"

"Keep dark," said Bradshaw; "I left them up stairs. There's watchmen hid away, about here, I believe."

"The devil! What will Adams do? Don't you smell something burning?"

At this moment, old Scratch called out from above—"Knock him down—kill him! He's a spy."

The fellows immediately placed themselves in a threatening attitude; one brandished a formidable club, and others drew their knives. They stood directly between Bradshaw and the door, calling out—

"Traitor, spy—we know you. Say your prayers!"

"Make way, my brave boys," said Bradshaw, nothing intimidated, drawing and cocking a pistol, as he spoke. "Make a clear passage. Put up your knives and clubs. The first man who attempts to use one, I'll shoot dead."

"Don't fear him," exclaimed the fellow who had previously spoken: "his pistol's not loaded. Didn't you hear it go off, up stairs?"

"Why don't old Scratch come down," said another fellow, intimidated by Bradshaw's manner, "and help us, if he wants him caught?"

"See, boys!" said Bradshaw, producing another pistol, and holding one in each hand,—"two pistols have not been fired: one must be loaded. Your blood be upon your own head! The first one that attempts to stop me is a gone case."

So speaking, he passed deliberately by them, while old Scratch came running down stairs, crying out, "Stop him!" They followed, but at a respectful distance, after Bradshaw, determined to dog him. He crossed over to the old building in which were the watch. He thought it best not to call them, as the fellows might then scamper off; and he wished them to be taken. They followed after him, giving, at intervals, a low whistle, which was answered from the upper part of the lane, where footsteps were heard advancing. All at once, the cry of "Fire! Fire!" from a hundred tongues, burst forth in that fearful tone, that tells it is near: at the same moment, a blaze of light revealed, to Bradshaw, the forms and faces of the watchmen, among whom he stood.

"We've found him," said Bradshaw. "He's at old Scratch's."

He turned and beheld the old villain's house on fire, with the flames blazing out of the second story windows. It immediately occurred to him, that Scratch had set it on fire; and the rapid progress of the flames was proof enough that his train, of which he spoke, was well set. Bradshaw looked anxiously round for Willoughby, but in vain. He told the watchmen, hastily, the circumstances; and requested them to take Scratch in custody, if they should see him. He then entered the burning house, in search of Willoughby.—He proceeded as far as the steps to the second story, but he found it impossible to ascend—the whole was in a blaze; and in places the fire dropped down into the grocery, through the floor, which, in several places, was burned through. He called in a loud voice, stood listening, and called again and again, but there came no answer. By this time, a great crowd had gathered; the bells were ringing; the cry of fire sounded through the city; and the noise of the engine bells and wheels was heard in the lane, as the hose-men ran to and fro, unreeling the hose. When Bradshaw re-entered the street, two engines were in full play on the fire. On the opposite side, he saw old Scratch looking very composedly on the house. Springing forward, and seizing him by the throat, Bradshaw exclaimed, "Where's my friend? Tell me, or I'll choke you? Where's Kentuck?"

"In the house," said the old fellow, doggedly.

As Bradshaw was in the act of pressing him to the pavement, he glanced towards the house, saw the trap-door open, and, in a moment after, Willoughby stood on the roof. It seemed to swing and tremble beneath his weight. Stooping down, Willoughby helped Adams through the door, and, half dragging him, for he could not help himself, they reached the chimney that stood near the adjoining house, divided, as we have before described, from it by an alley of about seven feet in width. Luckily for them, the wind blew in the opposite direction, so as to bear the flames towards the vacant lot. The whole of the house on that side was burning; and great bodies of flame broke upward through the very roof at that corner. The engines directed the whole body of the water there, but it seemed inevitable that the two must perish. "Where's the life escape-ladder?" was called out on every side.—"Not come yet, not come yet," was the answer. The crisis was so fearful that the immense crowd looked on in breathless suspense. The engine men worked away at their engines without their accustomed song, in dead silence, with their eyes upturned to Willoughby and Adams. The Kentuckian stood erect with his arm resting on the top of the chimney; his hat and watchman's cloak he had left in Adams' room; a splendid cable chain of gold was plainly perceptible, over the breast of his mole-skin vest. At his feet, cowering and clinging to the roof, with both his hands, was Adams. His face expressed the wildest horror; in heart-rending tones, he was calling on the crowd for God's sake to save him.

As soon as Bradshaw saw Willoughby, he called out to him, in a firm, clear voice, that every man in the crowd heard, "Willoughby! Kentuck! hold on; I'll bring you a rope from the next building." Willoughby waved his hand.

To throw off his coat and boots, catch up a coil of cordage, and enter the adjacent house, were, with Bradshaw, but the work of an instant. Several of the crowd said it was no use, as he passed them; and one or two, from the best of motives, endeavoured to restrain him, but he rushed on, and, in a moment more, he stood on the roof of the next house to the grocery. He put the coil of rope round his neck; with one spring, he lit beside Willoughby; but he would have fallen, had not the Kentuckian caught his hand, for he had to jump on the slanting part of the roof in consequence of the chimney. The roof cracked and smoked; a cry of horror burst from the crowd.

"Here, Kentuck, put this rope round you, and let me let you down," said Bradshaw.

"No, let's put it round this poor devil first," said Willoughby, "and let him down. I would have dared the risk of jumping on the next roof, but I could not leave this man to die, while there was hope."

While they spoke, amidst the breathless silence of the crowd, they tied the rope round Adams, and lowered him down in safety. Willoughby wrapped the rope round the chimney, made it fast, and said—

"Now, Bradshaw, do you descend."

"Not until you are first down," said Bradshaw.

Willoughby folded his arms, and looked at Bradshaw.

"No, Kentuck," said Bradshaw, "I got you into this difficulty. You're making the peril greater for both of us by waiting. Go ahead!"

"Come on!" called out the crowd, "come on! the roof is falling!"

The Kentuckian still paused; Bradshaw sprang upon the next building, as the only means of making him take the rope. As Bradshaw leaped, Willoughby seized the rope; scarcely had it felt his weight, when the roof fell in with a tremendous crash. The crowd thought for a moment that both were lost. But, when the roof fell, the chimney stood; and Willoughby clung to the rope, and held himself suspended, for an instant, by an admirable presence of mind, in air, till the smoke somewhat subsided; and, while the flames were yet smothered under the roof, he let himself down in safety. By almost a miracle, Bradshaw, when he jumped on to the next house, maintained his footing. This he could not have done, had he not been in stocking feet. If the Kentuckian had tried it, he must have fallen, booted as he was.

"Is he safe?" called out Bradshaw. "Is Kentuck safe?"

"Safe as an old 'coon!" exclaimed Willoughby; "how are you, Bradshaw?"

TO MY COLLEGE FRIEND, B. W. H.

Remember me not, when thy heart is glad,
And those that thou lovest are 'round thee,
But when thy bosom is burdened and sad,
Then I ask that thou'lt think of me.

Remember me not, in the hour of glee,
When all around thee is gladness,
No! I ask not that then thou'lt think of me
For fear it might cause thee sadness.

Remember me not, in prosperity's hour,
When fortune smiles brightly on thee;
But when dark clouds of adversity lower
Then I ask that thou'lt think of me.

Remember me not, when thou'rt free from care
And thy heart beats lightly in thee;
But when low thou bendest thy knee in prayer
Then I ask thou wilt think of me. W. H. M.

It requires but little acquaintance with the heart, to know that woman's first wish is to be handsome; and that, consequently, the readiest method of obtaining her kindness, is to praise her beauty.—Johnson.

THE WISSAHICCON.*

BY BENJ. MATTHIAS.

"Its bounding crystal frolicked in the ray,
And gushed from cleft to crag with saltless spray."
BYRON.

It is probable there are but few individuals residing in the vicinity of Philadelphia, who have not heard, during some interval of business engagements, of Wissahiccon creek, a beautiful and romantic stream that falls into the no less romantic Schuylkill, about five miles above the city. The stream is visited, statedly, by but a small number of persons, but as it is neither found on any map, nor marked in any gazetteer that I have ever examined, there may be some apology offered for the indifference to magnificent scenery, manifested by hundreds and thousands of our citizens, who, though domiciled in its immediate vicinity, have never deemed it worthy of a visit. So true it is, that there is a proneness in human nature to undervalue the gifts of Providence which are placed within our reach, and to admire and covet those which are located at a distance. Were a fatiguing journey of several hundred miles necessary, in order to enjoy a ramble along the banks of the Wissahiccon, we should then, without doubt, view its placid waters, its sluggish, meandering course, its richly covered banks, and its imposing precipices, with the admiration and enthusiasm which scenes of this character never fail to inspire in the minds of those who passionately love the untouched works of the hand of Nature. But the delightful little stream courses along within a few miles of our doors, and a ride to its most picturesque views, is but an hour's excursion; hence, except to a few whose researches have discovered, and whose good taste enabled them to appreciate, the beauty, sublimity and majesty of this stream, it is almost unknown.

But there are persons who have not been thus negligent of nature's treasures in this vicinity, and to these a visit to the fascinating Wissahiccon, calls up remembrances and associations of the most delightful character. To those who enjoy Nature in her majesty—free, uncontrolled, undespoiled of her beauty by the effacing efforts of human skill—there is no spot, within a circle of many miles, so rich in imagery, so imposing in appearance, so fascinating in attraction, as the banks of the Wissahiccon. The stream takes its rise from several springs in the upper part of Montgomery county, and flows, for a short distance, through a limestone country, remarkable for fertility and a high state of cultivation.—Thence it passes, south-westernly, "a sweet smiling stream sleeping on the green sward," into more undulating land, until it reaches the Chesnut ridge, from which it progresses, at times indolently, and at times with an impetuous current, through a narrow valley, hedged in on either side by high hills, steep and craggy cliffs and precipitous mountains, until it strikes the Schuylkill, about a mile above the falls. Along its whole course the scenery of the Wissahiccon is beautiful, but it is the portion lying within four or five miles of its mouth, that is generally regarded as the most attractive, as it exhibits, in bolder relief than any other portion, the peculiar sublimity and grandeur of the stream, and the imposing and majestic ledge of rock work through which it passes. It is along this distance that I have been accustomed to ramble during leisure moments, for years, and it is under the shade of the forests of brilliant hue that line its banks, that I have often reclined, and enjoyed, undisturbed, the sweet melody of nature, issuing from the bursting green foliage around me. I love nature with enthusiasm, and whether standing on the bank of a running stream and listening to the sweet gushing sound of its waters, or seated on an eminence overlooking the waving fields of golden fruit that bless the labour of the husbandman; whether enchanted by the Siren song of nature's minstrels in the spring, or watching the many-coloured leaves of the forest, as they are borne through the air by the whistling winds of autumn—there is, in the scene before me, absorbing attraction, calling forth reflections which never fail to mellow down the selfish and unkind feelings of the heart, and to shed a peaceful, consoling and happy influence—all-pervading and lasting in its impressions—over the heart.

The wild and majestic are, however, the scenes to which I am most strongly attached, and which invariably elicit, to a greater extent than those of a softer character, passionate emotions of wonder and admiration. I love to stand at the base of a mountain whose summit reaches the clouds, and to clamber among rocks and under precipices whose projecting cliffs threaten destruction to the hardy adventurer—I love to explore the dense forests of our bold and beautiful hills, and to bury myself in the hidden recesses of nature, where the foot of man has never trod, where the sound of civilization has never been heard—I love to stand at the foot of Niagara, and watch the mighty torrent of a mighty inland sea, hurling its concentrated power into the gulph below, and to gaze deep, deep, into that awful abyss—unfathomable, destructive, appalling—I love to see the elements at war, to hear the rush of the tornado and whirlwind, laying prostrate in their furious course every impediment to their destructive progress, and to witness the fall of the powerful oak and the whirlings of its cleft branches in the sea of matter above, crushing and overwhelming the most formidable obstacles of art. These are scenes in which the spirit of the enthusiast revels, and they are scenes which strike the soul with awe, speaking trumpet-tongued of the presence of an Almighty power! of the omnipotence of his authority, of the insignificance of human effort, and the frailty of human life.

The scenery near the mouth of the Wissahiccon is of a wild, romantic and imposing character, beautiful in its ever-varying aspect, and interesting in its mystic associations. High hills, occasionally assuming the appearance of mountains, rise on either side, covered with a dense and beautifully variegated foliage. The dogwood, with its beautiful flowers, the chesnut, the locust, the melancholy willow, the sumac, the gum, with its vermillion leaves, and the gloomy hemlock, flourish here in all their native grandeur, and the lofty oak, the father of the forest, stretches out his thickly covered branches to afford shade and shelter to the weary pedestrian. Wild flowers, in great number and varieties, rivaling each other in loveliness, are found in the underwood, giving effect to the drapery of the verdant trees, by enlivening the dark hues of the thickly-growing and overshadowed forest. Some of these flowers and plants are of rare quality and surpassing beauty, and far eclipse in attraction many that are cultivated with care and pride in our horticultural gardens; but here they spring up, year after year, in silence and solitude, being literally

* According to Heckewelder, the Indian term Wissahiccon, from which "Wissahiccon" has most probably been derived, means a yellowish stream.

"Born to blush unseen,
And waste their fragrance on the desert air."

In the valley of the stream, along the eastern side of which, for a mile or two, a convenient road has been chiseled and scooped out of the sides of the stony hill, the vision is completely obstructed by the imposing banks, and hills rising above hills, on either shore, and but for the unpoetic noise of a labouring mill, and the span of a rude bridge which crosses to a small cavern or cleft in the rocky slope, there would be nothing to betray the presence of man, or to mark the contiguity of human enterprise. Alas! that not one spot—not even the glorious Wissahiccon—bearing the undoubted impress of the hand of the God of nature, can escape the desolating depredations and officious interference of the onward march of civilization.

The carriage road commencing at the mouth of the Wissahiccon, crosses the stream on a covered bridge, about a mile and a half above, winds up a hill of considerable elevation, and passes over to the Ridge. From the covered bridge access along the creek is obtained by means of a foot path, on the western side, which is marked through the forest, over crags and cliffs, rugged rocks and rooted trees, until it reaches a beautiful green lawn, a little parlour in the wilderness, celebrated as the resort of occasional pic nic parties of young ladies and gentlemen from the city, and where, on the grassy floor, youth and beauty have often mingled in the graceful dance, and joined in the merry song of innocence and gay hilarity. It is a sweet spot, and surrounded as it is, by scenery of the wildest and most romantic character, may, very appropriately, be designated the "oasis of the Wissahiccon." Near this place, immediately on the water's edge, the ruins of an antiquated stone building are discovered, scattered over the ground, and as no trace of the original appearance of the edifice can be found, the imagination is permitted to enjoy free scope in dwelling upon the character and pursuits of its ancient founders. On the opposite side, the banks rise up, in many places almost perpendicularly, to the height of mountains, and but few have the temerity to attempt a passage along the course of the stream, as a single false step might hurl them among the dangerous rocks and jutting cliffs below. Here, as well as on the western side, several clefts and caverns in the granite rocks may be found, but it does not appear that they extend to any great depth under the massive structure; and here, upon the edge of a hill, may be seen the point at which it was sometime since proposed to throw a bridge over the stream, to carry across the rail-road from Philadelphia to Norristown. The projectors of the scheme reached thus far in their onward progress, but in casting a glance over the precipice into the gulph below, were struck with dismay at the formidable obstacles which appeared, and prudently abandoned the hazardous and wildly-conceived undertaking.

Near Garsed's flax mill, the foot-path crosses to the eastern shore of the stream, on a rude log chained to an adjacent stone, and passes up through a forest overhanging the sluggish waters, and through a thick underwood, which, in some places, is almost impenetrable. Occasional openings in the dense foliage, which become more frequent as the pedestrian progresses up the stream, afford highly picturesque and enchanting views of the surrounding hills, such as those who appreciate nature in her majesty, would journey miles upon miles, and endure pain and fatigue without murmuring, to behold. In every direction the scenes unfolded to the eye are rich and enchanting beyond description, and remind the visitor who associates therewith ideas of intellectual pleasure and enjoyment, of the beautiful lines of the poet:

"Dear solitary groves, where peace doth dwell!
Sweet harbours of pure love and innocence!
How willingly could I for ever stay
Beneath the shade of your embracing greens,
List'ning to the harmony of warbling birds,
Tun'd with the gentle murmur of the stream;
Upon whose banks, in various livery
The fragrant offspring of the early year,
Their heads, like graceful swans, bent proudly down,
Reflecting their own beauties in the crystal flood."

One of the most interesting spots on the Wissahiccon, is in the immediate vicinity of the great perpendicular rock of granite, opposite Rittenhouse's mill. Here the dark shadows of the hill fall, with beautiful effect, upon the gurgling stream, and the rich and deep woodland foliage, the tangled shrubbery, redolent of fragrance, the towering cliffs on the one side, and imposing hills and dales on the other, give to the place a charm and fascination, which the reflecting mind may enjoy, but of which it is impossible to convey with the pen, any accurate description. It was near this enchanting place, on the sun side of a high hill, as is currently believed, that Kelpius and his friend, scholars of Germany, located themselves about the close of the seventeenth century, and where for years they dwelt in quiet and religious meditation, awaiting, with anxious prayer, the coming of the "Lady of the Wilderness," and where they died, as we now know, "without the sight." It was here, that, at a period long anterior to the arrival of Kelpius, the untamed monarch of these wilds, came to enjoy the rich treasures of nature, and to worship in silence, the goodness and bounty of the Great Spirit. It was here, perhaps, on the summit of this very hill, that the original owners of the soil assembled for the war dance and to make preparations for a furious and bloody contest; or mayhap it was here that the chiefs of different tribes assembled to bury the hatchet of war and to smoke the calumet of amity and peace. Perhaps it was here that the noble young warrior, flushed with the honors of victory, stole silently at the midnight hour, to breathe his tale of love and his vows of devotion, into the ear of his blushing and affianced bride; and surely no spot can be found, in the whole range of our wide-spread territory, so suitable for scenes of this character. Here is the abode of romance, here the spirit of nature holds undisputed sway—and here, among these rugged rocks and in this dense foliage—by the side of this poetic stream, with its associations of woody heights and shady dells, it is fitting that pure and holy vows of love should be uttered, where Heaven, in every leaf of the forest, in every blade of grass, may be called upon to bear witness to their sincerity and truth.

But the Wissahiccon has fallen into other hands. The untutored savage no longer strolls over these silent mountains and vales, for his abode has been removed far away, beyond the western waters. The bones of his warrior father lie bleached and neglected in the depths of the valley, for the high-bounding spirit of the son is tamed, by the contaminating influence of his civilized brethren. The active deer no longer bounds over the hills and dales of the Wissahiccon, for he has been driven to more sequestered abodes. The stream is, however, much the same—its placid waters are still beautiful as mirrors—its shores are still romantic—its groves are still enchanting—and so may they ever remain, undisturbed, untouched by the delapidating hand of man! The place should ever be reserved as a refreshing retreat, where the soul may be uplifted in devotion, and the heart gladdened in sweet contemplation—where no sound shall be heard but the notes of melody and joy, in delightful unison with the tones of the murmuring rill.

"To sit on rocks, to muse o'er flood and fell,
To slowly trace the forest's shady scene,
Where things that own not man's dominion dwell,
And mortal foot hath ne'er or rarely been;
To climb the trackless mountain all unseen;
With the wild flock that never needs a fold
Alone o'er steep and foaming falls to lean;
This is not solitude—'tis but to hold
Converse with nature's claims, and see her stores unroll'd."

Two or three miles above the perpendicular rock, on the eastern shore of the stream, and in a spot equally beautiful and romantic, stands an edifice of great antiquity, connected with which there are a number of interesting associations. It is built nearly on the summit of a slope that stretches into a ravine, walled in on three sides by elevated hills, thickly covered with foliage. The building is of stone, three stories high, with numerous windows, four to each chamber, of uniform size and appearance; sixty years ago there was a balcony around the second story, and the old-fashioned eaves, plastered in semi-circular form, still to be seen, exhibit the architectural taste and style of a past century. The date of its erection is supposed to be the year 1706, and its founders a society of religious Germans, probably known as Pietists or Seven day Baptists, who no doubt selected this secluded situation in order to secure peace and quietness in their religious devotions. Many of the aged inhabitants of the neighbourhood remember this monastery, as a building of unchanged appearance, even from the days of their boyhood, and some have connected therewith curious traditions of romance and legends of mystic tale. Notwithstanding the edifice has lately undergone a thorough alteration, and is now the permanent residence of a highly respectable and very intelligent family, it still bears the reputation of being visited by spirits.

The fact of this building having been occupied as a monastery, by a brotherhood of Germans, is, however, involved in doubt. One tradition alleges, that it was tenanted, for sometime, by a fraternity of Capuchins, or White Friars, who took upon themselves vows of abstinence and poverty, and who slept upon wooden or stone pillows, with places scooped out for the head. In confirmation of this tradition, an ancient burial place near the premises, now under tillage, is pointed out, where repose the remains of many of the brotherhood. Another and more probable story is, that the building was actually erected for a religious society, professing a faith similar to that of the Seven day Baptists at Ephrata, near Lancaster, but never occupied, as those for whom it was designed, deemed it expedient to leave the neighbourhood and join the settlement at Ephrata. The Chronica Ephrata expressly states that previous to the formation of that community, in May, 1733, they had dwelt in separate places as hermits, and "the hermits of the Ridge" are frequently mentioned. That there was a feeling of affection between these hermits and the brotherhood in Ephrata, is beyond all doubt, as the Chronica, in another place, speaks of some brothers of single devotedness, at Roxborough, "who subsequently fell in with the spirit of the world and married."

Kelpius, probably the first of the hermits on the Wissahiccon, died in the year 1708. He was succeeded by Seelig, who survived him many years, and who was contemporary with Conrad Matthias, another recluse, whose cave was near the Schuylkill. Tradition speaks of these Germans as being men of undoubted piety and great learning. Kelpius wrote several languages, and his journal, in Latin, is now in the possession of a distinguished antiquarian of Philadelphia. He waited the coming of the "Lady of the Wilderness,"—the "woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars," spoken of in the scriptures, as having "fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days." (Rev. xii.) We may wonder that such a man as Kelpius should labour under a delusion of this character, but those who will visit the spot he selected for his "prayerful waiting," will agree with me in opinion that it was singularly well chosen to harmonise with and foster his eccentric views and romantic religious expectations.

There is another interesting legend, connected with the monastery on the Wissahiccon, which I feel inclined to allude to, if I may do so without being held responsible for its veracity.

It is a tale of unhappy love, and relates to a young, beautiful and accomplished French lady, who followed her lover to the Indian wars, who fought in disguise by his side, and who closed his eyes when he fell at her feet, mortally wounded. Being subsequently admitted, for temporary shelter, into the monastery, she passed a day or two in unavailing grief, and died, heart-broken at the loss of all she held near and dear on earth. The particulars of the melancholy fate of the beautiful Louisa, I may hereafter unfold to the reader, but I beg my young friends who may discover the mound which covers her remains at the foot of a weeping willow, washed by the gurgling stream, to shed a tear to the memory of one whose beauty and virtues deserved a happier fate.

I have thus attempted to give a sketch of the ever-delightful Wissahiccon, and to cast a hasty glance at a few of the prominent incidents with which it was once associated. If I have failed to excite interest in the mind of the reader, let him not hesitate to attribute the circumstance to the feeble powers of the writer, rather than to the paucity of the subject to which his attention has been called. Beautiful and magnificent beyond comparison are the picturesque views of this romantic stream, and for ages to come may its crystal waters continue to course through the valley, affording peaceful enjoyment to the pedestrian on its banks, and unqualified delight to those who may ramble through its attractive forests.

THE BACHELOR'S SOLILOQUY.

A Parody from Hamlet—Act 3rd—Scene 1st.
To marry, or not marry, that is the question.
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
All the loneliness of Bachelorship;
Or to take up arms against a sea of troubles,
And by opposing, end them? To wed—to marry—
No more;—And by a marriage to say we end
The heart-ache and the thousand natural ills
That Bachelors are heirs to, 'tis a consummation Devoutly to be wished. To wed;—to marry;—
To marry! perchance to quarrel;—ay there's the rub;
For in that marriage what ills may come,
When we have shuffled off this single state
Must give us peace. There's the respect
That makes our evils of such continuance:
For who would bear this cold and isolated life:
The world's reproach, the young beau's contumely,
The pangs of smothered love, the want of cash,
The coquetry of beauty, and the spurns
That the old Bachelor of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his own fortune make
With a lovely angel! who would burthens bear,
To grunt and sweat under this single life,
But that the dread of something after marriage,—
The undiscovered country, from whose bourne
No traveller returns,—puzzles the will;
And makes us rather bear those ills we have
Than fly to others that we know not of.

When Incedon was in the zenith of his fame, he did almost as he pleased. Kemble sent to him to ask his aid in Hecate. This Charles was inclined to consider infra dig. "The national singer play this He-cat! The fact is, you may tell Mr. Kemble that if he'll play one of the thieves to my Macbeth, I will play a He-cat, or any cat he likes, to his Macbeth."

Be open without levity; generous without waste; secret without craft; humble without meanness; bold without insolence; cautious without anxiety; regular yet not formal; mild yet not timid; firm yet not tyrannical.

Who in the same given time can produce more than many others has vigour; who can produce more and better has talents; who can produce what none else can, has genius.

He that would please must rarely aim at such excellence as depresses his hearers in their own opinion or debars them from the hope of contributing reciprocally to the entertainment of the company.

Who sedulously attends, pointedly asks, calmly speaks, coolly answers, and ceases when he has no more to say, is in possession of some of the best requisites of man.

Hypocrisy is very common—it being easy to acquire it—but hypocrisy is totally different from dissimulation; hypocrisy is the attribute of low and evil minds.

One of the first steps towards placing others at our implicit disposal, is to put them in love with themselves, by exciting their vanity; and then take advantage of the delusion for your own benefit.

Never make a promise when the power of performing that promise shall depend on another.

Assume a cheerfulness in society, if you have it not.

What greater instance can there be of a weak and pusillanimous temper, than for a man to pass his whole life in opposition to his own sentiments; or not to dare to do what he thinks he ought to do?

A man without assurance is liable to be made uneasy by the folly or illnature of every one he converses with;—a man without modesty is lost to all sense of honor and virtue;—a modest assurance is the just mean between bashfulness and impudence.

There is a wide difference between the confidence which becometh a man, and the simplicity which disgraces a fool.

Be not confident in a plain way.

That man is guilty of impertinence who considers not the circumstances of time, or engrosses the conversation, or makes himself the subject of his discourse, or pays no regard to the company he is in.

What is often termed shyness, is nothing more than a refined sense and an indifference to common observations.

Calumny is like the brands flying from a large fire which quickly go out if you do not blow them.

To be despised or blamed by an incompetent or uncandid judge, may give a momentary pain, but ought not to make us unhappy.

Never give a promise which may in the event interfere with your duty.

Promises of secrecy ought not to be violated, although the public would derive an advantage from the discovery. Such promises contain no unlawfulness in them, to destroy their obligation; for as the information would not have been imparted upon any other condition, the public lose nothing by the promise which they would have gained without it.

Fear never was a friend to the love of God or man, to duty or conscience, to truth, probity or honor.

Sketches by a member of the Western Bar.

No. 5.
[RESUMED.]

It was during the session of the court as described in my last, in the autumn of 1827, in L* co. Ohio, which was embraced in our circuit, that the following incident occurred, and which together with the entire narrative as here related is altogether authentic and "real." The subject indeed may seem to have little to do with the general title I have chosen for these sketches, but I was made acquainted with most of the individuals to whom it relates, while on the circuit, and there is, moreover, at least one incident in the narrative, connected in some degree with the profession, and which shows to advantage a point of character they are known to possess in as eminent a degree as any other class of men upon earth, I mean their generosity, their charity, their readiness ever to sympathize with the unfortunate, and to assist the sufferer. Bespeaking then a little charity for what may seem egotism, proceed we with our narrative.

It was at the close of a day spent in court, into which had entered more than the usual vicissitudes of a lawyer's life, of good and bad fortune, hope and fear, success and defeat, and all of which is likely to be keenly felt by a very young advocate (and such I was at the time) and perhaps even long remembered—when returning to the hotel, or rather our plain log tavern, my landlord handed me a note written in a very neat crows foot hand, though on paper a little soiled, with a direction inscribing my name at length even to the middle letter, and what is somewhat unusual, it was correctly spelt. It contained a request that I would call upon the writer, if I had leisure, in the course of the evening, directing me where she was to be found, for my correspondent, I need hardly add, was of the belle sex. It was very natural, especially in the case of a young advocate to suppose that the introduction had reference to nothing else than some interesting case in court, a breach of promise of marriage, or the defence of a fair creature against the persecutions of a jealous husband, and full of the subject, with this cue which my imagination had supplied, I hastily took my tea and went in search of my fair correspondent. Her residence was about a half a mile from the village, and partially in sight of it. It was situated I saw, as I approached, on the top of a knob, or little hill, from which the ground sloped in every direction, and was covered with a thick growth of shrub oaks extending quite up to the log dwelling. It had been cleared, it seems, during the last war for a military encampment, and occupied for a time by a portion of the north west army. The temporary log tenements that had been at that time erected, with the exception of the one to which I was making my way, had fallen to decay, and the logs lay strewn about the ground and crossing my path. It was the very highest eminence in the neighbourhood, having been selected to command the surrounding country—while the bleak exposure to the north, and the utter sterility of the soil prevented, at a later day, its being in any way cultivated or occupied until its present occupants sought a temporary shelter there.—The whole scene as I approached it, at the close of a cold December's evening, was the very type of poverty and desolation, bleak, cheerless and forbidding. I had some difficulty to believe that the author of my neat little billet could be the inmate of so wretched a habitation, for the building itself, a sort of block house, composed of large rough hewn logs, was quite in keeping with the surrounding scenery. My knock at the door was answered by the appearance of a female who might have been some forty years of age, clad in the most coarse and common garb. Her figure was tall and slender made, her cheeks thin and palid, and the expression of her countenance melancholy and dejected in the extreme. To my ordinary salutation she made no immediate answer, but continued to gaze into my face with the utmost interest, as if endeavouring to recognize an old acquaintance. She at length exclaimed, "I am right, I see plainly the resemblance, you are the son of my early bosom friend, C. P. Your mother was a P." And who, I exclaimed, is it, thus on the very frontiers of civilization, and in such an abode that claims acquaintance with my family, with my mother? But her heart was full, the interview had called up associations connected with better and happier days, and she turned from me and wept like a child. Not interrupting her, I had time to examine the contents of the room, or more properly barrack. A miserable straw bed, situated in one corner with a few tattered blankets for covering, two or three old chairs, and a little pine table constituted the entire furniture of the apartment. Two young children were shivering round some coals in the fire place, and a third was lying on the bed. I never saw a more desolate and poverty stricken looking home; the great size of the apartment, constructed probably, for the accommodation of fifty men at arms, stood in its nakedness in bold relief, nor did the melancholy and wo begone aspect of this lone woman (lone as I saw her) with her helpless little ones, assist to relieve the gloom. Repeating my question, when she had a little composed herself, as to what early friend of my mother's I had the good fortune to meet, though under circumstances that showed that adversity and that friend had not been strangers, assuring her at the same time that the name of my most cherished parent was ever a passport to command both the friendship and services of her son—after a moments pause, she replied by asking me if I ever recollected to have heard my mother speak of her friend Julia B*. Julia B! I exclaimed; the truth at once flashed upon me. I was indeed in the presence of the bosom friend, the early school companion of my mother. I was in the presence of one whose character was as familiar to me as though I had known her all my life; for who that has been raised in the neighbourhood that once claimed a distinguished belle, (one not alone the belle of the village but of the county, and of the surrounding country,) though it may be years after the heroine (and she is generally not less in some one or more of the traditions of the neighbourhood) has acted her part, and passed away—but will yet bear of her,—of her beauty and her conquests, and perhaps often of more worthy marks of distinction,—of virtues and qualities better entitling her to remembrance.

Her history in a few words is this. Mrs. C.'s (for such she now was) ancestors, had for years, if not almost, or quite for centuries, owned and occupied a rich and extensive valley in the neighbourhood of the Connecticut river. They were affluent in their circumstances, if not rich, and rode, and had for years in their carriages. Every pains and expense had been bestowed on Julia's education, and, as an evidence of it, even at the time I thus encountered her, she both read and spoke the French with ease and fluency, an accomplishment, it will be recollected, much more rare twenty-five years ago, than at present. It was by these qualities of the mind, her brilliancy and accomplishments, as much as by her beauty of person, though this latter was said to have been striking, that she obtained the reputation to which I have alluded. She had gratified an early attachment, while yet very young, by marrying a young clergyman, and removed with him to the state of Ohio, whither the tide of emigration was just beginning to set, and where he probably felt himself called to go. He had died some years after they removed to the state, and after an interval of several years she married H* C*, at that time Secretary of the Treasury of Ohio, having been elected to that office while a member of the State Senate. C. possessed at the time, great popularity and influence and was a leading and an aspiring politician; but at one fell blow lost his popularity and all else! It was suspected, during his administration of the treasury department, that its affairs were not going on right. A committee was appointed by the legislature to examine its concerns, who made a report, establishing clearly the fact, that the secretary was largely a defaulter. This exposure broke poor C's heart—he was never a man afterwards. By the bye, in justice it should here be added, that even at the time, he was supposed to have been no farther culpable than using the funds for the benefit of his friends, to whose faithfulness and treachery he was undoubtedly a victim. Disheartened, disgusted, cursing the ingratitude of his friends and the fickleness of fortune, he left his former home, gave up his property to the last cent and the last article he possessed in the world, and removed with his family to the very out skirts of the farthest settlement, and after leading a sort of squatter's life for several years, finally took up his residence in the vacated old barrack in sight of the little town of Bellefont as above described. The ex-secretary was utterly unfit for business or any of the cares of life. It was supposed at times that he was, subject to something like hallucination of intellect; gloomy, misanthropic and solitary; he was not even society, in the absence of all other society, for his own family; and was of so little assistance to them otherwise, that but for the kindness of some of their neighbours they must have suffered, if not perished.

The outline of all this and much more, was communicated to me by Mrs. C. during our interview. She had learned of my arrival at the county seat through a worthy neighbour who sometimes called on her and who had mentioned my name to her, knowing I was from New England, and that perhaps, I might know something of her friends; who I may here add, as "woes love a train," had also been overtaken by adversity or such of them as survived, for many of them, including her father, had long since deceased. Never did I more sincerely sympathize with any human being; my heart bled for her, to see her thus, the inmate of an old barrack, almost in the forest; her whom "the winds of summer had not been permitted to visit too roughly," her who had been so kindly cared for, and delicately raised,—almost in want of the crust that should save herself and her babes from perishing—and a cold winter approaching! I asked what were her plans for the future or if she had any, when, to my great satisfaction she told me that she was daily expecting her son from Indiana, who had been absent from her several years, having been educated by a friend, and had lately been licenced as a physician—that they expected to go with him to Indiana, where he had assured her it would be in his power to render them assistance. She added they thought of setting off in a few days to meet him on the way. Before I left the house the ex-Secretary entered. He was indeed the wreck both mentally and physically I had heard him described—the very epitome of woe. He might have been some fifty-five years of age, and in stature more than six feet in height, if standing erect—but he was much bent or rather bowed; his face was thin and haggard, his clothes tattered and shabby in the extreme; an old slouched hat covered his head, and from under which, and almost hiding his face, escaped a profusion of gray or rather white locks. Thus stood before me the once ambitious politician! But he hardly noticed me when introduced by his wife, and immediately turned off, seeming to shun all intercourse.

I took my departure, having first obtained from Mrs. C. a promise she would let me know the moment of her arrival at U— about twenty miles south, and which they would take in their route, and where the court were to adjourn to, on the following day; and to such time, I saw, for several reasons, it would be necessary to postpone any plans for the relief and assistance of this most distressed family; for individually, my means were unequal to that end, and never more did I regret my poverty.

In view of the above object, I at once applied to my old friend Chap, whose heart could never be applied to in vain, nor his pocket, while there was any thing in it. He proposed at once a subscription on the part of the bar to be taken up shortly after our arrival at U—. They came a day or two sooner than was expected—having met with a wagon or rather cart, going in their direction, on board of which they placed their little baggage and accompanied themselves on foot.

She, woman-like, true to that pride and inborn delicacy which under any circumstance, struggle to preserve themselves in the bosom of an educated woman, had determined it seems, to pass through the town where they were known to many, without, if possible, being discovered. But my friend Chap fortunately was an early riser; and happened to live at the outskirts of the town, near which they had passed the night. A little after day-light of a clear cold morning, Chap came round to my little office and awoke me, saying the C's have come to town, and were endeavouring to pass through it incog. I immediately rose and joined him, and we started in the direction they were coming. They had just turned out of the lane on to the main road. I shall never forget the appearance of this group. First came the horses attached to the cart harnessed tandem fashion, trundling the rickety old thing along at a snail's pace over the frozen kobs—and such horses! They were miserable little broken down Indian ponies, so poor as to be hardly able to drag one leg after the other. Next followed in his tattered summer habiliments the ex-secretary, carrying his youngest child awkwardly in his arms; and then came the mother leading a little boy and girl, the eldest hardly more than six years of age, the little creatures shivering in the air of a raw December morning, their feet scarcely protected with even the covering of a sock, from the frozen ground with which at every step they came in contact. It was a sight to rouse a man, to pulsate his blood, to swell his bosom; he could fight on such an occasion if he had an enemy; he could weep were it not unmanly to do so. I approached and caught up the little girl in my arms, while my friend did the same in reverence to the other child, and at the same time I presented an arm to the mother and would not be refused its acceptance.

Not the devoted pair, when threading leisurely arm in arm the shady mazes of the grove, not the lover when the mistress of his heart has distinguished him with some special mark of her favor, not the orator in the hour of his triumph, or the young soldier in the flush of victory, know the sensations—may I call it pleasure, of that moment. We are strangely constituted. I won't philosophise—but I felt my soul was in the arm on which that poor woman hung, and in her defence an adversary might have felt as much. There she was, she the once caressed idolized and worshipped child of fortune, houseless and homeless at an hour while others yet slept, travelling on foot, in a pilgrim's garb, to seek an asylum, at the end of a journey of hundred of miles, through mud, and frost, and snow, and with such companions for her journey as a wretched, half crazed old man and three helpless children! She was flying at the moment too, strange to say, from her friends; stealthily shunning them to avoid that ostentatious charity, which however required by necessity, the delicacy of her nature, the pride of her woman's heart caused her to shrink from—O! Woman thou art strangely constituted! What a leaven of pride ever mingles with thy nature! How well hast thou preserved thy first parent's legacy!

When I first approached, she had anticipated my charge; and with an effort at something like gaiety stammered out a kind of apology for so sudden a departure. But I saw in the whole plan the spirit and the character of Julia B—. In her own solitary home, to the private ear of one to whom she ought to be able to look as to a friend, she had no concealment—but contact with society, even the sight of a town again reminded her who she was, and how she once had moved in that society; and she was shocked at the thought of even a recognition by former friends, much more that she should be sought out by them as a fit object for charity.

The cart required some repairs, and we had stopped for a moment opposite a blacksmith's shop, and myself and friend were using all the persuasion in our power to prevail upon the party to enter the hotel near by, wishing to detain them at least for a short time till our plans for their relief could be carried into effect, which had been the longer delayed as their arrival had not been so early expected, when while thus engaged, a young girl from a neighbouring house approached and running up to the party, at once recognized them as her friends and relatives. Let me here add, I do not introduce this noble creature to give effect to this narrative, (I am not writing a fiction) she acted the part as here set down to her.

She was the niece it seems of old Mr. C. The fortunes of her father who had been one of the securities of his brother while secretary of the treasury, had been greatly injured by the wreck, in which had been swept away, every thing belonging to the latter, and young Abi had come to the village to learn the business of a milliner and mantuamaker. When she saw her uncle, aunt and the children, thus comfortless and unprovided for, and a glance was sufficient to satisfy any one of their condition in this respect, nothing could exceed the interest she expressed, or the flurry and agitation of feelings she seemed to experience. She would run up to one of the children and then to the other, and having caressed them all round, and pitied them a great deal in the kindest accents of her sweet voice, she insisted on their entering the house where she stopped, and her importunities were not to be resisted; they were sufficient to soften and overcome even her coy, reserved and dignified aunt (dignified in spite of her wretchedness) and the party entered.

Abi, if I was writing a story instead of what I am faithfully recording some reminiscences of the past, would do well for a heroine; many less beautiful have no doubt figured as such in the pages of fiction. She was at the time about eighteen years of age, with a figure of most delicate and faultless proportions. The striking features of her face were her eyes and forehead. Never looked there forth a nobler black eye. It was large, full and soft, and as clear and bright as the gazelle's. Her forehead was high, and the hair worn parted on the top and neatly combed back, exposing a brow and temples as fair and smooth as Parian marble, or the whitest bust of alabaster. The expression of her face was that of extreme innocence or artlessness. You could have sworn that the spirit that shone forth from those eyes, the blood that from the slightest cause rushed to her cheeks and mantled o'er her brow, sprung from a source as pure as the heart that inhabits an angel's bosom! She beheld the destitution of her kindred, and saw with dismay how much was required to make them any thing like comfortable, to perform a long journey at such a season of the year, and poor innocent, she never dreamed they could have claims upon any but herself. She had no difficulty in parting with a portion of her own wardrobe in order to make provision for her aunt, and having settled all this in her mind, she next took her little purse and flew to the store, and soon emptied its scanty contents in the purchase of shoes, socks, mittens, &c. for the children. With these she returned, and with as much care as a bird hovers round, protects and caresses its young, and with the same fluttering anxiety, she soon arranged her little purchases comfortably about their persons, apparently gratifying them not less than herself.

But there was one member of the party, her old uncle, yet unprovided for. A threadbare linen coat was his best outside garment. What was to be done? her funds were all exhausted. It occurred to her from the character of Bill Mc—a merchant in the village that he might give her credit. She had noticed a blanket coat in his store, which was just the thing her uncle required. Returning slowly back with her head cast down, meditating how she should break the matter of asking for a credit, she enquired as she entered again to see the blanket coat, and stood apparently intently regarding it, turning it over and over while the struggle was going on in her bosom between her affection and her fears, her desire to obtain the article, and her dread to ask to be credited for it. At length, watching an opportunity when no one else was near, in a low, hurried and tremulous voice, she asked Mr. Mc—if he would sell her that coat, holding it in her hand, on a credit, "she would pay him for it indeed she would—she had parted with all her ready money that morning, but she would in a few weeks obtain more, and she should not forget that whatever she earned was his till the coat was paid for?" The character of the purchase, and the singularity of the request, was such that Mr. Mc—thought he had misunderstood his fair customer, or perhaps, from her hurried manner he hardly understood her at all, and put her some questions intended to elicit her wishes, but which she unfortunately misconstrued into a reply designed to preclude an apology for declining the sale on her terms. Her young heart was full, her feelings could no longer be controlled, and bursting into tears she exclaimed, "sell me, I beg of you, this coat—I will pay you for it if I have to work my hands off; besides, sir, if you doubted my maiden word thus publicly pledged for a trifle, you know my family, and poor though they may be, that they would not let you suffer for a kindness extended to our unfortunate kinsman. It is for him, my uncle, that I want the coat, it may save his life—it may be the last office of kindness any of us will have it in our power to perform for him." Of course, her request (of course with Bill Mc—) was complied with, and I hardly need add that her eloquent appeal would have been altogether unnecessary had the parties rightly understood each other. Every apology was made, and every thing said calculated to calm and appease her feelings, and a credit to any amount in the most delicate manner freely tendered her. But taking the coat, half blushing for shame at the excess of feeling, that thus before strangers she had been involuntarily betrayed to, she hastily returned to her friends, when the ex-secretary was at once arrayed, though apparently himself almost unconscious of the change, in the ample folds of the blanket coat, covering as it did effectually his under summer garments, and well protecting him from the cold.

Mean time my friend Chap had been busy, and the call upon the bar, had been answered, as such calls with them ever are, with promptness and liberality. A more humane, generous and liberal minded man, than our venerated judge who headed the list, did not and does not live. And it is a very great mistake generally, to suppose, as many do, that the practice of the profession tends to deaden the sensibilities and dry up the charities of life; on the contrary, its members by being brought much acquainted with the adversity and misfortunes of men, and at the same time with that short-sightedness, weakness and fallibility that belongs to the human character, and often induces "those ills which flesh is heir to,"—seem to regard the unhappy, as naturally having claims upon their sympathy, and give to the unfortunate almost without scrutiny or without inquiry.

Thus were matters arranged, the cart meantime had been prepared, and the party were ready to set out, and with means at least sufficient to defray their travelling expenses along the road, and procure them necessities—when a horseman, well mounted came dashing up the road in the direction they were going. He was recognized by one of the party long before he had reached us. It is, exclaimed the overjoyed mother, it is my son, it is Henry! In another moment the young man had dismounted, was by her side, and held her to his bosom. When the first transports of the meeting was over, and he had more time to regard her, he could not withhold the expression of his surprise at the change that had taken place in her appearance since he last saw her. But I well recollect the manner in which he eyed that old cart, the Indian ponies, and the driver, and indeed the other members of the party, including the ex-secretary. He seemed to comprehend for the first time, the full extent of the poverty to which his family had been subjected, and I suppose in fact did, for his mother's letters out of regard to his feelings had probably left the worst untold. After eyeing them all round, he stepped up to his mother, and taking her hand in the most kind and affectionate manner, drew her arm within his, and drawing his tall and manly figure to its full height, looked round upon the crowd with a sort of expression of defiance (though heaven knows there were none there but his friends) as much as to say, "she is my mother. I can protect her. These are mine to look to and provide for; they will be safe with me," and he extended an arm at the same time to the ex-secretary.

I see him now as he stood in the first dawn of manhood, clad in the usual riding dress of the country, with his long leggings and spurs, his fine face flushed with the emotions his bosom had just experienced, his big coat thrown back as if to relieve the pressure that was at his heart, his cap in his hand as though hardly presuming to stand covered in the presence of his honored parents; I see him thus as he supported them along the street in the direction of the hotel, followed by his fair cousin leading the children; the bowed and emaciated figure of the old man, and the weak and fragile form of his mother; well contrasting with the firm and noble bearing of him on whom they leaned, strikingly illustrating the figure that is so often exemplified of the ivy clinging to the oak.

There are many situations in which youth, beauty and manliness may appear to advantage, but the artist himself will in vain devise scenes and attitudes, whether selected from the list, the senate chamber, or the drawing room, where the effect can surpass, or the moral equal that of the genuine exhibition of filial love, in the sort of grouping I have here faintly attempted to describe—It was Grecian all—it was poetry and the arts combined, and hallowed by God's own commandment, where he says "honor thy father and mother that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

The young doctor after making the necessary arrangements left in a few days with the family in a private conveyance for S— having in the first place insisted upon having the money that had been received returned, and from S— they took the stage for Indiana.

It remains for me but to record poor Abi's fate, and I cannot alas! do it better than by transcribing literally from a letter that he wrote me, written by a brother, dated at C— Ohio, April 23d, 1834. I should premise that she was married shortly after the events narrated above to my young friend B— who discovered and appreciated her worth, and removed with her to the town at which the letter bears date.

It proceeds—"I had supposed from what you told me, or got the impression, that B— resided at U—. My attention was called to his name some days since by a card which was left at the hotel where I stopped, stating that the wife of Mr. J. B. was deceased, and his friends were invited to attend her funeral. On enquiry I ascertained he was from U— and supposed him to be one of the B's you had spoken of, so I considered myself invited, although a stranger, and attended the funeral. The circumstances attending it were somewhat singular. After we had assembled and attended prayers, the hearse at the door, and she in the coffin, the physician was not perfectly confident that she was yet dead, so perfectly natural and beautiful did she look, so she was taken from the coffin and laid back in her bed.

The next day, being sure she was deceased, she was buried. He, or she, appeared to have no relatives, or at least gentlemen relatives present, as at her grave he appeared to weep alone, which he did bitterly. From the circumstance of my supposing it was him who had been your friend, or because it is easy for me to play the woman, or both, as I turned to leave the scene a tear of sympathy unconsciously escaped me, which was the only tribute a stranger could pay at the early grave of her we buried."

A NEW SONG.

We insert the following beautiful verses as a specimen of a new set of songs just published by Moorz. "There are twelve of them," says the London Times, "and we think that they are among the best efforts of the most graceful and fanciful of English lyric poets."

If thou would have me sing and play
As once I play'd and sung,
First take this time-worn lute away,
And bring one freshly strung:
Call back the time when Pleasure's sigh
First breath'd among the strings;
And Time himself, in flitting by,
Made music with his wings.
Take, take the worn-out lute away,
And bring one newly strung,
If thou would'st have me sing and play
As once I play'd and sung.

But how is this? Though new the lute,
And shining fresh the chords,
Beneath this hand they slumber, mute,
Or speak but dreamy words!
In vain I seek the soul that dwelt
Within that once sweet shell,
Which told so warmly what it felt,
And felt—what nought can tell.
Oh, ask not, then, for passion's lay
From lute so coldly strung,
With this I ne'er can sing or play
As once I played and sung.

No: bring that long-lov'd lute again!
Though chilled by years it be,
If thou wilt call the slumber'ing strain,
'Twill wake again for thee.
Though time have froz'n the tuneful stream
Of thoughts that gush'd along,
One look from thee, like summer's beam,
Will thaw them into song.
Then give, oh give, that wak'ning ray!
And, once more blithe and young,
Thy bard again will sing and play,
As once he play'd and sung.

THE HUNTER'S PERILS.

From the Legends of a Log Cabin.

On the fourth day, about noon, being then about forty miles direct distance from H—, we came upon the trail of a large body of Indians, who had passed there the day before, and were going up the river. It was not a war party, as the tracks of women and children were mingled with those of grown men. We followed four or five miles, when, at a soft piece of ground, I caught sight of a foot-mark I knew right well. 'Twas the broad flat foot of the Indian, whom we called Broadfoot. I showed it to Johnson, who agreed that there could be no doubt as to whom it belonged. We traced it along till at the top of a ridge the party separated, Broadfoot and four others taking a course directly out from the river; and the others, principally old men, women and children, still following up the stream. Here Johnson and I called a halt, and consulted whether we should follow Broadfoot and his gang, or the larger party. Johnson was for the latter plan, saying, that where there were so many women and children, they must needs move slowly, and we should easily overtake them, and like enough, take a scalp or two. I wanted to track Broadfoot still, both because I longed to take the scoundrel's scalp, and because I could not but think we stood the best chance of finding the boy, by keeping on the trail of the enemy of whom we were in search. Finally, Johnson gave in, and we followed the smaller, or war party.

Poor Jim grumbled a good deal at what he called my wrong-headedness. "There were twenty or thirty tracks," he said; "they were going slow, and by night we could have overtaken them, and taken a scalp or two at least. Even a squaw's scalp would have been some satisfaction; nay, a child's would have been better than nothing."

"What on earth do you want with a squaw's scalp, much more with a poor papoose's, Jim Johnson?" said I.

"Why, Balt, I don't want a squaw's scalp, nor a papoose's, if I can get a warrior's; but surely half a loaf is better than no bread. Here we have been on a range four days, and have not had a shot at a red skin, man, woman, or child, though we all know the woods are full of them. It is too bad; I vow it is a disgrace to the settlement, there has not a single scalp been brought into Harner in a month." Johnson went on grumbling and complaining, but I did not mind him, but kept a sharp eye on the trail. We followed it steadily and pretty rapidly, till nightfall; we then camped, lighted our fire, cooked a bit of bear steak, and went quietly to sleep. Next morning we were early on the trail, and followed it steadily till near noon; then a new footmark joined it; I gave but one glance: 'twas Ham Cass. The sight of the footmarks warmed my heart; I gave a glad shout, and followed the trail with renewed energy. I did not lose the chance of bragging over Jim. "See, Jim, wasn't I right after all? I knew the boy was true breed, the genuine old hunter blood is in him, and for all his book learning, it will show itself. You see he is on the right scent now, and, my word for it, he will tree the game." Just as Johnson began some light and joking reply, I heard the sharp crack, crack, crack—three rifles. Johnson, who was a step or two in front of me, gave one bound right up into the air, and fell dead at my feet. At the same time I felt a numbness in my right leg; I, too, was hit. I looked up the hill side, five Indians were bounding down at a great rate. There was no time to lose, I ran for life. Luckily the ball had not touched the bone. In a moment they were all after me at full speed. I gave one glance over my shoulder, to see how they were coming; only one was very near me, and if I could but escape him, I had no fears for the rest; for, on level ground, even with my hurt leg, I could leave any Indian far behind me on a short race. In a minute more I heard another rifle; I glanced behind. The Indian who was nearest me—and he was fearfully near—stood still, groping in the air with his hands for a moment, and then fell. One of his companions had hit the wrong mark. The Indians saw the fatal error, and filled the air with their yells. I ran on, making for a creek we had passed in the early part of the day. I soon found that no one was after me, but there was little safety in that; the savages could not look at my trail without finding that I was wounded, and this would encourage them to hunt me down. My wound, too, began to be very painful, and I felt that it would be impossible for me to reach the creek without a rest—yet I scarce dared stop, till at last I came to a sycamore tree, which was hollowed out by rot. Here I determined to make my resting place. In the upper part of this hollow I would probably remain concealed, or, if discovered, sell my life dearly. The only opening to this tree was about four feet from the ground, scarce large enough to permit a man to crawl in; once in, the space would easily permit a dozen men to stand at ease. I crept in, and began to take a regular survey of my little fortress. I found there were several small holes, the size of a dollar, and one, near twenty feet from the ground, where a limb had broken off, which was larger than that at which I had entered. Here I rested for some time, and having plucked some leaves as I went through the woods, I now chewed, and applied them to my wound, with great relief. You may well suppose I kept a good look out all the while, lest the savages should come on me unawares. I had watched there for more than an hour, when I caught sight of them following my trail. The first was a chief, a large, tall, powerful fellow, with a feather in his high tuft of hair, medals on his breast, and wampum beads hanging in strings from his dress. At his belt hung a fresh scalp, which I knew could only be poor Johnson's. He was followed, in Indian file, by six others. Slowly and cautiously they advanced on the trail, till they came within fifty feet of the tree. Here they halted, and I could have picked off one very easily, but I thought I would wait and see what plan they would adopt. After some whispering and gesticulating, two of the Indians were detached, and made a circuit round the tree, apparently to discover whether the trail led beyond it.

When they had completed their round and joined their companies, they had another long talk; finally, three raised their rifles and fired at the hole in the tree. One ball only entered the hole, but as I took good care to be out of range, it did no harm. Again they held a talk; they seemed irresolute what to do, and I began to think they would leave me, but such was no part of their intention. I saw them again raising their rifles for a shot, when a plan entered my head by which I hoped to get two lives at least; so when they fired I gave a furious scream, as though wounded and then began to groan; at first very loud, and finally slowly and softly, as though just dead. The stratagem had its effect. At the first scream the Indians gave a shout of triumph, and then, as they heard the groans, they advanced towards the tree. Still their natural craft did not entirely desert them, for they crept on very slowly, stopping every now and then, and listening with eager attention. Finally, the head man stood beside the opening, he poked in his rifle, moving it about; then he thrust in his head; and just as he was fairly in, I fired, and blew the top of his head all off. He fell forward, his body blocking up the hole. In an instant I sprang on him, wrested the rifle from his dying grasp, pointed it from one of the small loopholes, fired, and another Indian was dead beside his Chief; the others gave one yell of despair and took to trees. There was now, for a while, a cession of our warfare. The Indians, each hid behind some neighboring tree, were concealed from me, and did not seem very much inclined to leave their covert. In the mean time I was busy rifling the dead Chief. The gun I had taken, and which had already done me such good service, I found, on looking at it, was Johnson's; the savage had a well filled bullet pouch and horn of powder; the ammunition was of immense importance to me, as I had not above a dozen charges left, and there was no telling how long this fight might last. I also got a large bag of parched corn, and a small (pity it was so small) flask of whiskey. Having secured these valuable spoils, I resumed my quiet watch of the savages.

The sun was near setting, when I saw them, at a signal, fly each from his tree, and take refuge behind a small rise in the ground about twenty or thirty yards from my tree. Here they were out of my sight, and, what was worse, they could creep round, and approach on either side without my knowing where to look for them. "This," thought I, "will never do; I'll see if I can't break up the council they are holding, or at least get an idea of what they are about." I began to climb the sides of the tree. As the rot had eaten irregularly, it left a good many knots and knobs; so that, notwithstanding my lame leg, I made out finally to reach the upper hole. Cautiously I poked my head out, and was rejoiced to find that I could command a full view of my enemies. There lay the whole five, their heads together, talking and pointing, evidently hatching some plan for my destruction. Having satisfied myself that from the top of my fort I could hit one of the savages, I descended again, and fastening one end of my belt to my side, and tying the two rifles, ready loaded, to the other, I ascended again. Just as I caught sight of the savages, two of them made off, rolling and creeping along until they were out of range of my rifle; then they took to the woods and I saw no more of them. Here was another hint for me to be in haste, as the varmin were sending for reinforcements. Slowly and carefully I pushed out my rifles, and resting one in the crotch of the tree, I took deliberate aim at the nearest Indian. He lay flat on the ground, and my ball hit the very centre of his head. His companions sprang on their feet, gazing all around, evidently at a loss to tell whence the blow came. As they stood there I could take perfect aim, and in a moment another fell, with a ball through his body. The second shot roused the remaining Indian to the necessity of putting shelter between him and me. He sprang behind a tree. Here he remained a long time, till finding he was not likely to move, and knowing that their reinforcement could not be far distant, I determined to be off. I went to work with my tomahawk, cutting a hole in the tree opposite to where he lay, and in half an hour's time I could creep out.

I then hid Johnson's rifle, took my own in hand, and crept softly out. Taking advantage of the ground, I was soon out of sight of the Indian; then I sprang to my feet, and made towards the creek with my best speed. I walked more than an hour undisturbed, and began to indulge the hope of reaching the creek without further danger. I had gained the top of the last hill, and the creek lay in the valley below; I paused for a moment, and looking back, I saw four stout Indians on the opposite hill, not more than a mile behind me. They must have seen me at the same moment, for their loud war-whoop rang through the woods. I did not wait for another look at them, but made for the creek. I gained the bank, and plunged into the stream. Oh! how pleasant was that cool water to my parched skin and burning wound. I swam with the current, which was pretty rapid, till at a turn in the stream, I saw a large raft of drift wood. I struggled towards it, and diving, came up between two of the largest logs. They lay so close together, that I could barely get my eyes, nose and chin, out of the water; and as the logs touched a few inches above my face, I was in nearly total darkness. Here I lay, half dead with fatigue and pain, waiting the coming of the savages. I soon heard by their shouts that they were near—were descending the stream. One of them came on the raft; he stood for a moment on the log that concealed me; his weight pressing my head under water—had he remained many minutes I must have perished. He moved onwards, however, and then, like an old otter, I poked my nose out of the water to blow. For near an hour I heard their shouts near the raft; then they began to grow more and more faint, and finally died away. I waited some time, lest some straggler might have remained behind. At last, hearing nothing of them, and being nearly exhausted, I left my hiding place, and swam into the open stream. It was quite dark; I was wet, hungry and lame; still I dared not rest, there was no hope of safety but in instant flight. By hard tugging I detached a large log from the raft, and drew it into the middle of the stream; then laying myself at full length upon it I began to float down the stream.

TALES FROM THE FRENCH.

THE ORATORY.—About six months prior to her death, the Comtesse de Merset, having been seriously indisposed, occupied a separate suite of apartments from those of the comte, La Grand Bretche. Her sleeping room looked upon the river, and had sash windows opening upon the lawn, which sloped pleasantly towards its banks. Within this apartment was a small recess with a glass door which served as an oratory, about four feet square, and constructed within the thickness of the wall. On the night in question, by one of those strange fatalities for which there is no explanation, the comte returned home two hours later than usual from the club where he usually spent his evening in reading the papers or discussing politics.—The invasion of France had formed the leading topic of conversation, and the subject of a long and animated discussion after which, being already excited by argument, the comte had lost a considerable sum at billiards. On returning home he had usually satisfied himself, for some time past, by asking the comtesse's attendant, Rosalie, if her lady had retired to rest, ere he proceeded to his own apartments; but on this night it occurred to him he would visit her himself, that he might recount his ill-luck. Accordingly, instead of summoning Rosalie, he proceeded directly to the chamber of the countess. His well known step resounded along the corridor, and at the instant he turned the handle of the door, he fancied he heard that of the oratory within closed suddenly; but when he entered the apartment, he saw Madame de Merset standing before the hearth, on which smouldered the embers of a half extinguished fire. It immediately occurred to him that it must have been Rosalie who went into the oratory, from which however, there was no egress but through the comtesse's apartment. Yet a suspicion of a darker nature crossed his imagination like a sudden flash of dazzling light, which could not be extinguished. He looked fixedly at his wife, and there seemed a troubled expression in her, as she avoided his searching glance.

"You are late to-night," she said, and there was a slight tremor in her voice, usually so clear and musical.

The comte did not reply, for at that instant, as if to strengthen the horrid thought which possessed his secret soul, Rosalie entered the room. Turning abruptly from her, he folded his arms moodily across his breast, and mechanically paced the apartment.

"You are ill my lord, I fear; or bring you evil tidings?" gently inquired the comtesse, as her attendant proceeded to undress her. But he still continued silent. "You may retire," added Madame de Merset to her attendant, for she foresaw something more than usual was gathering on the disturbed brow of her lord, and she wished to meet it alone.

As soon as Rosalie was gone, or supposed to be so, he approached his lady, and said coldly, though his lips trembled with emotion, "Some one is concealed within that oratory."

The comtesse looked calmly and somewhat proudly at her husband, and simply answered, "No, my lord." The "no," smote like a knife across his heart for he dared not believe her, and yet never had she seemed more true to him than at that moment. He was advancing a step towards the door of the oratory as if to convince himself, when the comtesse, placing her hand upon his arm, arrested him, and looking at him for a moment with an expression of deep melancholy, said in a voice trembling with emotion, "Should you find no one there, remember, all must be at an end between us forever."

And there was ineffable dignity in her look and manner which awed the comte's suspicion, and made him pause in his purpose. "No, Josephine," he exclaimed, "I open not that door, as guilty or innocent, we then must part. But listen, I know all thy purity of heart, and the sanctity of life, thou leadest; thou wouldst not commit a mortal sin at the expense of thy soul." She looked at him wildly. "Here is the crucifix. Take it—swear to me before that image there is no one there, and I will never seek to enter."

The countess took the crucifix, and murmured, "I swear!"

"Louder," said her husband, "and repeat, I swear before the virgin there is no one concealed in that oratory." And she repeated the words of the oath without any visible emotion.

"Tis well," M. de Merset coldly said; then added, after a moment's silence, his eye resting upon the crucifix she had just laid down, which was of ebony and silver and of exquisite workmanship—"You have something there which I never saw before, or knew that you possessed."

"I met with it accidentally at Duviver's, who bought it of one of the Spanish prisoners of war, when they passed through Vendome, on their way to the frontier."

"Ah!" said the comte, replacing the crucifix on its gilt nail over the chimney piece—in doing which, at the same moment, he rang the bell. Rosalie came immediately. M. de Merset advanced to meet her, and leading her into the embrasure of the window which opened upon the lawn, abruptly, and in an undertone, said, "I understand that poverty alone prevents your union with Philippe, and that you have declared your intention not to become his wife until he shall have found the means of establishing himself in business as a master mason. Now, mark me—go seek him—bring him hither with his tools. Let him do what I desire, and his fortune shall surpass your utmost wishes—but take special care to wake no one besides himself in the house—above all, let not a word escape your lips—a whisper and—"

His brow darkened, as he looked menacingly upon her. She was about to leave the room to obey his orders, when he added, "Hold, take my passic partout." He then called Louis in a voice of thunder along the corridor. Louis, his confidential servant, appeared at the hasty summons of his master, who added in a tone of authority, "Get you all to bed." Then making a sign for him to approach nearer, and lowering his voice, said,

"When they shall be all asleep—asleep, mind—you come and inform me."

During none of these extraordinary arrangements had the comte once lost sight of his lady, and when he had finished giving his orders, he returned to where she was seated by the fireside.

When Rosalie re-entered the room, she found the comte, and comtesse conversing together, to all appearance mechanically.

"Philippe is here, monsieur," said Rosalie.

"Tis well," answered her master "bid him enter." The comtesse grew slightly pale, on seeing the mason.

"Philippe," said the comte, "you will find materials in the court yard for walling up the door of yonder cabinet." And drawing Rosalie and her lover to him—"Listen, Philippe," he continued, "you remain here to-night, but to-morrow you will receive from me a passport, which shall enable you to leave this place for some distant town in a foreign land, which I will indicate. I give you the sum of six thousand francs for your journey: and you will remain ten years either in the town of which I shall direct you, or in any other you may yourself select, provided you continue in the country in which it is situated. But you will first proceed to Paris, where you will await my arrival; then I will ensure the possession of another six thousand francs, to be paid you on your return from your expatriation, provided you have strictly complied with my conditions. At this price, understand, whatever you may be called upon to do this night must remain forever a secret. For you, Rosalie, he continued, turning towards her, as he spoke, "I will settle ten thousand francs on you the day of your marriage with Philippe; but mark me, this promise is made on the sole condition of your marrying him."

At this moment the comtesse's voice was heard calling to Rosalie, and the comte turning away, proceeded quietly to pace the apartment, watching the movements of his wife, Rosalie, and the mason, but without allowing any indications of suspicion to be discernable. Philippe, meanwhile, in pursuance of the task imposed on him, made a considerable degree of noise; and seizing this chance of her voice not reaching the ears of the comte, who had just attained the other end of the chamber, the comtesse hurriedly addressed Rosalie, in a tone that was scarcely above a whisper—"A hundred crowns yearly for life are thine," she said, "if thou canst only obtain one crevice there," pointing to the door of the oratory, which Philippe had commenced building up with brick and plaster. Then in a louder voice, and with a fearful calmness, as her husband approached, she added, "Go, Rosalie, to the assistance of Philippe."

The husband and wife, as by a sort of tacit agreement, remained mutually silent during the time employed in filling up the doorway. This silence perhaps might have been assumed on the part of the comte, to prevent the countess from having it in her power to convey any double meaning in her words; while, on the other side, it might have been pride, or prudence, perhaps, which prevented her from breaking it. By this time, the wall being about half way completed, the artful mason, seizing his opportunity when the comte's back was turned to the scene of operations, struck a blow on the door of the cabinet, which shattered one of the panes of glass. This action gave Madame de Merset to understand the success of the intelligence which subsisted between Rosalie and her lover, and casting a glance of intense anxiety towards the now darkened aperture, the mason as well as herself beheld within it the dark and handsome countenance of a man, whose intrepid look of courage and devotion fell upon her pale and guilty countenance. Ere her husband turned again in his walk she made a hasty sign to the stranger, which seemed to say "there is yet hope."

It was near day-break—that is to say, about four o'clock, for it was in the month of May—ere the construction was completed; and the mason having been delivered to the care of Louis, the comte and comtesse retired to rest. The next morning on rising, the comte seized his hat, and making a step towards the door, said with the utmost appearance of indifference, he must go to the mayoralty for a passport. Then suddenly turning back, as his eye chanced to rest upon the crucifix, he took it from the chimney place, and as he did so a thrill of satisfaction passed through the bosom of the comtesse. "He is going to Duvivier's," she thought, "and will be the longer absent."

Scarcely had he left the apartment when she rang the bell violently to summon Rosalie, and in a voice that was rendered fearful by excess of agitation, cried, "To work! to work!" Then frantically seizing an iron bar which Rosalie by her direction brought for the purpose, commenced demolishing the yet undried work of Philippe. Desperate were her efforts, in the hopes of being able to repair the destruction of the walled up doorway, before the dreaded return of the comte. Despair lent her energy, and a voice within, which penetrated to her sharpened and nervous ear, alone encouraged her to proceed. Already a part of the brick work had yielded, and she was in the act of applying a yet more vigorous blow for the removal of the remaining impediments, when the comte, pale and menacing, stood before her. She shrieked not, spoke not, but fell insensible on the floor.

"Place your lady on the bed," M. de Merset coldly said. The truth was, he had foreseen the probable result of his absence; and had accordingly laid a snare into which his wretched wife had but too surely fallen. He had written to the mayor, and sent to Duvivier, who had arrived just as the countess's apartment was again restored to order, and herself recovered from her swoon.

"Duvivier," said the comte, addressing the unconscious jeweller, "did you receive this crucifix from any of the Spanish officers who passed through the town as prisoners of war, on their way to the frontier, a short time since?"

"I did not, monsieur, nor have I ever seen it before," was the reply.

"Enough—I thank you," rejoined the comte, calmly restoring the relic to its former place; then as the jeweller left the room, he desired Louis to see that his repasts were served regularly in the apartment of the comtesse, "who is too ill," continued he, "for me to think of leaving her until her health is in some degree re-established."

And for fifteen days did the comte de Merset continue to keep watch over her. During the first six a noise was from time to time heard in that closed-up cabinet, which struck terror to the soul of the guilty woman, and horror and despair crept through her veins; but when she would have thrown herself at his feet, to implore for mercy on herself and the stranger that was dying there, without allowing her to give utterance to the agonized prayer which rose to her parched lips, with a fierce and cruel emphasis he checked her, saying "You have sworn, on that crucifix, there is no one there!"

THE BELL.

In youth it jingles us on to school,
And it jingles us home to dinner;
It jingles the wise man—it jingles the fool—
It jingles the saint—it jingles the sinner,
It jingles the doctor, it jingles the preacher—
It jingles the lawyer, it jingles the teacher—
It jingles us all, whate'er we're about—
It jingles us in life, and will jingle us out.

LAYS.—BY J. C. PERCIVAL.

I.

Through the wood, in evening's shadow, straying;
O'er me arched the boughs, in silent gloom;
Deep in the dreamy vision, long delaying—
Fades to-night the day's departing bloom.

Fades the skiey rose, that over mountain,
Blossomed wide and full in fields of air—
Bloomed in Heaven aloft, and low in fountain Shone in softer tints, as pure and fair.

Darkness veils me round, and voices gliding
Through the murmuring foliage seem to say:
'Pause and listen to the spirits chiding—
Haste, O! haste to brighter worlds away.

Mark the last tint of day, receding
O'er the top of yonder solemn pine!
So departs the lingering spirit, leading
To yon purer day's eternal shine.

There await thee all thy heart has cherished—
There the early loved, the hoped and gone;
Not a treasure of thy heart has perished—
All to yonder world of rest have flown.

II.

O! that I lay on yonder mountain,
So blue and fair—
In shade of rock, by gushing fountain,
Aloft in air.

The cloud and storm might swell below me,
The thunder roll—
Still waves of light should overflow me,
And warm my soul;

And peace, unbroken peace, for ever
Around me play;
And thought serene and calm, be never Compelled away,

And blush of dawn and rose of even,
My heart should fill
Oft with the loveliness of heaven,
So bright and still.

O! had I but the eagle's pinion,
Thither I'd soar,
And there possess my sole dominion,
Till life be o'er.

III.

They call me—they call me, from meadow and grove;

They sing to me sweetly of hope and of love,
And dove-like and peacefully, over
My pillow, they hover.

And they say to me kindly: 'O! hasten away—
No longer in dreamy oblivion stay—
Young life with its bliss is before thee,—
And heaven is o'er thee.

O'er valley and mountain, in beauty and light,
The world stretches onward, so dewy and bright—
The roses are budding beside thee—
What joy shall betide thee!

The day has awakened so fresh and so fair;
The clouds float aloft in the warm summer air;
All nature is swelling with gladness—
O! sink not in sadness.

I hear ye—I hear ye—I will not delay,
But up, and o'er valley and mountain away—
Through life, like a bird, I will hie me—
Hope never shall fly me.

Thomas's Viaduct—Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road.

Inclined Plane of Morris Canal, opposite Easton.

THOMAS'S VIADUCT.

This beautiful piece of architecture was built by the Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, to convey across the Patapsco river, a branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to Washington. Its location is immediately at the head of tide water, about seven miles from Baltimore, and in full view of the flourishing village of Elk Ridge. It affords a very fine prospect for the traveller, as the adjacent scenery is highly picturesque and romantic. This work is said to be one of the most permanent structures in the United States. Its foundation is upon a solid rock, and it is composed of very large blocks of granite, laid in regular courses, from bottom to top, the material being obtained from the very extensive and valuable granite quarries in the neighbourhood.

The Viaduct was designed by Benjamin H. Latrobe, Esq. civil engineer; and the work upon it was commenced by John McCarney, Esq. contractor, on the 17th of September, 1833, and finished May 1st, 1835. The whole length of the bridge and wing walls, is 704 feet—arches 58 feet 4 inches span, chord line 33 feet, key-stone 60 feet, and roadway 66 from the surface of the water. The plan of the bridge is a curve of 1273 feet radius, of which the arches are chords.—The piers, at chord line, are 10 feet thick, and at the water line, 15 feet. The whole contains about twenty thousand perches of masonry, and the cost was about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It is named after the president of the company.

INCLINED PLANE OF MORRIS CANAL.

This engraving gives a very graphic picture of the termination of the Morris Canal, at Philipsburg, on the Delaware river, opposite the town of Easton. The level of the Canal is considerably higher than that of the river, and boats are passed in and out by means of an inclined plane, leading from the first out-let lock of the Canal to the river. On the engraving there is a representation of a boat passing up, and another passing down, an operation which, by means of machinery, is managed with great facility.

The Morris Canal commences at Jersey City, opposite New York, pursues a circuitous route through the Bergen marshes, and crossing the Hackensack and Passaic rivers, a short distance above their discharge into Newark Bay, enters the flourishing town of Newark. Here the canal assumes a course nearly north, which it maintains to Paterson, passing the village of Bloomfield. After leaving Paterson, its course is nearly south-west, to the Little Falls of Passaic, where it crosses that river, and thence pursues a more western direction, through the little town of Powerville, into Rockway valley; still continuing its western course along the valley of the Rockway, until it enters the township of Roxbury, it ascends the summit level, two miles north-west from Drakesville. From the summit, at Hopacong pond, the canal is carried along the left bank of Musconetcong river, which it crosses one and a half miles south-west from Andover Forge; thence assuming a south-west direction, it passes near the villages of Hackensack, Bearystown, Anderson, Mansfield, Broadway, and New Village, and terminates on the Delaware, at Philipsburg, opposite Easton. General course, from New York to Easton, west; length, 101 miles; ascent, 915, descent, 754 feet; total rise and fall, 1669 feet, overcome by locks and inclined planes. Elevation of Easton, 161, and summit level, 915 feet above the Atlantic; 32 feet wide at top; 18 at bottom; 4 feet deep. Rise and fall, 1657 feet, of which 233 feet are overcome by 24 locks, and 1334 feet by 23 inclined planes; 4 guard locks; 5 dams; 30 culverts; 12 aqueducts; 200 bridges. Cost $1,200,000.

A SKETCH FROM REAL LIFE.

BY ALARIC A. WATTS.

I.

I saw her in her morn of hope, in life's delicious spring,
A radiant creature of the earth, just bursting on the wing!

Elate and joyous as the lark when first it soars on high,
Without a shadow in its path,—a cloud upon its sky!

II.

I see her yet—so fancy dreams—her soft, unbraided hair,
Gleaming, like sun-light upon snow, above her forehead fair;—

Her large dark eyes, of changing light, the winning smile that played,
In dimpling sweetness, round a mouth Expression's self had made!

III.

And light alike of heart and step, she bounded on her way,
Nor dreamed the flowers that round her bloomed would ever know decay;—

She had no winter in her note, but evermore would sing
(What darker season had she proved?) of spring—of only spring!

IV.

Alas, alas, that hopes like her's, so gentle and so bright,
The growth of many a happy year, one wayward hour should blight,—

Bow down her fair but fragile form, her brilliant brow o'er-cast,
And make her beauty—like her bliss—a shadow of the past!

V.

Years came and went—we met again,—but what a change was there!

The glassy calmness of the eye, that whispered of despair,—

The fitful flushing of the cheek,—the lips compressed and thin,—

The clench of the attenuate hands,—proclaimed the strife within.

VI.

Yet, for each ravaged charm of earth some pitying power had given

Beauty, of more than mortal birth,—a spell that breathed of heaven;—

And as she bent, resigned and meek, beneath the chastening blow,

With all a martyr's fervid faith her features seemed to glow.

VII.

No wild reproach—no bitter word—in that sad hour was spoken,

For hopes deceived, for love betrayed, and plighted pledges broken;—

Like him who for his murderers prayed,—she wept; but did not chide,

And her last orisons arose for him for whom she died.

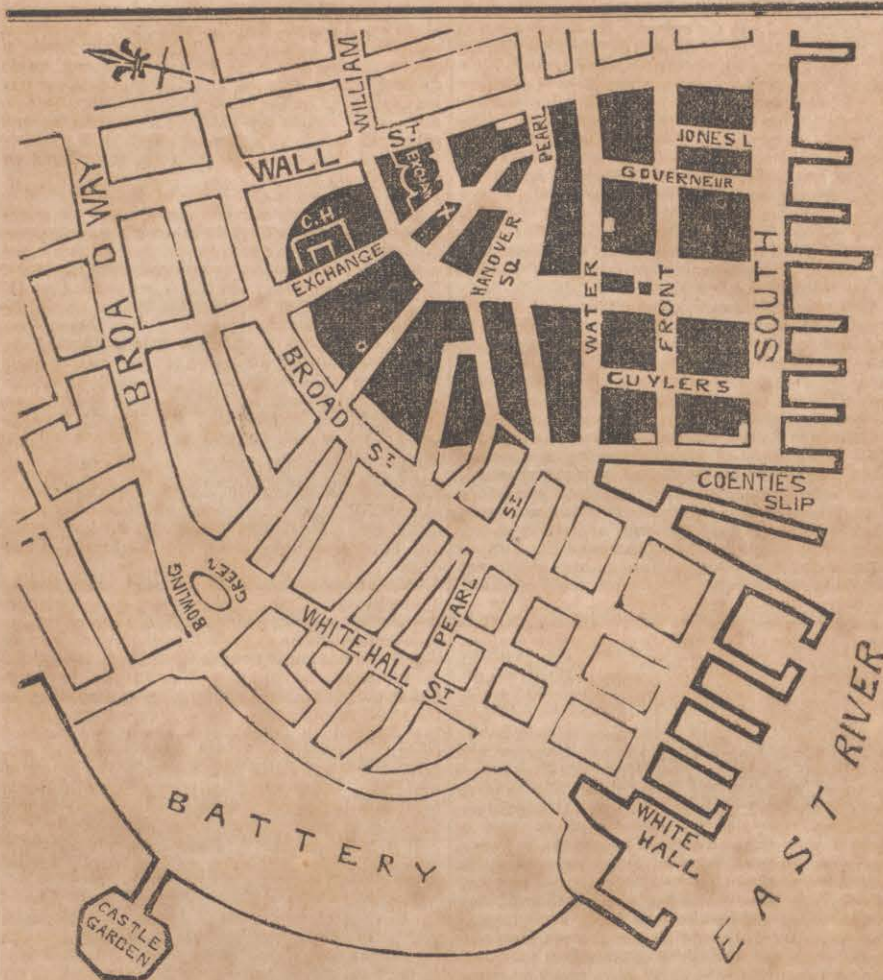

VIII.

Thus—thus—too oft the traitor man repays fond woman's truth;

Thus blighting, in his wild caprice, the blossoms of her youth;

And sad it is, in griefs like these, o'er visions loved and lost,

That the truest and the tenderest heart must always suffer most.

Note.—The black blocks are those destroyed by the fire. The X shows the point where the fire commenced.

THE LATE AWFUL CONFLAGRATION IN NEW YORK.

The fire commenced about 9 o'clock in the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 16, 1835, in the store of Tomstock and Andrews, 25 Merchant street, near the Exchange, and in twenty minutes, says the New Yorker, the whole block of wholesale stores, in the very centre of the mercantile business of the city, was in a blaze, and the destroying element was rapidly extending its ravages in every direction. It would be vain to attempt giving the distant reader an idea of the spectacle presented. The weather had been unusually severe for several days; but on the night in question the cold had increased to an intensity which has seldom been exceeded. The thermometer stood below zero; with a breeze from the N.W. amounting nearly to a gale; and the fire had obtained a tremendous advantage in the most compactly and loftily built portion of the city, filled with silks, cloths, liquors, and other com-bustibles, and intersected only by narrow streets which could interpose no barrier to the progress of the flames. The rally of the Fire Department was not made with its accustomed alacrity, owing to the unparalleled severity of the weather, and to the fact that there had been so many alarms within the week, and so large an amount of harassing service required of the firemen.

The effort to check the ravages of the conflagration in the quarter to which the wind was vehemently urging it, proved utterly unavailing. The water so plentifully thrown upon it by hydrants and engines was blown back in the faces and fell congealed at the feet of the firemen, or seemed only to add to the fury of the elements. William-street was passed—Pearl-street overleaped—next Water-street—then Front—and its removal into the stream. No barrier but that of Nature could be interposed on the East; and it was with great difficulty that the fire could be prevented from extending its ravages across Wall-street. The Tontine building (Hudson's News-Room) was indeed once on fire, but happily extinguished. The extraordinary strength of the Wall-street buildings—many of them resisting firmly the assaults of the destroyer, and none of the walls crumbling and falling into the street, as is too generally the case—did more for the safety of those north of the street than any thing within the power of human effort. For hours, it was doubtful that the flames could be arrested here—and if not, there was little hope that they could be before reaching Maiden-lane!

Onward—still onward, swept the besom of destruction! The hydrants were exhausted—the engines had long been frozen up, with their hose like cannon. Westward, the South Dutch Church, which had been made the hasty depository of stores of precious goods, was in flames, which threatened to extend to Broad-st. throughout. On the South, a desperate struggle was made at Hanover-square; but it was unsuccessful. How could such an avalanche of fire be checked, when water could not be thrown upon it, and seemed of no avail when it was? A last resort was had to gunpowder—but none, in sufficient quantities, was to be procured in the city—not being allowed as an article of merchandise. An application to the Fort on Governor's Island was unsuccessful; but a supply was ultimately procured after daylight from the Navy-Yard, Brooklyn, with a corps of mariners, &c. and the demolition of a few buildings contributed materially to the subjugation of the flames, which was finally effected at Coenties-slip, about noon of Thursday, after an awful and uninterrupted devastation of fifteen hours.

We shall not attempt to give a statement of individual losses: a bare catalogue of the sufferers would fill a column. Seventeen of the most valuable blocks of buildings in New-York are totally destroyed, and three others nearly so. The Merchant's Exchange is destroyed, including the Post-Office. Six hundred and seventy buildings have been burnt, principally occupied as importing and wholesale stores many of them by such firms as Arthur Tappan & Co. Bailey, Keeler & Kemslen, &c. &c. with a stock of goods, even at this season, of $300,000 each.—The south side of Wall-street is half destroyed; William, Pearl, Water, Front and South-streets, from Wall-street to Coenties-slip, are in ruins; Exchange-place, Hanover-st. Merchant-st. and Hanover-square, entirely destroyed; Stone-st. from Pearl to Broad-st. nearly so. Some of the buildings on Broad-street were slightly injured; but throughout the night this noble avenue was universally regarded as the only efficient barrier against the entire destruction of the First Ward.

Of the six large morning papers, only two escaped the general wreck—the Mercantile and the Courier & Enquirer. The Daily Advertiser, Journal of Commerce, and Gazette, were burnt out of both printing and publication offices; the Times of printing office only. The American, among the evening papers, is entirely destroyed.—All Mr. Minor's periodicals—Rail-Road Journal, Mechanics' Magazine, &c. &c. are included in the wreck. The printers of the Knickerbocker also. The other periodicals of the city were mainly exempted from immediate suffering.

We cannot pretend to give an estimate of the total loss sustained by this dreadful calamity. Fifteen millions of dollars seems the average of current opinions, but we esteem it decidedly too low. The Insurance Companies are generally ruined—some will not pay fifty per cent. There is, however, a considerable amount insured in Boston and other cities.

Every measure has been taken to alleviate the pressure of this afflictive dispensation. A meeting of the Common Council was immediately held—several apartments in the City Hall appropriated to the use of the merchants and other sufferers—the city watch doubled—and a volunteer guard of one thousand citizens called out for the protection of the city—the firemen being completely exhausted, incendiaries and plunderers still plentiful in every street, their appetites sharpened by success—and city insurance being no longer worth any thing.

From the N. York Star of Thursday.

It is almost impossible to discriminate the goods which lay on each side of the pavement in every direction and in every street in the first ward. All kinds and descriptions of dry goods, groceries, hardware, furniture, desks, books and papers, are huddled together almost without owners. On South street, the wharves are crowded with casks, crates, chests, pipes, hogsheds, &c. all of which we fear are burnt. As they were rolled out for safety and the engines could not approach the stores, we fear the whole is destroyed. Several houses were blown up by the marines, by order of the Mayor, with powder brought from the Navy Yard, which was necessary to arrest the progress of the flames.

To enumerate the particular individual losses is impossible—as an example, one merchant had in silks alone $300,000, which were destroyed—another $200,000, in teas and brandies. Many who were prosperous and happy last night are to-day bankrupts, utterly ruined.

Plundering at the Fire.—As usual, those miscreants who always avail themselves of such opportunities to plunder their neighbors, did not neglect the present occasion to do so. The extent of their depredations, and the number of robbers who committed them, was commensurate with that of the conflagration itself. More than ninety robbers were taken in the act of carrying away property during the night of the fire, and the ensuing day, nearly two hundred more were arrested for having in the possession, property which was stolen from the fire. The rooms of the Police office are filled with articles of almost every description, which were taken from thieves, and the value of which is probably little less than $10,000.

It is computed that a quarter of a mile square of brick and mortar in the first ward, is entirely levelled to the ground.

The Post Office is removed to the lower floor of the Custom House, in Cedar street. All the mails, letters, and every kind of property belonging to the Post Office, were saved by the praiseworthy exertions of the Post master and his clerks, who were on the spot throughout the night.

The appearance of the Exchange this morning is that of a venerable ruin: the broken shafts of its white columns—the crumbling, defaced cornices, scarcely sustained on their tottering capitals, connected with the half-burnt edifices, broken walls and general scene of havoc every where peering through the volumes of smoke, might well cause one to imagine that he was in the midst of the smouldering relics of some ancient city, rather than in that young and prosperous queen of commerce which yesterday was the metropolis of the western world.

And among the ruins, not the least to be lamented, was the loss of that splendid statue of Hamilton, which towering brightly amidst the sea of flames that dashed against its crackling base, cast a mournful glance on the terrific scene and then fell nobly, perishing under the crush of the edifice of which it had been as it were, the tutelary genius.

The handsome church of the Rev. Dr. Matthews, Garden street, along while resisted the mass of flames in their course towards Broad street. The bright gold ball and star above it on the highest point of the spire, gleamed brilliantly, and still while they were both shining on the deep blue concave, with an intensity of splendor, which attracted general remark, gave one surge and fell in all their glory into the heap of chaos beneath them.

A man was caught in the act of setting fire to the house at the corner of Stone and Broad streets. It is scarcely possible to conceive, that there could exist such a fiend as this in human shape, without supposing him to be either a maniac or drunk with liquor. It would seem, however, to have been done with a diabolical design, when it is considered that the fearful apprehensions of the whole of that part of the city were directed to this point, least the fire would cross it and reach the Battery.

In that unusually large space, called Hanover Square, where every body thought the goods piled there would be perfectly safe, there was accumulated from the stock of all the French stores a mass of silks, satins, laces, cartons of dresses, capes, Cashmere shawls, and the richest kinds of fancy articles, forming a pile of 60 feet wide by 25 feet in height, or nearly 100 feet square. In a few minutes afterwards a gust of flame, like a streak of lightning, came from the N. E. corner building, and shooting across the square, blown by the strong wind and set fire to the entire mass, which it in a few moments consumed to cinders, and then communicated to the houses opposite.

The weather was so intensely cold that the firemen were compelled to take the fine blankets saved, and cutting a hole through them, convert them into temporary cloaks, in which they were seen at daylight dragging home their engines, many of them so exhausted by fatigue that they were asleep as they walked. One entire company, thus accoutred, had artificial wreaths, and bunches of artificial flowers, of the richest kind, in their caps, taken from the wreck of matter, and presenting a very singular contrast with their begrimed faces and jaded appearance.

Our city owes its thanks to the officers and soldiers of the 3d and 9th regiments, and to the light infantry companies for their patrol during the night that succeeded the fire. Also, to the conduct of the marines from the navy yard, and U. S. soldiers from Governor's Island, in protecting property in the neighborhood of the fire.

The striking advantage of rail roads, especially at this season when every thing is locked up in ice, was never more emphatically demonstrated, than in the instance of the late fire engines from Newark, N. J., nine miles distant, where the same locomotive that early on Thursday morning carried out the news of the fire, brought these engines on their platform within an hour afterwards to the city. Their services were eminently useful.

A novel spectacle occurred on the night of the fire at the head of one of the slips. A large quantity of turpentine piled up in barrels caught the flames and burnt with great fury, being as is well known, one of the most inflammable substances that there is. It ran down in a stream like burning lava into the dock upon the surface, and spread out until it had reached several hundred yards into the river, being lighter than water and therefore floating upon it, giving the appearance of the river being on fire.

In some of the Iron Chests, the bank bills, papers, notes, &c. were perfectly uninjured. In others they were totally destroyed.

It is supposed that a thousand baskets of champagne were broken and destroyed, the tops being unceremoniously knocked off and the contents drunk up by the crowds surrounding the fire and working, and who were thus enabled to obtain protection against the excessive cold. An immense quantity of baskets of champagne were seen floating in the docks, and cheese and provisions seen scattered there and about the slips.

The prospect continues to grow more cheering.—It is believed that all the insurance companies will be able to pay in full, or nearly so, and most of them will also be able to go on. The Eagle, Fulton, United States, Bowery, Greenwich, City, and New York, are prepared to pay all losses.

The banks are behaving nobly. The Mechanics' discounted on Saturday almost all paper that was offered. The City Bank renews all notes falling due, on the same securities.

The general impression is, that the city will issue scrip to the amount of several millions.

A gallant effort was made to save the statue of Hamilton by a young officer from the navy yard with a party of four or five sailors. They had actually succeeded in removing it from the pedestal, when the danger from the approaching fall of the roof, compelled them to seek safety in flight.

Notwithstanding the immense losses sustained by the merchants, and the horrible state of confusion occasioned by the fire, no failures have as yet been announced or are expected. Not a note has been dishonored. There never was a more noble display of energy and fortitude than has been made on this occasion.

The U. States marines, eighty in number, under command of captain Walker, formed a complete chain of sentinels, on the night of the fire, along South st. from the Fulton ferry to Wall street, and up Wall to the Exchange, thus affording great protection to the property exposed. They kept their post all night.

It is estimated that nearly three thousand clerks, porters, cartmen, &c. &c. are thrown out of employment, for at least a time. Many of them with families to support, and no dependence but their daily earnings.

A fine old sycamore, near the corner of Beaver and William streets, on the premises formerly occupied by Cadwallader D. Colden, stands uninjured amid the ruins.

Too much cannot be said in praise of the noble conduct of the Philadelphia firemen. Immediately on receipt of the intelligence from this city, four hundred of them organized themselves and started to come on. Unfortunately by the breaking down of one of the cars on the rail-road, a large number of them were obliged to go back, but some arrived early on Saturday morning, and the remainder followed with as little delay as possible. They reported themselves immediately on arrival, and having stations assigned them amid the ruins, went to work with excellent spirit and effect.

Mr. Lenox is a heavy loser, but takes no thought of his own misfortunes. He remarked that his own loss did not cost him a pang—he felt not for himself, but for those who were sufferers, and who would be ruined; then he was willing to make any sacrifices and exertions to relieve.

Great benefits have resulted from the civic patrols formed in several of the wards. Property to a great amount has been saved by them from depredation.

Stephen Whitney's loss in stores, stock and goods, is said to be nearly half a million.

An attempt was made on Saturday night to set fire to a large building in Pearl street, near Chatham, occupied by the Transcript, one of the penny papers. Some villain got in a back window, and set fire to a pile of paper. The discovery was made in season by two of the watchmen.

Great quantities of merchandise, taken on the night of the fire, are supposed to be secreted on the Long Island and Jersey shores, and in the upper wards of the city, which was carried off in boats.

THE HEIRESS WITH THE PRETTY FOOT.

The scene at the Police Office (says the Times) since the first breaking out of the devastating element which wrought all this ruin, panic and distress, has been indeed heart rending. The squalid misery of a greater part of those taken with the goods in their possession, the lies and prevarications to which they resorted to induce the magistrates not to commit them to prison, their screechings and wailings, when they found they must relinquish the splendid prizes they had made during the raging of the fire, and the numbers in which they were brought by the police and military, exceeded any scene of a similar kind on record. For the last three days and nights, every place capable of detention has been crammed with these miserable objects—sometimes as many as one hundred being in confinement at the same moment. Hundreds were discharged without detention or other punishment than merely taking from them their plunder, and but very few of the whole number, even those who had stolen hundreds of dollars worth, can ever be convicted, in consequence of the impossibility of the identification of the property stolen.

It is not to be doubted, that an earlier resort to the use of gunpowder, would have saved millions. The regulations, however, of this city and Brooklyn, remove powder at such a distance, that great delay was inevitable—for at the navy yard there was no powder, and though a most bitter night, and against a head tide, a navy barge was sent to the magazine at Red Hook, a distance probably of four or five miles from the yard, for a supply. Meantime, however, some was received from Governor's Island, and with that commenced the destruction to save. We have seen nothing more characteristic than the entire song froid with which the sailors of Captain Mix's party carried about, wrapped up in a blanket, or a pea-jacket, as it might happen, kegs and barrels of gunpowder, amid a constant shower of fire, as they followed their officers to the various buildings indicated for destruction.

From the N. Y. Courier.

An investigation was commenced and carried on in the grand jury room on Monday, before Col. Murray, the Chairman of the Committee of Citizens, aided by Justice Lowndes, and Messrs. Ward and Jordan, of the Fire Committee of the Board of Assistant Aldermen, relative to the origin and cause of the late fire.

From a mass of testimony received from numerous merchants, clerks, and others under oath, it appeared to be incontrovertibly established, that the fire originated in the store No. 25 Merchant street, and that it was seen simultaneously in the first and fourth stories of that building, occupied by Messrs. Comstock and Andrews, the two intermediate stories occupied on the Pearl street side, by Mr. Henry Babad, and on the Merchant street side being until with flames until some seconds afterwards. That a report like an explosion of a gas pipe was heard in No. 25, to proceed from No. 28 and soon after the flames seemed to have been enkindled on the first floor, and shot up with the rapidity of lightning through the scuttles in the several floors to the upper story and through the roof. And it was the opinion of the examiners, that it must have been produced by the bursting of a gas pipe, and the distribution of the gas, until it came in contact with the coal in the stove or grate, by which it was ignited. The store No. 25, had been closed a little after five o'clock, and the fires well secured to guard against any accident or injury therefrom. This was the result of a long and critical investigation, and proves that no blame is to be attached to any one.

Women exceed the generality of men in love, but men have the advantage in friendship.—La Bruyere.

"By the bye, Fred. are you a marrying man?" said Charles Russell to his bachelor friend Frederick Somerville, as they discussed a cool bottle together at the Star and Garter, at Richmond. "By the bye, Fred. are you a marrying man?"

"My dear Charles, with a patrimony of one hundred a-year, and an allowance from my aunt of a second, for gloves and shoe-strings, how can I entertain such an idea? But why do you ask?"

"Because I have just heard a strange whim which my cousin Ellen has taken into her head; and 'pon my soul, if she perseveres in it, I should like some good fellow like yourself, who will take care of her and her couple of thousands a-year, to be the eccentric partner."

Fred's curiosity was now raised. He entreated to be made acquainted with this strange whim; and, a fresh bottle having been placed before the friends, it was not long before the generous operation of the wine, and our friend Fred's enquiries, prevented Russell from burthening himself any longer with the secret.

And the secret was this:—Ellen Cameron, a high-spirited and self-willed girl of two-and-twenty years of age, and an unnumbered income of as many hundreds, having been disgusted at the treatment which a fair relative had received from one whom, after an attachment of some years, she had made her husband, vowed that, if ever she married, it should be to a man to whom she should be introduced, for the first time, at the altar where she was to become his bride.

It was a strange idea, doubtless; but young girls, who are mistresses both of themselves and their fortunes, are apt to have strange notions. Ellen was one of these. With a good heart, an excellent understanding, and a cultivated taste, she had just so much of oddity in her disposition as prompted her to make, and enabled her to persevere in this extraordinary determination.

The strangeness of the notion seemed to possess charms for the somewhat romantic mind of Somerville, who, having enquired as narrowly into the state of the case as Russell's relationship to the lady would admit, expressed himself willing, could she be prevailed on to accept him, to undergo the ceremonies of introduction and marriage at the same moment.

"But tell me, my dear Russell, do you know any thing objectionable in her temper or disposition?"

"Nothing, upon my word, Fred. No woman is perfect; and Ellen has her failings; but despite certain eccentricities and peculiarities, I do believe you would live very happily together."

"But, my dear Russell, I always vowed I never would marry even an angel, if she exhibited a supercandance of foot and ankle. Tell me, has my fair incognita a pretty foot?"

"On my word, she has—there is not the fellow to it, I can assure you. But I tell you what, although it is almost unfair to Ellen, yet I will let you into a secret; she will be at the opera to-morrow night—you may get a peep at her there."

Full particulars of what box she was to occupy, together with other means of identifying her, were asked and given.

The following night saw Fred. at the opera, before Spagnoletti's magic tap had given the signal for the commencement of the overture. His eyes were instantly turned upon the box that was destined to contain the object of his search; but that, of course, was empty. During the whole of the first act of the opera, his attention was rivetted to that spot, but not a soul broke in upon its solitude.

During the divertissement, which followed, and exhibited attractions so powerful as to seduce the eyes of our hero from the object on which they had so long been fixed, the box was filled; and when Fred. turned his eyes again in that direction, he felt convinced that the most prominent personage which it contained was the eccentric Ellen!

His glass was now directed for some momentous minutes to the box; and when he removed it to return the salutation of his friend Russell, who now approached him, he was muttering to himself, "By heavens! she is certainly a fine girl!" Nor did he exhibit any selfishness with regard to this feeling; he never attempted to keep it to himself, but instantly confessed as much to Russell.

"She is certainly a very fine girl. Can't you introduce me to your cousin, my dear friend?" said he.

"Then the two thousand a-year have no charms for you, Fred," was the reply.

"Faith! but they have though, and so has your cousin; therefore, the sooner you say a good word for me the better."

Whether or not Charles, who adjourned to his cousin's, introduced the subject of his friend's admiration of her that evening, we cannot take upon ourselves to assert; but certain it is, that Ellen's opera glass was, for the remainder of the night, much more frequently directed to the part of the pit which was occupied by her aspirant, than to any other.

The subject was introduced, however, at some period, and, after sundry blushings and hesitations, Russell's wooing, in his friend's name, sped favourably; and six weeks after the eventful dinner at Richmond, saw a travelling chariot, with four of Newman's quickest, draw up at St. George's, Hanover square, and deposit at the snug and sly vestry-door, the bridegroom expectant of Ellen Cameron and her twenty-two hundreds per annum.

Here he was met by his friend Russell, whose obvious confusion and anxiety could not escape the notice of Fred. Somerville. He was about to enquire into the cause which produced the effect, when he was prevented by the arrival of the bride.

He would have flown to assist her from her carriage; but Russell seized him, and, motioning him to withdraw, succeeded in leading him into the body of the church;—not, however, before he had discovered that his intended had a very pretty foot, which was certainly without its fellow—for he saw she had but one!

He was at first bitterly enraged at the deception which had been practiced upon him; but Russell soon calmed his irritation by a very satisfactory explanation of his conduct.

Well assured of Fred's worth, and his cousin's amiability, he had felt convinced in his own mind that their union would prove a happy one; but the circumstance of Ellen having unfortunately been deprived of one of her legs, he feared would prejudice Fred. against her. His anxiety for the happiness of both parties had tempted him, therefore, to conceal this fact—for, knowing as he did, Fred's devotion to a pretty foot, he feared lest this enthusiastic admiration of the extreme of feminine beauty should lose him an amiable and wealthy woman, had he been told at once, that, although she had a singularly pretty foot, she had but one!

That this explanation was satisfactory, we have asserted already; and it was made evident by the fact of the worthy clergyman being called upon immediately to perform the matrimonial service; to say nothing of the worthy clerk receiving triple fees upon the occasion.

The marriage created a good deal of attention at the time, and many ill-natured jokes were cut upon the parties; but they heeded them not, and have been rewarded for it by a succession of many happy years.

One of these malicious witticisms only will we record.

"So, Fred. Somerville has married a woman of property, I hear—old, of course!"—said a young guardsmen at Brook's.

"Not exactly old," was the answer, from a quondam rival of Fred's—"not exactly old, but with one foot in the grave."

From the Knickerbacker for October.

A SCENE IN AN INDIAN VILLAGE.

BY T. L. McKENNY.

The treaty of 1827 was concluded. The commissioners, and a part of their military escort, together with some of the attendants and subordinate officers, were yet on the ground; all, however, preparing for a descent of the river to Menomine Village. Every thing was bustle and confusion. The Indians were, in great numbers, preparing to depart to their respective villages; the children were crying, and the dogs were barking; canoes partly laden with the gifts of the Commissioners, consisting of pork, flour, blankets, calicoes, &c. were floating on the river, held by the hands of little Indian girls, or squaws, far enough out to keep them above the pebbles and rocks beneath. These frail vessels being made of birch bark, will not endure a contact with hard substances. At this moment, and when in a few hours the ground that had been covered with lodges and tents, and trodden by thousands of Indian feet, and by hundred eds of the feet of the white men, was to be left silent, desolate, dreary,—with no marks of its having been occupied, save the green boughs which covered the earth within the wigwams, the poles which had furnished the frame for this frail tenement, the straw upon which the soldier had reposed himself, and the smoke of the cooking fires, not yet extinguished. At this moment, I say, when I was in my tent folding up my papers, and preparing to embark in my canoe, I heard a scream! It was immediately followed by a rush to the spot of hundreds of Indians, by the whites yet remaining on the ground, and by voices and screams mingling in great confusion. The original shriek was instantly repeated, and echoed, chiefly by female voices. By this time, I was at the door of my tent, and seeing the crowd of Indians, that had now become dense, an arm raised high above the heads of the agitated spectators, with a knife firmly grasped by the handle, I rushed to the spot, where I was met at the same instant, by Maj. R. A. F., who at the moment when the knife was descending, (being a few feet in advance of me, although approaching by another direction,) with one blow of his fist brought to the ground its murderous holder. There stood a squaw, bleeding and trembling, with the muscles of both shoulders cut, and so feeble as to be scarcely able to stand. She was the mother of the Indian's wife who had thus lacerated her, and her arms being now disabled, would have fallen the victim of this man's cruelty, but for the timely aid afforded her. The knife had already descended twice. In her hand she held a paddle, but this fell with the disabling gash inflicted by the first blow. Her other arm being raised to ward off the second stroke, received, in nearly the same place as the first, the blow of the assailant. It was when these were given that her screams were uttered,—and then the bosom of the meditated victim, with no arms to screen it, was open to the third, which would have proved, but for reasonable interference, the mortal stroke.

I immediately ordered a file of men to take the culprit, out of whose nose, mouth, and ears, the blood had been forced by the blow he had received, and keep him secure, until it should be decided what sort of punishment be inflicted upon him.—There was no excuse for the outrage. No offence had been given. The mother, who was one of the best looking squaws on the ground, had done nothing more than to importune her son-in-law not to retire to the woods, where some villains had conveyed some barrels of liquor, but to get into the canoe, which was then held by the hand of his wife, and was all ready for a start. Enraged at this interference, he seized, and, as has been stated, attempted to kill his victim.

The great body of the Indians retired in different directions, in sullen mood. Mutterings were heard in every quarter. The soldiers escorted the bloody minded savage to a log house in which our provisions had been kept, while I took the squaw in charge, to employ the necessary means for a cure of her deep and wide-gaping wounds. Our doctors had gone down the river, and I was the only person who had any knowledge of the urgent necessities of the occasion. But with the doctor had gone our medicine-chest, with the appropriate instruments and sticking plasters, lint, &c. I resorted to my trunk, however, in which, fortunately, I had some needles and thread, which every voyager in those regions finds it necessary to take with him. These, with a fee of one of my lineas, a couple of handkerchiefs, and a small portion of laudanum, which a friend had with him, were my only means. I united, by the aid of the first, portions of the severed muscles, and with the help of the laudanum, a little maple sugar, lint, and bandages, went through the operation with all the skill I was master of. All that was left was advice,—and that was, that she should keep her arms still, and in the position in which I had placed them; to avoid using the paddle, and indeed exercise of any sort, until she should get to Menomine village, distant thirty-five miles, where a more skilful operator would attend upon her case. Suffice it to say, she entirely recovered.

The next question to be decided was, what was the punishment that such an outrage called for, and under what form should it be inflicted? It would never do to leave that region, and the Indians present, under the belief that such conduct would be permitted; and especially was it due to the Indian women to use the occasion in such a way, as to raise them from that degraded subordination in which they were held. The murmuring among the Indians continued to increase. We could hear them whetting their knives, and denying our right to interpose. They said: "An Indian man has a right to kill a woman, and no white man shall interfere."—The Indian character was understood, however, and instead of yielding to such implied threats, we took still higher ground, and told them in reply, "he should be punished."

The question again recurred, "What shall be the punishment?" when the elder and more experienced commissioner said: "Let us make a woman of him!" It was instantly decided to do so. The ceremonies for this operation were put immediately on foot. Interpreters were sent out to call in all the Indians,—men, women, and children,—with directions for them to form around "Le Blute des Mortes." In a short time they all came trooping "like chickens to a housewife's call." The squaws trode the ground with new dignity,—the men looked scowling and lowering. The first came with light and elastic tread,—the last with sullen stubbornness. The eyes of the one beamed with gladness and hope,—those of the other looked wild and wicked. The children caught the inspiration of the mothers, and the very dogs barked with joy. They had all heard that the murderer, (in intent) was to be punished, and punished, too, for even an attempt to kill a woman!—a right the men considered to be as sacred as was their right to their hills and rivers.

All hands being now present, orders were given to bring out the culprit. He was escorted to the top of the mound, and placed with his back against the flag-staff. He was perfectly indifferent to his fate,—though he knew not what that was to be. He stood unmoved. Not a muscle trembled,—nor a breath, beyond ordinary respiration, moved his bosom. He surveyed the multitude with the most perfect indifference.

The attention of the concourse was now called when a friendly Indian, stepping up, whispered "They'll kill you!" He was told, audibly, we had no fears. We should do what we had determined to do, happen what might. Attention was again required,—when the elder commissioner, as had been agreed on, spoke through the mouths of four interpreters, (there being four or five deputations of tribes present,) and explained the outrage, and its cause. He then told them in what high respect woman was held among the white people, and said: "He among us who would act thus, would be looked upon as a dog,—even worse and more degraded than a woman, and would be punished for it." He then proceeded: "We have determined to punish this man: we will make a woman of him!" Whereupon the women's eyes beamed with exultation, and a shiver of delight, the result of elevated feelings, was felt to run through their ranks, while the men, as before, gave signs of deep agitation and revenge. A couple of our canoe-men were then called, and told to begin the ceremony. It consisted in stripping the culprit of his ornaments—his leggings, and all the exterior appendages of his sex,—and in putting on him an old worn out petticoat, that had seen the service of some dozen winters. This being done, I took his hand, and unclasping the fingers, in which he yet grasped the knife, I took it from him. I held it up, and said: "This is the knife that has been used in the attempt to kill." I then drove the blade into the flagstaff, and breaking it off, I replaced the handle in his hand, and holding up his arm, in view of all, added: "This is all the knife he shall carry for the rest of his days." Two boatmen were then ordered to take him by the shoulders, and run him down the mound, and onward to his half-covered lodge; while an interpreter was directed to follow him, and report what he should say.

On reaching the door of his lodge, he fell in, face foremost. He breathed hard and heavily, and presently muttered: "I wish they had shot me! I suppose that was what they intended, I went out to be shot. I am now a dog,—and worse than a dog,—I'm a woman!" He would then breathe hard again, and again repeat, in substance, this wailing over his fate.

Soon after, we all separated. I have heard since of our man-woman. He is shunned and hated,—is admitted to neither the council nor the chase, but is appointed to do the duties of the lodge to paddle the canoes, and put up lodges,—in fact, to endure all the drudgery and degradation of a squaw.

It was hoped that by such a procedure, the hard fate of the Indian woman could be softened—that her labours might be lessened,—and that she would rise in the scale of mortal and social worth. I am not without hope that, to a certain extent at least, the lesson was a wholesome one. Certain it is, the women contemplated the interference as a new era in their destiny,—and with feelings of joy and gladness that some power had at last been employed in their behalf.

THE RUINED FAMILY.

Dark desolation there hath been,
Following upon the track of sin—
No trace of those I once had known
Is left, not ev'n a burial stone.

On a bright morning in last June, feeble and sick from long study and seclusion, I wandered forth into the green fields and woodlands, to seek refreshment amid the universal gaiety of nature, and by exercise, to restore the wasted energies of mind and body. The green corn was rustling in the gentle breeze of the morning, and the feathered choir were singing their matin hymn in the great church of nature. As I leisurely sauntered along, gazing at the rich and variegated foliage of the dark woodland, a large black serpent stretched in the sunshine, heard the sound of my footsteps, and fled from my approach. Fly not, poor creature, said I mentally, if thou art proscribed, if every man's hand is lifted against thee, thou hast nothing to fear from me. God hath created thee to enjoy life in thy proper sphere, and why should I take away the life which I have not power to restore. If thou wert not useful, God would not have created thee.

Musing upon the cruelty of man, my path led me to the ruins of a church which once belonged to that plain and upright people called Friends or Quakers, whose tenets are calculated to lead to virtue, and whose lives alone would embody a complete system of ethics. The ruin of the little church is situated in a beautiful cove or grove of woodland, where silence and solitude guard the haunt of meditation. I sat down on a part of the ruin that overlooks the little graveyard, and gave myself up to serious contemplation. There before me was the stand where the aged had stood, and given their admonitions to the young, and there were the graves in which many slept, who had there wept and worshipped.

No pomp, no grandeur marked their resting place.

I was in a musing mood, for every thing around me breathed poetical feeling, and I passed on through a distant skirt of woodland to the main road. About a mile from town, I stood at the gate of a farm yard, through which I had often passed in my boyish days, to visit the friends of my youth. A flood of recollections rolled over my mind, as I stood contemplating the scene. I called up to memory the family to whom once belonged the surrounding fields and woodland. The elder brother, a gay and handsome youth, was placed in a mercantile establishment, in Philadelphia, while the younger one remained at home, to cultivate the paternal estate. The younger brother was one of those droll productions of nature, whose witty and queer sayings kept his comrades always in a good humor, and made him the favorite of all the boys who knew him. Such he grew up through the long years of boyhood, and with him, two favorite associates, one of which, like himself, was of quick intellect, and full of droll and singular sayings. They all grew up to manhood, united together in friendship, and received every where with respect. At the age of twenty-one or two, the elder brother returned home an accomplished and a very handsome man. I remember the noise his arrival among the ladies occasioned, and not without cause, for there are few, very few young men to be found more fascinating.

But there was one to whom his attention was particularly paid, and before whom he bowed the knee of adoration. She was a beautiful and fascinating woman, with a gentle disposition, and a small fortune which she inherited from her father. To her he breathed his vows, and in due time wedded, with every prospect of a long life of happiness and prosperity. But unfortunately for him, the warning voice against intemperance had never been raised, and the two brothers, with their two particular friends and associates, were in the habit of taking the social glass whenever they met, which was often. An occasional glass cannot injure us, said they, for we never suffer ourselves to become intoxicated. Whenever they came to town, their young friends invariably set out the bottle, and the frequent repetition gradually confirmed the habit of drinking—for the inroad of dissipation is like the serpent, which crawls through a bed of flowers, and nestles in your bosom unseen and unnoticed, until too late. The young men on particular occasions, were seen intoxicated; but, said they, the best of men will do so sometimes; it is excusable on particular occasions. The beautiful woman, whom the elder brother had married, became alarmed, and in tears persuaded, then remonstrated, but in vain; the fascinating spell was upon them, and no earthly power could snatch or entice them from the giddy labyrinth.

Time rolled on, and portion after portion of land was brought to the hammer of the auctioneer, or sold at private sale, to defray the expenses of a life of indolence and dissipated habits. On her knees, the beautiful wife expostulated, and in tears implored him to return from the error of his ways. In impassioned eloquence, she portrayed the ruin that awaited him, and pictured in glowing colours, the anguish she felt in the fact that every day he was sinking in public estimation, that those who had once placed the most implicit confidence in him, would not now give him credit for a penny—and that in a few years, there was every prospect that if death did not arrest his course, he would become a sot and a vagabond, and bring his ill-fated family to starvation and beggary. These appeals, dictated in the purest affection, instead of winning him back to virtue, only served to rouse his anger, and a long course of ill-treatment she experienced in consequence. Portion after portion of his property disappeared, to supply the liquid poison—and already had he begun to make free with his wife's maiden portion, when, after long suffering and abuse, she appealed to him for the last time, with the fixed determination, that if he did not reform she would leave him forever. For a short time he commenced a reformation; but soon relaxed, and plunged still deeper into the vortex of intemperance. Worn out with sorrow and suffering, she fled from his once happy home, and returned to the home of her childhood. Sad was the fortune of this beautiful woman. After flying from her husband to her paternal home, she was destined to see her own brothers go down to the grave one by one, the bloated victims of intemperance. Three or four of them were cut off in youth, in the course of a very few years.

In the meantime, one of the two intimate associates of the brothers attempted his own life in a fit of insanity, occasioned by constant excess, and nearly succeeded; but recovered only to destroy himself by enormous potations a short time after. Thus the first one of the four whom I had known in boyhood, and who had set out with such fine prospects in life, went down to the grave a young man, of a good natural disposition, and one who might have rendered himself an honor to society. The other friend and associate, who had sprung from a good family, and had been highly respected, repaired to the gloomy abode of the two brothers, and there remained, constantly indulging in drunkenness. The cleared lands had all been sold to supply liquor, and the axe now resounded in the remaining portion of woodland, and the lofty oaks were reeling and falling to the earth—fit emblems of the unfortunate brothers and their companions. A considerable tract of woodland, which their forefathers had spared for them, soon entirely

THE WAITER.

Going into the city the other day upon business, we took a chop at a tavern, and renewed our acquaintance, after years of interruption, with that swift, and untiring personage, ye old waiter. We mention this long interval of acquaintance, in order to account for any deficiencies that may be found in our description of him. Our readers perhaps will favour us with a better. He is a character before the public; thousands are acquainted with him, and can fill up the outline. But we felt irresistibly impelled to sketch him; like a portrait painter who comes suddenly upon an old servant of the family.

We speak of the waiter properly and generally so called, the representative of the whole, real, official race, and not of the humourist or other eccentric genius occasionally to be found in it, moving out of the orbit of tranquil but fiery waiting, not absorbed, not devout toward us, not silent or monosyllabic; fellows that affect a character beyond that of waiter, and yet spoiled in club-rooms, and places of theatrical resort.

Your thorough waiter has no ideas out of the sphere of his duty and business; and yet he is not narrow minded either. He sees too much variety of character for that, and has to exercise too much consideration for the "drunken gentleman." But his world is the tavern, and all mankind but its visitors. His female sex are the maid servants and his young mistress, or the widow. If he is ambitious, he aspires to marry one of the latter; if otherwise, and Molly is prudent, he does not know but he may carry her off some day to be the mistress of the Golden Lion at Chinkslord, where he will "shew off" in the eyes of Betty Laxon wat refused him. He has no feeling of noise itself, but as the sound of dining, or of silence but as a thing before dinner. Even a loaf with him is hardly a loaf; it is so many "breads." His longest speech is the making out of a bill viva voce—"two beels, one potatoe, three ales, two wines, six and twopenny," which he does with an indifferent celerity, amusing to newcomers who have been relishing their fare and not considering it as a mere set of items. He attributes all virtues to every body, provided they are civil and liberal; and of the existence of some vices he has no notion. Gluttony, for instance, with him is not inconceivable, but looks very like a virtue. He sees in it only so many more "beels," and a generous scorn of the bill. As to wine, or almost any other liquor, it is out of your own power to astonish him with the quantity you call for. His "yes sir" is as swift, indifferent, and official, at the fifth bottle as at the first. Reform and other public events he looks upon purely as things in the newspaper, and the newspaper as a thing taken in at taverns for gentlemen to read. His own reading is confined to "accidents and offences," and the advertisements for butlers, which latter he peruses with an admiring fear, not choosing to give up "a certainty." When young, he was always in a hurry and exasperated his mistress by running against the other waiters, and by breaking the "negresses." As he gets older, he learns to unite swiftness with caution; declines wasting his breath in immediate answers to calls; and knows, with a slight turn of his face and an elevation of his voice, into what precise corner of the room to pitch his "coming sir." If you told him that in Shakespear's time, waiters, said, "anon anon, sir," he would be astonished at the repetition of the same word in one answer, and at the use of three words instead of two: and he would justly infer, that London could not have been so large, nor the chop houses so busy in those days. He would drop one of the two syllables of his "yes sir," if he could; disappeared, being sold to supply the very article of poison which was fast destroying their bodies, and would, in all probability, destroy their immortal part; in other words less paradoxical, doom them to everlasting misery.

If I mistake not, it was on Christmas Eve, that the three were all carousing over the flowing jug. They had all become bloated to the last degree, and their appearance was actually frightful. One by one became drowsy from the effect of the liquor, and sunk down upon a few ragged bed clothes, until the trio were snoring stentoriously in insensibility. The long night wore away, and the next morning, the anniversary of the Saviour's birth, broke upon a scene horrific and humiliating in the extreme. Death had entered that dwelling, and two of the three, the younger brother and his associate, had gone to eternity. The elder brother alone remained; but the warning which had been given him was unheeded. In a short time after, his poor old decrepit mother, who had in early life been accustomed to plenty, worn out with privation, and broken hearted, followed her son to the grave.

The elder brother now retired to a small cabin on one corner of the farm, for the wild vagaries of a dis-temperamented imagination, would not suffer him to remain in the paternal home fast going to decay. In the cabin with a woman of the darkest fame, he lived; or rather, dragged out a miserable existence. Disease soon began to prey upon him, and he was chained to his bed of straw. The physician who attended him, told me that he reasoned with him, and asked him if he did not know that his habits would very soon destroy him. He said he did, and declared that he was now determined to drink no oftener than his physician prescribed. The Doctor told him he must drink no more until a certain hour, and he promised he would not; but scarcely had the physician turned to the door, ere his resolution failed him. The Doctor turned suddenly round, and beheld the infatuated man dragging the jug from under the bed, and lifting it to his quivering lips.

"Unguarded man, it will kill you in a few days," said the physician, in a tone of solemnity.

"I cannot help it," said the dying devotee, "for it is impossible that I can resist."

In a few days he followed his brother and associate to the grave, and I went through the gate to look at the spot where the three unfortunate men slumber. A rude fence surrounds the spot, and a willow weeps over the graves of the friends of my early days.

And near their lone and silent tombs,

The beautiful Catawba blooms.

I looked around me. The well remembered woods had all disappeared to supply the means of their ruin. And where was the house whose floor my boyish feet had so often pressed? It was gone—not a vestige of it now remains. Two Lombardy poplars alone lift their tall heads near the spot where the dwelling stood, and the once hard and level yard is now grown up in weeds. Sad were my reflections, while I stood upon the spot where flourished this ancient family, now gone to decay. I returned home to my garret a better and a wiser man. May the solemn facts here related, be the means of arresting from their downward course, those young men who think it no harm to take a social glass, and who think they can govern the use of liquor. Believe me every man is in danger who drinks a single glass. Thousands have fallen who had perfect confidence in their own self command. They have tampered with the lion for years, but have at last become the victims of his clutches.

MILFORD BARD.

Envy not the appearance of happiness in any man for thou knowest not his secret griefs.

but business and civility will not allow it; and therefore he does what he can by running them together in the swiftest sufficiency of his "Yezzir."

Thomas!

Yezzir.

Is my steak coming?

Yezzir.

And the pint of port?

Yezzir.

You'll not forget the postman?

Yezzir.

For in the habit of his acquiescence Thomas not seldom says "yes, sir, for no, sir," the habit itself rendering him intelligible.

His morning dress is a waistcoat or jacket; his coat is for afternoons. If the establishment is flourishing, he likes to get into black as he grows elderly, by which time also, he is generally a little corpulent, and wears hair powder, dressing somewhat laxly about the waist, for convenience of movement. Not, however, that he draws much upon that part of his body, except as a poise to what he carries; for you may observe that a waiter, in walking, uses only his lowest limbs, from his knees downward. The movement of all the rest of him is negative, and modified solely by what he bears in his hands. At this period he has a little money in the funds, and his nieces look up to him. He still carries, however, a napkin under his arm, as well as a corkscrew in his pocket; nor for all his long habit can he help feeling a satisfaction at the noise he makes in drawing a cork. He thinks that no man can do it better; and that Mr. Smith who understands wine, is thinking so too, though he does not take his eyes off the plate. In his right waistcoat pocket is a snuff-box, with which he supplies gentlemen late at night, after the shops are shut up, and when they are in desperate want of another fillip to their sensations, after the devil and toasted cheese. If particularly required, he will laugh at a joke, especially at that time of night, justly thinking that gentlemen toward one in the morning "will be facetious." He is of opinion it is in "human nature" to be a little fresh at that period and to want to be put into a coach.

He announces his acquisition of property by a bunch of seals to his watch, and perhaps rings on his fingers; one of them, a mourning ring left him by his late master; the other a present, either from his niece's father, or from some ultra-good-natured old gentleman whom he helped into a coach one night, and who had no silver about him.

To see him dine, somehow, hardly seems natural. And he appears to do it as if he had no right. You catch him at his dinner in a corner, huddled apart, "Thomas dining!" instead of helping dinner. One fancies that the stewed and hot meats and the constant smoke ought to be too much for him, and that he should have neither appetite nor time for such a meal.

Once a year (for he has holidays) a couple of pedestrians meet him on a Sunday in the fields, and cannot conceive for the life of them who it is; till the startling recollection occurs, "Oh, now I know! It's the waiter at the Grogan!"

He that indulges himself in ridiculing the little imperfections and weakness of his friends, will in time find mankind united against him. The man who sees another ridiculed before him, though he may for the present concur in the general laugh, yet in a cooler hour will consider the same trick might be played against himself; but when there is no sense of danger, the natural pride of human nature rises against him, who by general censures, lays claim to general superiority.—Johnson.

THE RETURN.

The heavens were bright in their shadowless blue,
And earth's emerald mantle was spangled with dew,
When the sea-boy return'd to his dear native home;
Farewell, for a season to ocean's white foam!—
O'er the door of his cottage a jasmine is gleaming,
And through its close leaves a faint sun-light is streaming;

Bright, bright o'er that home are the golden beams
Smiling,
The midshipman's heart with their gladness beguiling,
Though roses and woodbines their fragrance are Breathing,

No curl of blue smoke o'er the wide roof is wreathing,
No laugh thro' the cottage in wild mirth is ringing,
No voice in the joy of a young heart is singing.
The vase in the window with flowers is shaded,
But their perfume has fled and their beauty has faded.

One sister, the last of his kindred on earth,
Of all the lov'd forms that once gladden'd that heart,
At parting had bless'd him with sorrowing tears,
For the thoughts of the ocean awaken'd her fears,
And oft in his absence she started from sleep,
While the storm raged without, o'er her brother to weep.

But now he's return'd, he is happy and well,
And gladness must banish that mournful farewell,
Though dearly he loves o'er the ocean to roam,
His heart bounds with rapture at sight of his home,
But the step that was wont to spring forth from that Door,

To welcome her brother from perils pass'd o'er,
Comes not forth as he lightly bounds over the hill,
And a pang smote his heart—could his sister be ill?
He sees her not there in her favorite seat,
Why comes she not forth her lov'd brother to greet?
Oh! come sister dearest,—I've nurtur'd for thee,
A bird of bright plumage from over the sea,
And sea-shells that grieve with a sweet plaintive moan,
For the shadowy depths of their wild ocean home,
And a casket with carving surpassingly fair,
From afar I have brought thee, my own sister fair,
But the gift which I know the most valued will be,
Is the heart warm and changeless still, clinging to thee!

Oh, why dost thou linger my own sister sweet,
Thy wand'ring but true-hearted brother to greet!
With a tremulous hand he has open'd the door,
And with faltering footsteps he paces the floor:
But the last cherish'd form had from thence pass'd Away,

As snow that dissolves in the sun's fervent ray,
One short summer week in its beauty had fled,
Since the loved one and loving repos'd with the dead,
While her brother had hasten'd from ocean's salt
Wave,

His sister to bless—he found only her grave!
Oh! sad was the stroke on that light, throbbing heart,
That bade all hope's fairy-like visions depart,
And swept all the dreams of affection away,
"Like the gold of the wizard returning to clay,"
That bright eye was soon in its blinding tears shrouded.

That fearless young brow with deep anguish was Clouded,

And nature and feeling were swaying that breast,
Where never a cowardly fear had found rest,
One passionate gaze on the cottage he bent,
One long, long adieu from his bursting heart sent,
Then slowly he turn'd from that dwelling again,
Where was sever'd the last shining link of love's chain!

ROSALIE.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

Epistle to Horace Smith, from Algiers.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL.

Dear Horace, be melted to tears;
For I'm melting with heat as I rhyme;—
Though the name of this place is All-jeers,
'Tis no joke to be caught in its clime.

With a shaver from France who came o'er,
To an African inn I ascend:
I am cast on a barbarous shore,
Where a Barber alone is my friend.

Do you ask me the sights and the news
Of this wonderful city to sing?
Alas! my hotel has its muse;
But no muse of the Helicon's spring.

My windows afford me the sight
Of a people all diverse in hue:
They look black, yellow, olive, and white,
Whilst, I, in my sorrow, look blue.

Here are groups for the painter to take,
Whose figures jocosely combine,—
The Arab, disguised in his haik,*
And the Frenchman, disguised in his wine.

In his breeches, of petticoat size,
You may say, as the Mussulman goes,
That his garb is a fair compromise
'Twixt a kilt and a pair of small-clothes.

The Moorsesses, shrouded in white,
Save two holes for their eyes that give room,
Seem like corpses in sport or in spite,
That have sily whipp'd out of the tomb.

The old Jewish dames make me sick:
If I were the Devil, I declare,
Such hags should not mount a broom-stick
In my service, to ride through the air.

But, hipp'd and undined as I am,
My hippogriff's course I must rein,
For the pain of my thirst is no sham,
Though I'm bawling aloud for Champagne.

Dinner's brought; but their wines have no pith,—
They are flat as the Statutes at Law;
And for all that they bring, my dear Smith,
Would a glass of brown stout they could draw.

O'er each French trashy dish as I bend,
My heart feels a patriot's grief;
And the round tears, O England! descend,
When I think on a round of thy beet.

Yes, my soul sentimentally craves
British beer.—Hail! Britannia, hail!
To thy flag on the foam of the waves,
And the foam on thy flaggons of ale.

Yet I own, in this hour of my drought,
A dessert has most welcome come;
There are peaches that melt in the mouth,
And grapes blue and big as a plum.

There are melons, too, luscious and great;
But the slices I eat shall be few;
For from melons incautiously eat,
Melon-cholic effects might ensue.

"Horrid pun!" you'll exclaim; but be calm,
Though my letter bears date, as you view,
From the land of the date-bearing palm,
I will palm no more puns upon you.

Finding Store.—A chap from "the bush" was patrolling the streets of Boston a short time since, with a sheet of gingerbread under his arm, and gazing at the signs; when one which was labelled "General Finding Store" attracted his attention. He entered, chewing his "gingerbread," and after a severe effort at swallowing, like a hen eating dough, he exclaimed, "I show! you must be darn'd lucky chaps to find all these here things,—I s'pose you aint found my umbriller nor nothing, are you?"

A clergyman happened to pass a boy weeping bitterly. He halted, and asked, "What is the matter, my little fellow?" The boy replied, "Before, we could hardly get enough to eat, of any thing, and now I don't know what we shall do, for there is another one come." "Hush thy murmuring and wipe off those tears," said the clergyman, and remember that, He never sends mouths without sending victuals to put in them." "I know that," said the boy, "but then he sends all months to our house and the victuals to your house."

A BITE.—Alfonso Lombardi, a celebrated sculptor of the Emperor Charles V. was a great coxcomb. He got punished one day by a lady of Bologna, to whom he took it into his head to make love in a foppish manner. She was his partner at a ball, in the midst of which he turned to her, and heaving a profound sigh, said, as he looked her in the face with what he thought ineffable sweetness in his eyes, and we may suppose some fantastic and writhing gesture, "If 'tis not love I feel, pray what is it?" "Perhaps," said the young lady, "something bites you."

The present King of England is a gentleman of the old school, and pronounces point, pint! His subjects do not find about him the old "divinity" that used to "hedge a king." They call him a "jolly old chap." Modern utilitarianism has much to answer for!

In the registration of the names of persons qualified to vote, as required by the Reform Act, some amusing scenes take place:

In the parish of St. Luke's, two brothers, named Sims, were objected to by the Tories. One of them was asked by Mr. Adey, if he had a freehold worth 40s. per annum?

Claimant—"Yes, d—n you, I have."

Mr. Adey—"You don't hold it as a trustee?"

Claimant—"No, d—n you, I don't."

Mr. Adey—"And you have a clear beneficial interest of 40s. a year in it?"

Claimant—"Yes, d—n you, I have."

Mr. Adey—"We thought you were both not entitled; and I am sorry you have been put to any trouble."

Claimant—"D—n you, I wish I could get at you; take care of your neck."

These fellows must have been Loco Focos.

Effect of Repetition.—Repeat the word haste! a number of times and it sounds like stay! Repeat stay! stay!—and a bystander will think you are saying haste, haste, haste!

A Dilemma.—Extract from a dialogue between a father and his child:

Child.—Father, what's a dilemma?

Father.—A dilemma, dear, is—a dilemma; when any one don't know what to do, that's a dilemma.

Child.—Oh, yes! I know—a dilemma is just like you when ma scolds you.

Father.—Hem, you talk too much child.

A FREE AND EASY ONE.—"Arrah this, how the devil is it, Mr. Henry, that the post-office does be chargin' me with the price of all the lethurs you rank for me? said one of the constituents of an Irish County Member, "I'm tould, by Jabers, (continued the freeholder that the raisin is ye're half noncompush wid the drink whin ye'er franking them." The Hon. Member, with a deep blush, pleaded guilty to the soft impeachment touching the tittle. "Well, thin, I'd advise ye just to write 'dhrunk' whenever you wish to make 'free' for the futur."

How to judge Customers.—A merchant who has acquired considerable of this world's gain by his attention to business, lately informed us how he decided whether a man was fit to be trusted or not. He said whenever he saw a farmer come in riding or driving a good fat horse, he knew he could be relied upon.—If his horse was poor, he knew him careless and inattentive to his contracts.

FRENCH GRENADEIER.—During the assault of Commodore Thurot on the town of Carrickfergus, in 1760, an incident took place, reflecting at once the highest lustre on the soldier concerned, and evincing the union of consummate courage with noble humanity. Whilst the combatants were opposed to each other in the streets, and every inch was pertinaciously disputed by the British forces, a child by some accident escaped from the house in the midst of the scene of action, and immediately ran, unawed by the danger, into the narrow interval between those engaged in front.

One of the French grenadiers seeing the imminent danger of the child, grounded his piece, left the ranks in the hottest fire, took the child in his arms, and placed it in safety in the house from which it had come, and then with all possible haste, returned to resume his part in the fight.

An Irishman, speaking of the rapacity of the clergy in exacting their tithes, said, "By St. Patrick, let a farmer be ever so poor, they won't fail to make him pay his full tenths, whether he can or not; nay, they would instead of a tenth take a twentieth, if the law permitted them."

We copy the following anecdote from the Boston Mercantile Journal. Where the Journal got it we do not know, but if other anecdotes, as good and as interesting, can be obtained from the same source, we shall be thankful for the information.

SAGACITY OF THE ELEPHANT.—And now for an instance of self-denial, which I have often witnessed on the part of my friend, the large elephant. I had observed him very busy, flapping right and flapping left, evidently much annoyed by the mosquitoes. He showed, by constant flagellation of his person, that he was much annoyed by his persecutors; and just at that time the keeper brought a little naked black thing, as round, as a ball, which in India, I believe they call a child—laid it down before the animal, with two words of Hindostanee, "watch it," and then walked away into the town. The elephant immediately broke off the larger part of the bough, so as to make a smaller and more convenient whisk, and directed his whole attention to the child, gently fanning the little lump of Indian ink, and driving away every mosquito which came near it: this he continued to do for upward of two hours, regardless of himself, until the keeper returned. It was really a beautiful sight, and caused much reflection among those who observed it. Here was a monster, whose bulk exceeded that of the infant at least ten thousand times, acknowledging the image of his maker, even in its lowest degree of perfection, as divine; silently proving the truth of the sacred announcement that God had "given to man dominion over the beasts of the field."

From the Saturday Evening Post.

ANECDOTE.—The late Judge Peters, who with many excellent qualities possessed facetiousness in a great degree, was used to relate a joke at his own expense, which is too good to be lost.

The Judge having rode into Philadelphia from his country seat in the vicinity, dismounted from his horse opposite the dwelling of a gentleman in Market street, with whom he had business; but not finding a convenience for securing his horse, he beckoned to a man repairing the street, who, touching his hat, asked in the dialect of his country—"What 'll yer honour be plazed for till hav'?" "Hold my horse, my lad," said the Judge, "while I just go into this house for a few minutes." "Plaze yer honour, will he bite?" "Oh, no." "Will he kick?" "No, no." "Can one man houl him?" "Yes, my good fellow, easily." "Well then, yer honour 'll be plazed to be after houlin' him yerself."

So saying, he returned to his work, but not until the Judge, delighted with his native wit, threw him a piece of silver in testimony of his satisfaction.

LORD BYRON'S DOG AND BUTLER.—Lord Byron's principal favorites, in his household, were his Newfoundland dog, Boatswain, and his Butler Joe Murray. The dog, however, stood first in his master's affection, and was, if we may believe the epitaph placed on his monument, his only friend. That famous epitaph runs thus:

"To mark a friend's remains these stones arise,
I never knew but one, and here he lies."

Never was dog so honored. But Joe Murray almost rivalled Boatswain in the esteem of his master; and (says Washington Irving, in his late work) when Byron built the monumental tomb which stands in the Abbey garden, he intended it for himself, Joe Murray, and the dog. The two latter were to lie on each side of him. Boatswain died not long afterwards, and was regularly interred, and the well known epitaph inscribed on the monument. Lord Byron departed for Greece; during his absence a gentleman, to whom Joe Murray was showing the tomb, observed "Well, old boy, you will take your place here some twenty years hence."

"I don't know that, sir," growled Joe in reply, "if I was sure his lordship would come here, I should like it well enough, but I should not like to lie alone with the dog."—N. Y. Transcript.

DROLL INCIDENT.—(A Fact.)—A countryman the other day paying an early morning visit to the American Museum, to view the curiosities, having arrived at the third story, which contains several Wax figures, felt himself so uncomfortable in their company that he partly left the room; remarking to the first person that he met (who happened to be Sutton, the Ventriloquist)—"That them are Wax figures were too nat'ral like—he felt a kind o' fear'd, being alone with 'em." After a little persuasion, he was induced to return, Sutton at the same time secreting himself behind the stand that contains a petrified body. The countryman, still viewing the figures with fear and trembling, having arrived at the representation of Othello and Desdemona, Sutton in a voice of thunder exclaimed—"the handkerchief, I say!" With a scream, a-la Kemble, off starts the affrighted countryman at a fearful risk of dislocating his limbs, and jumped each flight of stairs at a leap, to the astonishment and confusion of the officers belonging to the establishment, at such an extraordinary exit.—*N. Fun and Philosophy.

BY LADY CLARKE.

Heigh for ould Ireland, oh would you require a land
Where men by nature are all quite the thing,
Where pure inspiration has taught the whole nation
To fight, love and reason, talk politics, sing;
'Tis Pat's mathematical, chemical, tactical,
Knowing and practical, fanciful, gay,
Fun and philosophy, supping and sophistry,
There's nothing in life that is out of his way.

He makes light of optics, and sees through dioptrics,
He's a dab at projectiles—ne'er misses his man;
He's complete in attraction, and quick at re-action,
By the doctrine of chances he squares every plan;
In hydraulics so friskie, the whole Bay of Biscay,
It it flowed but with whiskey, he'd stow it away.

Fun and philosophy, supping and sophistry,
There's nothing in life that is out of his way.

So to him cross over, savant and philosopher,
Thinking, God help them! to bother us all;
But they'll find that for knowledge, 'tis at our own College,

Themselves must inquire for—beds, dinner or ball;
There are lectures to tire, and lodgings to hire,
To all who require and have money to pay;
While fun and philosophy, supping and sophistry,
Ladies and Lecturing fill up the day.

Here's our desjuner, put down our shilling, pray,
See all the curious beasts after their feed;
Lovely lips, Moore has said, must evermore be fed,
So this is but suiting the word to the deed;
Perhaps you'll be thinking, that eating and drinking,
While wisdom sits blinking, is rather too gay;
Thus fun and philosophy, supping and sophistry,
Are all very sensible things in their way.

So, at the Rotundo, we all sorts of fun do,
Hard hearts and pig-iron we melt in one flame;
For if love blows the bellows our rough College Fellows

Will thaw into rapture at each lovely dame.
There, too, sans apology, tea, tarts, toutology,
Are given with zoology, to grave and to gay.

Thus fun and philosophy, supping and sophistry,
Send all to England, home happy and gay.

ANECDOTE.—The origin of singular names of individuals is sometimes truly laughable. In illustration of this we give the following:—The father of Return S. Meigs was born at Middletown, Connecticut. For some time prior to his settlement in life, he addressed a fair Quakeress at Middlefield, some few rods from his father's residence, and found much difficulty in obtaining her hand. She repeatedly answered his protestations of fidelity and attachment with "Nay, Jonathan, I respect thee much, but cannot marry thee—for better is a dinner of herbs and contentment, than a stalled ox and contention therewith." Mr. Meigs finally told Ruth that he was paying his last visit as a lover, and should strive to form an alliance with another family, and would therefore bid her farewell. The kind and lengthened word, pronounced with so much softness, fell upon her heart with healing in its tone; and as he mounted his horse to ride off, the Quakeress, relenting, beckoned to him to stop, exclaiming, "Return Jonathan! Return Jonathan!" Mr. Meigs went back, and fixed upon a day for the celebration of the nuptials. The first fruit of their union was a son, which the father, in commemoration of the happiest words he had ever heard spoken, had baptised "Return Jonathan," who rose to distinction, and subsequently to the office of post-master general of the United States.

From the Saturday Evening Post. THOUGHTS ON MARRIAGE.

Did young people seriously consider the important change which marriage must necessarily produce in their situation, how much more cautious would it make them in forming their choice of a companion for life? Alas! what avails the graces of the finest figure, the most captivating address, the assemblage of all that is ensnaring, if the heart is depraved, or the conduct imprudent. The gayest associate of the convivial hour, may be the dullest—the most unfit companion for the domestic circle; and he, who is never satisfied except in a crowd, or when engaged in a continual round of pleasure, is very unlikely to make a tender and prudent husband. Should sickness and distress draw near, depend upon it he will fly from their approach. If beauty alone excited his compassion, it will cease to exist when you are deprived of those attractions on which it was founded. If fortune was his inducement, that will likewise soon lose its value in his sordid mind; and the very person who brought him wealth, for which he sighed, will be considered as the grand obstacle to his enjoyment. Too often is this unpleasant picture to be seen in many discontented families, which a little serious reflection might have prevented being so unfortunately realized. Never be prevailed upon to yield your heart to any one, however he may shine in the gay circle of the world, if you are convinced that he has no relish for the enjoyments of a retired life. The man who likes every house better than his own, will scarcely take the trouble of making home agreeable to others, whilst it is disgusting to himself. It will be the only place in which he gives way to his discontent and ill humour; such people are for ever, strangers to the dear delights of the social state, and the real comforts of a well regulated family. He that is indiscriminately at home, is never at home, and he feels himself a stranger or a visitor amidst his closest connexions.

Extracts from Coleridge's "Table Talk."

Love.—Every one who has been in love, knows that the passion is strongest, and the appetite weakest in the absence of the beloved object, and that the reverse is the case in her presence. * * * What is Love but Youth and Hope embracing, and so seen as one?

History.—If men could learn from history, what lessons it might teach us! But passion and party blind our eyes, and the light which experience gives is a lantern on the stern, which shines on the waves behind us!

Metaphysics.—No studies gives such a power of distinguishing as metaphysical, and in their natural and unperverted tendency they are ennobling and exalting—Some such studies are wanted to counteract the operation of legal studies and practice, which sharpen, indeed, but, like a grinding-stone, narrow whilst they sharpen.

Keeness and Subtlety.—Few men of genius are keen; but almost every man of genius is subtle. If you ask me the difference between keeness and subtlety, I answer, that it is the difference between a point and an edge. To split a hair is no proof of subtlety; for subtlety acts in distinguishing differences—in showing that two things apparently one are in fact two; whereas, to split a hair is to cause division, and not to ascertain difference.

EPIGRAM.

"My book—the sharks have cut it up—my book;"
Grumbles a luckless bardling choaked with grief;
"Take heart," replied a wag with pitying look,
"You see, my friend, I have not cut a leaf."

A singular circumstance occurred while I was at Tunis. The Sapatap, or prime Minister, a Georgian, about thirty-six years of age, was sent, on account of his extreme beauty, a present from the Grand Seigneur to the Bey of Tunis. The Bey became very much attached to him; and from rank to rank he rose at length to that of Sapatap.

Nearly about the same time, a young girl was sent, a Georgian by birth, and extremely beautiful. She was in time taken into favor, and placed in the harem of the Bey.

About six months before my arrival, she declared to some of the women in the harem, that the Sapatap, whom she had seen through the lattice, and whom she had not met before for sixteen or seventeen years, although living in the same palace together, was her brother. This was mentioned to him; he laughed at the idea, and said he had no relation that had any knowledge of him whatsoever; that he had himself a very slight recollection of his family, &c. &c. This was reported to her. She sunk into a deep melancholy, which brought on a rapid decline; and for change of air was removed to one of the country seats of the Bey. His Highness told his sapatap, that she still insisted that she was his sister, and desired him to go and relieve her mind on the subject, as otherwise she certainly would die. He went and saw her. She was greatly agitated. 'You say you are my sister,' said the sapatap. 'Yes,' said she 'I am.' 'How many children had your parents?' 'You and myself,' she replied. 'What were their names?' She gave the names of her father and mother. 'Then,' said he, 'if you are my sister you have a scar on the upper part of your left arm, where a dog bit you.' She stripped up her sleeve and exposed the arm. He fell on her neck and embraced her. 'You are indeed my sister,' he said; but she was then dying. Dr. Heap was sent for. I accompanied him to the place of her residence, while I heard the story from the mouth of the sapatap, he shed abundance of tears. In a few days she was a corpse, and he was the most wretched of brothers—Com. Porter's Letters.

A SPIRIT-STIRRING INCIDENT.

A Quebec correspondent of the Boston Atlas, after giving a brief account of the skirmish during the late war between the then U. S. frigate President and three British vessels of war, relates the following spirit-stirring incident:—

"I have spoken of the three chivalrous officers who were killed in the action, on board the President. One of them, Lieut. Hamilton, was the son of the Hon. Paul Hamilton, of South Carolina, Secretary of the Navy. He was a midshipman under Decatur in the frigate United States, at the capture of the Macedonian. On the arrival of the United States at New London with her prize, young Hamilton was singled out by Decatur to carry express to Washington, the news of the capture. He accordingly departed, with the colors of the British frigate, without communicating his intelligence to any one on the way. On arriving at the seat of government, in the evening, he learned that there was a grand ball going on, given by the citizens of the place, in honor of the victory of the Constitution over the Guernere. The Chief Magistrate, all the officers of the government, and commodore Hull, with all the fashion and beauty of the place, were of course present. Hamilton proceeded to the ball-room, and calling out his father before he entered, he showed him the Macedonian's colors, and announced her capture. The joy of the father may be imagined. Leading his son by the arm, he entered the saloon, and there displaying the captured colors, he communicated to the brilliant assembly the intelligence of the new victory. Young Hamilton was made a lieutenant on the spot by Mr. Madison. The ladies crowded around him, bestowing upon him most undisputed tokens of their favor and admiration. It was an hour to Hamilton, in which the emotions and the happiness of years of ordinary life were crowded.—Little more than two years afterwards, he fell mortally wounded in the encounter with the Endymion."

The Reply to "Tell him I Love him Yet."

Tell her I love her yet,
With an enchanting soul;
Oh! how can I forget,
When memory spurns control.

Tell her the by-gone time
Oft seeks my curtain'd sleep—
If dreams of her be crime,
My guilt is dark and deep!

Tell her I'd strive for fame,
If 'twere my truth to prove;
And win a noble name,
Were my reward her love.

But, ah! the laurel now,
With all its glorious strife,
Would bind an aching brow,
And mock my cruel fate.

Tell her no happy smile
May now my cheek illumine!
Say, can the dead the while
Life's warm, warm glow resume.

Tell her I hope no more,
But still my faith retain—
The vow to her I swore,
I may not swear again.

Tell her, her prayer for me
Is lifted not alone;
Mine, too, to Heaven shall be,
As warm-breathed as her own.

Tell her when welcome death
Shall call me hence to part,
Her name shall have my breath,
Her image light my heart.

Substantial reasons for trusting nobody.—A lady went to a circulating library in this city to borrow books, but objected to leaving the pledge required for their safe return.

"Do you always take a pledge?" said she.

"Invariably," said the librarian.

Lady—What! of acquaintances as well as strangers?

Libr.—Equally the same, madam.

Lady—Seems to me that's very odd.

Libr.—It may be very odd, ma'am, but it's very safe.

Lady—Oh, how illiberal!

Libr.—I'm sorry you think so. But the truth is, we don't trust strangers, because we don't know them, and—

Lady—Because you don't know them? Very good—and what's the reason you don't trust your acquaintance?

Libr.—Because we do.

Pig Names.—Among the singularities of the Irish peasantry is that of giving fine names to their pigs.—"I have heard of one instance," says Mr. Moore, "where a couple of young pigs were named at their birth, Abelard and Eloise."

LEAP YEAR.

"Albeit, it is now become a parte of the common lawe, in regard to the social relations of life, that as often as every besetile year doth return, the ladies have the sole privilege, during the time it continueth, of making love unto the men, which they may doe either by wordes or lookes, as unto them it seemeth proper; and, moreover, no man will be entitled to the benefit of clergy who dothe refuse to accept the offers of a ladve, or who dothe in any wise, treat her proposals with slight or contumely."—Old Chronicle.

And must I then forego my right
To kneel at "beauty's shrine?"
Shall eyes, whose flash have thrill'd delight,
With "fond appeals" seek mine?—
I fear! (be still my fluttering heart!)
I fear that I shall yield,
Yet I will play no coward part,
I'll bravely keep the field.

"Come on then! pretty tremblers, come!
We'll hear what you've to say!"
What! frightened, nervous, pale and mum?
Pray cast your fears away!
"Nay! never blush, nor shrink, mes cheres!
The crowd of sighing swains
Who have besieged you, three long years,
Stoop to receive your chains.

Our club, each meeting, has contained
A dozen beaux, I know,
More timid than the youth who stray'd
Where Yurich's* waters flow.
One saucy look—one melting tone
Of a mellifluent voice,
And the whole squad are overthrown,
Quick! haste and make a choice!

Some heartless, wayward bells may feel
When they implore and sue,
That slights and scorn have turn'd to steel
The passionate and true:
O'er hearts once tortured 'neath their sway,
Their brightest smiles will gleam,
Like sunbeams of a wintry day
Upon the frozen stream.

I have myself some scores to clear;
The coquette now I'll play!
Each trace,—each record of a tear,
A tear shall wash away,
Zounds! how I'll torture their hard hearts
Who crushed and slighted mine;
Come Cupid, with thy bow and darts!
Avenge me, and I'm thine!

What! must I now forego my right,
To kneel at beauty's shrine?
Shall eyes, whose flash have thrill'd delight,
With "fond appeals" seek mine?
I fear! (be still my fluttering heart!)
I fear that I shall yield;
Yet I will play no coward part,
I'll boldly keep the field.

WILL HONEYCOMB.

A compliment taken.—"How very lovely you look," said a gallant cavalier to a brilliant dame, at a recent fancy ball. The lady smiled and simpered, and replied, as she twirled and twirled her jewels, so that the light might shine fitly upon them, "Oh yes! I assure you I've got on thirty thousand pounds!" And so she had, and was fairly worth that sum.

POOR PAY, POOR PREACH.

GENERAL CHARLES SCOTT, of the revolutionary army, afterwards Governor of Kentucky, became a prisoner of war at the surrender of Charleston, South Carolina, in 1781.—His health became so bad that he obtained his parole; and having procured a horse and chair for himself, and a horse and chair for his servant, put some provisions and a bottle of spirits into the chair box, (for there were few houses of accommodation on the road he was about to travel) the General was placed in his small carriage, and set out for his native state, Virginia.

On his march to Charleston, he acquired the knowledge of a remarkably cool spring, about twelve or fourteen miles from the city, encompassed by a fine shade, and not more than a hundred yards from the road. He ordered his servant to drive to the spot, which was soon found. As the General was so feeble that he could neither walk nor stand alone, his servant spread his cloak upon the grass, took him from his chair, and laid him down to rest.

The British commander had sedulously prohibited all communications to the American prisoners, either by letters or newspapers, in consequence of which it was extremely difficult to learn what was going on. General Scott was desirous to know if the Americans had any force in the field in that quarter of the country, and if so, to learn their strength and position. He ordered his servant to keep a lookout, and if he saw any person passing along the road, to hail and ask him to come to the spring. After some time the servant remarked to the General, that he saw a dirty looking Indian coming up the road. "Direct him to come here," said the General. He did so, and something like the following dialogue ensued.

General—How do you do?

Indian—Oh, how do?

General—Where have you come from?

Indian—From the Lower Catawba town.

General—Where are you going?

Indian—To the Upper Catawba town.

General—What are you going there for?

Indian—I am going to preach.

General—Aye, so you preach, do you?

Indian—O, yes, me preach sometime.

General—Well! do they pay you any thing for preaching?

Indian—Yes, little—twenty shillings—each town pay me twenty.

General—Why, that is d——n poor pay.

Indian—Aye—and d——n poor preach too.

The General who was so pleased with the prompt and candid reply of the Indian, that he burst into a fit of laughter, and for a long time he could not restrain himself. When he became composed, he discovered that he had got into a considerable perspiration, which he had not felt before since his sickness. The bottle of spirits had been put into the spring, to cool: the provisions were taken out of the chair-box; the General and the Indian ate and drank together, and the General has been heard to declare, that he ate and drank with a better appetite than he had done since he had been a prisoner. He was helped into his chair again, pursued his journey, continued to improve in health, and when he arrived at his residence, Petersburg, he was perfectly restored to health.

General Scott has often said, that this adventure with the Indian saved his life; the incident was so novel, and the acknowledgment of the Indian so simple and frank, it cheered him up, and the recollection of it caused him to laugh frequently, as he travelled homeward, with gloomy thoughts, brooding over the misfortunes of the American cause. It was the first time General Scott had ever heard the comparison and he believed the present adage of 'poor pay, poor preach,' had its origin in the manner here described.

THE DISGUISED LOVER.

My dear Tom had a natural affection for dirt, or rather dirt had an affection for Tom. It is to him what gold was to Midas; whatever he touched turns to dirt. No matter how white the cravat—no matter how immaculate the vest, the moment it comes within the sphere of Tom's influence, its whiteness is gone; it is immaculate no longer. Dogs, sweeps and lamp-lighters never pass him without leaving upon his breast unequivocal marks of their presence. Once, and once only, I saw him cross the street without encountering the wheels of a carriage. I opened my mouth to congratulate, and before I could utter one word, it was filled with mud. The careless blockhead lay at my feet, full length, in the gutter. At my earnest solicitation, he once purchased a suit precisely mud color. It was a capital idea. He crossed the street three times, he walked half a mile, and returned, in appearance at least, unscathed. The thing was unprecedented. True, he was welcomed by the affectionate caresses of a dog that had been enjoying the coolness of a neighboring horsepond; true, he received a shower bath from the wheels of an omnibus. But to plaster mud on Tom's new coat, was 'to gild refined gold—to paint the lily,' I said, as I witnessed the success of my plan.

In about half an hour, it was my fate to meet a gentleman with seven stripes of green paint on his back—it was friend Tom; he had been leaning against some newly painted window blind.

His man Caesar declares, that he can't see de use of brack a boot ween he never stay bracked, and his washerwoman with a proper regard for her own reputation, has been compelled to discard him, not from any ill-will, but, as she declared with uplifted hands, 'if any one should ask me if I washed Mr. Smith's clothes, what could I tell them!' But there were very few things in this world with which Tom could have more easily dispensed, than the services of his washerwoman.

Having no other amusement, one morning I strolled over to Tom's room. As I ascended the stairs, I heard his voice in a very decided tone, 'But it must be done, and so there is an end to it.'

'Really,' was the reply, 'any thing within the limits of possibility, but to make a coat in ten hours—I will promise any thing in the world, but I really fear I shall not be able to perform.'

'If double your price would be any object—'

'Certainly, sir, if you insist upon it; certainly. I will put every man in my shop upon it; it shall be done in time—Good morning, sir.'

The door opened, and a fellow with shears and measures passed out. What should Tom be doing with a tailor?

'Just the man I wanted to see,' he exclaimed. 'I require your advice upon a very important affair; which of these cravats do you think most becoming?' and he spread before me some half dozen of every hue and fashion.

'Now, what in the name of all that is wonderful, does this mean, Tom? A fancy ball, is it? You have chosen an excellent disguise; your nearest friends will not know you. But you cannot support that character: if you had taken that of a chimney sweep, now; but that would have been too natural. Tell me, truly Tom, what does all this mean?'

'Why, the fact is, Frank,' passing a hand through his hair, redolent of macassar, 'I have concluded—I think I shall be a little more neat in future. You, doubtless, remember the good advice you gave me some time since; it has had an excellent effect I assure you.'

Now, it so happened, that of all the good advice I had ever given Tom, this was the first instance in which he had seen fit to follow it. So I could not attribute the metamorphosis of my friend, to my eloquence. Who but a woman ever changed him from a slob to a fop.

'Pray, where are you going this evening,' I continued, 'that you must have a new coat so suddenly.' 'Going! no where, in particular, I had, indeed, some idea of calling on my old friend, Mr. Murray; no harm that I hope.'

Conviction began to flash upon me. 'Your old friend Mr. Murray; and his young niece, Miss Julia, has no share in your visit, I suppose; I heard that she arrived in town last night.'

'Now, upon my word, Frank you mistake me entirely—when I—that is, when I—I did not know any thing about it.'

'And so you were there last night, too! Really this is getting along bravely.'

'Why, the fact is, Frank, you must know every thing. I called last evening to see Murray on some business, about that real estate, you know. I had no more idea of meeting a woman than a boa constrictor; my beard was three days old; my collar ditto; and the rest of my dress in excellent keeping. I became engaged in conversation, and some how or other I forgot all about the real estate.'

'And so you are going again to-night—and that is the secret of your new coat?'

'By no means; I wanted a new coat, and tailors are always so long, you know. Do you think blue will become me? Blue is her favorite—that is—I mean blue.'

'Oh, go on, don't stammer—blue is her favorite color, is it?'

'The fact is Frank—take another glass of this wine—the fact is, I suppose—I rather fancy—I am a little in love. Try some of that sherry. What are the symptoms, Frank—queer feeling about the heart, and something which drives the blood through one like lightning!'

'Exactly! I believe I have seen Julia, short and chubby, isn't she—with red hair, and a little squint-eyed?'

Frank, I never did knock you down, though I have been tempted to do so a great many times; but if you don't stop your nonsense, I will.'

'Quite valiant in defence of your lady-love—Well, Tom, I will confess that she is a lovely girl, and tomorrow I will call and learn your success. So, good morning.'

* * * * *

'Well, Tom, what success?'

'Would you believe it! she did not recognise me.'

'Not recognise you?'

'No. You know what a quiz that Murray is. As soon as he saw me enter dressed in such style, he came up, shook hands with me, and without giving me a chance to say a word, introduced me to Julia, as Mr. Frederick Somebody. And would you believe it—the witch did not know me. I think I should not forget her so easily. Nor was that all. Murray said something about the fellow who called the previous evening—a country cousin, he said, clever enough, but an incorrigible slob. And Julia said, he pressed like a barbarian. Just think of that Frank, a barbarian. She shall pay for that yet. Such eyes—and she steps like a queen. Well Frank, a clean collar does make a vast difference to a man's appearance. Lovely as Hebe herself. Terrible difference clean linen makes.'

The last time I saw Tom, he was scolding his eldest son for coming into the drawing room with muddy boots.

Give something wherever you go, and you will be sure of a good reception.

LITERARY PORT FOLIO.

PAULULRICH.—or the Adventures of an Enthusiast.—A novel—2 vols. Harpers & Brothers.

We are not among those who deprecate the prolixity of the American press in works of fiction, as a stupendous evil, neither are we among those who regard with jealousy and distrust the industrious efforts of the many youthful aspirants after literary renown, in all parts of the country, to contribute to our stock of national literature. There are those who, considering the multiplication of new publications as a serious grievance, are not backward in discouraging all attempts at works of fiction, under a belief that every new American novel which does not display the genius of an Irving or a Cooper, is calculated to bring our literary efforts into discredit abroad, and to depress the standard of literary excellence at home; but with all due deference, we conceive that such opinions are founded in a radical error. So long as we have before us the bright pages of Scott, Byron, Campbell, Hugo, Irving and others, as models of taste and talent, there is no fear that the tone of literary excellence can be depressed, and a multiplicity of productions of inferior grade, rather adds to, than diminishes from, the lustre of the genius of our best writers.

In our opinion every attempt at book-making, that exhibits talent and gives promise of improvement, should be zealously encouraged, rather than otherwise, for in no other way can the latent genius of our country be brought to light, and its literary character improved; and though we are free to admit that among late publications there are many that deserve but a brief existence, it cannot be denied that a number of works have recently been issued from the American press, and from the pens of youthful American writers, that may safely be compared with any modern productions of Europe, and that give promise of literary talent of a superior and commanding order. Such works for instance as Guy Rivers, Yemassee and The Partisan, by Mr. Sims, Outre Mer, by Professor Longfellow, and Horse-Shoe Robinson by Mr. Kennedy, give cheering evidence that the mantles of Shakespeare, Byron and Scott have not been hermetically sealed in the grave, and that here, in the wilds of America, there is a promise of genius as powerful and luxurious, as that which has given to Europe the renown and glory so eminently deserves.

Among our latest receipts from the publishers we find the novel, the title of which is prefixed to this article. We have given it a careful perusal, and having done so, feel desirous of commending it to the favorable attention of our readers. It is from the pen of a young writer, and the present, we believe, is his first attempt at a work of fiction. As the title imports, Paul Ulrich is an enthusiast, not less in love matters than in all the business pursuits in which he engages, and in all the chivalrous and Quixotic undertakings that he commences. The plot is ingeniously laid, but the chief interest of the work consists in the well written and graphic details of Paul's adventures, from his infancy when he was the object of the affection of an antiquated maid, through many love intrigues, until the time of his marriage with the beautiful Emily. Some of the incidents of the work, it may perhaps be alleged, savour rather strongly of German romance, particularly that respecting an organised banditti in Pennsylvania; but it cannot be disputed that the author has thrown around these incidents the charm of interest and novelty, and depicted scenes of terror, crime and suffering, in a bold and fascinating style.

Altogether we regard Paul Ulrich as a very pleasant and agreeably told story, and for a first attempt it is undoubtedly highly creditable as a literary composition. It is far superior to many recent publications, and can scarcely fail, we are induced to believe, to place the author upon a very respectable footing among young American writers.

The following extract is descriptive of an afternoon's ramble of the hero and heroine, the latter of whom, Emily Florence, resides with her father, at a secluded country mansion, and is obliged to see her lover clandestinely.

THE LOVERS' RAMBLE.

"You have said all things are a mystery. I feel the truth of your remark. My mind has pondered upon the vast order of creation—the links by which it is held together—each dependent upon the others—until it has been lost in the boundlessness—the infinity of the subject. We see the heavens studded with innumerable stars, to which the earth we inhabit is a mere atom—a grain of sand upon the sea-shore. I have asked myself if they are not the homes and resting-places of other beings—endowed, perhaps, with the same feelings and affections as ourselves—who may look abroad into the infinitude of space, and exclaim, how petty, how insignificant the globe we inhabit? But we, also, have the same exalted notion of ourselves. Like the heathen philosophers, we would fain believe that we are the common centre to which every thing else must tend—nothing more or less than especial objects of Providence—creating for ourselves an immortality; but consigning the next grade—the next link—the next order in creation, to utter oblivion. What are we? a speck! Who are we? beings as fragile as the flower! Whence came we? from nothingness! Whither do we return? to the dust—the grave—the insatiate worms! What has been the tenor of our lives? misery and wretchedness! Have we found no green spots—no delightful resting-places in the pathway of our existence? ah! but the thistle and thorn were there to sting us! Are there no pleasant memories of joys, of pleasures, that are past? true! but they have had their opposites of pain and of peril! Have we led a life of debauchery and crime? too often a melancholy truth! And is there not a fitting punishment hereafter? it is a mystery! Have we not immortal spirits? let us go and question the deer that is leaping from rock to rock—or the innocent lamb sporting joyously on the green turf! Do we not sometimes dream of a home beyond the grave? let us ask the winds that are careering abroad, where may be found their hiding-places—whence they come, or whither they go? I cannot answer!"

By this time we had ascended to the top of a hill, clambering a rude and precipitous way—for I observed, wherever there was a steep ascent, or shelving rock, Emily was the first to climb and stand upon its edge—as though she courted, rather than avoided, danger. It was my task, however, to render assistance in cases of difficulty; and before we had gained the eminence, how often did I find her snowy and delicate hand clasped in mine!

Fatigued with exertion, we seated ourselves upon a rock. There was a pleasant prospect before us—the green pastures of a neighbouring husbandman stretching along as far as the eye could reach. The cattle and sheep were quietly browsing in the distance. Near them were a few acres of Indian corn, waving its luxuriant tops in the breeze. A rich belt of woodland on the opposite side, was beginning to cast a lengthened shadow upon the fields, for the sun (how short seemed the time!) was already declining. It was a scene of deep and quiet beauty. There was not a sound to be heard, save the solitary bleating of the lamb, or the measured strokes of the wood-cutter. Emily was the first to interrupt the silence into which we had relapsed.

"And so you are a little sceptical, I perceive. You have suffered your mind to become entangled in the mazes of doubt, by some pleasing, yet deceptive theory, of which there are so many abroad in the world. Yet I admire your frankness in thus avowing your sentiments; but depend upon it, you are fostering sentiments which will one day prove destructive to the peace and tranquillity of your mind. I cannot be your monitor—it would be an unpardonable presumption—but I saw you, enamoured of the beautiful tints of a flower, hastening to the brink of a fathomless abyss to pluck it, I would call aloud, and warn you of the threatening danger! You question our immortality—and why? Who will pretend to say that the tomb is our ultimate resting-place? Or why is it that our restless spirits are for ever leaping abroad—wandering and unsatisfied? Why do our imaginations soar above the dull earth, in search of another and a brighter world? Why do we shrink with so much horror at the approach of death, or the thoughts of the grave, if it is only an oblivious mantle to be thrown around us, and thereby extinguish the soul? Do the drops of water, which sink into the earth and are seen no more, perish for ever? Do not the particles of dust, which we see floating in the rays of the sun, exist unto all eternity? Will the constituent part of the hills, and mountains, and rocks, (which, according to philosophic truth, will one day be mouldered into dust,) ever become annihilated? Then, why should the soul—that sublime and ethereal essence—the mainspring of human action, and the great moving and regulating principle of human life—so pre-eminent, so lofty in its nature and attributes—be less enduring than the vile earth over which it exerts so powerful an influence?"

On taking our seats, we observed a dark mass of clouds rising in the west, when, although scarcely perceptible at first, had continued to spread without any further notice, until they reached nearly midway over the heavens. The sudden exclamations of Emily first directed my attention to the approaching storm—for I was too much absorbed with my own sweet emotions to be conscious of anything transpiring beyond my immediate presence.

"Hark! hark!" she ejaculated. "Hear the thunder, how it roars and mutters! Mercy! what a crash! A drop of rain, too! And the wind, how it begins to howl! Oh, where shall we fly for shelter?"

We had, indeed, encountered a fearful tempest. The wind was beginning to blow, the lightning to flash, the thunder to roar, and the rain to fall. Where could we find a place of retreat? We recollected the shelving rock, upon which Emily had stood on our way thither—and to this we immediately repaired. The storm raged with increasing violence, and the rain fell in torrents. We had scarcely gained our retreat, when an affrighted horse rushed by us, and took his stand at the foot of a tall chestnut, immediately before us. The rain for a moment ceased—there was a deep and pervading silence,—this dread interval—this prophetic pause, was succeeded by a quick flash, and a terrific burst of thunder, as though the earth was crumbling to its centre. Emily preserved a great degree of calmness for one of her sex, but as she clung to me at this crisis with a beating heart, I knew she was not without considerable alarm. We looked out from our retreat. The fierce lightning had shivered the chestnut almost to atoms—and the unconscious beast was struck dead at its root.

"Look!" said Emily, with violent emotion, "look at the shattered tree, and the lifeless animal, and learn the insignificance of man—his dependence upon an all-wise Providence. Oh, could your doubts—your scepticism be blasted, even as that tree, how could I rejoice!—how could I—"

"Nay, Emily," I interrupted, "I am your convert!"

Fool that I was to have thus gone astray, by following the impulse of a blind and heated imagination! And almost for the first time in my life, I knelt down in silent worship amid the rocks.

The storm subsided; we set out on our way homeward. The dim twilight was already closing in upon us. Emily leaned upon my arm; and, short as had been our acquaintance, I felt that there was an inseparable tie between us. We had given ourselves up to silence and meditation, and moved slowly along without uttering a sentence.

At length Miss Florence abruptly paused, exclaiming—"See! see! there is some one crossing our path!"

"Pshaw! it is your fancy," I returned.

"Look! look!" she continued, with her eyes intensely fixed in the same direction; "he is gliding into the thicket—and now—he disappears."

I could just perceive the dim outline of a human figure, as it moved quickly before us, although it was clearly discerned by the keener vision of Miss Florence.

"A neighbour on his way home," I carelessly observed, fearful that I might add to her fears.

"It may be," she replied, "but I think differently.

There is a band of robbers who have their retreat in the neighbouring hills—and this was no doubt one of them. They are headed by a brave and reckless fellow of the name of Elmo—Captain Elmo, I think they call him. They have been the terror of the inhabitants for a long time. My father went out some time ago with an armed force in pursuit of them, but could not discover their hiding-place. I have heard it said that they steal away the children of wealthy parents, that they may exact a ransom. Sometimes I obtain glimpses of them from my chamber-window, prowling about in the night; but they have never offered to molest us."

We finally reached Dame Lawler's cottage without being disturbed, and found her standing in the door, looking anxiously for our return.

"A pretty couple you are, to be sure!" she exclaimed. "You come to spend a social afternoon with me, and I see no more of you until the night drives you home. A pretty couple, indeed! I had the table spread, and everything in readiness—but I saw nothing of you, and so I sat down to my homely fare alone. Out upon you, I say!"

Emily apologized, and promised to amend the error of her ways.

"What will your father say to all this?" asked the old woman of Miss Florence.

"What, indeed, will he say?" returned the agitated girl. "How imprudent I have been! I must hurry home without delay;" and so saying, she requested me to accompany her through the woods.

We continued our way as rapidly as possible towards the Florence mansion, for it was now almost dark. Emily expressed frequent apprehensions that her father would reprove her severely for remaining out until so late an hour. I endeavoured to quiet her fears, but it was to little purpose. Sometimes, however, she resumed her gaiety, for her spirits were naturally too buoyant and elastic to be entirely subdued. The conversation at length turned upon Meg Lawler.

"She is a strange woman!" remarked Miss Florence. "For a year or more she has lived in that cottage, chiefly supported by my father. Poor woman! her husband deserted her some months ago, and has not been heard of since. I often wonder at her shrewdness and intelligence; but, unfortunately, she is much given to intemperance. The Bible she considers her greatest treasure, although, like many others, she sometimes disobeys its precepts. She is fond of relating the history of her life; and no greater insult could be offered than a refusal to listen. She tells many strange stories, some of which, perhaps, are wanting in probability. Her mind is vigorous and energetic, but resembles the rude and unpolished marble."

By this time we had arrived at the margin of the woods, within view of the Florence mansion.

"Here you must leave me," said Emily: "you may think strange that I am so unceremonious, but I have my reasons."

I remarked that it would be ungallant to desert her, as the path was uneven, and she might find a difficulty in making her way.

"We must dispense with etiquette," she replied, "when necessity requires it."

I reminded her of the robber, whom she thought we had seen in the woods—adding, that he might be on the watch, and overtake her.

"What have I to fear?" she asked in a bold and fearless tone, drawing an ivory-hilted dagger from her bosom, which she held before her with an extended arm. "This is my protection! You see, therefore, I am not without a defence." And her words were uttered in a voice which bespoke her stern and resolute nature.

There was a brief silence, which neither of us seemed disposed to interrupt. Miss Florence at length added—

"Pardon me, but I would not be seen in your presence, nor in the presence of any man."

I was about to reply.

"Hush!" she interrupted, in a deep, low tone, placing her finger upon her lips.

At this moment I heard approaching footsteps. Miss Florence looked hurriedly around, and said, in a scarcely audible tone—

"It is my father!"

"Why this alarm? Why do you tremble?" I asked, taking her hand in mine.

"Hush! or my life is perilled!" she quickly replied, putting her mouth close to my ear, as if fearful that the slightest whisper might be heard.

Scarcely knowing what I did, I imprinted a kiss (the first—burning, passionate, and full of rapture) upon her innocent lips, and darted into the woods.

POEMS BY MRS. ELLETT.—Messrs. Key & Biddle have just published, in a handsome volume of 200 pages, the poetical productions of Mrs. E. F. Ellett, of New York, authoress of the successful tragedy of "Teresa Contarina," and well known as a liberal contributor to the columns of our leading literary periodicals. In noticing this work we feel confident that we cannot say too much in its praise. The lady possesses no common mind, and we have always regarded her poetical productions as possessing an unusual degree of excellence and merit. Her writings are invariably chaste and beautiful, evincing a high degree of intellect, and a grade of talent far above the reach of our ordinary poets.

The volume embraces about sixty compositions, on as many different subjects. A portion of them are translations from the French and the Italian of Lamartine, Foscolo, Testi, and other celebrated writers. All of them possess merit, and the collection may justly be regarded as a rich addition to the literature of our country. The annexed beautiful extract may be quoted as a specimen of the whole.

THE GUARDIAN GENIUS.

BY E. F. ELLETT.

From the French of Alphonse de Lamartine.

"Peety is the guardian angel of humanity in all ages." In childhood, sitting in the garden shade

By flowering citron, or pink almond tree,
When the spring's breath, that round the arbor played,
My neck caressing, tossed my tresses free—

A voice I heard, so sweet, so wild, and deep,
Joy thrilled my frame that owned its magic spell;
'Twas not the wind—the bell—the reed's soft sweep—
Nor infant's voice, nor man's, in murmuring swell—

My guardian genius! Oh! the voice was thine!
'Twas thou, whose spirit communed then with mine!

When later, from a lover doomed to part,
Past those dear hours when by the shade we met,
When his last kiss resounded to the heart
That 'neath his hand's fond pressure, trembled yet—
The self-same voice, deep in my bosom pleading,
Rang in mine ear with still entrancing power;
'Twas not his tone, 't was not his step receding—
Nor lovers' echoed songs in trellised bower;—

My guardian genius! Oh! the voice was thine!
'Twas thou, whose spirit communed still with mine!

When, a young mother, round my peaceful hearth
I brought those gifts which bounteous heaven had sent,

While at my door the fig-tree flung the earth
Its fruits, by hands of eager children bent—
A voice, vague, tender, swelled within my breast—
'Twas not the wild bird's note, the cock's shrill cry—

Nor breath of infants in their cradled rest;
Nor fishers' chant, blent with the surge's sigh;—

My guardian genius! Oh! the voice was thine!
'Twas thou, whose spirit mixed its song with mine!

Now lone and old, with shattered looks and white,
The wood my shelter from the tempest's sweep,
My shrivelled hands warmed by the fires they light,
My gentle kids, my infant charge I keep.
That hidden voice, yet in this breast forlorn,
Enchants, consoles me with its ceaseless song;
It is no more the voice of life's young morn,
Nor his fond tone whom I have wept so long:
My guardian genius! still—yes, still 'tis thine!
'Tis thou, whose spirit dwells and mourns with mine!

THE AMERICAN IN ENGLAND.—2 vols. Harper & Brothers. Books of travels are getting to be all the rage, in this country as well as in Europe, and the manner in which they are multiplied is truly marvellous. Almost every week some work of this character issues from the press, and if we have heretofore had an abundance of publications giving descriptions of ourselves, we are now likely to be favored with an equal number relating to Europe, from the pens of our own writers. Englishmen, especially, will find very soon that the tables are turned, for if but one-half of the American travellers now in Great Britain publish their sketches, they will have enough reading to supply them for a dozen of years.

This work is from the pen of Lieut. Stidell, author of "A Year in Spain,"—a book that obtained a high degree of popularity,—and we entirely agree with a contemporary, that it is deserving of high praise. "Its style, with the exception of an occasional straining after effect, is excellent, and if considered merely as a graphic description of scenes, presenting themselves to the eye in a great metropolis, it is unrivalled. Appearances are described, and impressions are conveyed to the mind with the greatest force and distinctness. There is running through the whole a strong feeling of admiration for every thing American, which does credit as well to the author's head as his heart. Many young men, in his situation, if they had one-half of the puppyism which he affects, would have cut patriotism as decidedly mauvais ton."

We extract a portion of one chapter, in which the author describes some of the scenes witnessed in London, during the Christmas festival.

Among the more pleasing evidences of preparation for some great feast, in whose joys there were to be many partakers, was the arrival of untold quantities of game by the vans and coaches from every part of the kingdom, whether sent as presents from the country to friends in town, or to swell the stock in trade of some extensive poulterer. The game thus transported by coach in England, from one extremity to the other, is packed in boxes or hampers, or else left loose, where the distance is not considerable. Such, indeed, is the influx of game from some of the counties at this season, that the coaches are often exclusively freighted with it; and I saw one coach from Norfolk come whisking up to the Bull and Mouth, the day before Christmas, drawn by six smoking horses, and festooned in every direction, body, box, and carriage, with moor-fowl, hares, and partridges; and exhibiting, moreover, for inside passengers, instead of the querulous features of weazen-faced old maids, or the bottle-nose of a doughty half-pay officer, or the anxious countenance of muffled valetudinarian, the more interesting spectacle of dangling goose-heads, looking more than usually silly, or the whitened gills of what had late been vapouring and consequential turkey-gobblers.

The riot had already commenced, one day in advance. An ill-judged charity, or their own economy, had furnished the most wretched of the populace with the means of brutal indulgence, and at nightfall the streets of the capital resounded with drunken brawls, and the clamors of a pervading debauchery. That night I went to the Convent Garden Theatre, to see the Christmas spectacle of Mother Hubbard and her dog. Having tired of this, I next went to Drury Lane, where there was a most brilliant pageant, founded on the fable of St. George and the dragon, and the Seven Champions of Christendom. In both places the audience was of a character more disgusting than can be furnished by any other capital in the world.

In the places of inferior price the occupants were sitting in their shirt sleeves, their coats hanging down before the boxes, and sometimes falling; bottles were passing from mouth to mouth, while, immediately below me, sat two ruffians with their sweethearts, who, in addition to their bottle of gin, had a glass to drink it from, either because their tastes were more scrupulous, or because they had an eye to the just distribution of their "lush." One of them, who had but half a nose, kept his arm about the neck of his greasy partner, and indulged in open dalliance, in which, indeed, he was supported by the example of many others, in the face of the audience.

Those in the boxes, consisted chiefly of persons of a tender age of either sex, who, having returned from their boarding-schools to spend the holidays at home, were brought by their parents to see what they might. The spectacle off the stage was at all events an edifying one; and what with the shouts, groans, the whistling, and deafening din, I left the place at length completely stunned and heart-sick.

There was nothing very refreshing in the scenes without. Here, too, the air was foul with gas, smoke, and ill odours of every sort. It was raining in a slow, deliberate manner. The streets, and they who perambulated them, were reeking with mud, while the corners and other stations, where a more than usually brilliant display of gas lights and stained glass announced the position of a gin-palace, were surrounded by ragged throngs, whose flushed faces, tainted breaths, and noisy clamour, gave evidence of the depth of their potatoes. These groups were not composed alone of the ruder sex, but women from the labouring classes of life, as well as of a more wretched description, mingled in equal numbers. Many swaggered homeward, cursing or chanting a drunken catch, with a bottle in each hand, while others, only singly armed, sustained on the other side an unconscious infant, exposed thus soon to the inclemency of the weather, and doomed to suck its earliest nourishment from a bosom polluted by poisonous ministrings.

It was near two o'clock; the light of day, withdrawn some ten hours earlier, had proclaimed that this was the season meant by nature for repose; yet everywhere the streets were thronged with whatever was unseemly in the spectacle of human degradation. The ears were shocked with slang and obscenity, and from blind alleys, constituting the darker haunts of misery and vice, proceeded the fierce clamour of drunken strife, and reiterated cries of "Murder! murder!"

As I went musing homeward, it was difficult to realize that which I had contemplated was done in commemoration of the Nativity of our Saviour. It was by drunken orgies, murderous brawls, and shameless prostitution, that the English populace celebrated the advent of Him who came to establish a pure and unsullied religion—"the Lamb which taketh away the sins of the world." I could not help remembering that the last Christmas had found me among the Mahones, a people who, being both Catholic and Spanish, had, as such, a double claim to the scorn and pity of Englishmen. What were the circumstances there attending the celebration of Noche Buena—the happy night of all the year?

Why, the streets were gay with groups of mirthful and merry making maskers, pausing to sing and to dance beneath balcony or veranda, until, as the midnight hour approached that fulfilled the period of the thrice joyous anniversary, all were seen to seek the temple which was to be the scene of its celebration. Behold the vast area of the noble edifice, filled with adoring thousands kneeling humbly on the pavements, as they contemplated the mystery which shadowed forth the scene of the Nativity, the Gothic roof trembling with the glad sounds of angelic hallelujahs, or reverberating to the joyous and life-inspiring strains pealed forth by that noble organ, thrilling the feelings with untold ecstasy, and elevating the soul heavenward with a holy joy, by strains not unworthy of the skies. There was no intoxication, save what might be found in the delirious transports of believers, quickened into a sublime enthusiasm at the advent of the Redeemer.

BULWER.

A French writer gives the following description of Bulwer, the novelist. The story of his treatment to a young American we have heard before, and it is confirmed, in some measure, by Brook's notice of his general deportment towards strangers.

"Mr. Edward Lytton Bulwer is, like his brother, a decided radical. He is very tall, and would appear more so, did he not stoop and hold himself badly. He has thick, curly, light hair; his long face, without expression, and his large, moist, motionless eyes, denote by no means the writer of genius. I presume that it is partly owing to the great success of his works, that the doors of exclusive society are so widely thrown open to him. In his toilette he reminds one of those parvenus of bad taste, who obstruct the lobbies of the opera house at Paris. I do not deny the merit of powerfully interesting his readers in the incidents and story of several of his novels, in other respects so poorly written; but it seems to me that he should not have exaggerated their value to the degree of manifesting the supreme pride and self-complacency, betrayed on every page of the sad rhapsodies he has recently published, under the title of 'The Student.' I pardon him, however, for this last work, more readily than for the following trait which was told to me: A young American presented himself to Mr. Bulwer the other day, well provided with letters of introduction. "I am happy to see you, sir, said Mr. B. but it will be difficult for me to have this honour often. I have already more acquaintances than my time permits me to cultivate, and to them I owe the hours I have to dispose of."

NOBLE DEEDS OF WOMEN.—Carey, Lea & Blanchard have just published a work in two volumes, under this title. It embraces anecdotes and incidents of females of various ages and countries, who have distinguished themselves by striking evidences of the virtues belonging to their sex, and particularly in acts of affection, integrity, benevolence, courage, gratitude and patriotism. Very honorable mention is also made of many ladies who have contributed to the cause of science, and the promotion of the arts. The work is well executed, and presents a record in the highest degree creditable to the sex.

THE YOUNG WIFE'S BOOK.—This is the title of a neat 18 mo. volume, just published by Carey, Lea & Blanchard. It consists of a number of excellent essays on the social, moral, religious and domestic duties of females, with particular reference to their responsibilities as wives and mothers. The advice given by the author appears to us to be discriminating and sound, and we do not doubt but that the tendency of the book is decidedly useful and salutary. The author observes in the preface:—"I beg permission to present the young bride with this small volume, to supply the place of a living adviser—a volume filled with precept, advice, warning, and encouragement—gathered from many sources, the work of many learned and experienced minds. I hope she will permit it to lie on her toilet or centre table, and occasionally read it, until the whole is familiar as household words. If she shall be faithful to herself in the application of its counsels, she will save herself from many vain regrets, and reap a harvest of that which should be the heart's desire and prayer of a young bride, the object of her warmest hopes and best exertions—domestic happiness—home-felt joy."

Latrobe's "Rambles in America," is unquestionably an exception to the numerous shabby and jaundiced works that have lately been written and published on the manners and customs of the United States, by foreign travellers. The author is the English gentleman who accompanied Washington Irving in his tour on the prairies, and who is so favorably mentioned, as a gentleman of education and liberal feeling, by that distinguished writer. Mr. Latrobe and his friend Count Portalis, familiarly called "The Count," met Mr. Irving while on their passage to this country, and it was during the voyage, we understand, that the trip to the "far west," was agreed upon. A description of this expedition occupies the greater portion of the first volume, and the reader is again introduced to Tonish, Bente and the rangers, mentioned by Mr. Irving. The second volume contains an account of Mr. Latrobe's rambles in other sections of our country.

Books of travels being very similar to each other, in general outline, it is unnecessary to specify particularly the contents of Mr. Latrobe's work, except to remark that the author's trip to the west gives it a new and very interesting feature. He is more particular, in detail, than Mr. Irving, and perhaps quite as pleasant and agreeable in his descriptions. Throughout the work he writes in a lively, spirited and graphic style, and his observations upon our manners and institutions, are sound, discriminating, and free from prejudice. He is decidedly the most interesting writer on America that has lately been among us, and though he is not, at all times, entirely republican in his views, it is impossible to be displeased with his courteous criticisms. The Rambles are dedicated to Mr. Irving.

THE PARTISAN.—2 vols. Harper and Brothers. This is a tale of the Revolution, from the pen of W. Gilmore Sims, author of Guy Rivers, the Yemassee, &c. to whose reputation as a rapid and powerful writer, it is in all respects creditable. Although a novel in detail, there is much of historic truth displayed in its general incidents, and the reader who has carefully perused that portion of the narrative of our Revolution, which relates especially to South Carolina, will find, as he progresses through the Partisan, many truths which become more fearfully engrossing, heightened as they are by the masterly pencillings of the author of Guy Rivers. A spirited sketch is given of the leading events in South Carolina, from the fall of Charleston to 1780, the materials of which have been gleaned partly from written history, and partly from tradition and local chronicles, preserved as family records. The Partisan is intended, if we understand the author right, to be the first of a series of works in which the events of our Colonial history and Revolutionary struggle, are to be rendered the themes, and we look for the further prosecution of the design with interest, as in the hands of Sims it cannot but be happily executed.

ROBINSON CRUSOE.—1 vol. octavo, Harper & Brothers.—This is one of the most splendid books that has ever been issued from the American press, not even excepting the very pretty annuals published in this city and in Boston. The typographical execution is beautiful, and the binding, the style of which is entirely new, is really superb. "The adventures of Robinson Crusoe," is generally regarded as Defoe's best work, and it is, unquestionably, the master piece of its class—a story of thrilling and absorbing interest for youth, and a tale replete with moral and instructive lessons for those of riper years. The present edition, which is probably the most beautiful ever published, is embellished with fifty engravings, prepared expressly for the work. A biographical sketch of the author, Defoe, is appended. The work is, in all respects, a very suitable one for a holiday present. It may be obtained in this city, of Mr. Perkins, Chesnut street.

BRIDGEWATER TREATISES.—Another number, the fifth, of the valuable series of works, known as the "Bridgewater Treatises," has just been published by Carey, Lea & Blanchard. It is devoted to the subject of "Animal and Vegetable Physiology, considered with reference to Natural Theology," and occupies two large octavo volumes, which are embellished with nearly 500 wood cuts, in illustration of the text.

The subject of this work, in accordance with the will of the Earl of Bridgewater, under which the Bridgewater treatises have been written, is to enforce the great truths of Natural Theology, by adducing those evidences of the power, wisdom and goodness of God, which are manifested in the living creation. In the fulfilment of this design, the whole phenomena of animal life, in their infinitely varied forms of organization, are placed before the reader, classified, analysed and most ably discussed. The treatise is from the pen of Dr. Roget, one of the most eminent scientific men of Great Britain, whose labors in this work appear to have been very happily directed. We can conceive of no study more interesting and profitable than that of Physiology, in reference to the power, wisdom and goodness of God, and to all who feel any interest in this branch of science, the present comprehensive and learned work, will be a most valuable acquisition.

A SHAKER'S MEETING.

"Reader," says Charles Lamb, "wouldst thou know what true peace and quiet mean: wouldst thou find a refuge from the noises and clamors of the multitude: wouldst thou possess the depth of thy own spirit in stillness, without being shut out from the consolatory faces of thy species:—come with me into a Quaker's Meeting.

But—and so pregnant is this but with meaning, that it deserves to be enclosed in one of those flourishes or more pretending vignettes, with which the beginnings of chapters are adorned in old books—if you wish to have the depths of your soul rolled up into a muddy conglomeration of feelings; if you wish to view one of the most singular phases of eccentric, wandering and yet universal human nature: if you wish to feel at once peace and unrest, quiet joy in a few simple and great truths and a deep disgust at the strange, wild, yet decent pageant before you:—come with me into a Shaker's meeting. You go in softly and with a reverence into the wide, scrupulously neat house, where excessive plainness presents a new idea of architectural beauty; and as soon as you have put a noiseless step upon the polished floor, the chill absence of pews—those dumb, social, almost companionable reliefs of the vacancy of a great building—strikes oddly and painfully upon your curiosity; and you slide into one of the seats by the wall, appropriated to such intrusive worldlings as yourself, glad of the refuge even of a bench. Presently a side door opens, and a row of the demure sisterhood glide softly in, dressed in that quaint angular costume, which approximates the female form of those rude drawings of children, where they place dots for the head, hands and feet, and connect them by straight lines. The straight, stiff cap of snow white muslin, pulled forward beyond the temples, seems intended like the blinders we put upon horses, to prevent any sidelong glances of the eyes over which it projects. Yet have I observed, at times, that the texture was not so entirely impervious, as to prevent the sharp, glowing lustre of certain of their eyes from peering quite through its flimsy obstruction. They are all reduced to the same straight cut, elderly forms: the old, to whom "the grasshopper has become a burden," and the young, who ought to be as free, as joyous and as light as that frisking insect itself, that hops from blade to blade of the tall grass, in all the luxury of Nature and the Sun. Nothing would enable you to detect the presence of Youth among them, but that unfailing index of the eye; there, it is seated in that lustre of young life, that is irrepressible by any outward restraint or disguise, and which nothing but years and the drying up of life's bubbling springs can ever dim. In a few seconds, the door on the opposite side of the building lets in some of the brethren, the older and more saintly preceding the younger and those who are not so far removed from the ranks of the backsliding; and in the corner of the little ante-room, out of which they proceed, some one may be seen smoothing down his cropped hair and brushing a speck or two of dust from his clothes—for not shakerism itself can entirely suppress the inherent coxcombry of human nature. At length, they are all in and all seated in deep, silent congregation, the men on one side, the women on the other, with their hands folded in their laps and their eyes cast down. Notwithstanding the strange, grotesque scene, no tendency to smile comes upon you, for it is all done with a decency, an order, and a quiet confiding reverence for the sanctity of the place and the occasion, that address themselves at once to your better feelings, and put far away all immediate sense of the ridiculous. But after a few moments of silence, the whole assembly rise as one person, at a signal apprehensive only to themselves, and having removed the benches, they stand in two dense square bodies opposite each other; and then you feel a painful reluctant curiosity, thinking that something is about to be done that will shock or disgust you. Again profound silence spreads its wings over the whole assembly, and when every nerve is calmed out of excitement of recent motion, some old man drops a few words about "the privilege and the great importance" of meeting together, which fall gratefully upon your ear and bring you back again to the universal ideas and the common ground of Religion itself, where every condition of mankind can sympathize with every other. Anon, the words cease—the assembly is again silent—and, in a few seconds, they burst forth in a song and begin their dance in two lines with their backs arranged towards you, dancing to and from the wall on the opposite side. Suddenly, the figure changes to two large circles, one within the other; the outer and the inner with their faces directed in opposite directions; while in the centre of the whole stand several men and as many women, who lead the song to which they dance.—Round they go, in a sort of swinging half dance and half march, with their hands raised before them to a level with their elbows, and flapping them up and down like fishes fins. They become more and more agitated, as the song rises, and every now and then, at the recurrence of a sort of chorus, they clap their hands in one loud simultaneous beat, and make the roof of the building ring. You grow nervous at the sight and at the thrill, irregular and almost wild music of the hymn; you would be glad if it were over, or that you had not come; but on they go, in this strange procession, for the space of half an hour, when the song suddenly ceases and they return to their places. Then, after a few more simple, earnest words, they betake themselves to the benches, and another interval of silence follows, after which the meeting is abruptly broken up, and you are glad once more to be in the open air, to get back to the world and forms and ideas to which you are used.

Seldom will a sight present itself, that will touch stranger sympathies, than that of a Child Shaker. Take it in its garb, fit only for the withered form of age, with its dry response—carrying you back to scriptural communication—of yea—yea, and nay—nay; a child without the vagaries of childhood, a copy of the men and women Shakers, a chick on which the mantle of Ann Lee has fallen in miniature; and the oddities of all human fanaticism will not present many an odder image. It groweth up, for a solemn crossing of hands, for a life that is one long straight-jacket, and for yea and nay; for the weaving of baskets and the pressing of cheeses on all week days, and for a quaint old dance on all Sundays, through four score and ten years. It knoweth naught of the high places, the brilliant sights, the power and grandeur and mechanism of that far country—that wicked island in an ocean of Shakerism—called the World; it keepeth on its growing and declining periods of life, eating, dancing, singing, working, with a solemnity that it learns to breathe as an atmosphere, and which is as little to be accounted for or conscious to itself. It hath no holydays, or spending money; it never shoots fire-crackers, or lets off a squib. It does not keep a baby-house, or play at having a tea-party. The Fourth of July dawns to it, like any other morning; and it never counts the weeks and then the days and then the hours to vacation. It never hears the words Father and Mother; and should it die—for little Shakers do die, though rarely—it will not be wept with a parent's agony, even if the paternal parents stand at the bedside. Should you in your worldly curiosity, seek a reason for this, you need not to be informed, that Ann Lee said there were no parents and children.

No. 2. PHILADELPHIA.—FEBRUARY. [1836.]

THE NEWEST FASHIONS.

Carriage Dress.—A black satin pelisse. A double pelerine of moderate size, trimmed with black blond lace. A white satin bonnet, lined with cherry colour, and trimmed with white satin ribands and a bouquet of white ostrich leathers. Embroidered muslin collar edged with Valenciennes lace.

Evening Dress.—A dress of pink crape over white satin; corsage, cut rather low, is trimmed en mantelle with blond lace. The hair is dressed in high interlaced bows on the summit of the head, and soft curls at the sides it is ornamented with artificial flowers. Embroidered crape scarf.

Walking Dress.—A cloak of Luxmore, of a bright brown, with a rich pattern in black; it is made as a pelisse, fitting closely to the figure, excepting the sleeves, which hang full from the shoulders. A dress of pale lilac cychemire, bonnet of sapphire blue velvet.

Standing Figure.—Cloak of violet satin, embroidered round with a light pattern of bright chenille, a deep cape lined with velvet: the cape finishes at the shoulder, and, turning back, forms a second in velvet. Dress of green cachemire, bonnet of black velvet, trimmed with ponçeau, and black and ponçeau vulture feathers.

Sitting Figure.—A morning dress of cinnamon satin, wraps to the side, is bordered entirely round with a double edge of velvet scalloped. Pelerine to correspond, a simple cap of blonde lace tied with cerise riband, the borders rather wide and full round the face, and supported by chrysanthemum.

General observations on Fashions and Dress.—There seems no doubt that the out-door dress of our fair fashionables will, this year, be not less distinguished for comfort than richness. Furs are expected to be more generally adopted than they have been for several seasons past. We think we may venture to say, from the orders that we know have been given, that muffs will be very generally adopted, and hoas quite as much worn as ever. Sables is still the most fashionable fur, but ermine, which for a long time had been out of favour, has now nearly regained its former vogue; it is expected to be particularly in request for trimmings of mantles and mantlets. Grey squirrel and Kolinski are expected to rank next in estimation.

A tippet of a new form, called the Victoria, has been brought out; but how far it will be fashionable 6, 1836.

we cannot, till the season has fairly commenced, pretend to say. Those we have seen, were composed of sable, and bordered with a rouleau of the same. We have noticed among several mantles, that have been recently ordered, some of gros de Teurs and gros d'Orient, embroidered in silk to correspond. One of the most elegant of these was of black gros d'Orient embroidered in black silk, in a gothic pattern; the sleeves, of the usual size, were open both at the elbow and the bend of the arm. The collar, and a robing lappel, which descended to the bottom of the skirt were of black velvet. The mantle was confined to the waist by a rich black silk cord and tassels, which passed twice round it.

We have seen some new and very elegant patterns of fancy silk trimmings for carriage pelisses. We believe that these kind of trimmings and furs will be those most adopted. Several pelisses have the sleeves drawn full round the wrist, by a narrow band so placed as to leave a little of the bottom of the sleeve falling full over the hand, which forms a pretty and rather novel kind of trimming.

Plain velvet is expected to be the favourite material for carriage hats and bonnets. We have already seen a few morning bonnets composed of it, ornamented only with a simple band of riband, and a knot at one side, and a ruche of blonde lace disposed in the cap style in the interior of the brim. We have also to cite some half dress hats, remarkable for the elegant and simple style of their trimming. One of those of maron velvet, was decorated with satin ribands, the ground of the same colour, figured in waves of light blue, and two marron plumes penachées, edged with light blue. Another very pretty hat was of scabieuse velvet, trimmed with ribands of the same colour, edged with apple green, and two ostrich feathers, the bardes thickened at the ends with apple green, and knotted.

A new and splendid material for full dress, that is expected to be very fashionable, is called satin Amy Robsart,—it is a soft rich satin, printed in gold and colours. Another beautiful material, but of a less expensive kind, is the satin d'Ancree; it is a mixture of cachemire and silk, is twilled, a white ground quadrilled in wood colour, with a running pattern of green foliage, and small Bengal roses mingled with other flowers.

The waists of dresses are expected to be a more formal length than they are at present; and the sleeves to fall more off the shoulders. When pelerines are worn, the corsages will be made plain, otherwise they will be a good deal ornamented.

Mr. Editor—The following beautiful verses were written by a traveller in an album at a little inn at Zurich. The name of the writer is unknown, but he is decidedly a poet:—

A SWISS DAY.

'Tis DAWN, lovely dawn! and the sky is all white,
And the cattle in vale and on hill-side are lowing;
And the lake lies in vapor; half morning, half night,
And the breeze through the tops of the pine-grove is blowing;

And the vineyards are shaking the dew from their leaves,
And down in the valley the village roofs shine;
And the doves are all rustling their wings in the eaves,
And the earth and the heaven are cool, lovely, divine.

'Tis MORNING, rich morning! The yagers are out,
And the rifles are ringing from valley to hill;
But the sun rises broad! and the horn and the shout
Sink down, 'till we hear but the gust of the rill;
And, far up the mountain, the roe-buck's brown troop
Are seen, with their nostrils spread out to the wind,
While the eagle above spreads his wings for a swoop,
And the yagers toil on through the forest behind.

'Tis NOON, burning noon! and the far village spire,
And the peaks of the mountain are arrows of flame,
And the air is a fever, the sunbeam a fire,
And the deer, like the hunter, are weary and tame;
And the yagers by fountain and pine-tree are spread,
Where the smoke of their meals curls up through the trees;

And the shepherd is slumbering in chalet and shed,
And the fainting earth longs for the shower and the breeze.

'Tis EVE, balmy eve! and above the hush'd world,
Like a mother's red cheek o'er her soft-sleeping child,
On the east with her pinions of crimson unfurled,
The twilight is stooping, sweet, dewy, and mild,
And the planet of eve looks on mountain and lake,
Like a sentinel spirit just glancing from heaven.

Oh! thus may we life and its trials forsake,
And the hour of our parting be calm as this even!

VAPID.

A NEW BALLAD.

BY T. MOORE, ESQ.

Her last words at parting, how can I forget?
Deep treasured through life in my heart: shall they stay;

Like music, whose charm in the soul lingers yet,
When its sounds from the ear have long melted away.

Let fortune assail me—her threatenings are vain;
These still-breathing words shall my talisman be:
"Remember, in absence, in sorrow, in pain,
There's one heart, unchanging, that beats but for thee."

From the desert's sweet well, though the pilgrim must hie,
Never more of that fresh springing fountain to taste,

He hath still of its bright drops a treasure supply,
Whose sweetness lends life to his lips through the waste.

So, dark as my fate is still doomed to remain,
These words shall my well in the wilderness be;
"Remember, in absence, in sorrow, and pain,
There's one heart, unchanging, and beats but for thee."

VESPER REVERIES.

From the Saturday Evening Post.

"Indulgent MEMORY wakes, and lo! They live!"

"Thought and her shadowy brood, thy call obey."—

I am sitting in my own little room—the fire burns briskly in the stove—the shaded lamp sheds a mellow light upon the paper before me,—all is quiet—save, that, at intervals, I hear the wind moaning without, and the rain pattering against my window—giving "confirmation strong," that those who are exposed to it, must find it a cold, cheerless, and inclement night—this makes me look around with the more complacency upon my snug apartment, and the brightly flaming fire, towards which I now stretch out my "slipped feet," while I throw myself back in my arm chair, in all the conscious dignity of sole and indisputable possession. Really, the sound of that wind and rain—soft, distant, and subdued—is not disagreeable when one's well sheltered from it. Hist! what noise is that? It is old Tom, the cat—who has found his way into my room, and is purring behind the stove—he looks up, and purrs away the louder—his mode, I suppose, of showing his gratitude, and rejoicing at his escape from the storm into such warm and cheery quarters. Purr on, and take thine ease, old Tom!—you disturb me not, thy comfort seeking species has formed a part of many a pleasant family picture of domestic felicity; and there is a quiet gratification which I am not ashamed to indulge or avow in the contemplation of thy innocent animal enjoyment, and in knowing that I have been instrumental in making thee happy. So, keep thy place—my humble four-footed friend! No mischievous urchin is near thee to pinch thy tail, and pull thy whiskers, and after teasing and tormenting thee out of all good humour, to complain of thy spiteful temper, and demure maliciousness, and have thee kicked out for using thy claws in self-defence. * * * * *

Now, in the stillness and solitude of the place and the hour—my vagrant mind, glad to escape from the shackles of business, or systematic study, stretches its wings, and flies back to scenes, events, and individuals that have "a local habitation and a name," in cherished memory alone.—They rise before me, one after another, a ghostly train, bound together by the singular and delicate chain of involuntary association. Let me indulge my rambling thoughts in their devious ranges over the fields—I will not, because I cannot, say the "waste" of memory—or it is no "waste" to him who has seen much, if he has reflected but a little: He must have plucked some flowers, he must have gathered some ideas in his course—he cannot have travelled "from Dan to Beersheba," and found it all barren—the expanse must have been dotted over with some objects, at least, that could not but arrest and fix his attention for a time, and if so, some impressions must have been left behind.

Nothing is so well able to leave its echo long haunting the mind, as the music of eloquence, the finest, because the most intellectual of all music: the thrilling tones; the burning words; the thought sublime; the gesture of graceful passion—these will dwell in the memory, and move the soul, long after the voice of the gifted one is hushed in the unbroken silence of the grave. Recollections crowd upon me, "pleasant and mournful" are they—let me catch some of them as they flit so hastily across my mind. * * * * *

There is the slender form, and the pale mild countenance of young S—d, as he stood in the pulpit, the observed of an immense admiring throng. I hear him speak, his voice soft and silvery; his deep and fervent pathos; the amiable and spiritual expression of his face, beaming with feeling and devotion; added to his youth, and evident ill health; all conspire to give peculiar interest and effect to the earnest persuasion and affectionate appeal that falls from his lips and seems to flow directly from his full heart. There was an uncommon fascination about this young clergyman. It was not the splendor of genius—his mind was by no means of the first order; it was not the flight of an excursive imagination, nor the grasp of a vigorous intellect—his imagination was not remarkably brilliant; his intellectual powers were respectable, but could hardly be called great—he rarely reached the sublime, and as rarely spoke in those tones of passion, that burn their way into the soul, and leave an eternal impress there. It was not this. But there was such an appearance of perfect sincerity—there was such resistless evidence, that "his heart was in his vocation"—there was such pure, high and wrapt devotion, breathed forth in every sentiment, and visible in every movement—there was so much love in him, and in every thing he said—all of which was increased in its effect, by the youthful beauty of a face, almost unearthly in its beauty, (for consumption had already touched its bloom, with its own deathly grace and withering lustre)—and a finely moulded, though fragile form, whose motions were full of natural elegance—that it is no wonder that he was followed after, and so much admired and praised—especially by the young and susceptible of the other sex—and even those, whose chief delight had been, to obey the beck of fashion, and to mingle in the giddy train of pleasure's modish votaries—but who were now willing to sit humble and unnoticed, at the feet of a young disciple of a Crucified Master, in the midst of a listening crowd of refined and unrefined auditors; within the homely and unfashionable walls of a Methodist chapel. No young clergyman ever produced more effect upon the imaginations and the hearts of the other sex, and was more of an idol with them, than S—d. But in him, you detected no feeling of latent vanity—so natural in so young a man, so much caressed; so difficult, so almost impossible to be wholly stifled and controlled, even by a sense of sacred duty, arising from the solemn obligation of one who has joined himself to the servants of the Lord. You were offended with none of the little clerical fopperies—the displaying of a white hand, or a white handkerchief; unfortunately, not unusual in young clergymen of far inferior pretensions to personal elegance. The stream of incense which continually rose before him—which would have turned the heads of many, and those by no means deficient in talent; and which could not have been altogether without effect, but upon a very staid and scanty few—seemed to pass over him, and to leave no trace behind. His mind was away, engrossed, absorbed, in the things appertaining to another state of being—to which he felt that he was rapidly hastening. He was already, as it were, out of the body, his "home was Heaven," and he knew that his sojourn here could not be long—and what had such an one to do with earth or earth's vanities? It was his, to do his father's business—to labour for the souls of men—to work while it was called to-day; for the night, his night of death was soon to come, when no man can work. His spirit bent in perfect humility and submission to the will of Him whose minister he was, and as his feet drew nigh unto the grave, he seemed determined to make up by zeal in the cause, for the shortness of the time allotted him to fulfil those duties which he was sent to perform. Excellent young man! His career was brief, but it was glorious in the true and most emphatic sense of the term. He would speak from the sacred desk, when it was almost a "voice from the tombs"—when the hectic upon his cheek, and the feeble tones of his sweet voice, and the exhaustion of his debilitated frame, told that every effort he made reacted with fearful force upon his vitals, and that the shadow of the "dark mountains" was already upon him. He went away for a time. He returned, and preached again—travel and medical aid were equally unavailing. Consumption had fairly taken hold upon his victim, and could not be induced to loosen his inexorable grasp, by the labours of science, or the sympathies of a multitude of friends. I used to see him often in my walks, taking his daily ride; and he would appear to me to grow thinner and paler each time that I saw him.—At length I met him no more; debility and wasting fever had laid him upon the bed, to him of death and of triumph. Soon after, I saw his funeral; and among those who have been gathered to so early a grave—in the morn of usefulness, and but on the verge of manhood—few were followed by more sincere mourners, or have left a purer fame behind them, than J. J—n S—d, the young English missionary.

And there was another in my own profession—young M—r of New Jersey—and not dissimilar in mind or fate. His mind was quite as powerful—perhaps, more brilliant. His fancy would wanton with its beauty even amid the dry close reasoning and abstruse recondite learning of the law, in which he was by no means deficient; and his eloquence, rich, varied, full of feelings, yet strong in argument—not the eloquence (so called) of the mere declaimer—but the true power of one, who thought justly—who reasoned clearly—who felt warmly—and who had studied and had discovered the way to the understandings and the hearts of others—possessed a charm, which will embalm his remembrance with those, who like me, listened to him with attentive ear and moistened eye—while some around me wept, yes—almost sobbed aloud. I was present at the last speech that he ever delivered. It was before a jury in our Circuit Court. He was then a sick man. You saw it in the unnatural flush upon his fevered cheek, and in his attenuated, though still handsome form. Rarely indeed has it been my lot to look upon a countenance of such united intellectual and physical beauty—the contour of his features was regular and Grecian; his dark locks clustered round a high and finely developed brow; his eyes, which were of the darkest hazel, shone at times when he was excited with his subject, with that preternatural lustre which is said to be peculiar to the consumptive, for he too, was a consumptive—and the almost feminine delicacy of his complexion, apparently the result of ill health, gave an increased and a touching interest to his personal appearance. Never will that face and form fade away from my remembrance; for they are linked with so much that was beautiful in judgment, taste, feeling, so much that was elevated in sentiment, glowing in expression, and captivating in manner. And his early death! Ah! how does this hallow the remembrance, and help to enshrine his image—even among those of the loved who have departed—his, is there. * * * * *

The case in which he was engaged was one of no little interest, and well calculated to rouse the energies of an advocate. His client, a venerable clergyman, had been most grossly slandered by a brother-in-law—a member of his church, and ex-Sheriff of the county. The hostility between them had its origin in a most trivial dispute about the repairs of a wagon, which they used in common; and which the clergyman thought he had repaired often enough; while the other refused to contribute his share of the necessary expense. It happened shortly afterwards, that the ex-Sheriff put himself forward for some office in the church, and made great exertion to obtain it—using all his interest, and electioneering in every quarter.—The unfair conduct and unchristian temper which he had displayed in the paltry affair of the old wagon, convinced his pastor that he was a very unfit person for the station he sought so eagerly; he opposed his election, and the ex-Sheriff was defeated. This roused all the "old Adam" in the ex-Sheriff—he boiled over with rage against the clergyman—and with unfeeling vindictive malice, almost unparalleled in the annals of human littleness, he did not hesitate to insult the remains of a deceased sister, and to whisper in the startled ear of friends and neighbours, a tale of shame and guilt in which he connected the names of that sister and his hated brother-in-law! The clergyman soon discovered the effects of the slander so skilfully and industriously circulated by a man whose standing in society and place in the church, gave him of necessity some weight and influence—in glances of suspicion, empty pews, and a diminished congregation; and however much inclined he might at first have been to treat the slander and the slanderer with silent and dignified contempt, he now felt himself bound to perform the unpleasant duty of bringing the matter into a court of justice, and submitting his conduct and character to the comments and scrutiny of a legal investigation. The facts of the case, it will be perceived, were of a novel character; and afforded an admirable field for the powers of an orator who was equal to the subject. The words had been spoken in the Dutch language—the clergyman lived in a neighbouring county, and was of the Reformed Dutch Church; and a good deal of preliminary ingenuity and acuteness was required and displayed, in fixing the precise meaning of the words, and whether they made out a charge of an indictable offence, so as to amount in the language of the law, the slander per se—and in urging upon the court, that the proof in the cause fully sustained the innuendoes laid in the declaration. After having done this, so as to demonstrate his possession of that forensic perspicacity and legal ability, without which a lawyer's eloquence will not be listened to with much effect by the bench—he turned, and made his appeal to the jury—and a soul stirring appeal was it. His pathos drew tears from many who did not look as if they were much given to the melting mood, when he drew a picture of the distress which this foul slander had introduced into the clergyman's once happy home—of the anguish of a loved and loving wife—the sufferings of those of his children who were advancing to womanhood, and felt that keen sensitiveness to blemished fame which is one of the greatest safeguards of virtue—and the mental woe of him at whose reputation and peace the blow had been struck, and who bent in meek submission to that blow as a dispensation of Providence; but who could not divest himself of the feelings of a man, and knew the bitterness that was in a wounded spirit, even when conscience did not lift its voice in accusation to add tenfold torment to the pang. And when he adverted to the injury done to the cause of our most holy faith, by such an assault upon the character of one of its ministers—his language in keeping with the greatness of his theme gave force to sentiments, so just, and occasionally, so sublime—that they would not have been out of place at the altar of the sanctuary: and then, the orator glanced at the defendant, who sat in court with a lowering brow, and a face of bold, unmoved, unfeeling effrontery; and as he looked upon him, his eye flashed, and his lip curled with the indignation that swelled his bosom—to which he gave vent, in a lava stream of burning and sweeping denunciation of the dark and miscreant malice of him, who would have his revenge—though to obtain it, he must trample upon the ashes of a sister; stab the reputation of the living and the dead; poison the sweet fountain of domestic love and hope; and destroy the usefulness of a servant of the Most High; and do this fiend like work, while, with a friend's hypocrisy, he took upon his lips the sacred name of his Saviour—and made profession of his belief in his religion, and his submission to his will—and put his polluted hands upon the consecrated symbols of his broken body and his precious blood; and to aggravate the deep wickedness, and to impart an additional shade to the blackness of his heart—the cause of all this hellish hate, was, what?—the sting of mortification, merited by unworthy conduct—the baffled desire of unprincipled ambition, which sought a religious destination; for which a moment's self-examination must have convinced him that his ungoverned passions, his malignant heart, and his unchristian life, had altogether unfitted him! The peroration sent a thrill through the vast audience, hushed to a death-like stillness—and as their gaze and mine own was fixed upon the bold offender who was the object of its just invective, as if all wished to see whether he was not affected, by what so stirred the blood and touched the hearts of others, I saw his look of brazen impudence give way—it was doubtless, half assumed—for the man must have had some human feelings—a sudden paleness overspread his countenance; he put his hands over his brow, and bent down his head, nor did he raise it until the speaker had ceased. Well did this most eloquent speech deserve the eulogium which it drew forth from his venerable colleague, Mr. Emmet, who followed him, and closed the case. The jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff—a heavy one considering the circumstances of the defendant—but they would have been fully justified in doubling the amount. It did however, all that the plaintiff desired—it proclaimed his innocence of the fabricated charge of guilt, and the malice in which it had its origin; it restored its wonted peace to the bosom of his family, and their pastor to the confidence of his flock.

M—— had acted imprudently in speaking at all in his state of health. He had exerted himself beyond his strength, and spoken too long and too earnestly. But he had been sent for from his village home in another state, to plead this interesting cause of a valued client, and that client and his friends were so anxious to hear him; it was the first opportunity he had had of appearing before an audience in our great city; he felt those promptings of professional ambition, without which a man can never attain to eminence, but which are so apt to lead him too far—and thus urged forward, with these considerations weighing upon his mind, and impelling him to task his powers to the utmost, he took no thought of bodily weakness, and unable to refrain from making the required effort, he lost sight of every thing but his cause, and made such a speech as I have attempted to describe—and his last! He concluded in the afternoon at about three o'clock; and in the evening, he was confined to his chamber with a hæmorrhage of the lungs. The able physician who attended him, frankly told him, that another such an effort would be fatal; and that but one chance of a restoration to comparative health remained, and that was, to try the effects of a milder and more propitious climate. He took the advice, and turned his footsteps towards the sunny skies and balmy air of the Vineyards of France. He arrived, and for a while was better; but alas! like too many more, he came too late—too late. His disorder returned upon him, and after lingering a few weeks, he was laid among the strangers, in that gay city of the dead—where beauty mocks decay—Pere La Chaise. There let the young American traveller, as he muses among the monuments reared to the memory of the brave, the noble, and the renowned—pause at the humbler stone which bears upon it the name of a gifted countryman—W——m W. M——r.

"Light be the turf of thy tomb!
May its verdure like emeralds be:

There should not be the shadow of gloom,
In aught that reminds us of thee."

Never do I take from my shelf the volume once thine, and containing thy name, written with thy own hand, without having thee before me—as thou stoodst in thy beauty and thy intellectual might, pouring forth thy eloquence upon the very margin of thy grave.—Thy last notes were like those of the swan. My thoughts of thee are like the recollected tunes of melancholy music—for when I think of thee, I hear that most powerful of all instruments, thy variable voice, in all the inspiration of high and noble feeling! *

* * * * * Another, and yet another, and another still! How ye crowd upon me!—But I will speak of one—and only one—the unfortunate H——r C——g, who art now in my thoughts—conspicuous in the group!—Thy image will I arrest, ere it melts into thin air. Alas! though like S——d and M——r—cut off too soon—we cannot dwell with similar feelings upon thy fate. They died in their usefulness, and before they had reached the full expansion of their strength. Our loss was great. But they died in the whiteness of their fame; the breath of slander had not touched its purity; the sternest of earth's many censors had not ventured to condemn or censure aught. The imprudence of youth—the irregularities of early excitement—the degradation of vicious habit—could not be adduced, to diminish their claim to be remembered with affection and respect. We have nothing that we wish to forget in their epitaph. Their best eulogium is the record of their lives. Beautiful were they in death—for though their lives were short, if we knew not what they might have been—yet we had seen enough of the bud, to prognosticate the future beauty of the flower—we had seen enough of the active mind, to give full credit for the increase of power that future years and further study would have imparted—we had seen the imagination in the fulness of its brilliancy, and the feelings in their first warmth and fairest bloom. We might have seen them greater, but we never could have seen them more attractive—for we saw them in the youth of their genius and their hope; when virtue was emotion, as well as duty, and the cold lesson of the world had not yet been taught. Who shall say, that our loss was not their gain? No, weep not for them!

"Weep not for those, whom the veil of the tomb,
In life's happy morning hath hid from our eyes,
Ere sin threw a blight o'er the spirit's young bloom,
Or earth had profan'd, what was born for the skies.
Death chill'd the fair fountain, ere sorrow had stain'd it;

"Twas frozen in all the pure light of its course,
And but sleeps 'till the sunshine of Heav'n has unchain'd it,
To water that Eden where first was its source."

But unfortunate C——g, it was thy fate, to die with the blight upon thy name. Thou hadst outlived thy fame. Long ere age could assail thy mind, or bow thy frame—the scorners' sneer, the world's neglect had chilled thy heart, and broken thy proud spirit. There is pain and gloom in our thoughts of thee—not that sad simple melancholy which we are often inclined to indulge, rather than avoid. We grieve, not only that thou art in thy distant grave; but that thou wert hurried there, before thou hadst lived down—the dark calumnious charge—and perchance, the accusation of truth, severe, but just!

C——g's preaching used to attract me, notwithstanding all the rumours of his indulgence in excesses. At times, I was inclined to believe that they were not without foundation—again, I doubted—I was always willing to doubt. There were eccentricities in his deportment—some of them not very appropriate or becoming in a clergyman. He paid too little attention to the decorums of his profession, and seemed to entertain too haughty a contempt for the opinion of the world as to clerical propriety of manners and conduct. There was something of a recklessness visible in his demeanour, and a real or affected indifference and disdainful independence of others' thoughts and censures, which increased the number of his enemies, and diminished the regard of his friends; perhaps, unfair reproach and undeserved condemnation, was its first unhappy cause? *

* * * * * I have him now before me, ascending his pulpit stairs—his stick under his arm—his dress of a more fashionable cut than is usual for clergymen, but negligently put on—his hair gracefully dishevelled, and thrown back from a white and very handsome forehead. He would remain in his seat for a while, scrutinizing his audience as they come in—sipping water at frequent intervals, and passing his hand rapidly through his thick dark hair. He would then raise, and in an attitude of graceful ease, read the customary hymn—his manner, it is true, somewhat too careless, and a little irreverent—but with a distinctness and a beauty of emphasis and intonation, that I have never heard equalled—with equal grace would be sink back into his seat. But withal, there was no affectation—nothing forced—no apparent studied elegance; and yet real elegance was there.—In this respect—in the mere externals of oratory—was C——g truly great. In ease, grace, and propriety of gesture, superior to any speaker I ever heard; in fullness and distinctness of enunciation—in propriety and force of emphasis—in every thing connected with mere manner (except that he was deficient in the dignity and the gravity befitting pulpit effort) he was admirable. But his eloquence wanted soul—it might perhaps be more properly called oratory, than eloquence—he was a master of the arts of elocution.—True eloquence has its birth in the mind—in the imagination—in the feelings. It cannot be acquired. It breaks forth in the wild imagery and sublime thoughts of the untutored savage, when he seeks to rouse the fierce spirit of his tribe. It was heard from our own Patrick Henry, when he spoke the language of genius and of nature; no less than in the elaborated brilliancy of a Burke, the magnificent periods of a Bolingbroke, or the polished point and florid rhetoric of a Canning. It is sometimes greatest in the silent pause of intense emotion. Again, it bursts upon us in the irregular resistless torrent of excited passion, overleaping all barriers, and spinning all control. It cannot be subjected to positive rule—it cannot be restricted by a simple definition; for it is felt, when rules would condemn—we are arrested, impressed, fascinated, by a nameless grace—we are "pleased, we know not why, and care not wherefore." It is with eloquence, as it is with poetry—much of both is "unwritten." Poeta nascitur, orator fit, says Cicero; but you can no more make an orator, than you can a poet. You might as well attempt "to build a tree." The movements of the made up orator, when compared with those of the true orator, are like those of a first rate automaton, in contrast with the living grace of the man himself—the movements are correct and according to rule—the mechanism is admirable—yet it is but mechanism after all. We may bring out—we may improve—we cannot create. Manner alone, cannot form an orator—it is but the dress, the mode of giving vent to thought and feeling—the thought and feeling must be first in the man. Cicero's own description of a perfect orator, combines an appalling multitude of requisites. It has been often quoted. Where shall he go for a better—whose authority would we prefer?

H——r C——g's eloquence was manner, manner, manner--and manner only. He could not speak extemporaneously with any fluency--all his oratorical efforts were premeditated, and his best sermons were those which had been the most carefully prepared--and even these were rather tame and frigid productions--relieved by occasional energetic declamation, now and then rising to vehemence, rather than fervour; but rarely stamped with the glowing impress of creative genius, or developing the workings of a powerful mind--rarely lifting us to the "Empyrean Heights" upon the "Seraph Wings" of sublime emotion; as rarely melting the heart with the simpler display of the gentle sympathetic affections of our nature. He never threw a spell over us--he could not unbar at will the flood gates of feeling--he could not force or insinuate his way into the mind and heart, and reign a master there--he never uttered one of these original animating comprehensive thoughts, that startle and haunt the mind through the vicissitudes of years. He was fond of borrowing, and those remarks which occur to my mind while I now endeavour to recall to my recollection his best peculiarities of manner, are the remarks of others, introduced into his sermons and speeches, and delivered in his most admirable and emphatic style. His very manner, with all its beauty, wanted soul. You could hardly call it strictly an artificial manner--it was too perfect a specimen of art, to appear artificial--and yet the after thought was irresistible, that it was artificial. You could not but be pleased, while you were an auditor--but when you retired and reflected, there was an involuntary dissatisfaction--you weighed it in the balance, and found it wanting; it had not sufficient variety of intonation--it was too declamatory--it was too uniform--too unvaried in its correctness--too unbroken in its flow. In short, it was deficient in what art cannot supply--in feeling; a transient occasional irritation--the mere ebullition of temper--frequently, too frequently--ruffled the surface--but, you looked for the indications of the deep internal power--you looked in vain--of course, with all its beauty--there was a want, and you were dissatisfied. C--g might more properly be called an elegant speaker, than a great orator. They are very different things in my humble opinion, however much we are apt to confound them. Strange to tell, C--g was most spirited and energetic, where one would have least expected it. For laxity of faith, he showed no mercy. He was bitter and unsparing in his invectives upon those who departed from the standard of orthodoxy, or doubted, what he deemed the essential doctrines of christianity. To Universalists and Unitarians, he denied the name of christians. For them, in his estimation, there could be no salvation. "Refined Deists"--"Baptised Infidels"--were the epithets that he was fond of applying to them. All were included in one sweeping condemnation--the religious professions of Priestley--the christian labours of Lardner--the amiable piety of Buckminster--could not protect them from being coupled with the scoffer Voltaire, the sophist Hume, and the blasphemous Paine--such was C--g's christian charity. He was also a very zealous politician--singularly, perhaps unbecomingly so, for a clergyman--for his political feelings would break out and flash forth in his sermons, and even in his prayers--and would sometimes be marvelously out of place and keeping in both. Often have I heard him fulminate denunciations from his "drum ecclesiastic" against the "Alliance of Europe's unholy despots"--and I once heard him invoke the Divine vengeance upon the "accursed House of Bourbon"--and frequent and fervent were his petitions to the throne of Grace, that the "bow of the Ottoman might be broken." He was possessed, I believe, of a truly patriotic heart, and animated by a sincere, though not perhaps, a very well regulated desire for the universal emancipation of oppressed humanity. In his appeals for the Divine blessing, he was particularly careful to include by a full enumeration--the various departments of the general and state governments, as well as "all our professional, mercantile, and mechanical interests"--and he would sometimes stop by the way, to pronounce a compliment upon one who stood high in his admiration--and whose worth ought perhaps to have excused the digression of the preacher--our late lamented Clinton.

C--g had a wonderful craving after popularity. To him it seemed the breath of life. Various, and sometimes almost ludicrously ingenious, were the expedients resorted to for the purpose of "filling a house." On one occasion, I recollect--it was at the height of the Greek excitement--he gave out that a sermon would be delivered to the young men of our city; after which a collection would be taken up for the benefit of the Greeks. The ladies were politely apprized, that he anticipated an audience composed inclusively of young men. The attraction was great, and I never saw a finer assemblage of the "rising hopes" of our city, than was gathered into the church in Vandewater street. It was literally overflowing with young men, and among them were not a few, whose visits to any church were "few and far between"--but who had been attracted on the present occasion by the expectation of hearing a stirring oration from so celebrated a speaker, upon the popular subject of the suffering and struggling Greeks. There were about a dozen females present, and they had taken their places in the organ gallery, to assist in the singing. The aisles--the very pulpit stairs were lined with eager listeners. When C--g rose and gave out his text, which was from Proverbs, a growing suspicion of what was coming, became visible in the exchange of significant glances--and smiles of surprise--and indications of being finely caught were perceptible in the countenances of many--as the preacher observed, that some no doubt had come in expectation that the cause of the Greeks would be the theme of that night's discourse--but such had not been his promise. He had given notice that he would deliver a discourse to the young men; and that after it, a collection would be taken up for the benefit of the Greeks. He thought that the present time could not be more profitably spent, than in a serious consideration of those offences against religion and morality, into which, from various causes, the young men of our city were more particularly liable, and inclined to be allured. He told his auditors not to look upon him as a stoical censor, for he was himself a young man, and had a fellow feeling with them. A little incident which took place will give some idea of the man. There was some noise in one of the galleries, owing to the entrance of a number of persons, who did not tread so lightly as they might and ought to have done. C--g stopped--stood for a space of about five minutes, bending a stern staid look at the quarter from whence the noise proceeded--and at length observed--"Since I have commenced this discourse there has been a great deal of unnecessary noise in this house. If there is any more of it--the exercises of the evening are closed, and the congregation dismissed." No more occurred, and he went on with his sermon. As he proceeded to expand his subject, and became broader in his allusions, and more pointed and severe in his animadversions--he fairly done out the few females who had ventured to show their faces over the organ gallery, notwithstanding his previous intimation. Bonnet after bonnet disappeared--and the cleared spot in the gallery was soon filled with a dense mass of the rougher sex. C--g never delivered himself better. The collection was one of the largest ever taken up in any of our churches. On the succeeding Sunday, he informed the young ladies of his congregation, that they had a claim upon him for a sermon addressed particularly to themselves--and he should hasten to discharge the obligation. The time was appointed, and my curiosity was not the less, because the sermon was to be addressed, if not exclusively, at least particularly, to the young ladies. The gentlemen did not display the same forbearance which the young ladies had done--for they composed about a fourth of the congregation--myself among the number. This discourse was much inferior to the other--in fact, it was a string of vapid, common place, and twaddling moralities, which nothing but his admirable manner could have rendered endurable. Among other matters, he talked about dress--novel reading--and playing upon the piano forte. Not that he developed any thing of the cynic or the puritan. By no means--he pronounced the "Scottish Chiefs," to be a work worthy of every young lady's perusal; commended the productions of the "wonderful Byron," (he probably intended to except "Don Juan,") admitted that it was perfectly right and proper for young ladies to finger the piano forte--only he wished that they would design somewhat oftener than they now did--to strike up the good old fashioned devotional tunes of "one hundred" and the "119th psalm"--and as to dress--why he was clearly of opinion, that a female ought to be clothed according to the pecuniary circumstances of her father or her husband--and for his own part, he liked to see "an elegant woman, elegantly attired." It was painful to witness such intellectual decrepitude as was here developed. It seemed to prove that to him the old age of the mind had indeed arrived--that he was already in the lees of life--and that young as he was in years, the mind had exhausted itself, and was in the midst of that rapid decline, which is at times--a fearful effect of the reaction of prolonged excitement. It was painful also, to witness such continued and ineffectual strainings to retain that hold upon popular favour which was daily growing looser and looser, in consequence of his own follies--to use no harsher term. All popularity, we know, is at best unstable--a city clergyman's almost proverbially so. To make it at all his aim, is at variance with his duty; and to let it appear a primary object of pursuit, is justly to produce revolting and disgust. But let me not become too severe in my reflections; nor write a homily upon the clerical character, with poor H--r C--g held up in it as an example to deter. Far be it from my thoughts. My feelings towards his memory are too kind for this. They would prompt me to fold the mantle over his frailties, and to drop a tear, while I did so--rather than to draw them forth to the common gaze or to utter a harsh reproof. If he did transgress--the punishment of his transgression followed. Let that suffice. It is not ours to condemn--for we all have erred. Let us rejoice that it is divine to for give.

The vestry of C--g's church became dissatisfied. There was a quarrel, and a separation. He endeavoured to collect a permanent congregation at Washington Hall; but it did not succeed. Numbers indeed, particularly among the young and the gay, were willing enough to spend some of their Sundays in listening to his oratory, instead of the customary lounge through Broadway, or ride into the country--but the steady going church people--upon whom alone, a clergyman could rely for permanent support--were not inclined to encourage and patronize one, of whose propriety of habits suspicions were entertained, and rumour spoke with her thousand tongues; and who in attempting to preach at all, was acting in disobedience to the decision of the spiritual authority of the church to which he professed to belong. He preached, I think, about three times in Washington Hall. I went once to hear him. It was quite full.

He appeared very much depressed, and suffering both of body and mind had left their visible traces on his countenance. For the first time, I saw him arrayed in the clerical gown. It sat awkwardly upon him--and before he took his place--his wife, a pale interesting woman--rose and adjusted it. He spoke with his usual--no--not with what was wont to be--his usual grace and energy. After the sermon was over and he had resumed his seat he again rose, and with evident agitation of manner, said to the audience--that he was poor--that his salary for the last three months had been denied him, because he could not attend to his pastoral duties during that time in which he had been confined to a bed of sickness--that for himself--and he spoke it with a kindling eye, and a look that betrayed the struggling pride that scorned to solicit--he cared nothing--he was ready to endure all that his enemies might have in store for him--but--he had a wife and children--he stopped abruptly, and sat down--and as he took his seat--I saw that his eyes were filled with tears. My heart bled for him. His worst enemy could not have wished for more, than to behold this manly spirit thus trampled down into the very dust of the earth. One of the gentlemen present went round among the audience, and took up a contribution in his hat. At length I heard, that he had received an invitation from a congregation in Charleston, South Carolina, and had taken his departure for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements previous to acceptance. The next piece of information that I received, was, that he was dead. Before he landed, he was seized with a violent fever; and only arrived, to die in Charleston. He left behind him, many who admired his talents--and some friends who loved him with all his failings, and clung to him to the last. It was his unhappy lot--like too many, and some alas! still more gifted than himself--to wander from the sure and upright path of sober moderation. If he did, at times, submit to the foul thralldom of the fiend, that has bound, and is binding in his chains--so many, even of the mightiest of the sons of men--let us not forget, that there were most melancholy circumstances connected with his earlier life--which need not now be dwelt upon--that were well calculated to result, not merely in temporary insanity--but in a continued tendency to mental alienation. The shock his brain received--when the most horrible of sudden deaths was his, who but a moment before was at his side--and he found himself alone and widowed--that brain might have been lost. The brain is too complex a machine, and we know too little about it--to pronounce a dogmatic judgment--and to say, where eccentricity ends, and where insanity begins. If there be a doubt, let us take the charitable side--if we should err--'twere better to err that way, than the opposite. A man may mingle with his fellow men, and pursue the routine of ordinary cares and duties, so as to escape observation or remark--and yet may not be a perfectly sane man. Some delicate string of the mazy instrument may be shattered--and you have the strange response of monomania. Though no one string has snapped, each string may have been strained beyond its proper tension; and the whole instrument yields to the soul's action, fitful, irregular, discordant music--though not so strikingly varied from the ordinary sounds occasioned by the ordinary others when temporary passion or sudden impulse lends its aid--as to lead us with any certainty to the dire and latent cause. Reason teaches us that such may be--experience--the record of man's frailties, and man's woe, teaches us that such has been the fact--Who shall say that it was not thy case, unhappy C--g? And if it were so, can it be just for those to sit in judgment upon thy errors, and condemn thy life--who never knew thy early history, or those who if they knew it--can know nothing of the possible effects of misfortunes such as thine—upon the young heart and the untathomable mind? * * * * *

But the growing dimness of my lamp warns me of the lateness of the hour, and that it is high time for me to call my thoughts home. Like the oil consuming in that lamp, so passeth my life away. The years of youth are departing; the recollections of youth are waxing fainter, as the cares of manhood thicken upon me. I have endeavoured to catch and to embody some of them before they have faded quite; or before the evil days come, and the years draw nigh, when I shall say "I have no pleasure in them." But I must throw aside my pen, and seek my pillow—to exchange my waking, for slumbering dreams—and both, I am sure, will be of the past—the past!—that can thus—and only thus return to us. Perhaps, gentle reader, before thou hast got thus far with me, thou hast more than once, sighed for thine own pillow? If so—thou wilt need no sleeping potion—and may thank my drowsy lucubrations for saving thee the unwholesome necessity—and now, "good night!" J. B. S.

LINES

Written on seeing a drawing of the "Delaware Water Gap," when far from home.

Stream of my native hills! ye bring
My holiest visions back,
And seem again thy waves to fling
Around my boyhood's track:
Oft, oft in life's young hour I've stood,
The cloud cap hills around me,
And gazed upon thy passing flood,
Till a strange spell hath bound me;
And laid me down beside thy stream,
O'er shadowed by the willow,
Till on my spirit, like a dream
Came the low murmur of the billow,
Once more ye bring me round my home,
And on my listening ear,
The sil'ry times of childhood came,
All joyously and clear.
A gain, along the sunlit hill,
With heedless step I'm bounding,
And by the rock, and flashing rill,
My careless laugh is rounding.
Or far away, my wand'ring feet
Are o'er the meadows flying,
Or where the babbling streamlets meet,
My wearied form is lying.
My home! my home! I see thee now,
The blue hills round thee sweeping,
That o'er thee with a changeless brow,
Their ceaseless watch are keeping:
My home! my home! oh! what a crowd
Of thoughts are o'er me rushing,
And like a torrent deep and loud,
My heart's full fount is gushing.
My dream is past, the vision fled,
And I am hurried back
To weary life, once more to tread
My manhood's cheerless track:
Bright dream! I wish ye had not past
So beautifully before me,
To fade so soon, for ye have cast
A painful sadness o'er me.
My home! where is it now? oh! where
The forms I dearly cherished!
Go ask the winds that wander there,
They'll tell thee, "all have perished,"
Stream of my childhood! life hath past
But sadly, since I threw
My loneliest parting, and my last,
Across thy waters blue.

CLEMENT.

From the Saturday Evening Post. AFRICAN CHARACTER.

Phillis Wheatly, the subject of the following sketch, was brought from Africa in the year 1761 and purchased by John Wheatly, a wealthy merchant of Boston. His wife, wishing to possess a female slave whom she might bring up under her own eye, and thus secure for herself the services of a faithful domestic, visited the slave market for the purpose of purchasing one; passing by many whose healthy appearance would have generally been considered as a recommendation, her choice fell upon one, whose looks denoted anything, rather than a capability of enduring the toils of servitude and the sufferings incident to a change of climate, but whose pleasing and unobtrusive manners, and intelligent countenance, won her sympathy and induced her to become her purchaser. Phillis, who was then about 7 years of age, was of a delicate frame that appeared already sinking under the hardships to which she had been subjected: Shortly after her introduction into the family, Mrs. Lothrop, a daughter of Mrs. Wheatly's, observed her quickness and intelligence and undertook to instruct her in reading and writing, in which she made great proficiency. The avidity with which she seized upon all opportunities for the acquisition of knowledge, attracted the attention of the literati, who furnished her with the works of various authors, which enabled her to pursue with greater success the objects to which her attention was directed: the knowledge which she acquired, by the assistance of the family, acted as a stimulus to a greater exertion; and accordingly we soon find her endeavouring to master the Latin tongue. Her poetical talents were early developed, some of her productions were written when about twelve years of age.

Instead of being suffered to wait upon her mistress, as was at first intended, she was not even allowed to associate with the domestics of the family, but was treated by her mistress as one of her own children: Notwithstanding the kindness of her master's family, and the attention she received from distinguished individuals, she never lost sight of that modest and unassuming deportment, that first attracted the attention of her mistress in the slave market. The following anecdote will serve to show the high estimation in which she held her. Phillis had gone to visit at a friend's in the neighbourhood; during her absence the weather changed, her mistress, fearful of its effects upon her health, ordered Prince, another of her slaves, to take the chaise and bring home her protegee; as he approached the house, Mrs. Wheatly, who was standing near the window exclaimed, "do but look at the saucy varlet—if he hasn't the impudence to sit upon the same seat with my Phillis!" and Prince, received a reprimand for forgetting the dignity attached to the person of "my Phillis."

In 1770 she was joined to Dr. Sewall's church, and became an ornament to the society in which she belonged; three years afterwards a volume of her poems was published, and passed through several editions; and least their authenticity should be doubted, her master, the governor, the lieutenant governor and fifteen other respectable persons, testified "that they verily believed them to have been written by Phillis—that she had been examined by some of the best judges, who thought her qualified to write them," such was the excellency of the poems, and so strong was the prejudice against a colored skin, that many believed it impossible, that one whom God had clothed in a sable livery, should possess talents of so high a character.

In 1773 her physician recommended a sea voyage for her health, which had long been gradually declining; a son of her master being about to make a voyage to England, it was settled that she should accompany him: upon her arrival there, she was presented to Lady Huntingdon, Lord Dartmouth, Mr. Thornton and many other distinguished individuals, by whom she was treated with the greatest respect and attention; a letter from America, informing her of the declining health of her mistress, induced her to hasten her return, although many of her friends wished her to remain until the return of the Count to St. German, that she might be presented to the young monarch, George III. but refusing to listen to their persuasions, she hastened to attend the sick bed of her kind friend and mistress, where she arrived in time to close the eyes of one, who had ever been to her, as a tender and indulgent mother. Mr. Wheatly did not long survive the decease of his wife, and was soon followed by their only daughter; their son, the only survivor of the family, was married and settled in England. Phillis was thus deprived of a home where she had enjoyed the comforts, and even luxuries of life, and of those friends, who had ever been solicitous for her comfort and happiness: perhaps, at almost any other period, those whom she had known when in affluence, would have extended to her their sympathy and aid in adversity; but at that time, individual sufferings were lost sight of, amid the darkness which overhung our political horizon and threatened desolation to our country and saddened every heart.

In 1775, Phillis received, and accepted an offer of marriage, from a grocer of the name of Peters; a man of considerable talent and information, but indolent, improvident and proud. During the war between England and the colonies, she suffered much from neglect and poverty, and to her other sufferings, was added the anxiety of a mother, who saw the distresses of her children without the means of alleviating them—many of her former friends were favourable to the royal party, and obliged on that account to leave the country; the depreciation of the currency added to the general distress, and many who would have been willing to have assisted her, had not where-with to feed their own families. After years of suffering and privation, we find her in a miserable hovel in Boston, two of her children were dead, and the mother, and remaining child, were fast approaching the termination of their earthly career. She, whose acquaintance had been sought by the wise and good of our land—who had visited the shores of England, and been received and treated with honor and respect by Britain's proudest nobles—whose amiable disposition, and feeling heart, had won for her, the love of all who knew her—whose talents, learning and virtue, have done much to redeem from unmerited obloquy the character of her people, and established her own fame upon a sure foundation; was fated to close her existence, in the midst of poverty and wretchedness, of misery and woe.

It may be said that her poems are not above mediocrity; granted. It is not expected that they will compare with the writings of a Hemans, a Sigourney, a Hewitt, or a Gould; nor would the times in which they were written justify such an expectation. The system of female education, miserably defective as it now is, is much superior to what it then was, even in the most enlightened portion of Europe. In the western wilds, in the colonies of America, but few females could boast of any accomplishment, save that of housewifery. There was then, no brilliant exhibition of female talent, to incite her to exertion, surrounded by the darkness of ignorance, and weighed down by the disadvantages of her situation; what could we have looked for? could we have supposed that she would have trod a path, that, comparatively speaking, was unknown; that she would have delighted in literature, and poured forth her soul in the pure and holy language of song? how can this be accounted ed for, unless we allow it to be the inspiration of that genius, which is the gift of God alone.

But as regards the merits of her writings; let each judge for themselves:—for those who cannot gain access to her poems, I have selected the following as a fair sample, I have chosen them, not because I thought them the best, but for their brevity; the first, was written when she was but fourteen years of age.

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty."

"Your subjects hope, dread sire, the crown upon your brow may flourish long,
And that your arm may in your God be strong,
Oh, may your sceptre num'rous nations sway,
And all with love and readiness obey.

But how shall we the British king reward?
Rule thou in peace, our father and our lord!
'Midst the remembrance of thy favours past,
The meanest peasants must admire the last.*
May George, beloved by all the nations round,
Live with heaven's choicest, constant blessings crowned.

Great God! direct and guard him from on high,
And from his head let every evil fly:
And may each clime with equal gladness see
A monarch's smile can set his subjects free.

The following poem written at the age of nineteen, contains some advice which it would be well for us all to remember.

"On being brought from Africa to America."

'Twas mercy brought me from my pagan land,
Taught my benighted soul to understand
That there's a God—that there's a Saviour too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.
Some view our sable race with scornful eye—
"Their color is a diabolic dye,"
Remember christians, negroes black as Cain,
May be refined, and join the angelic train.

The next on Virtue.
O thou bright jewel, in my aim I strive
To comprehend thee. Thine own words declare,
Wisdom is higher than a fool can reach,
I cease to wonder, and no more attempt,
Thine height to explore, or fathom thy profound.
But O my soul, sink not into despair;
Virtue is near thee, and with gentle hand,
Would now embrace thee,—hovers o'er thine head,
Fain would the heaven-born soul with her converse,
Then seek, then court her for the promised bliss,
Auspicious queen, thine heavenly pinions spread,
And lead celestial chastity along,
Lo! now her sacred retinue descends,
Arrayed in glory from the orbs above,
Attend me, Virtue, through my youthful years;
Oh! leave me not to the false joys of time,
But guide my steps to endless life and bliss,
Greatness, or goodness, say what shall I call thee,
To give a higher appellation still;
Teach me a better strain, a noble lay,
O thou, enthroned with cherubs in the realms of day.

The following is an extract from a poem "to the Right Honorable William Earl of Dartmouth.

"Should you, my lord, while you peruse my song,
Wonder from whence my love of Freedom sprung,
Whence flow their wishes for the common good,
By feeling hearts alone best understood,—
I, young in life, by seeming cruel fate
Was snatched from Africa's fancied happy seat:
What pangs excruciating must molest,
What sorrows labor in my parent's breast!
Stealed was that soul and by no misery moved,
That from a father seized a babe beloved:

* The repeal of the stamp act.

Such, such my case. And can I then but pray
Others may never feel 'yrannic sway?"

The next, written somewhat later in life, was addressed to S. P. G.—Esq. and is entitled "A Hymn to Humanity."

Lo! for this dark terrestrial ball
Forsakes his azure paved hall,
A prince of heavenly birth!
Divine humanity behold,
What wonders rise, what charms unfold.

The bosoms of the great and good
With wonder and delight he viewed,
And fixed his empire there:
Him close compressing to his breast,
The sire of Gods and men addressed,
"My son, my heavenly fair!"

"Descend to earth, there place thy throne:
To succour woman's afflicted son,
Each human heart inspire:
To act in bounties unconfined,
Enlarge the close contracted mind,
And fill it with thy fire."

Quick as the word, with swift career,
He wings his course from star to star,
And leaves his bright abode,
The virtue did his charms impart,
Then G—y! then thy raptured heart
Perceived the rushing God:

For then thy pitying eye did see
The languid muse in low degree;
Then, then at thy desire,
Descended the celestial Nine;
O'er me, methought they deigned to shine,
And deigned to string my lyre.

Can Afric's muse forgetful prove?
Or can such friendship fail to move
A tender human heart?
Immortal Friendship laurel-crowned,
The smiling graces all around,
With every heavenly art.

Such are the productions of Phillis Wheatly. If I have quoted too largely from her writing, my only apology is, a desire to show what a negro has written, that we may not suppose them to be destitute of intellect, as our treatment of them would seem to imply.

LOVE.

Who can fully his delicate passion define,
Who that loves can its nature express,
It can soften affliction and pleasure refine,
It can soothe the deep sigh of distress.

In the midst of adversity, sorrow and grief,
When oppressed by misfortune and care;
One look from a loved one brings us instant relief,
Her sweet smiles the disconsolate cheers.

When the cheeks become pale, and the eyes dimly shine,
When suffering affliction severe,
On the bosom we love, oh, how sweet to recline,
While her hand softly wipes the cold tear.

Thou treasure divine, the pure offspring of Heaven,
True source of all comfort and joy,
Without thee all else that to us has been given
Were as worthless and vain as a toy.

From the Saturday Evening Post.

ABU RESCHID.

Almansor the second, Caliph of the Saracens, finding his authority acknowledged, and his government secure, determined to build a capitol city that should combine all possible advantages, both religious and political. For the better success of his undertaking, he determined to ask the advice of some one of his friends, whose knowledge of his dominions would enable them to counsel him to his advantage. Abu Reschid, a particular friend of the Caliph's, was the person applied to, as he possessed a great knowledge of the Caliph's dominions, obtained by travelling over a great share of the Saracens' empire, and his knowledge of geography—his favorite study. He was a man of close observation, and he determined never to seek riches as he had observed that wealth only added to the desires of man, and rendered him less happy. Nay more, he vowed to the Prophet that he would not seek riches, nor accept of wealth, if it should by chance be offered to him. The little patrimony left him by his father, he felt was sufficient to supply all his wants, and by it he determined to obtain his livelihood. Abu in his younger days had spent a season on the banks of the Tigris, and had been delighted with the situation. He thought no spot of Almansor's territory offered so many attractions for the new city as the banks of that river. He accordingly recommended it to the notice of his master, which was approved and the foundation of the new city was begun. The Caliph was so delighted with the situation that he determined to make a present to his friend of princely magnificence; which he did in bestowing on him a residence, a most beautiful one near the new city, and while he lived to rule over the Saracens, was his warmest friend. Abu in an evil hour accepted the gift, forgetting his vow to the Prophet. He took possession of his estate which furnished him all his heart could desire of this world's goods. But while he possessed in abundance, he became an unhappy, a melancholy man. He with sorrow remembered his vow and how madly he had broken it. Evils do not occur singly, and to the sin of unfaithfulness he added that of an inordinate desire for long life. Indeed so far did he carry this desire that he became really a subject of monomania.

In the course of a little more than twenty years from the time Bagdad, the city of peace, was built, its founder died and was succeeded by Haroun Al Raschid, a person very different in his opinions with regard to the ornamental part of a city from that of his predecessor. Almansor sought to embellish his city by every means in his power, and had planted beautiful groves in the neighbourhood of his city, and had encouraged his subjects to add to their possession every thing that would help to increase the good appearance of the city. Groves of graceful cypresses were planted, interspersed with sweet smelling spicewood; while the vine adorned the edges of the forests, and was taught to entwine its graceful folds around the trunks of the lofty trees. Luxury itself could not wish a more pleasant retreat—very different from this were the actions of Haroun Al Raschid. Instead of seeking ornament for his capitol he sought things useful and in carrying his plans out, he often demolished what cost his predecessor infinite pains to erect. He was liberal in his support to literature, and thought ornamental works as beneath his notice. Ever ready to erect academies and halls of learning, he sought by every means in his power to strengthen the defence of his capitol, to procure the firm establishment of his power. For the purpose of carrying on the numerous works of improvement and defence, he had recourse to procure materials from the forests planted by his predecessor and his subjects, which he made use of without scruple.

Through the space of many years had Abu Reschid lived to see the beautiful grove of his own planting bloom in all the richness of an eastern clime; yet was he not happy amidst all of his possessions. Like a canker did the remembrance of his past misdeeds eat upon the peace of his mind. In a temporal point of view he had been blessed even to the desire of a miser. He had married and was blessed with a most dutiful son, the only child he had born unto him. The delight he took in his child could hardly be said to have bounds, and to make known his joy, the anniversary of his birth day was celebrated with much pomp. As he increased in years so far had he given away to the mania of his imagination, that let his engagements be what they would, at a particular hour of the evening he would retire by himself to complain to the prophet of the hard fate of mankind, as all must die, and to sorrow over his own situation. After a year of great prosperity he determined to celebrate the birth of his son with more magnificence than ever, and great was the exertion he made, and many were the guests that attended his feast. All were merry and acknowledged Abu Reschid the happiest man in the Saracen Empire, as he had gained the friendship of two Caliphs, and was reputed the richest man in or near Bagdad. But how often are we deceived by appearances, and how wide from the mark, was the opinion formed of the feelings of Abu Reschid. Notwithstanding all the joy manifested by Abu's guests, and the pleasure of their company, it had not the effect to make him forego his practice of retiring by himself to complain of his fate. Leaving his guests rather abruptly, he went by himself to a part of his groves that surrounded his dwelling, to pour forth his sorrows to the prophet, instead of paying that attention to his guests that they deserved, or of rendering thanks to the father of mercies for the favors he had received in such abundance. More vehement than common at this time, probably so on account of contrasting himself with that of his guests, he exclaimed in the bitterness of his sorrow, "great prophet of the faithful, why lettest thou one of thy followers be thus miserable? far better would it have been for me, had I been one of the kine of the fields, or even of the vegetable kingdom; had grown up one of the trees of this forest, then sorrow would not be on me. Father of the faithful, suffer me no more to be afflicted."

The evening was serene and beautiful. Not a cloud was to be seen in the horizon, and nature seemed to slumber in the calm of repose. The stars, gentle-like, bespangled the broad arch of heaven, while the full orb moon shone forth with a richness that filled one with pleasure to behold. The nightingale had long caroled its song, but hushed its melody at the approach of Abu, as from an evil messenger whose mournful cry spread sorrow and silence on all nature around. As he gave utterance to his sorrowful petition, a rustling was heard among the leaves, and an unearthly form arose before him, and seemed waiting his requests. Apparently after waiting for Abu to make known his desires, the vision spake forth; "son of man what wastest thou of the prophet that thou disturbest him with thy cry. Abu speak forth thy desires that they may be fulfilled, for the prophet is not unkind to his children." At first Abu was fearful, but seeing that the being before him had laid aside all that would overawe, felt his desire for long life return on him with all its former force, and fearful lest the opportunity of speaking face to face to the prophet, as he really supposed the being before him was, he found courage to say, after prefacing it as most persons would, making a foolish request, that the whole nation of Saracens had been faithful to the religion of the Alcoran, and as a great favor he would request that they might be translated to paradise without being subject to the pains of death." How much in keeping is Abu in his request to thousands of others, when desiring any thing, to present the claims of others while themselves are the only ones to receive the favor. "Son," said the vision, "why makest thou so foolish a request. Dost thou not know that death is the bridge over which the faithful pass to paradise, and that it is necessary to die, to be happy hereafter? The prophet died and why should you not also. And did you not say it would have been better for you had you been a tree of the forest than one of the number of mankind. And you thereby complain of the prophet, that he has no care over his children, but being more merciful than to change thee into a tree as you think it would have been better, had it so been, and as you think the forest less apt to die than mankind, choose ye among this grove some stately tree, which shall be as a talisman over your life, and so long as it lives thou livest, but if it die thou diest also. And thou must not relate the conditions of this interview." Abu at the prospect of long life forgot before whom he was and somewhat surprised at the clemency exercised towards himself, accepted the offer, thereby opposing his wisdom to that of a far superior being. He selected for his talisman a thrifty member of the grove. He flattered himself that death could not assail him till some far distant day and long was the time he pictured to himself for happiness.

Just as his absence was being noticed as a neglect to his guests, he returned with a flow of convivial spirits, to which he long before had been a stranger, to which the company acknowledged an immediate influence. Great was the wonderment at the alteration in Abu, and what could be the cause no one trusted his judgment so far as to form an opinion. Before, he wore the appearance of a moody philosopher, or a religious ascetic, but he was now all hilarity, and had advanced farther in the path of happiness than he ever had before. The eastern horizon acknowledged the approach of fair aurora, ere the guests had taken their departure for their homes, so great had been the enchanting influence of the entertainment.

Abu retired to rest, full of joy for the prospect before him, but the succeeding day had not passed away, ere he had revealed to his wife the conditions on which his life was granted to him, for a long while, as he conceived it, thereby violating the command of the being of his night's vision.

The singular success which had attended the Mahometan arms had excited the fears of the barbarous nations which inhabited the Tartar country, and they thought themselves insecure, and liable to become the subjects of another nation, unless they opposed them with vigor. Their alarm was still greater as the new enemy had taken possession of all territories conquered, and appropriated them to their own subjects. Thus fearful of their rights they had made all possible preparations for a vigorous attack on their common enemy. Haroun Ab Raschid was of that cautious kind that would suffer nothing to remain weak that might by possibility be subject to the attack of an enemy, and determined to render the fortifications of Bagdad as complete as possible. Each day increased the alarm of the Saracens, as there was the appearance of many of the neighboring nations entering into an alliance, to make war on them.

The Caliph made every exertion possible to finish the works of defence, and being in want of materials for the wood work, he gave orders to his workmen to obtain it wherever they could, as their situation would not allow a moment's delay. The fine groves of Abu Reschid offered them all they could desire, and the workmen commenced hewing them down with despatch. Abu well knew the situation of the Saracen Empire but never supposed that his own forest was to fall by the hands of the axeman. His surprise can only be imagined, not described, when he saw the public workmen filling the groves he had taken so much pains to rear. He expostulated with the workmen, but to no purpose, as the orders of the Caliph were positive. His actions appeared rather the ravings of a madman than that of a reasonable being. One resource only seemed left him, and that was to fly to the presence of the Caliph and get an order to prohibit the workmen from cutting down his groves.—This plan he put into immediate execution and pursued his course to the residence of Ab Raschid and rushed into his presence with all the wildness of a maniac. But ere he reached the dwelling of the Caliph, his talismanic tree had been attacked by the workmen, and just as he was about to speak to the Caliph he fell dead at his feet—a monument of the folly of the desire for long life. FIAL.

AN ALLEGORY.

The fondness of the Orientals for allegory is well known. One of the most curious instances of it is found in an Arabian poet, who narrates a suit which was pleaded on both sides and judged under an allegorical veil, and which seemed an enigma to those who were not in the secret. The following account of it is abridged from the "Mélanges de Littérature Orientale" of M. de Cardonne.

A Sultan, beholding a beautiful woman from his terrace, fell violently in love with her. Wishing to inform her himself of the sentiments with which she had inspired him, he imposed upon her husband, Feiroux, a commission to be executed immediately. As soon as he was gone, the Sultan found means to penetrate to the apartment of the beautiful Chemsennissa (a name signifying the sun of women). The lady seeing him enter, and divining his intentions, said to him: "The lion would deem himself degraded by eating the leavings of the wolf; and this king of animals disdains to stake his thirst in the stream which the dog defiles with his impure mouth." The Sultan comprehending that he had nothing to hope, retired in such confusion as to forget one of his slippers.

Feiroux had set off with such haste, that he had omitted to take with him the order written by the Sultan; and returning to get it a moment after the latter had departed, perceived his slipper. His jealousy was excited to the highest pitch; but he dissembled it through fear of the Sultan, and resolved to repudiate Chemsennissa. He induced her, accordingly, under a plausible pretext, to go and pass some days with her father, and gave her a hundred pieces of gold. She obeyed; but sometime having elapsed without the appearance of Feiroux, she became alarmed, and communicated her fears to her brothers. They repaired together to the Vizier, to learn the reason of his absence. He replied, without entering into any explanations, that the dower which had been agreed upon having been paid to Chemsennissa, there were no further questions to be asked. The case was then brought before the tribunal of justice.

The Sultan was in the habit of being present at trials, in order to restrain the Cadis. The brothers of Chemsennissa spoke thus:—"My lord, we leased to Feiroux a delicious garden, a terrestrial paradise; we consigned it to him, surrounded by lofty walls and filled with the finest trees, adorned with flowers and loaded with fruit. He now wishes to give us back this garden, deprived of every thing that rendered it delicious when he received it from us."

The Cadi having commanded Feiroux to assign his reasons, he said—"It is unwillingly that I renounce the enjoyment of this spot, which was dear to me; but one day, whilst walking in one of its paths, I perceived the traces of a lion; fear seized upon my soul, and I preferred abandoning the garden to that terrible animal, to exposing myself to his rage."

The Sultan, who easily understood the enigma, anticipating the Cadi, said to Feiroux—"Return into thy garden, Feiroux; thou hast nothing to fear. It is true that the lion has placed his foot in it, but he has touched none of the fruit; and he left it, overcome with shame and confusion; there never was a more beautiful garden, nor one, at the same time, better guarded and secure from danger."

Feiroux took back Chemsennissa, and loved her still more ardently when he discovered the difficult trial to which her virtues had been exposed without succumbing.

IMAGINATION OF WOMEN.

From the Poetry of Life.

The imagination of women may be compared to a quick growing plant, which shoots out so many tender twigs and tendrils, that the main stem is weakened, and the whole plant, unable to raise itself from the earth, continues to bud and blossom, and send forth innumerable shoots which altogether form a beautiful group of flowers and verdure, but nothing more; while the imagination of man resembles a stately tree, whose firm and continuous stem, exactly proportioned to the support and nourishment of the numerous branches in their subordinate place, completes the majesty, the utility, and the beauty of the whole. The imagination of woman is sufficiently vivid and exuberant to take in the widest range of poetical sublimity, but unfortunately it meets with so many interruptions in that range, and deviates so often from its proper object to waste itself upon others of minor importance, that it seldom attains any laudable end, or accomplishes any lasting purpose.

It is impossible for those who have merely studied the nature of woman's mind, to comprehend the rapidity of her thoughts, and the versatility of her feelings. Touch but one sensitive chord, and her imagination takes flight upon the wings of the butterfly over the garden of earth, up into the mid air, beyond the lark, the sweetest intelligencer of sublunary joy, higher, still higher, through illimitable space, ascending the regions of peace and glory, and passing through the everlasting gates into the communion of saints, and blessed spirits whose feet "sandalled with immortality," trace the green margin of the river of eternal life.

Would that the imagination of woman had always this upward tendency, but alas! it is not satisfied even with the fruition of happiness; it cannot rest even in the bosom of the repose; it is not sufficiently refreshed, even by that stream whose waters make glad the celestial city. The light of some loved countenance perchance is wanting there, and the spirit, late soaring on delighted wing, plunges downwards amongst the grosser elements of earth, while lured by the irresistible power of sympathy, it chooses rather to follow the erring or the lost through all the mazy windings of sin and sorrow, than to rise companionless to glory.

With such an imagination, startled, excited, and diverted from its object, not only by every sight or sound in earth or air, but by every impulse of the affections and the will, it is impossible that woman, in her intellectual attainments should ever equal man; nor is it necessary for her usefulness, her happiness, or the perfection of her character, that she should. As she is circumstanced in the world, it is one of her greatest charms, that she is willing to trust, rather than anxious to investigate. While she does this she will be feminine, and while she is feminine she must be poetical.

A man may see his own faults in those of others.

SKETCHES ON IRISH HIGHWAYS.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

OLD GRANNY.

"Whist! Maurice, whist!—and don't gainsay her. What she thinks, you know, is as good as a law with us all;—and that's enough about it—"

"A law is it, Anty?" repeated Maurice. "It may be a law to you, if you choose to make a fool of yourself, but it will be no law to me."

"For God's sake Maurice, exclaimed the girl, "don't go on so; you know she's charmed."

"Charmed!" he again repeated, in the true Irish fashion;—"Charmed!—ay, as much as the black slug that lives on and lies in the dew. As much as the frog that croaks in the meadows; as much, Anty, as the raven which I could bring down with your brother Luke's ash-bow!"

"But, any way, it's only waiting till after Holly-eve, and that's not long. All she says is, wait till after that;—and indeed, Maurice—indeed, I cannot gainsay her."

"And you—you, Anty Doynne, tell me;—you! after our keeping company for nearly two years;—you say that, because your croaking old GRANNY says we must not marry until Holly-eve is past, though you were promise-bound to me before then if things answered—you say, that because she takes the whim in her head, you'll be off!"

"No, Maurice—no," replied the girl; "I swear to the Virgin, in the beams of this blessed moon which is now shining on both our heads, that in death, or—oh, Maurice—even in disgrace, I would be your wife, or go as I am to my green grave,—but to wait a little while—only a little while—to do her bidding—surely it's no great thing for her to expect? And she that has been more than a mother to me ever since I lost my own."

"Suppose she was to forbid it out-and-out?"

"She would not do that."

"Why?"

"Because her word is given, that when once Holly-eve is passed, she will bless—not ban."

"I tell you what, Anty;—take me now—or give me up, up intirely. I'm too proud to wait on the bidding of an old woman, whatever I might do on the bidding of a young one."

"If it comes to that, Maurice, perhaps you'd rather it was so; and I'm certain that I never mean to keep any boy to his promise if his mind is against it," Anty Doynne drew herself up to more than her usual height, though her heart beat, and her cheek crimson from agitation.

"Anty, it seems mighty easy with you!"

"Maurice, it was you spoke of it first; and that man's not breathing who should speak twice to me of such a thing. I'm ready," she continued,—"quite ready to return your token, and break all off."

While she spoke, she tugged hard to draw a ring from her rosy finger, and at last having accomplished her intention, she held the simple gage d'amour towards her lover.

"Why don't you take it, Mister Maurice—it will fit Jane Lemon, or Kate Leslie, or any other girl, as well as me;—and if I had known your mind before, I'd have burnt it—drowned it—trampled on it—sooner than have suffered myself to wear it an hour—a single minute. Why don't you take the ring, Maurice?"

Anty Doynne had talked herself into a passion; and, truth to say, there is no young lady who would not have felt hurt at the insinuation which her lover's speech conveyed. Angry though she certainly was, Maurice thought he had never seen her look so lovely as she did at that instant; her calm and gentle nature was seldom roused to anything like wrath, and it lent an animation to her placid features which improved their expression for the time being. Maurice, like all young men—particularly young Irish men—and a vast opinion of his own powers of fascination, and though he loved Anty with all the impetuosity of youthful passion, he loved to exercise a power which many consider purely feminine—the power of tormenting. He knew she doated on her grandmother, who was the Sibyl of the neighborhood, and, to confess the truth, he was not a little jealous of the influence she possessed over the mind of his betrothed.

"And so—that's the end of your love, Anty, that you'd give me up for your grandmother?"

And while he spoke he could not avoid smiling at the absurdity of his inquiry. Anty saw the smile upon his lip, and it angered her the more. She felt that she could not give utterance to her feelings, and, with singular prudence, she remained silent, still holding the ring towards him.

"And you want to turn me over to Jane Lemon?—who's on the world since holly is green; or to Kate Leslie, whose eyes were set wrong in her head?—I'm obliged to you, Anty!"

"Take the ring, Maurice!" she exclaimed again.

"Why, then—maybe I will—but if I do, it's only to give it back to you, Anty; for when I put that ring on your finger I kissed you for the first—but, please God, not for the last time."

"If you don't take it," said Anty, rejoicing in her strength, which returned with her lover's last words, "If you don't take it, I'll drop it into the very middle of the fairy ring in the next field, and then none but the true-hearted will have power to pick it up."

"You'll do no such thing!" exclaimed a voice from the hollow of a blasted elm, the fragments of whose branches had overshadowed their meetings on more occasions than one. "Bright gold is not to be thrown as a temptation on fairy ground. Give me the ring, and let both of you remember that a troth present or a troth plight is not to be cast away like the feather from a wild bird's wing."

The person who thus spoke was a worn shrivelled woman, thin and erect, whose figure at an earlier period of life must have been imposing, for even at the advanced age of seventy-six she carried herself with a dignity that made all the children in the neighbourhood look on "Old Granny" with respect. Her character was in keeping with her carriage, and her carriage with her character; the one was exactly suited to the other, and in neither would the least change have been an advantage.

Margaret Doynne (for even in Ireland, where they delight in nicknames, and pet names, and all names except the right one, the dame-like courtly name of Margaret had never been reduced to the diminutive of Peggy or Peg), Margaret Doynne was, as I have already said, the Sibyl of the neighbourhood; but she was still more—poor herself, she was nevertheless the benefactress of the very poor. Often she used to say, when consulted by the peasants, "Ah then! sure I have nothing to give but the wind word!" But the "kind word" is much, when bestowed in due season; and it would be difficult to determine whether, amongst the simple people who resided in her neighbourhood, she was most valued for her wisdom or good-nature. In England, she would have been esteemed a "worthy dame." In Ireland, the superstitious feelings of the people magnified her into something more. She certainly did meddle with charms and philters—saw fate and fortunes in the stormy grounds of a tea-cup—and interpreted dreams—in a manner which none but those well acquainted with the circumstances, hopes, and fears of the dreamers could interpret. I believe that when her intellect was in its full strength and power, she laughed at those who relied upon her promises and prophecies; but latterly she believed in them herself—her kindness outlived her wisdom, and it was observed that as Old Granny grew older, she grew more mysterious, and more celebrated as a soothsayer. She had been brought up by a family of distinction, and the good-breeding acquired by coming (during her early days) constantly in contact with her superiors, gave her manner and conversation a tone infinitely above her associates, or rather, I should say, her neighbours, for the only person she was intimate with was her grandchild. Anty Doyné's mother died while giving her birth, and her father was drowned at sea a few weeks after; thus the helpless infant was thrown completely on the benevolence and care of "Old Granny," who soon prided herself on the beauty, ay, and the cleverness of her darling.

The old and young are always more attracted than the young and middle-aged, and I doubt if Anty could have bestowed half the devotion on her mother which she offered spontaneously to her venerable grandame.

Maurice had never been inclined to pay the respect to her behests which were the willing tributes of Anty's heart, though in her presence he had seldom the courage to assert even a difference of opinion: he saw "Old Granny" drop the ring into the recesses of her black satin thread-case, and could not bring himself to remonstrate until the old lady was about to deposit it—treasures and all—in her capacious pocket.

"It wasn't hers, Granny, to throw away," he murmured at last, "and it's too bad to be thwarted by both."

"Ay," she said, "by a croaking old woman, Mister Maurice?"

Well, Granny," he exclaimed, "listeners never hear good of themselves—not that I mean that to you."

"Nor you didn't compare me to a black slug—nor a frog—nor a raven—eh, Maurice?"

"I do not want nor wish to deny my words, Granny," he replied sulkily; "but you well know how Anty and I have been long promised to each other."

"Ay, Maurice, I do, I do; and I know that when we want to use the wisdom of the wife we honour it, if—mind my words young man—if it agrees with our own; but if it does not, we throw it to the dogs, and curse the lips that spoke it. You think it long to wait till Holly-eve, and you think that after that you will have nothing left to wish for. Hope often digs its own grave with the spade of indiscretion; but I tell you, I would rather dig her grave than see her your wife before then. The first week in November will bring you, Maurice Grey, either a cross or a crown, and though she will have my leave and blessing to share the one, I pray God that my darling may not die by the other."

"Die!" exclaimed both young people at once.

"Ay, death will come sooner than you look for, any of you: the thunder growls in the heavens—it gathers before it breaks—and those who are warned should beware the bolt."

"Oh Granny, don't be fostering the trouble on us before our time," exclaimed Maurice, endeavouring to shake off the terror her words inspired, "sure we'll bear sorrows together, and two can support it better than one."

"It's thoughts like them that send many a one to the priest's knee before their time," replied the old woman; "but wait till the day I have said is past, and when temptation is strongest on you, Maurice, think of Anty Doyné and Holly-eve!"

She placed her staff firmly on the earth, and was proceeding on her way towards the cottage, when Maurice called out, "The ring, Granny, give her the ring, any how; do not keep it from her."

"Ah, ah!" she said; "love Maurice, was never bound by gold—you shall give it her when Holly-eve is past."

Old Granny's dwelling was swept and garnished with no ordinary care on the night of the festival to which she had so earnestly alluded. During the time that intervened between the commencement of my sketch, and of the period I now arrive at, Maurice and Anty had been together even more than usual. Old Granny, latterly, spent a good many hours of each day in wandering along the wild sea-shore near to which her dwelling was situated. I believe I had forgotten to mention that Maurice's trade was that of a ship-carpenter; he was considered exceedingly intelligent, and (for an Irishman) a quick workman. Granny farmed about seven acres of land—she held the farm for a nominal rent; and, thrifty as well as wise, Anty was regarded by her companions as an heiress of no small pretensions. She took much pleasure in adorning their clay-floored sitting-room, and the young people of the neighbourhood always thought their annual spells worked better in Old Granny's cottage than in any residence for ten miles round. The wind howled without—the rain poured—but "the boys and girls" within heeded neither. "The crackling faggot" blazed upon the hearth—the piper blew his most discordant, and yet animating music—crossed sticks, an apple upon one end, and a candle on the other, were suspended from the ceiling, and whirled round and round—while many a wide mouth extended its dimensions to "snap" the fleeting apple, and, instead of the expected prize, caught the moving light to the manifest amusement of the throng. Others were engaged in pouring boiling lead through the handle of a key into cold water, and reading their destinies in its various forms. Some bent anxiously over the hearth to note which nuts jumped, and which remained stationary with their partner.

"Jane Cahil! look at Jane Cahil's sweetheart," exclaimed one, "he's burnt as black as a crow by her side; there, that nut in the corner—what a study!" pair! well, there is no fun in such studyness, and that's my objection to matrimony." "Look, look at Mary Flynn! well, she bates Banagher, and how, at cover the buckle—there's a fling, that's the fifth boy she's done over to-night at the dance."

"Anty Doyné, look at your little cater-cousin Mary, stealing in with a bundle of ivy leaves—'deed and 'deed I think she had better leave the ivy leaves alone, for they're too true for a joke. I never found them wrong in telling a death—God save us!" and the speaker crossed herself devoutly, for the trial by ivy is regarded in some parts of Ireland as a fearful spell.

"July James has her apron full of hemp-seed," shouted a boy, whose merry laugh had frequently resounded through the chamber. "Now tell the truth, July: how often have you sown that in the lone churchyard during your lifetime?"

"Hemp-seed, hemp-seed here I sow, He that is my true love, come after me and mow."

Ah, July, my darling, you've been sowing hemp-seed these thirty years, and sorra a mowar ever tended your heels yet!"

While the laugh, the sport, and the jest were banished about with careless and noisy hilarity by the young and the thoughtless, the table at the further end of the room, covered as it was by pipes, tobacco, snuff, bottles of whiskey, glasses, and wooden noggins, was surrounded by the elders of the people, loud and energetic in their politics as need be. One read passages from a "liberal" paper, and then all talked together as to the import. As the night waxed old, their energy increased, and their reason declined. They contradicted—quarrelled—then embraced—then contradicted, and quarrelled again. The dancers and fortune-seekers, however, were in no degree disturbed by the tumult, but pursued their sports unheeding, and unheeded by the politicians of the table.

"Meg Turner has just picked up such a beautiful cannon out of the water. Meg, as sure as Cashel is built on a rock, you'll have a soldier," exclaimed a sly-looking rural wag, whose bright eyes danced with mischief.

"Me a soldier!" replied Meg, who, if Anty was the heiress, was considered the beauty of the country.—(By the way, the Irish peasantry estimate the beauty of woman somewhat as they do that of their pigs—by their size. I hear them constantly say, "God bless her! she's a fine woman—a big woman!" It's she that has the good, wholesome flesh on her bones! Thirteen stone won't excuse her! Kind for her! Sure, all her people* were fine portly men and women—none of your poor starved creatures; but every one of them big and white, like the rale gentry.")

To return to Meg. She twisted her pretty nose in great wrath, and repeated—"Me marry a soldier, indeed! I did not think you'd even the likes of that to me. Take up with a soldier!"

"Why thin, Meg," observed a neighbour, whose son was a soldier, "you're like a tall tree beat down by a storm—more high than wise. Sure the young lady at the Hook is married to a soldier."

"I wonder at your ignorance," replied Meg, "to say my lady above there is married to a soldier. A soldier, indeed!—a major, if you please, Ma'am. No, not he; he's a born gentleman. A soldier! I can't but wonder at your ignorance!"

Those who knew better than Meg laughed loudly; and at last, half crying, she snatched the cannon from those who were examining it, and declaring that it was "a purse of gold," and not an emblem of destruction, called loudly for "Old Granny" to decide in her favour.

The old woman had been for some time employed in an inner room, tossing cups and casting natives, after a fashion of her own; but now she was no where to be found,—it was in vain they sought her—she was not in the house. Why was it also that Anty—Anty, the heroine of the evening, "the pride of the country,"—"The Lilly of Bally Moyle,"—names given her by the respect and affection which her modest and gentle loveliness excited,—why was it that Anty Doyné had not joined in a reel or a jig for nearly an hour? During the early part of the evening she had danced with her lover; and it was observed by more than one that never had either appeared so happy. Their probation was nearly over; she had even ventured to return, in the least possible degree, the ardent pressure of his hand. Poor Anty!—what a blessed thing it is for friends, as well as lovers, that the Almighty has closed the gates of futurity to them and to us all!

"Anty won't dance any more to-night, because Maurice is not here," whispered one girl to another; and then came the enquiry—"Where is Maurice?"—This question no one appeared able to reply to;—Maurice could not be found—had not been seen; but, yes—the piper said, that while Maurice was in the act of desiring him to strike up "The Boys of Linn," he heard a voice distinctly call him; and he affirmed that the voice came from without. Nobody, however, believed the piper, who was known to have been half tipsy during three successive days, a fact easy accounted for, as he had attended there "berrins," from which, unhappily, no piper, and not a great many Irishmen, returned sober. By degrees the news that neither Old Granny nor Maurice could be found spread amongst the assembly; and though at first the people jested upon their disappearance, told Anty that her grandmother had run off with her lover, and that they should all expect to be asked to the wedding and indulged in various rural witticisms, still, as the hours drew towards midnight, they became alarmed at their absence. One declared that Old Granny had been seen more than once looking from the window towards the ocean, as if she expected the arrival or passing of a vessel. The politicians either slept soundly under the table, or staggered towards their homes; the piper pillowed his head upon his pipes, and "made strange music" of another kind; but the young companions of Anty Doyné, both men and maids, resolved to remain with her till morning, and then scour the country in search of the fugitives. One or two old greyheaded fathers, who had not drunk freely, remained also, and before the hour of one chimed from the clock of the neighbouring hall, every out house and haggard was examined in vain. Anty's cheek had grown deadly white, and her lips quivered. As time passed, her companions endeavoured to divert her attention, and dispel her anxiety: and she would listen to them and smile,—and then, more quickly than my words are written, relapse into herself, while the convulsive twitches of her features, and the incessant motion of her fingers, showed how much she suffered.

"Keep up your spirits, my lily," said one venerable man; "sure there's no accounting for Old Granny's doings—maybe she's off to gather flowers, or herbs, at the charmed hours. Who ever thought of minding her?"

"But Maurice—Maurice?" murmured poor Anty, her feelings forcing her to acknowledge an interest which at any other time her maiden modesty would have compelled her to dissemble.

"Maybe she's taken him for a safeguard," continued the comforter; "there's sometimes wild doings along the coast, and she might not like to go as a lone woman down the glen where the rag-wort, ground ivy, and more whose names I forget grow most plenty."

"Who ever thought of harming Granny?" replied the maiden. Those who never honoured God nor feared Satan have bought her charms as a safety, and she might walk through sin and murder without suffering;—who ever thought of harming Granny?"

She had hardly finished her sentence, when the house-dog barked, and steps sounded from without. Several ran to the door, but Anty's feelings so overcame her, that she hung to the dresser, unable to move or speak; in an instant a mingled crowd of the water-guard and soldiers belonging to a detachment quartered at a neighbouring fort filled the cottage, and those who entered last bore upon a rude bier formed by their crossed arms the murdered body of "Old Granny." As they placed her remains upon the very table which her hospitable hands had spread but a few hours before for the entertainment of her friends, there was a dead silence,—the awful silence of extreme horror;—those who had remained with Anty appeared paralyzed. One of the soldiers rolled a cloth to support the white head whose hairs were clogged with gore, which had ceased to flow; and the sight of the trickling blood recalled Anty to her senses, while it told her of the extent and reality of her bereavement; her scream—loud, shrill, and terrible—started every creature within hearing; it was so wild and so prolonged. She threw herself upon the body, where she lay, as inanimate and as unconscious as the clay she pressed. Then came the questions, brief but earnest,—the who?—the when?—the where?—Who did the murder? The soldiers and water-guards separated so as to show a group of bound and fettered men whom they had thrust into a corner—the foremost of them was MAURICE GREY!

"Now the great God of heaven guard us!" exclaimed one of Anty's aged friends, advancing towards him. "It is an awful night, and an awful time,—and there is many a charm and many a change over the earth which poor mortals can't understand; but if you be Maurice Grey,—the Maurice Grey whom I nursed many a winter's night upon my knee, and whom that murdered crathur loved next in the girl now stiffening by her side,—speak, and say you had no hand in this!"

With a sudden and mighty effort the young man burst assunder the ropes with which his hands were tied, and before the guards could impede his progress, he threw himself upon his knees besides the body; flinging his arms upwards, he clenched his hands together; and the voice in which he spoke, though at first hoarse and thick, was perfectly audible; not a word was lost:

"May the God who hears me rain down his eternal curses on my head if I alter, or change, one word of his holy truth this night? but you, Anty,—Anty, darlint! you must hear me, too. Waken, Anty! my heart's jewel! my heart's blood, waken!—as you hope to see heaven!" he exclaimed, as a soldier endeavoured to prevent his lifting the senseless girl from the corpse to his bosom.—"as you hope to see heaven, neither touch her, nor hinder me." Having placed her drooping head upon his shoulder, he remained kneeling, and again lifted up his arms to heaven.

It was an appalling picture; the dark figures crowded together in the back-ground, their rough countenances only partially seen, as the candles, which a little time before illuminated the apartment, were either extinguished or burning in their sockets; the fire cast a bright, but unnatural glare upon the murdered body; and a little black dog, "Old Granny's" favourite and friend, after smelling the blood, and stretched himself upon the bosom of the corpse, and whined his misery, while such was the glare, yet uncertainty of the light, that he looked like a misshapen object from the dark world of spirits. Maurice kneeling, pale as Agony, supporting his bethrothed with his left arm, while his right still stretched toward heaven, was so placed that every movement of his features could be observed by those who were in partial darkness. "You hear me Anty, now." She opened and fixed her eyes upon him; and he continued.—"You remember that she would not consent to our marriage till after this night had passed: and though I did not to say know, I guessed, her reason after. She knew that this very week the return of a vessel to this shore was expected, with the crew of whom (I'll not deny it before God or man this blessed night) of whom I knew too much,—though God, he hears me and can judge,—that, beyond smuggling, I never thought harm was in 'em;—never, until this night.—Any how, the shadow and the foreknowledge was over her, for she told me the first week in November would bring either a cross or a crown, and to beware the bolt,—the thunderbolt! Oh! little, little did I think it would fall upon herself;—and all for me,—all for me!"

"Hear 'till him! hear 'till him!" exclaimed a rufianly voice from amid the group of prisoners as the young man paused from emotion; "the white-livered rascal thinks to get us in for a job of his own doing."

Maurice heeded not the words, but continued, "I got the news that Blue Morgan and the Petrel would be off shore this holy night, and that I would be wanted abroad, on account that some ship job was going on which they could not compass without me. I thought the goold healtways gave without the counting would furnish a better wedding than the country had seen for many and many a day; but I did not think that evil goold brings an evil curse. The Granny got the wind of the word as soon, and maybe sooner, for anything I know, than I did, and just as I finished the first hand-o'-three reel I danced, whispered, 'Think of Anty Doyne and Holly-eve.' Well, the Devil was in me, I am sure of that, for somehow I fired at the thought of her making and meddling so often about us, and if my mind could have had vent in a sharp answer, it would have past away until, Anty, love, I danced again with you; and who ever thought of sin while looking in your face?"

"Still my heart was for not going to the beach, and I forgot the Granny and everything in the world, except that Holly-eve was passing, until Tom Morgan came outside to hurry me off, and promised me goold and the drink I had got, and the thought of the goold that I was throwing away—(and why? for all they wanted of me belike was a hand at my own trade)—came over me, and—I—went."

"In a cave, close, close under the Otter's Glimb, I found such of the crew of the Petrel as had not been murdered by their comrades—"

A shudder passed through the crowd, which had increased both inside and outside the cottage, as the day was now dawning; and the smugglers, with dreadful oaths and execrations, denied the inference, declaring that Maurice having murdered Old Margaret Doyne himself, wished to heap a multitude of crimes upon their heads. No words can give an adequate idea of the interest—the breathless anxiety felt by every one present. The ruffians were soon silenced, and Maurice proceeded with his story. "As near as I can judge, it might be about nine o'clock when I got to the cave, and found it as good as filled with heaps of sea-store and chests of dollars.—Tom Morgan and four more burying the treasure. The waves were washing up just to the mouth of the cave, and I heard that what they wanted of me was to make the boat they had got ashore in sea-worthy, as they intended putting out in the teeth of the wind, and returning by times for the treasure. I asked Tom for his brother, Blue Morgan, and he made answer that the Petrel had drifted, and was half-wrecked, and that the Captain set off to cross the country with three more, just as I arrived. It was an awful night, for as he spoke, and I at the boat, a wave dashed the poor man's mangled body to our feet. It was then I felt that they who are ever enticed into bad company, either from the love of pleasure or the love of goold, knocked at sin's door; and when did sin fail to answer? God keep me my senses, for they are a'most gone!" Again during the pause, compelled by agitation, the murderers cursed and swore, and the interest increased tenfold.

"Tom Morgan put a pistol to my head, and with a bag of dollars in the other hand, threatened and tempted me at the same time. I might have been terrified into swearing the silence he commanded, (for he saw my eyes were opened,) and thus have become either a perjured man, or the murderer's slave—a villain or a victim—but Anty, your blessed grandmother had tracked my ways, through the dark night, down the steep cliffs—ay, not regarding age or weakness. Through the waves which were racing up the cave, I saw her like a spirit rising from the sea—and blessed be God, there was still time for me to mind the warning, as she cried, and I heard, though the wind was howling—'Remember Anty and Holly-eve!'"

"They were, I may say, her last words, for before I could snatch the pistol from his hand, I heard the corpse splash amid the water,—and when I plunged after and caught her in my arms, she only said—'The bolt has fallen—but—I heard no more, except Anty's name which she called on twice.'—He covered his face, and pressed the almost insensible girl still more closely to his bosom.—The serjeant who

SKETCHES OF THE WESTERN BAR.

No. 6.

Biographical Sketch of the Hon. John Tod of Pennsylvania.

The subject of this brief sketch furnishes an instance, among many others, of the success which talent and industry, unaided by any adventitious means whatever, has ensured to many of the adventurous and enterprising sons of New England, when leaving their homes to prosecute their fortunes, if not amid fairer scenes or beneath brighter skies, yet with advantages, or supposed advantages, for the acquisition of fortune, professional honors and political distinction, too tempting, in the case of many, not to be embraced, even at the sacrifice of local attachments, the pleasures of home, the fraternity and fellowship of friends and kindred.

John Tod, was the son of David and Rachael Tod, and was born in Suffield, Hartford county, Connecticut, in November 1779. His father was a Scotchman by birth, and a man of a very original turn of mind, possessing much shrewdness, and a dry kind of wit, many of his sayings being even to this day, familiarly repeated by the people of the neighbourhood. His mother was a Miss Kent, a native of the town of Suffield.

John commenced his education at one of the public schools in the village, but subsequently became a pupil of the Reverend Mr. Gray, pastor of the Presbyterian church of the town. His aptness for learning, his genius and industry, enabled him to make rapid progress in his classical studies; so much so, that on his examination for admission to Yale College, he was permitted to enter an advanced class, (I think the junior class) and took his degrees two years afterwards with great credit and honor to himself. The fondness imbibed at this noble and venerable institution, the Alma mater of so many of the great men and ripe scholars that have been raised to the country, was never subsequently relinquished or even diminished; his attachment to his classics, his Greek and Latin authors which he read with ease and facility, continuing through life.

I am indebted for the following early incident in his life to his accomplished sister, to whom I must also make acknowledgments, for much of the data on which the private history of the subject of this sketch is founded.

I may here premise, that in his early adventure, may be seen much of that spirit, that distinguished him in after life. The energy of character, and enthusiasm of feeling, both of which he possessed in a high degree, always exhibited themselves in acts, rather than words—rather in some definite result which he would propose to himself, and immediately engage with his whole soul to accomplish, than in any more formal or less demonstrative expression of his zeal and ardour. He had a still, quiet way of pushing directly to the point, of running strait for the goal, and which he would have half way attained before others had gone through the preparation for a start. The following anecdote therefore, though related of him at the early age of eleven years, is strikingly illustrative of what was discernable in his character in after life; especially of the simple and unpretending manner, in which he would set about the most important matters, and the energy and indomitable spirit with which he would follow them up to their issue.

The extract proceeds. "During the French revolution (the early part of it) when every American bosom beat with ardour for the cause of the people, John Tod, then about eleven years of age was missing from his father's house on a Monday morning; he could not be found; no one had seen him; as he did not appear

"We had notice, after much watching, that the Petrel was expected to be off the shore, and were night and day on the look-out. We little thought the crime committed by a portion of the crew—it was the report of Tom Morgan's pistol that directed us to the spot—and though we have every reason to believe the truth of Maurice Grey's story, still he might go with us until it is legally confirmed."

"My poor boy!" said the venerable man, who had called upon him the first for an explanation;—"My poor boy!—God, in his mercy, grant you may not be like the pigeon who fed with the crows.—'tis ill to be seen with public sinners."

Maurice knelt and prayed by the murdered body of the aged woman, who, though she had seen his faults, and desired that her grand-child should wear, as she poetically called it,—the crown but not the cross,—had still loved him with extraordinary affection. The workings of superstition were mingled in the minds of those who murdered the captain and a portion of the crew of the Petrel, with a desire of revenge against Old Granny—whose charms and spells they had purchased—though, according to their thinking, they had worked to them for evil, not good; doubtless, the poor sybil relied upon her influence over them, or she would not have ventured to their cavern, though ignorant of the crime they had committed. One of the ruffians turned king's evidence, and thus, it need had been, Maurice's innocence was fully confirmed. He was not likely to forget the dangers arising from bad company, though Anty was too deeply affected by the death of Old Granny, to marry until another "Holly-eve" had passed; and there was gloom and heaviness, instead of mirth and festivity, for many a year, when time brought round the last night of October, and renewed the memory of its horrors!

Between Featherd and the dark fort of Duncannon there is a smooth and sandy portion of strand, called "Dollar Pay," in memory of murders so familiar to those I have recorded, that I am led to believe both stories the same. The bay smiled in the sunshine when I last passed it, but it brought the fate of "Old Granny" fully to my remembrance; and I was assured by some of the recorders of old tales, that cartloads of dollars were found buried in the sands, as Maurice described, and removed to Wexford by order of the government; that the mutineers and murderers of the Petrel suffered the punishment due to their crime, on the cliffs of "Dollar Pay."

EVENING.

O come, when sunset's hectic flush
The day's declining glory lightens,
And evening's loveliest colours rush
To deck the smile, that dying brightens;

O come, when every breeze is still,
And every leaf is calmly sleeping,
And yonder sky, whose eyelids fill
With dewy tears, is gently weeping;

O come, when forest songster's notes
Grow plaintive, as their lays are dying,
And many a golden vapour floats
Around the couch where twilight's lying;

O come, and bid thy spirit learn
To take from earth so sweet a parting,
And teach each brighter thought to burn
For angel wings, to heaven darting.

ANCUS.

for some hours, the family were thrown into great perplexity, which was increased upon discovering that he had taken a shirt, a pair of stockings, a loaf of bread, and some cheese with him; all of which he had gathered together, while the family were at church the day previous. He had retired to bed at the usual hour; conjecture was at defiance, and alarm began to prevail, when a townsman returning from Hartford in his wagon, brought home the stray boy, saying that in Windsor, he found him asleep, under a shed, at a tavern. Upon rousing him up, he said, 'Jack what are you doing here,' the poor weary fellow replied, 'I am going to France to fight, sir!' He had risen from his bed when the family were asleep, and walked this distance, when sleep and fatigue overcame him. At this period of his life he was as firm in his principles, and as settled in his habits as at any subsequent one."

After graduating he entered the office of his brother George Tod, then a practising lawyer in New Haven, and I believe he was also a short time in the office of Gideon Granger, late Post Master General, and who resided in, and was also a native of the town of Suffield. Certainly it is, that Granger was very much his friend, and succeeded in deeply inoculating him with his own political opinions which were of the Jeffersonian School, and which Tod professed and consistently practised throughout the remainder of his life.

He was admitted to the bar during the Session of the Court at Hartford, in the year 1800. There were several applicants—some half dozen, and among them the father of the writer of this. He recollects to have heard him say, that Tod's examination disappointed them all. He was not at all prepossessing in his appearance, especially at this period of his life, and had by no means prepared those who now saw him for the first time, for the admirable examination he passed, showing on the authority above, a far more intimate and thorough acquaintance with the law than any of his fellow applicants, and prepared them, one of them at least, to anticipate the brilliant career he afterwards so successfully entered upon.

But with the advantage of any talents, still the line of the poet is applicable; and "few can tell how hard it is to climb the steep, where fame's proud temple rears itself afar."

Tod, in starting out into the world had among other difficulties, to contend with poverty; for his father having a large family, was able to do little or nothing for him, beyond giving him his education and his profession. He first visited the state of Virginia, and after travelling about for a time, before finding a suitable place to settle in, his funds became exhausted, and he was induced to become a tutor for a few months in a gentleman's family, residing some where in one of the northern counties of Virginia. He was not likely long to be satisfied with this situation; and accordingly soon abandoned it, and started on foot in the direction of Pennsylvania, and entered the town of Bedford in Bedford county, some time in the year 1802. He came on foot, and alone, an utter stranger, and destitute of a dollar in the world. He used to relate himself, in after life, this part of his early history, his entry into Bedford; saying, that a handkerchief which he carried in his hand, contained all his clothing which amounted to only a few changes of linen; his pockets empty to the last cent, having paid his lodgings the night before he arrived at Bedford by parting with a pair of silk stockings.

Having determined to remain here for the present, (indeed he seems to have had no choice) he got a situation in the prothonotary's office, and wrote for a time as a clerk, but the same year was admitted to the Bedford Bar, and commenced the practice of the law. But here again he soon found he had other difficulties to encounter beyond even those that usually beset the tyro of the profession.

For some unaccountable reason, perhaps discovering that young Tod bid fair to become in time no mean rival for the honors and emoluments of the profession, then exclusively enjoyed by others—but certain it is, he met with the most violent, bitter and uncompromising opposition—from the individual, in particular, who then led the Bedford Bar. He has been heard to say that it was perhaps in part owing to this fact, and a determination to overcome this opposition, and not to permit himself to be crushed by a high hand, that he ultimately made Bedford his permanent residence; for before this contest had terminated he had become so well and favorably known as to have other inducements to remain besides that of counteracting or defeating an enemy.

From this on, he continued to pursue quietly the even tenor of his ways, faithfully and assiduously attending to any business he received, and the result was, as might have been expected from the exercise of talents and acquirements like his, that his practice rapidly increased, despite all opposition, and in 1808, such was his popularity and standing in the county, that he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

On this new sphere he very early distinguished himself. Soon after he took his seat, the great Olmstead case, that threatened to produce a collision between the General Government and the State of Pennsylvania, the latter in the bad spirit of what would now be called nullification, or a numerous class of her citizens; having intimated resistance to a decision of the Supreme Court, and even proceeded almost to open hostilities, the matter was finally brought before the Legislature of the State. Tod, though elected by the democratic party, which particularly espoused the side of opposition to the government; nevertheless, took strong and high grounds in favor of sustaining the integrity of the union, and to this end the authority and decision of the Supreme Court. Such was the ability he displayed, and such became his popularity and standing in his own county, that he was re-elected for the sessions of 1809-10, 1810-11, 1811-12, 1812-13, and the two last sessions was elected by the House of Representatives to preside over its deliberations as speaker of that body.

He was elected to the Senate of Pennsylvania at the October election 1813, and was elected speaker of the Senate for the sessions of 1814-15, 1815-16, and was again elected for the session of 1816-17, but resigned the office on the 20th December 1816.

In representative bodies as in other popular tribunals a few master minds soon got a controlling influence, and direct and to a considerable extent govern and control their course, especially when associated themselves, with the dominant party in politics. In so large a state as Pennsylvania, the legislation of each session is very important, bearing as it does on the various great interests of the commonwealth, and its numerous population. The advantage of having wise, moderate, and judicious men in this popular branch of the government, who amidst all the excitement of party feeling, and the collisions of local interests, will still never lose sight for a moment of the true objects of legislation, and the true and legitimate interests to be promoted by it, cannot be too highly appreciated.—Such a legislator was Mr. Tod, and such his course for the nine consecutive years he occupied a seat in one or the other branch of the legislature, to all which, the journals during that period bear ample evidence. No man perhaps that has ever had the honor of a seat in the legislature of Pennsylvania since the adoption of her constitution, exercised (not by the tricks of the demagogue or the arts of the politician, for these were unknown to him) but by force of character, reason, and argument, a more extensive and controlling influence. He had the reputation with his associates of being a sound headed man, a correct thinker, independent and honest in his course, and therefore, safe to follow. As chairman of the committee of Ways and Means, during the sessions of 1808-9, he was the author of a report in which it was suggested that the proceeds of the sales of public lands, which at that period were annually very large, should be appropriated to the purposes of Internal Improvement. To him then, may be assigned the credit of having been among those who were the first, to come forward with any practical plan for doing what has since been so extensively entered upon by Pennsylvania, the development of her wealth and resources by means of Internal Improvements. It was indeed but a suggestion, but even that no doubt, contributed to call public attention to the importance of the subject and prepare the way for future legislation.

During the time Mr. Tod was in the legislature, the country was engaged in the late war with Great Britain, of which he was a warm supporter, nor did he confine his support to a mere advocacy of the principles on which it was founded, or the stake of national honor and glory embarked in the result, when once at issue with the enemy. But with that promptness and straight forwardness that ever characterized him, much indeed in the spirit of his early military adventure, on the approach of danger he shouldered his musket and took the field as a volunteer. I will relate the incident in his own language—as committed to paper by a friend at the time.

"On the evening of — in the year 1815, I was sitting with some friends in a tavern at Bedford, when the news of the burning of Washington was brought to us. I immediately determined on starting off for the army, to aid in the defence of Baltimore, on which place the enemy was advancing. Accordingly the next morning I mounted my horse and set off. Next day I arrived at the lines, before Baltimore—my horse was taken to be used in the cavalry, and I was placed in a regiment, first having procured a musket and suit of uniform from a townsman of mine who was going home. The battle took place the day after: our regiment was not in the engagement, although our men were, or professed they were, very anxious to be engaged; though it appeared to me, they were very well satisfied to be out of the way of danger. The city was in great alarm and suspense throughout the day; parties of the wounded men were continually arriving, all bringing contradictory accounts of the event of the engagement. Finally news was brought that the American army was defeated, and that the city would be attacked during the night. Preparations were immediately made for an active defence; all the houses &c., in the neighbourhood of the city which might serve to cover the approach of the enemy were destroyed, among these were several rope walks—the effect produced by the conflagration was very grand and picturesque. The night was dark and lowering, with indication of a heavy thunder gust; the murky flame from the burning buildings only rendering objects visible.

I was quartered with the regiment in the trenches, the order to preserve silence was strictly observed.—About ten o'clock at night an officer came to that part of the trench where I was posted, and said that the general had given orders to form a body of 10 men to serve on a piquet guard, one man to be taken from each regiment, and to be all volunteers—after waiting about half a minute, and no one volunteering, I offered myself to serve as one of the guards. In company with my companions of the guard, we were marched to a narrow lane, about a mile in front of the lines, bounded on either sides by a wood and there received our orders. Nothing occurred during the night except the advance of one of our rifle companies who had lost their way, and whom in the dark we took for the enemy and were near firing upon.

I remained with the army for some time until all prospects of an attack had vanished, when I obtained my discharge and returned home—so ended my military life."

Mr. Tod in 1820 was elected a member of congress, and again in 1822.

Pennsylvania from the leading interest she took in the subject of manufactures, had for several years furnished a chairman to the committee on that subject; and it was the good fortune of Mr. Tod to occupy the same station during the discussion of the tariff in 1824, that had been filled with so much ability by Henry Baldwin during the passage of the bill of 1817.

His labours in congress from the time he was placed at the head of this committee, were most arduous and unremitting. He set about at once endeavouring to make himself master of that much vexed and most perplexing question to American statesmen, a judicious tariff of duties. The tariff question it will be recollected was the leading measure of congress during the session of 1823-4. Whatever bill might be brought forward, would, it was evident, meet with much opposition, the southern statesmen having arrayed themselves for battle and war to the hilt. To make the bill as perfect as it could be made, in the first place, that it might afford protection at the same time, it should not too much oppress other interests, was the first object of the committee; and to this end, as also that he might have it in his power to defend the bill, not only on constitutional grounds but those of policy and expediency, he able to explain its principles, and at the same time to enter into all the details of its enactments,—the chairman saw the necessity of making himself perfect master of the subject. A practical mind like Tod's was not likely to be satisfied with the theories of political economists however respectable; he sought information from higher and more authentic sources. Having first taken a statesman like view of the character, capacities and resources of the country, he sought to obtain by examinations and inquiries directly from the manufacturers themselves, (and his searching and inquisitive mind was not likely to be either deceived or misled,) the degree of protection that was required to introduce and sustain each particular branch of manufacture. His assiduity, labours, and researches to this end were most incessant and unwearied.

It is now generally conceded, whatever may be Mr. Tod's share of the honor, that the tariff of 1824, is the most perfect that was ever passed into a law; it is in fact, the present tariff with some modifications and alterations.

His speeches on the subject, to be seen in the National Intelligencer of that period, are fine specimens in their way—particularly his opening speech, delivered on the 10th of February, and the speech with which he closed the debate on the 7th of April. The first is remarkable for the data, facts, statistics, and other important information it conveys. The second is of a different character, and for powerful and persuasive reasoning, fervid eloquence, wit, and satire, all expressed in the most chaste and pure language, may challenge a comparison with the finest specimen of debate called forth from the ablest men in Congress, on the same subject, and few subjects that have at any time occupied the attention of congress, have elicited more masterly and brilliant displays from American statesmen.

The last speech was intended particularly as a reply to those who had opposed the bill, and as some of the speakers had a good deal identified the bill with its author, it became necessary for the orator to be somewhat personal in return, and he was so, but without bitterness or invective. He noticed particularly Mr. Hamilton, of South Carolina, who had the day before in an able speech paid his respects in pretty broad terms to Mr. Tod; but so far was the latter gentleman from being offended by the biting satire contained in the reply, that the only notice he took of it, was to acknowledge in good humoured terms, in connection with some explanations, the skill and address with which the orator had used his weapons. Satire, perhaps, next to reason and argument, was Mr. Tod's forte; but it was the satire of Junius, the language of a scholar and a gentleman, and none other ever escaped his lips.

The share of honor due to Mr. Tod, in connection with the tariff, while others also have large claims, is not inconsiderable; and the zeal and ardour with which he laboured in the cause during the time he was connected with it, may challenge comparison with the best efforts of any of the distinguished men, who have at different times advocated the cause of American manufactures.

On the 8th June 1824, he was appointed president judge of the 16th judicial district, and thereupon resigned his seat in congress. In May 1827, he was appointed by Governor Shultz, a justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Notwithstanding the large portion of time he had been engaged in public life, his profession had not been neglected. His practice, up to the period he went upon the bench, had been extensive and lucrative, and from the proceeds of it, after supporting a family, he had been enabled to accumulate and lay up a handsome competence. He united system and economy with great industry.

The judge in whose district he practised for many years, remarked of him, that "Tod was almost invariably ready to try his causes, and always so, so far as depended upon himself. If the absence of a witness, or the like, made it necessary to have the cause continued, he would lay his legal ground at once, by calling, for instance, a witness to the stand to prove the fact, and there leave it without occupying time by a word of comment."

He was a very powerful advocate before a jury. He paid very little attention to the mere arts of oratory, and his manner might be said to be, if not awkward, at least not graceful. But his great earnestness, warmth (and when excited) powerful vehemence, bore down every thing before it, and rendered him almost irresistible with a jury. To give some idea of his manner, at least in one of its peculiarities, after speaking for several minutes, in the lower tones of his voice, he would rise gradually, in some passage to which he wished to give effect, higher and higher, until he had reached the topmost note, and utmost compass of a clear and powerful voice, and at the same time exerted the last physical effort of his strong and well set frame, in his own bold and peculiar gestures. These climaxes were often thrilling and eloquent in the greatest degree.

In delivering his great tariff speech in congress, a gentleman who was present, in describing his manner, said, as he rose he had a pen in his hand, which he seemed to be intently regarding, turning it in every direction and, in a sort of abstraction, would talk on for minutes, until apparently having conceived some valuable thought, would burst out with a volume of sound, and a torrent of words that seemed to take every body by surprise; and leaving them to ponder the thought thus expressed, which would generally, bear examination, would again fall off into almost colloquial phrase, for a few minutes, when the same thing would be repeated, and that during the whole time he was thus speaking, he retained most successfully the earnest attention of the house.

I have said Judge Tod had not neglected his profession, but occupied as he had been, so much in public life, and his practice from his local situation not absolutely requiring his familiar acquaintance with certain branches of his profession, or the decisions under certain titles of the law, (the maritime law and the like,) he found it necessary on taking his seat on the bench of the Supreme Court to continue his studies, and which he did, most systematically and laboriously, both late and early, at all those intervals when not actually engaged in the discharge of his judicial duties.

Judge Tod had been indeed all his life a student, and had laboriously and critically studied the science of his profession. The number of hours he devoted to study and business, not merely at intervals but throughout the whole period of his public and professional life, is almost incredible, and such as no ordinary constitution could have sustained. When the legislature held its session at Lancaster, the stage used to leave for the city at four o'clock in the morning. It was always understood among Tod's friends that if they had any business with him, or wished to see him, they would be sure to find him before that hour in his seat in the house. This habit of early rising he continued throughout life.

No man that ever had a seat upon the bench had a stronger sense of justice, or a greater love of truth and equity, (truth and equity on moral and philosophical principles,) and which he always seemed desirous to see reached and fully attained in every cause that came before him. The manner in which this feeling would sometimes exhibit itself, may have had the effect to disparage him as a lawyer, with those of the profession, who are the mere lovers of the text, your sticklers for definitions; and who would treat jurisprudence rather as a system of philology than one of the learned sciences. But Judge Tod, it will be found was better up with the day in which we live, and with the present era of jurisprudence in Pennsylvania, as now explained in the decisions of the learned bench on which he once had a seat, and over which still presides with so much satisfaction to the profession, the same able Chief Justice, than the class to which I have alluded.

Possessing as Judge Tod did, in addition to his studious habits, that quality of the mind most of all necessary for a good judge, a clear and discriminating judgment, along with good common sense; there is no doubt, had his life been prolonged, but he would have attained to the first, the very first judicial distinction in the country.

But why speculate as to the future? as to what would have been? To do so, would indeed be to imitate himself, to indulge the same hopes and aspirations, by which from youth up he had been urged on from acquisition to acquisition, from honor to honor; and which lived at his heart, up to the last moment almost that it ceased to pulsate, as strong as when a little New England boy, he started to seek glory and gratify his patriotism by fighting for liberty in revolutionary France. But the past is sufficient, and that death has secured. It is enough. Enough for his own fame, since twenty years of active public life, as a statesman, and as connected with the higher branches of the judiciary, cannot but furnish in the era in which he lived, at least within the sphere within which those services were performed, and even far beyond it, a text for the commentary of history; in which shall be recorded of him, among other things, that he was wise, patriotic, and learned; that he lived much honored and died greatly lamented. And to those not ambitious like Caesar, but only as they would make themselves and their talents useful to their country and their fellow beings, this is sufficient.

To these claims which the public may acknowledge, his friends know there can be also added a list of private virtues, as rare and bright as "storied urn or animated bust," ever rose to consecrate. He was an honest man, which in the sense it is intended to be used here, conveys an eulogy of itself.—His heart was always in the right place.—He had no morbid feelings of sensibility—yet ever felt like a man and a christian.

He had married in 1800 Miss Hannah, who belonged to an old and highly respectable family of Harrisburg, and with whom he enjoyed the most unalloyed pleasures of domestic life, until death terminated her existence, leaving him the father of three young daughters. He did not subsequently marry, nor did he live himself to see his children, on whom he so much doted, entirely educated, but left them with a handsome competency, to the charge and care of their kindred.

For some time previous to his death, while in all other respects well and hearty, he became subject to some kind of internal inflammation, and which finally assumed a chronic form. It was thought to have been induced by the free use of the Bedford water, as he was accustomed to walk every morning, summer and winter, a mile and a half to the spring to drink of it. To the want of it, while absent on the circuit, after having acquired this habit, his disease or the causes that led to it, was by some attributed.

He had been engaged with the other judges in holding a court at Lancaster, and becoming much worse, contrary to the advice of his friends, he got into the stage and rode home without ever stopping on the way, impressed it is said, with the belief that his end was approaching, and anxious to reach his home that he might breathe his last there. The effort no doubt hastened the sad event. He grew worse fast, was soon confined to his bed, and a few days after on the 27th March 1830, in the 51st year of his age breathed his last.

Judge Tod was some five feet ten inches in height, with a broad chest, and well set frame. His complexion was light, fair skin, and light hair, his head partially bald; light eyes, and usually wearing spectacles, being near sighted: His mouth large, with rather thick lips, and his forehead high and commanding; the expression of his face being indicative of both the qualities of his heart and his mind, the one warm and generous, the other clear, strong and comprehensive.

No. 7.

It was a frequent remark of Byron, that of his early friends and contemporaries, many of them had come to untimely ends, and more often by the casualties and mischances that beset life, than by the ordinary course of nature. There are many besides the illusory poet, who, if they were to draw upon their memories, might moralize in the same way; since who that has kept a catalogue, or will call to mind the list of those with whom at one time or another he has been associated, embracing his schoolmates, his college companions, his professional and political associates, but will discover, while hardly yet midway life, the absence of many of those who started with him for the goal, but who, one after another, have given up, or dropped off; while the grave has closed over them, or who barely succeed in keeping themselves on this side of it, by a constant struggle with fortune, in which the contest is no longer for the prize—the goods of fortune, the glory of winning—but to sustain existence—to defend against penury and want.

It is well, perhaps, that we do not too nicely count by data founded on our own experience of the past, the chances of success in life, of those in whom we feel an interest, and who have yet to enter upon, its untried scenes, particularly if a professional character is the one in which they have chosen to make their appearance. Often, too often, indeed, are we doomed in the result to feel disappointment: There would be no advantage in anticipating it. And what sad disappointments they are!

How many fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters with the long catalogue of friends and kindred are made to participate in them? Among the most elevating, grateful and generous feelings the bosom can know, are the cherished hopes, the fond anticipations we indulge for the success, the triumphant success of those we love. With the parent these hopes dawn while the object is yet a cradled infant, are more developed as he becomes the satchel school boy, and are already half realized in the manly collegiate or professional student. Perhaps from this very point they are doomed to be crushed and blighted for ever—for 'tis some where here, at this stage of the passage of life, that Sylla and Carybides are to be past, and how often does the young navigator make ship wreck upon one or the other—become the victim of one vice, or fashion, or folly or another—sinking in the same wreck in which he himself goes down, those "longings divine and aspirations free," that inhabited other bosoms for him; and that prayer and petition have ascended that he might realize and enjoy in full fruition.

A friend of mine who preceded me some ten or a dozen years at the Litchfield Law Academy, told me he had kept a catalogue of the students, who were there during the time he was—in all some seventy in number; and had made a memorandum opposite the name of each, as he learned from time to time, how fortune had fared with them, and from all he had heard more or less. They were generally young gentlemen who had graduated at the different institutions of learning, representing from their residence a majority of the states, and also representing some of the first names and best talent in the country.

He assured me, that out of the whole number of these his contemporaries and fellow students, but two solitary individuals had ever distinguished themselves in their profession. One of these resided somewhere in Vermont, the other, I think in Georgia. But not only had not the balance distinguished themselves, but as to a large portion of them, they had been overtaken by the most diverse fortune; many of them encountering early death, and in almost every variety of form. Some had fallen in duels, while others had gone to Greece to play the patriot, and fallen there,—others to South America, with the same object, and encountering the same fate; while others, had fallen victims to the pestilence of southern cities, whither they had removed, before becoming acclimated; others yet again had become the victims of intemperance.

Among the latter of these, I recollect was poor G—. In point of talents he was said to have met with no superior, or even equal, either at the college at which he graduated, or among the students of the Law Academy. His endowments were so rare, his parts so brilliant and striking, that the first place among his contemporaries, by common consent was conceded to him. After completing his studies, he removed to C— with a view to practice his profession. A friend of mine, a resident of the town, used to describe G. as always appearing in the street in a green frock coat, which he wore à la militaire, buttoned to the chin; generally alone, seeming to be solitary in his feelings and apparently shunning familiar intercourse. He was called on, upon some emergency, to deliver a fourth of July oration. The effect produced by his masterly performance—the style of composition, as well as the powerful and thrilling eloquence with which it was delivered, still lives in the tradition of the town. A copy was sought for publication, but could never be had. Subsequently, on his death, some few Sibyl leaves were found among his papers which was supposed to be all of it he had ever committed to writing. G—died in the streets. He was found there, cold and lifeless one morning, after one of those wretched debauches, to which alas! he was the victim.

It should here be recollected, I am speaking of those who entered upon life at the close of the late war, a period of hardly less peril to the student in his closet, than the soldier on the field of battle, since all partook in some degree in the excitement of the times, and indulged in the same, at that time, national excess, drink—for to drink was not only the fashion of the day, but often regarded as the evidence of patriotism, spirit and genius!!

Speaking of victims—victims to vice and folly, reminds me of poor Pierce. I subsequently had my residence in the same town, and learned all of his history that was known of him there.

He was a native of the state of Maryland; had been liberally educated, and bred to the law. Some misunderstanding arose between himself and his dearest bosom friend. A challenge past, they met, and Pierce shot his friend through the heart.

He subsequently removed to Urbana in Ohio, and there commenced the practice of the law. He occupied a little frame office at the out skirts of the town. A solitary taper might be seen burning there when the rest of the village had long been wrapped in sleep, and its unhappy inmate, (so the good people relate) might often be heard on approaching it, walking up and down talking to himself. Poor Pierce, whatever the cause, was undoubtedly unhappy, and even his mind, the latter part of the time was supposed to be affected. His end was most tragic and horrid. He had been down passing some days with Judge Fuhian, I think, or McBeath, some ten miles below the village. He started some time before night to return on foot; leaving the main road, he missed his way in the forest, when the wolves got hold of him and tore him to pieces; or, and which is more probable—becoming benumbed with the cold—for it was a very cold night, and the ground covered with snow, he lay down and froze to death, and the wolves then seized upon and mangled his body, which was terribly defaced when it was found a few days after. His remains were deposited in the burying ground at the village, and the bar subsequently procured a plain handsome marble slab, which they caused to be erected to his memory, and on which is engraved a neat and appropriate epitaph from the classic pen of my early friend and patron Gustavus Swan, Esq.

Judge Swan, when speaking to us of poor Pierce, and in connection, of the subject of duelling, used, I recollect to recount a variety of instances that had come within his knowledge, of individuals who had killed their antagonists in duels, and all of whom were, or seemed to be, more or less wretched and unhappy,—the argument being, that no man may wantonly take the life he cannot give—do that deed “gainst which the Almighty placed his canon,” and not ever after feel ready to exclaim (from mere compunction of conscience) in the pathetic language of despondency used by Cain,—when punished for his offence “O! Lord my punishment is greater than I can bear.”

The following parody on the beautiful lines of Goldsmith, were taken from the sign of a silk dyer. It undoubtedly obtained for him many a fair customer:

When lovely woman tilts her saucer,
And finds too late that tea will stain—
Whatever made a lady crosser,
What art can wash all white again?—
The only art the stain to cover,
To hide the spot from every eye;
And wear an unsoiled dress above her,
Of proper color, is—to dye.

HUMILITY.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

“The bird that soars on highest wing,
Builds on the ground her lowly nest;
And she that doth most sweetly sing,
Sings in the shade when all things rest;
—In lark and nightingale we see
What honor hath humility.

“When Mary chose the “better part,”
She meekly sat at Jesus’ feet;
And Lydia’s gently opened heart
Was made for God’s own temple meet;
—Fairest and best adorned is she
Whose clothing is humility.

“The Saint that wears heaven’s brightest crown
In deepest adoration bends;
The weight of Glory bows him down,
Then most, when most his soul ascends;
—Nearest the throne itself must be
The footstool of humility.

THE INDIAN CHIEF.

On a high rock against whose side,
The Schuylkill roll’d its gentle tide,
An Indian chieftain stood,
With arms close folded on his breast,
Fix’d as the stone he seemed to rest
Above the rushing flood.

Until (as if beneath the deep,
Some form awoke him from his sleep,
And call’d him to its side,) Forward a step he fearless sprang,
High in the air his arms he flung,
And loudly thus he cried.

“Father I come, I come to thee,
For my young heart would feign be free,
Would leave the white man’s home;
My light canoe now rots on shore,
The swift deer seeks these shades no more,
And I ’mongst strangers roam.

My tribe, a tired and weaken’d band,
Have sought a new and distant land,
Then Father now I come.”
He sprang from off the giddy height,
And sank forever from the sight,
Beneath the snowy foam.

EGO.

WHAT IS EARTH?

Though pleasures in their bright array
Strew roses on my sunny way;
Their fading flowers may I despise,
And heaven-ward lift my longing eyes,

Should joy ne’er come o’er my sad way,
Nor shed to cheer one smiling ray;
My Father let me not repine:
Grant bliss not mortal but divine.

If earthly hopes no longer beam—
If fled the vision, past the dream—
Yet, soothing thought! there is a place
Too joyous for e’en hope to bless.

Should friends, should trusted friends remove,
And cease to give me love for love;
O heavenly friend! I mourn them not,
Give me thy love, thou changest not.

When disappointments dark and dread,
Wreath cypress round my youthful head,
Direct my thoughts to that fair shore,
Where earthly ills are known no more.—M

THE EARLY LIFE OF WASHINGTON.

We extract a single passage relating to WASHINGTON, from an oration recently delivered at Beverly, in Massachusetts, by EDWARD EVERETT. Those who have witnessed the felicitous style in which Mr. Everett addresses an audience, may feel the thrill which it may be supposed the delivery of this paragraph produced.—Nat. Int.

“Time would fail me to recount the horrors of the ninth of July 1755. WASHINGTON,—emaciated, reduced by fatigue and fever—had joined the army. He implored the ill-starred General to send forward the Virginia Rangers to scour the forest in advance; he besought him to conciliate the Indians. His counsels were unheeded; the wretched commander moved forward to his fate. Washington was often heard to say, in the course of his lifetime, that the most beautiful spectacle he had ever witnessed, was that of the British troops on this eventful morning. The whole detachment was clad in uniform, and moved as in a review, in regular columns, to the sound of martial music. The sun gleamed upon their burnished arms, the placid Monongahela flowed upon their right, and the deep native forest overshadowed them with solemn grandeur, on their left. It was a bright midsummer’s day, and every bosom swelled with the confident expectation of victory. A few hours pass, and the forest rings with the yell of the savage enemy; the advance of the British army under Colonel Gage, afterwards the Governor of Massachusetts, is driven back on the main body, the whole force, panic-struck, confounded and disorganized, after a wild and murderous conflict of three hours, falls a prey to the invincible foe. They ran before the French and Indians “like sheep before the dogs.”—Of eighty-six officers, sixty-one were killed and wounded. The wretched General had four horses shot under him, and received at last his mortal wound, probably from an outraged provincial in his own army. The Virginia Rangers were the only part of the force that behaved with firmness; and the disorderly retreat of the British veterans was actually covered by the American militia men. Washington was the guardian angel of the day. He was every where in the hottest of the fight. “I expected every moment” said Dr. Craik, his friend, “to see him fall.” His voice was the only one which commanded obedience. Two horses were killed under him, and four bullets passed through his garments. No common fortune preserved his life. Fifteen years after the battle, Washington made a journey to the Great Kenhawa, accompanied by Dr. Craik. While exploring the wilderness, a band of Indians approached them, headed by a venerable chief. He told them, by an interpreter, the errand on which he came. “I come, said he, to behold my great father Washington. I have come a long way to see him.—I was with the French, in the battle of Monongahela. I saw my great Father on horseback, in the hottest of the battle. I fired my rifle at him many times, and I bade my young men also fire their rifles at him. But the Great Spirit turned away the bullets; and I saw that my great Father could not be killed in battle.” This anecdote rests on the authority of Dr. Craik, the comrade and friend of Washington, the physician who closed his eyes. Who needs doubt it? Six balls took effect on his horse and in his garments. Who does not feel the substantial truth of this tradition? Who, that has a spark of patriotic or pious sentiment in his bosom, but feels an inward assurance that a Heavenly presence overshadowed that field of blood, and preserved the great instrument of future mercies? Yes, gallant and beloved youth, ride safely as fearlessly through that shower of death! Thou art not destined to fall in the morning of life, in this distant wilderness. That won and wasted countenance shall yet be lighted up with the sunshine of victory and peace! The days are coming and the years draw nigh, when thy heart, now bleeding for thy afflicted country shall swell with joy, as thou leadest forth her triumphant hosts, from a War of Independence!”

THE MOCKING BIRD.

That sweetest of American songsters, the rival of the nightingale of the Old World (the mocking-bird,) was in full song, and wooing its mate; and sweeter melody than that which filled the ear during the short southern twilight, and beguiled the hours of darkness, was surely never heard under the stars.—I have often listened to that song elsewhere, in the deep woods of North and West; but, whether it was the season, or the union of circumstances and thought which attuned my own temper and mind to the harmony, I think I never heard that inexplicably varied song poured forth with such effect as amid the sweet-scented dews of Darien. The air was filled with its vibrations, hour after hour, and every quality, power, clearness, and melody seemed united and perfected in the quiet efforts of that sweet-throated bird. Their numbers were greater than I had ever witnessed elsewhere. If you stole in the starlight up the river bank, from your seat under the piazzas of the village, there was no danger of your leaving the melody behind. There was a secluded dip on the shore full of palmetto and other low bushes, into which you descended by a winding footpath between rocky sandstone banks. A couple of canoes were moored within its shelter; and, at the foot of the sandstone rock, where an aged tree slanted across it, a fresh spring welled out and ran its short bubbling course to the river. Here it was delicious to linger in the darkness, and listen to the melody in the branches above you. And again, between this point and the village lay an ancient Indian Mound, on the verge of a lawn-like piece of level sward, extending from the steep high bank of the Alatomana some distance towards the forest; with groups of live oak sparkling over it, and thickening towards the cottages and rude church on its confines. Here on both evenings of our stay, I marked one of these syrens takes its perch on a solitary bush which broke the uniformity of the swell of the mound, and sit hour after hour, alternately listening to, and answering the notes of a male concealed among the thick foliage and hanging moss of a distant tree. I listened to it till I thought I could almost interpret its full varied tale, with its innumerable periods. If the intensity of feeling be at all commensurate with the intensity and power of expression, who shall fathom the depth of that which God has implanted in the little fluttering heart of these his songsters? What can match the thrilling extacy of those clear and redundant notes, or express the depth of pathos, of which those slow plaintive modulations convey an impression to the breast? There is nothing in nature that speaks to me more plainly of the goodness of God, than the overflowing, heartfelt, and joyous song of a bird. Is this not the voice of praise, and is it not a song of unutterable gratitude. Who can listen to a strain like this, or study the nature and attributes of any individuals within the scope of animate nature, without being struck with the degree of perfection which seems to be stamped on each in its sphere, however confined that may be; and, making the reflection, what a distinct line is to be drawn between man and them. The one we believe created with nobler powers and impulses, and for nobler ends; but, having fallen, now irregular and vacillating, subject to a thousand imperfections; the others, as far as we know, the creatures of a day; but how perfect and how uniform in their generations!

The greater the self denial, the greater the virtue.

LACONICS—No. IV.

A lie is a breach of promise; for whoever seriously addresses his discourse to another, tacitly promises to speak the truth, because he knows that the truth is expected.

He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes, for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain that one.

Live with the sad serenely, with the cheerful agreeably, with the old gravely, with the young pleasantly—an author once added also, "with the wicked badly, with the wanton lasciviously," but I say avoid the society of the wanton and the wicked if you can.

Complaisance renders a superior amiable, an equal agreeable, and an inferior acceptable.

Search carefully if one patiently finishes what he boldly began.

Decided ends are the sure signs of a decided character.

Associate with people rather above than below your rank, and rather older than younger than yourself.

Complaisance obliges whilst it reprehends, without this the best advice seems but a reproach, praise disagreeable, and conversation troublesome.

Every one may excel in something.

A man of sense is a man acquainted with business and letters.

A man who is awkward from bashfulness is a clown—as one who is throwing off a number of impertinent airs and graces at every turn, is a coxcomb and an upstart.

It is a man's business to consider men's several characters and circumstances of life, with the different bias and way of thinking they give to the mind, that he may so conduct himself in his behaviour and manner of speaking, as will render him most respectable and gain him the good esteem of those he addresses.

Trouble not the company with your own private concerns, as you do not love to be troubled with those of others. Yours are as little to them as theirs are to you.

Inattention is ill manners, it shows contempt, and contempt is never forgiven.

Good nature is more agreeable in conversation than wit, and gives a certain air to the countenance which is more amiable than beauty. It shows virtue in the fairest light, takes off in some measure from the deformity of vice, and makes even folly and impertinence supportable.

Irresolution in the schemes of life which offer themselves to our choice, and inconstancy in pursuing them, are the greatest and most universal causes of all our disquiet and unhappiness.

Acasto has natural good sense, good nature and discretion. So that every man enjoys himself in his company.

It is incredible how an orderly division of the day gives apparent rapidity to the wings of time, whilst a stated devotion of the hour to its employment really lengthens life.

Praise undeserved is satire in disguise.

Be simple in your manners and noble in all your proceedings.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few

No revenge is more heroic than that which torments envy by doing good.

To err is human; to forgive, divine.

By other's faults wise men correct their own.

Deference is the most complicate, the most indirect, and the most elegant of all compliments.

A man should never be ashamed to own he has been in the wrong, which is but saying in other words, that he is wiser to-day than he was yesterday.

Fly him who from mere curiosity asks three questions running about a thing that cannot concern him.

The generous never recounts minutely the actions he has done, nor the prudent those he will do.

The wrath that on conviction subsides into mildness is the wrath of a generous mind.

Common sense is the foundation of man's happiness in his commerce with others.

A sincere man is consistent with himself, he is never embarrassed, he has courage enough for truth but to lie he is afraid. He is far above the meanness of dissimulation; the words of his mouth are the thoughts of his heart. Yet with patience and caution he openeth his lips; he studieth what is right and speaketh with discretion.

Study to be silent respecting yourself, your birth, your fortune, your acquisitions. If you are eminent for anything let others find it out and speak your praise. The utmost you can say of yourself will have but little effect, for no judgment of character will be passed by people of sense from what you may pretend.

Modesty makes large amends for the pain it gives, the persons who labour under it, by the prejudice it affords every worthy person in their favor.

In your politics think no further than how to preserve the peace of your life in any government under which you may live.

Raphael in return to Adams's inquiries into the course of the stars and the revolutions of heaven, counsels him to withdraw his mind from idle speculations, and instead of watching motions which he has no power to regulate, to employ his faculties upon nearer and more interesting objects; the survey of his own life, the subjection of his passions, the knowledge of duties which must daily be performed and the detection of dangers which must daily be incurred.

A man must live by the world and make the best of it, such as it is.

He who discovers his secrets to another, sells him his liberty and becomes his slave.

Assume a virtue if you have it not.

Let every man mind his own business and leave the government of the country to the governor thereof.

Who seldom speaks, and with one calm well timed word, strikes dumb the loquacious, is a genius among those who steady nature.

Discourse not in a whisper or half voice to your next neighbour, it is ill breeding, and in some degree a fraud, conversation being, as one has well observed, a joint and common property.

Accommodate yourself to the circumstances in which you are placed.

Let your whole conduct be not only irreproachable but unsuspected.

LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL.

LETTER I.

Algiers, 19th Sept. 1834.

My dear Friend,—One day that I was in the King's library at Paris, exploring books on ancient geography, I cast my eyes on a point of the map* that corresponds with the site of the city. Its recent eventful history rushed full on my thoughts, and seemed to rebuke them for dwelling on the dead more than the living. The question of how widely and how soon this conquest of Algiers may throw open the gates of African civilization, is it not infinitely more interesting than any musty old debate among classic typographers? To confine our studies to mere antiquities is like reading by candle-light with our shutters closed, after the sun has risen. So I closed the volume I was perusing, and wished myself with all my soul at Algiers. Ah, but the distance—the "mare saxum et importunum" of Africa—the heat that must be endured—and the pestilence that may be encountered—do not these considerations make the thing impossible? No, not impossible. I said to myself, on second thoughts; the distance is not so great, and the risk of contagion has been braved by thousands with impunity; I will see this curious place. I went to my friend, M. Galignani, and told him my intention; he introduced me to Mons. Lawrence, who was soon to return to the colony as the Procureur de Roi. M. Lawrence, with the greatest friendliness, sent me about a dozen books relating to the colony, and offered, if I would accompany him in the mail-post to Toulon, to procure me a passage from thence to Algiers in the Government steam-packet. Unfortunately for me, I had too much baggage to be accommodated in the mail, so I had to set out in the diligence, trusting to meet with M. Lawrence at Marseilles. As I travelled night and day, I had but a hasty view of the country, and when I reached Marseilles, I found that the Procureur de Roi had got before me, and (as I concluded) was embarked at Toulon. A merchant vessel was to sail for Algiers the next morning; I took a berth on board of her, being anxious to get across before the season of the equinoctial gales; I have since learnt that these gales are not so punctual to their visits to the Mediterranean during the autumn as to other seas. Meanwhile, an advice which M. Lawrence had given me dwelt in my mind, namely, by all means to take a servant with me from Europe, as the Algerine lodging-houses leave you very much to serve yourself. The only day therefore which I spent in the most interesting city of Southern France was devoted, not to seeing its curiosities, but to searching for the most valuable of all curiosities—a faithful domestic. A young man with an honest-looking countenance, who reminded me of your inestimable servant George, brought me a certificate of his character for a twelve-month past; but farther back the recommender could not speak for him, and there was a mystery over his anterior biography which makes me fear he was only an outside resemblance of George. I engaged him, nevertheless. He said he was a British subject, and a native of Gibraltar; but when I took him to a British Consul, his answers were not so satisfactory as to procure a passport. He then recollected that he had been born at Cadiz; the Spanish Consul, however, doubted the accuracy of his memory. Afterwards he discovered that he was a native of Naples, but with no better success. In fine, we went hither and yonder in search of some testimony as to his birth, which seemed to be as doubtful as that of Homer, only with this difference, that the cities where he alleged he had been born seemed to vie with each other rather in disowning, than claiming, the honour of his nativity; and nobody would give him a passport. So I was obliged to embark alone—a knight-errant without a squire.

I sailed from Marseilles the 11th inst. and we crossed the Mediterranean in six days. That they were not in all respects the pleasantest days of my life you will easily imagine, when I tell you that twelve of us adult passengers, besides an obstetrical child of four years old, were potted alive in a cabin nine feet square. There was no refuge during the day-time on deck, for it seemed to be kept from being set on fire by the sun only by incessant buckets of water. It is true that we could sally from our den in the evening, and in the night-time we had some repose, but it was constantly interrupted at day-break by the impious brat I have mentioned, beating a toy-drum, and bawling lustily when it was taken from him. At last the very mother who had borne him lost all patience; she threw his plaything into the sea, and threatened to send the little drummer himself after it. Several of us humanely, but in vain, implored her to fulfil her threat. We were fortunate, however, as to our ship's crew, who, from the captain down to the mousse, or cabin-boy, were all assiduously attentive to us. The Mediterranean trading-vessels have generally a bad character for feeding their passengers with tough salt fish, and laying to at meal-times, to make the rocking of the ship an antidote to their guests partaking freely even of that sorry fare. But here we had excellent food and wine, though the passage-price was very moderate. One day we had even a fête and plenty of champagne; it was when a brother skipper came on board and dined with us. He was a strange mad-cap, who, not contented with being master of a ship, imagined himself also master of the "Belles Lettres" and philosophy. Nay, he was a poet to boot, and, to my misfortune, learning that I was a littérateur, he cruelly inflicted several dozens of his own verses on my naked ears. It was a voyage altogether with many sufferings, but with some consolations. The cool of the evening gave us breath and appetite to sup upon deck, and, in order to promote cheerfulness, it was made a law that we should all sing after supper in turn, whether we could sing or not. I never recognised more of the natural gaiety of the French character, and I fell in with it the more easily, inasmuch as that, bating the discomforts I have described, and in the absence of stomachic affliction, I was, as far as the mind is concerned, very tolerably happy. The prospect of seeing a new quarter of the globe, and of desecrating even afar off Mount Atlas, with his head in the clouds and his feet in the sands of the desert—this prospect every now and then made my thoughts, I could almost say, delicious; and I blessed my fate that I had not in youth exhausted the enjoyment of travelling.

We passed between the islands of Majorca and Minorca, but at too great a distance to observe distinctly the features of either of their shores.

Early in the morning of the day before yesterday, I awoke to the joyous sound of land having been discovered from the mast-head, and to the sight of landbirds wheeling around our sails. I should think that as far as thirty miles off we saw the whole portion of the Algerine territory, which stretches on the east along Cape Matifou, and on the west along the peninsula of Sidi Ferruch, where the French first landed in their invasion of the regency. At that distance, and even when you come nearer, by a great many miles, the view of Algiers from the sea is not beautiful. It is true that the tops of the lesser Atlas form a fine background in the south, but the prospect assumes not its full picturesqueness till you come almost within a mile of the shore. Farther off, the city itself looks like a triangular quarry of lime or chalk, on the steep side of a hill, whilst the country-houses that dot the adjacent heights seem like little parcels of the same material lying on fields that are to be manured. On nearer approach, however, the imagined quarry turns out to be a surprising city, and the specks on the adjoining hills to be square and castle like houses, embosomed in groves and gardens.

No town that I have ever seen possesses, in proportion to its size, so many contiguous villas as Algiers; and their brilliance and high position give a magnificent appearance to this suburban portion of the coast. Meanwhile the city itself, when you come in full view of it, has an aspect, if not strictly beautiful, at least impressive from its novelty and uniqueness. Independently, indeed, of its appearance, its very name makes the first sight of Algiers create no ordinary sensations, when one thinks of all the Christian hearts that have throbbled with anguish on approaching this very spot. Blessed be our stars, that we have lived to see the chains of slavery broken here, and even about to be unrivelled on the other side of the Atlantic! But, without these associations, the view of Algiers is interesting from its strangeness to an European eye. It is walled all round in the old style of fortification, its whole mural circuit being, I should think, about a mile and a half. It forms a triangle on the steep side of a hill, the basis of which is close to the sea, whilst its apex is crowned by the Cassaba, or citadel. That strong place was the palace of the last Dey. His predecessors had dwelt at the foot of the town; but so many of them had died a violent death, that Hussein Pasha thought a higher position would enable him to take better care of his loving subjects and faithful Janissaries; so he removed quietly one night, with all his treasures, to the Cassaba. Farther off, on a still higher hill, stands the Emperor's Fort—so called from having been built by Charles V.—which commands the whole town. The terraced and square houses which rise, seemingly, condensed, close behind one another, are, like the forts and city walls, all washed with lime, and dazzling as snow.

These objects, together with the pier and light-house, the batteries, lined, tier over tier, with hundreds of enormous cannon on the sea-side rock, give an imposing aspect to the city that seems to justify its old appellation of "Algiers the warlike." At the same time the mosques and minarets, surmounted by the crescent, remind you that you are now among the Moslems; while a palm-tree which is visible, though remotely, seemed to me like a graceful characteristic feather on the brow of an African landscape.

I had soon, however, a less agreeable indication than the palm-tree of having got to a southern latitude. There was no keeping below when one came close to so interesting a scene; and, as they advanced, the deck became burning hot. The officers of health, as they are called, detained us for two hours in the harbour, gasping and execrating them, before they would visit the ship and permit us to land. I had been recently so sick as to bring up blood. I now grew feverish, faint, and almost blind. I felt bereft of every faculty except my fancy, and this was ill-naturedly busy in persuading me, falsely, that I was about to die. When the boat arrived that was about to take us ashore, I could not so much as rise to see my luggage put into it. It was then that a fellow-passenger befriended me in my utmost need. This was a smart, intelligent, little man of the name of Biron, whom I had supposed, from his appearance, to be some officer pretty high in the civil service; but he told me that he was returning to his perruquier's shop in Algiers. However, if he was not in the civil service, his humanity calls me to remember him as a most civil and serviceable friend, and I need not say that I associated romance with his name. He took charge of my effects, and saw them safely through the Custom-house. What passed in that hour of landing in Africa—when I fell on my knees on the shore, like Scipio, but from exhaustion and not enthusiasm—is but indistinctly marked in my memory; but I recollect being glad that there were no ladies in the boat, for we passed many young Arabs, obviously grown to manhood, some of whom were fishing in barges, and others swimming about, as naked as they were born. I recollect, also, that the native porters seized on our baggage with as much impudence as if they had been at Calais, and that my languid spirits were much refreshed by the sound of some hearty whacks of his cane which my friend, the perruquier, bestowed on those infidels. Without the aid of his arm I could not have got to the nearest inn. On reaching the hotel, its solid walls seemed to me to rock like the ship which I had quitted. I threw myself on a bed; my predominant sensation was thirst, but the roof, the floor, and the sides of my apartment were all sheer masonry, and there was neither bell nor other means of summoning a waiter. My faithful Biron, however, soon returned to my relief. He procured for me lodgings and a servant. I slept soundly that night, except when I was shortly, but not unpleasantly awakened, by the chaunt of the Mouzeens on the minarets, proclaiming the hour of prayer.

I now write to you from lodgings which I have taken in the house of M. Descousse, a respectable merchant in Algiers, who was formerly a captain in Napoleon's cavalry, and is at present colonel of the national foot-guards of Algiers. The national foot-guards, I understand, amount to between five and six hundred; there is a national horse-guard also, but it reckons only one company. M. Descousse's house formerly belonged to the Aga of the Janissaries; it may be surpassed by one or two mansions of Algiers in gilded alcoves, sculptured fountains, and other ornaments, but, upon the whole, it is a fair sample of the best Algerine habitations. From the street you enter into the lowest, or ground floor, which is dimly lighted by a window over the door. The main apartment here is employed by my landlord as a porter's hall; but, in bygone times, the Aga, surrounded by his servants, used to sit in it smoking his pipe and receiving visitors. On one side of this gloomy hall there are vaulted apartments which were formerly used as stables; but since the Christian conquest of Algiers, they have been converted into wine-cellar. From the ground, you ascend by two flights of white marble stairs in full daylight, and to a court of some thirty feet square, paved with marble. This court, with a gallery passing in front of each side of its quadrangle, tier over tier, to the height of three stories, remind you of our old English inns; only it is more elegant, and the white marble pillars, contrasted with the green and yellow glazed tiles that line the staircases, as well as the arches and floor of each gallery, produce a rich effect. From these galleries, large and handsome folding doors of wood, curiously carved, open into the rooms. The internal aspect of the house, as you look up to it from the court, is upon the whole imposing, and on the terrace of the uppermost story there is a commanding and magnificent view of the city, the sea, and its ships, and the distant mountains. To save the eyes from being painfully dazzled, it is however necessary to consult this prospect either by moonlight or by mitigated day-light. Here I meet with my fellow lodgers in the cool of the evening, among whom is Dr. Révière, physician to the civil hospital, an intelligent, far-travelled, and accomplished man. He distinguished himself much in Egypt by his skilful treatment of the plague. His lady is a fair daughter of Pennsylvania. In the Turkish time, men were not privileged to walk on these roof-terraces; the women enjoyed them alone, and used to visit each other by climbing ladders up and down to the contiguous houses. Hitherto I have seen no Moorish ladies upon them; but the Jewesses ogle their admirers on the house-tops with a sort of feline familiarity.

Notwithstanding all this showy architecture, the apartments of the Moorish houses are gloomy and comfortless. They have a few loop-holes in the outer wall towards the street, but receive their air and light principally through windows that look inwardly upon the court. These windows, which are latticed either with black or white iron, and without glass, except where Europeans have put it in, give the mansion a look of what it was really meant to be, when constructed—a family prison, where it was as easy to watch the inmates as in any of our most approved penitentiaries. Niches in the walls, which have generally doors, serve for presses and cupboards. One side of each quadrangular story, in an Algerine house, contains only one long and narrow room, but a show of three apartments is made out by a wall, built half-way up to the right and left of the central room, which faces to the door. At the risk of broken bones, you ascend by a ladder to the top of these walls, and there you find a new floor of glazed tiles in either side-room, with a curtain hung from the roof so as to form two quasi apartments. Until the French arrived, a chimney was unknown to the Algerines, except in their kitchens, or, peradventure, in the house of a foreign consul; and it is still difficult to find lodgings with such a comfort. Yet the climate, they tell me, is very chilly in the rainy months; and a Frenchman who has been in Norway declares to me that he had suffered less from the cold there than here. The sole objects of Moorish house-building seem to have been to exclude the heat and confine the women.

LETTER II.

Algiers Sept. 29th, 1834.

I have hitherto perambulated only a part of this city, but I understand it contains 153 streets, 14 blind alleys, and five places that can be called courts or squares; of the last of these, however, only the grand square near the sea is of any extent. Thanks to the demolitions made by the French, it is spacious and commodious. As to the rest of Algiers, it is, with the exception of one or two streets, a labyrinth of the narrowest, gloomiest, and most crooked lanes that were ever inhabited by human beings. In many of them two persons can scarcely walk abreast; and if you encounter an ass laden with wood, it behoves you to pull up cleverly to one side, if you wish to keep your lower venter from being torn up by a protruding faggot. The narrowness of the streets is, no doubt, some protection from the heat, and from the rain also, where the houses join their projecting upper stories into an arcade; but the stagnation of air which it occasions, together with the steaming offal and decayed vegetables that meet you at every corner, make me wonder that Algiers is ever free from putrid fevers. There are, however, large covered sewers, which rid the city of much of its filth, and might carry it all off, if the streets were properly swept. The city is also well supplied with water. There are four aqueducts which bring it from the neighbouring heights, and which feed sixty-four public fountains, besides seventy-eight in private houses. The sewers are said to have been constructed by the Romans in a city that pre-occupied the place of Algiers. For their aqueducts, the Algerines were indebted, in 1611, to one of the Moors who had been driven out of Spain, and who, having discovered a spring near the Emperor's Fort, about three-quarters of a mile from the city, laid his project for supplying the city with water before the Dey. It was approved of and executed, and the projector was well rewarded. Every fountain has a ladle chained to it for the common use, with some arabesque and sculpture on the stones, and an inscription which, I take it for granted, as a verse of the Koran—probably recommending Adam's wine as a beverage, in preference to stronger liquors. The Mussulmans are fond of quoting texts from their holy book. On an executioner's sword I have seen inscribed, in golden letters, "God is merciful."

I account for my continuing to be interested in this ugly place, only by the novelty of objects which it presents. The diversity of the people and of their costume is not only amusing to the eye, but it stirs up a curiosity in the mind respecting the history of so many races, and the causes of their concourse. The "Grand Place," as I have told you, affords the only tolerable promenade. Here, at the market-time of a morning, you see not only the various people, but the animal and vegetable productions of nature displayed in rich picturesqueness. It has been a perfect treat to me, for several days, to lounge here before breakfast. How I long for the pencil of a Flemish painter to delineate to you the human figures of all complexions and dresses!—the turbaned Moor—the Jew, with his sly face, and his spouse Rebecca, with her yard-long head-dress behind her. I could not pass even the Jew boys that blacken shoes, without being struck by the nimbleness of their tongues, and the comic play of their countenances. They all speak French, and seem the happiest creatures on earth; excepting, perhaps, the half-naked negroes, who are always chattering and laughing loudest, in proportion to the scantiness of duds upon their backs. I omit the Europeans, for they rather spoil the picture. Particularly striking is the looks of the Kabyles, the aboriginal highlanders of Barbary, who have, all of them, a fierce air, and many of them, legs and arms that would not disgrace the grenadier company of the 42d. Taller, and generally slenderer, are the Arabs descended from those who conquered the country in the seventh century. They are distinguishable by vivid black eyes, shaped like an almond laid sideways; and though many of them look wretched and squalid, you see some among them whose better drapery and forms, and fine Old Testament heads, give them a truly patriarchal appearance. I thought myself looking on a living image of antiquity, as I stood this morning beside a majestic old Arab, whilst he made the camels he had led into the market kneel before him to be unloaded of their enormous cargoes of herbs and fruits.—I felt "my very een enriched" at the sight of the vegetable treasures around me, glowing with all the colours of the rainbow—splendid heaps of purple grapes in one pannier, and oranges, peaches, lemons, pomegranates in another. Here were spread out in piles the huge and golden-hued melons and pompions, and there the white garlic, "and the scarlet and green pepper-pods," together with the brown melogines, an excellent pot-vegetable, in size, shape, and colour resembling a polished coconut. Altogether the vegetable profusion here beats even that of Convent Garden: the only exception to its glory is, that their carrots, turnips, and potatoes are smaller and dearer, in proportion to general prices, than with us. I was particularly astonished at the cheapness of Barbary figs—ten for a sou—in Scotch, a bawbee. It is a fruit entirely distinct from the true fig, and, though sweet, is insipidly flavoured; but still it is nutritious, especially if the stomach requires a slight astringent. I ceased to be surprised at its cheapness, when I found that it grows wild on the roadside, and may be had for the trouble of gathering. It is not an universal production over Barbary, but, where it grows, the poorer Arabs live on it almost entirely during the weeks when it is in season. It is about the size of an ordinary lemon, and grows on cactusbush. This plant, the cactus, does not assume the shape of a tree till its leaves, which are about ten inches long, and an inch thick, twist themselves together into a trunk. It affords the singular phenomenon of leaf springing out of leaf. The leaves are thickly covered with prickles, which, when, they get into the flesh, are with much difficulty coaxed out of it. It is much used for hedges about Algiers; but, if you should ever come to this country, my dear friend, I exhort you never to let your linen to be spread out on the cactus. An affecting story is told of a Dutch family who had a country-house near this city. In the house there were five plump, interesting daughters, who, in an evil hour gave, their garments to be washed to an ignorant European laundress. She hung them out to dry on these prickly bushes, and such evils were entailed on the lovely wearers of them, that they could neither sit nor recline with comfort, for a week or two afterwards. There is also a fish-market here; but its smell not being so inviting as that of the vegetables, I took an informant's word for it, that the fishes are the same with those caught on the opposite coast of the Mediterranean.

Among the indigenous quadrupeds, the stately camels, of course, are first to command your attention. Their tall slender foals, with their curly fleeces, look as gentle as lambs; but in the grown animal's physiognomy there is a ferocity which is not always absent from his real character. The camel is not that meek animal which report generally leads us to suppose him. I went up to pat one of them, but he showed his teeth with so menacing a cry, that I made a precipitate retreat from him. He is particularly fierce in the rutting season, and is then sometimes dangerous even to his native owner. It is true that the Arab contrives almost always to manage and attach him, though he loads him heavily, and treats him often to hard fare, even now and then to a blow; but, on the whole, the Arab deals kindly with him, and gives him good provender, when he can afford it. The animal, in fact, grows up like a child under the tent of his master, partakes of his plenty as well as his penury—enjoys his song, and understands his biddings. His docility springs from habit and affection—nay, we may almost say from moral feeling; for he rebels when his temper is not sagaciously managed. When the French came to Algiers, and got possession of camels, they thought that their obedience might be enforced, like that of mules and asses, by simple beating; but the camels soon showed their conquerors that they were not to be so treated, and that both their kick and their bite were rather formidable.

The horse here may be believed to have degenerated from the old Numidian breed; for he is lanky, and seldom elegantly shaped, and he never shows the blended fire and muscle of a prime English horse. Yet I am told that his hardihood and fleetness are often astonishing, and that his speed in sweeping down declivities would tax the horsemanship of an English jockey. It is surprising how safe and serviceable these animals are, though never mutilated. They will certainly give a snap at times, both in joke and earnest, but they are seldom vicious; and I am just come from seeing a "cheval entier," a beautiful creature, who will put his paw into your hand for the bribe of a sugar plum. The mules are large and powerful. Of the asses there are two kinds—one, of the true old biblical size, that might take Saul upon his back; the other, very diminutive, and most wretchedly treated. In the streets you are never a moment without hearing the cry of "Harri, harri," from a human brute of a driver, who is urging the speed of some of these unfortunate little donkeys, and making them feel his command by goading them with an iron spike on that part of their hips where a wound has already been made and left open.

I have seen no sale of live cattle in the square, unless you give the name of cattle to a poodle-dog, a raton, a monkey, or a caged wild-cat, which is now and then offered for sale. I was particularly struck yesterday with the beauty of one the last of these animals. She lay so sleekly and gracefully on herbed of straw, that if she had been tried for killing birds and rabbits, I could not have condemned her. Near her was a long-nosed animal, which the French call a raton, about seventeen inches without the tail, though I believe he has nothing of the rat about him but his name, for his eyes are gentle, and he suffers himself to be caressed. I am told, however, that he is treacherous, and a devil among the poultry.

Still more was I fascinated by a white, sagacious poodle, who whined in my face, and beseeched me to buy him, in a dog-like more persuasive than Ciceronian Latin. He told me all about it, and how cruelly hard it was to be standing the live-long day, tied by a string to the hand of his salesman. I bought him, and took him home; was ever dog in this world so happy? I thought he would have gone mad with joy. The French maid-servant exclaimed, as he ramped up and down, "Il est fou—il est fou." Unhappily for herself, the poor cat of the house encountered him. He seized her by the nape of the neck, but without hurting her, except that her pride was offended, and galloped round the gallery with her, as she uttered hissing and gurgling sounds from her throat, and sprawled with ludicrously unavailing efforts to scratch him. At last he dropped her, and, coming to an open window, showed his contempt of Mohammedan delusion, by howling in exact accordance with the voice of an old Mouzeen, who was proclaiming the hour of prayers from an opposite mosque.

But the most popular candidate for purchase at Algiers is a small tail-less monkey, about a foot and a half in height. These gentlemen, though the most diminutive of the simious tribes in Barbary, are more formidable when they congregate and get shelter among the woods about Collo and Bougia, than the wildest beasts of the forest. They devastate in a single night whole orchards and corn fields. They are cunning and regular in their tactics, having leaders, sentinels, and spies. They have a regular discipline, and a system of warfare: at least I have been told so. No traveller is accountable for all that he relates upon hearsay; it is enough if he quotes his authorities, and I can assure you that a highly respectable French drummer gave me his word of honour as to the fact, that the monkeys of Bougia are well officered, and that their commander-in-chief has a regular staff. Quory, might he not mean a switch? Yet, formidable as they are in their strategies, the natives contrive to make many of them prisoners. The Kabyle peasant attaches a gourd, well fixed, to a tree; he puts some rice into it, and strews some grains at the aperture to show that there may be more within, making a hole just large enough to admit the paw of the monkey. Unfortunate pug puts in his open paw and grasps his booty, but is unable to draw it back, because it is clenched, and he is not wise enough to think of unclenching it. Hence he remains, as the law phrases it, with "his person attached," and is found next morning, looking, you may suppose, very foolish and penitent. The olden custom was to put him instantly to death, but, as he will now fetch twenty-francs at Algiers, he is sentenced only to transportation, so that the monkeys are at least one part of the population who have been benefitted by the arrival of the French.

The streets of Algiers, as I have told you, are very dismal; and really, when you meet a Moorish woman, under their gloom, in a drapery much resembling the dress of our dead in England, and looking as much as possible like a mummy or a ghost, she is far from inspiring gallant sensations. Where you have light to see them, the bandiness of their legs is generally observable under their shrouds, and the shrivelled skin around their eyes indicates that there is no great cruelty in their veiling themselves. Still I must own that I have not seen the Moorish ladies so as to judge of them fairly.

The population of the city of Algiers must have been greatly exaggerated by the guesses of travellers in the last century, for it is impossible to conceive 80,000 or 100,000 human creatures ever to have been packed together within its walls. The French census in 1833 enumerates the inhabitants thus:—11,850 Moors, 1874 negroes, 5949 Jews, 2185 French (of course not including soldiers), and 1895 other foreigners, making a sum total of 23,753.

Algiers has one Catholic church, formerly a mosque, and fourteen Jewish synagogues. The religious houses of the Mussulmans, by far the most imposing of their public buildings, amounted before the arrival of the French to ten large mosques, and fifty marabouts or chapels; several of them, however, have been occupied by the French for military convenience, and some of the marabouts demolished. The mosques are almost all alike. At the entry there is a fountain, with water flowing into a basin, where the Mussulmans perform their ablutions before they prostrate themselves in prayer. Every mosque has an octagonal dome, and a tall minaret, like our steeple, terminating in a crescent, to which a piece of wood is attached whereon to plant a flag, when the mauseen ascends to the battlements of the minaret in order to call the faithful to prayer, that his signal may be seen when his voice cannot be heard. Some of the minarets are covered with glazed tiles of different colours, which have rather a gaudy effect.

The largest mosque of Algiers stands at the entrance of the street leading from the harbour. It is a long rectangular edifice, divided longitudinally into three naves by two rows of pillars, and, under the dome, at about two-thirds of the length of the building, there are two other rows of pillars, which form a cross with the former. On each side of the grand nave there are galleries supported on pillars, of which those nearest the door are public, whilst those beyond the dome are appropriated to the gentry. Five or six lustres of glass, and several lamps, are suspended with chains along the whole length of the grand nave, as well as along the two rows of pillars which intersect the dome. The lamps are lighted for the evening prayers, but the lustres only on grand occasions, such as the feast of the Bayram. There is a niche for the Imams, and a pulpit, ascended by a flight of stairs, for the preacher. Mats of reed and rich carpets are spread on the pavement.

There are a great many vapour-baths in Algiers. In these establishments, you enter a chamber paved with marble, vaulted, and lighted from above by small glass windows. The steam is created by hot water being poured into basins that stand on the sides of the room. A Moorish young man, who conducts you hither, is arrayed only in a linen cloth around his middle, and after dismantling you of your customary dress, he affords you a similar covering. After you have been seated for some minutes on a bench, inhaling the vapour and perspiring plentifully, he throws warm water over you,—rubs, or rather scrapes the skin, pats and paws the whole body, except what the cloth covers, as if he were kneading dough, singing all the time an Arabian song, and finally dries you with a towel. In an old account of Algiers by an Englishman, I find that this operation in the baths used to be quite formidable to a stranger—there was such rubbing with pumice-stones, and stretching the joints till they cracked. The treatment now-a-days is sufficiently gentle, but I felt myself less invigorated by it than by the cold or tepid bath.

The coffee-houses and shops of Algiers are rather amusing—I mean those that exhibit the old Algerine manners. In the best French coffee-houses I observed several Moors, but you recognized them at once, by their fine white turbans and dresses, as well as by their manners, to be men of the upper class. The other evening I took my coffee near two of them, each of whom I was told was supposed to be worth at least £40,000 sterling. I was, at first, Englishman enough to laugh at the idea of men worth £40,000 going about with bare legs; but, recollecting my own Highland origin, I said to myself,—and has not the chieftain of my own clan, in the best old times, shewn as much of his naked limbs? I have seen a Highland clergyman mount the pulpit in a flabberg. I was struck with the perfectly gentlemanlike air of these Moors. There was grace in every movement of their white and shapely hands. By the tones of their voices, I knew that they were arguing, but it was with mildness and light pleasantry, and their Arabic sounded like a musical language in comparison with the guttural harshness of the common speech. These gentlemen Moors sat in chairs like the Europeans.

In the native Algerine coffee-houses you find the Moors and Arabs squatting themselves for hours on benches, smoking and sipping black and sugarless coffee, which in taste much resembles worm-powders. There they also play at two games, which, as far as I could observe, are like drafts and chess. They listen meanwhile to the vocal and instrumental music of their ingenious minstrels—a music which, to an European ear, if I may judge by my own, is unintelligible and execrable. They have a finger-guitar, with four strings, a fiddle with only two, and a flageolet, which is their best instrument, though bad is the best. I have seen them also use a drum made of parchment stretched over a jar of burnt clay. The jar might indeed be painted as a symbol of their music. Really against an Algerine concert I would almost pit the bag-pipes of Lochabar. A Highland piper gives you at least some idea of lilt or rhythm in his rudest pibroch—something to which you could dance or beat time; but in the Algerine airs I could discern no rhythm.—What, you will say, melody without rhythm? it is impossible, and the fault was in your ears. Well, I own to you the utter difficulty of imagining music without rhythm, and I thought at first that the fault lay wholly in my own ear; but when I spoke on the subject with a Frenchman here, who is the leader of a regimental band, he told me that the rhythm in Moorish melodies is so capricious as to puzzle him.*

The natives have also a sort of opera-house of their own, where Mooreesses dance unveiled—if their monotonous, see-saw movements can be called a dance. Of course the reputed purity of those ladies cannot be compared with the unsunned snow, but, in justice to the beauty of the Algerine fair sex, which I have impeached upon suspicion, I ought to say that more than one of these opera-women appeared to me exceedingly handsome.

The shops that have been opened by the French are of course after the fashion of Europe; but those of the Moors and Jews are in general formed by a recess in the side of a house, some four feet deep, and seven feet long, and raised a step above the ground. In these booths you see the tailor sewing an embroidered garment, the shoe-maker shaping slippers of morocco-leather, and a variety of native artisans plying their different trades. In the butchers' shops I observed a luxury (at least we Scotchmen esteem it as such) which I little expected to meet with so far from home, namely, a single sheep's head. The meat here is but indifferent. The restaurants effect the Parisian cuisine; but, whether it be the fault of the cook, the viands, or the climate, I have had little gastronomic pleasure since my arrival.

* A later period of my residence in Algiers, a most accomplished vocal musician, the lady of Colonel De Verger, had the kindness to write out for me the notes of some Algerine airs; but said she, "I have been obliged to put a rhythm of my own to them, for I never could discern what the natives mean the rhythm to be."

The general food of the natives is couscous, a preparation of flour somewhat like macaroni, but enriched with a mixture of the yolk of eggs, and stewed with a little portion of animal food. I found it very palatable, though a little too highly peppered. Far different were my sensations when I tasted a bit of their mutton, which they preserve unsalted in suet. I believe they smoke it first; it is horrible stuff.

Before the arrival of the French, an European could not find at Algiers either an inn or an eating-house. The African merchants arriving in the city had, and still have, covered bazaars where there goods are laid, with sleeping-places in the upper stories, forming a rude hostellerie. Near one of these bazaars I remarked also a cook's shop—a miserable dirty hole, where a Moor was roasting bits of meat about the size of a walnut, spitted on an iron wire, over a charcoal fire before the shop. When they were done, he whipped them cleverly off the spit into the plates of his customers, who grabbed them with their dirty hands, and seemed to relish them much.

As the Algerines shave their heads, though not their beards, they have barbers among them, and the barbers' shops are here, as they have ever been in a simple state of society, great places of resort for loungers. They are a great deal larger than the shops of other artisans, sometimes fifteen feet deep and proportionably broad, with benches around them for the loungers to seat themselves. On the walls they have daubs of pictures representing naval victories of the Algerines over the Christians, executed, I am sorry to believe, by Christian artists who had been prisoners here. Here the Moslem has his head shaved and his beard stained. The Algerine barber is, as every where else, a mighty newsman. In these shops the French spies reported that they have found conspiracies hatched, and plans laid for insurrection, which probably never existed.

I compute that the expense of living at Algiers is about as dear at present as it is at Paris. The arrival of the French, it may easily be imagined, raised the price of almost everything. That of wheat, and all manner of meat, was quickly trebled, and fowls and ducks soared in the market to a height of cost which they had never before been known to attain. Yet, though the great part of vires thus rose, some of them kept stationary. Honey and sugar, for instance, remained the same, the former at 80 and the latter at 60 centimes* for the pound of 27 ounces. Brandy also continued steady, though it has been far from steady either the heads or health of the French. In this climate a moderate infusion of brandy in water is not unwholesome, except in a particular state of the body, when internal inflammation is threatened. But the poor common soldier understands not the point of moderation. It is difficult to conceive how he gets money to poison himself with brandy, for his pay leaves him only a sou a day for pocket-money; but so it is, that he gets frequently enough of it to be sent to-day to the hospital, and to-morrow to the grave.

* A centime is the hundredth part of a franc.

The French have hitherto lost here about 3,000 soldiers a year, and one of their physicians tells me that at least a sixth part of them have fallen victims to sheer drunkenness.

During the last three months of the present year, wheat averaged 9 francs 75 cents, for 45 kilograms. The kilogram is about 2lbs. weight, and 9 francs 75 cents, make, at the exchange of £1 sterling for 24 francs, 8s. 7 3/4 d. for 90 lbs. of wheat; which is about 40s. a quarter. Beef averaged at 40 cents, the half kilogram, about 4d. a pound; veal was a trifle cheaper, and mutton a trifle dearer. Fowls rated at 1s. 1d. a piece. Rice at about 17s. by the cwt. Potatoes at 4s. 4d. the cwt. An ass-load of wood at 1s. 3d., and the same load of charcoal at about 3s. 6d. Finally, vin ordinaire (it is very ordinary indeed) may be had for about 2d. a bottle; but from logwood dye and alum I should think that an equally good beverage might be prepared still cheaper.

LETTER III.

I was three days at Algiers before I called either on the British Consul General, Mr. St. John, or Mr. Tulin, the Vice-Consul; but I had scarcely left my name at the consulate, when the latter brought me a friendly message from Mr. St. John, requesting me to visit him as often as I could at this villa, where he resides in summer, and in the meantime to use his town house for my lodgings. The latter offer I declined for the present, but I agreed to avail myself frequently of his rural hospitality. The first morning that I went out to his country house was uncommonly mild for an autumnal day in Africa. A fresh sea-breeze tempered the sun's rays, and brought a delightful breath and murmur from the sea. Having sallied out from the gate of Babel-el-Oued, I passed the cemetery of the Jews with its splendid white marble tombs and curious Hebrew epitaphs, as well as the gardens of the late Dey, which, though square and formal, are large and not destitute of beauty. The road to the Consul's house, which is a short league from town, goes round those gardens up a steep ascent, where the country presents at first only a sterile appearance; but as you get farther up, the villas increase in number, and the vegetable power of nature increases with the height you attain. The fig-tree, the orange and lemon-tree, the pomegranate, the olive, and the jubber are either growing wild, or in orchards with little or no cultivation. The cactus, with its massy leaves and fantastic trunk, raises ramparts around the field and along the road sides, whilst the agavé, a variety of the aloe, shoots up its branches ten feet high, like the swords of a race of giants. Then at a certain height, you pass ravines on one side, beneath you, displaying lovely openings into the sea-coast, where the waves are whitening its distant rocks. In coming to one of these, peculiarly beautiful, I could not but recall the lines of Thomson's "Castle of Indolence,"—

"And where this valley wended out below

The murmuring maine was heard, and scarcely heard, to flow."

I left my horse on the road with my servant, and went down to traverse this ravine. With delight I heard the gush of a gurgling rannel, and followed a stream almost worthy of a Scottish glen that was wimpling from rock to rock. A brown little singing bird flitted before me: I could see it only by glimpses, but its note, though short and twittering, was sweet. Is it possible, I thought to myself, that I am in Africa the torrid! The air was balmy; the banks of the rivulet were thick with wild flowers; I knew not the names of most of them, or merely guessed at them from their resemblance to the productions of our gardens and hot-houses; but this uncertainty nowise diminished my interests in the charming strangers. When one meets with a smiling beauty, does it spoil one's admiration not to know her name? I suspect that it sometimes enhances it. Oh, but you will tell me perhaps, that it is fantastic, to compare a man's homage to woman with his love of a flower. True, if you mean a strict, unflattering comparison. But allow a little phantasy, for it is an ingredient in all sorts of love. When we admire your sex, and, most of all, when we address you in poetry, do we not compare you to every flower that is most beautiful? Then why should I be shy to confess that my heart has a gallantry for flowers? They make me dream that I am among graceful and gentle females.

This was a day which I should never wish to forget: I could not tread a step or look a yard around me without seeing floral treasures that were exotic to an Englishman. It is true that the ivy, the blackberry, and the daisy pleasantly reminded me that I had not dropped into another planet; yet, altogether, Nature appeared to me like an old friend with a new face; but it was a brightened face, and she was still "my goddess."

When I returned back to the road, I found my man Iachimo conversing with an Italian compatriot with whom he had met. I had taken out my new valet in not the best possible humour. For a few days that he had been with me, my service had appeared to him a sort of insecurity to his heart's content; but when I told him one evening to be ready to come with me at sunrise next morning to make a country excursion, he showed by his face that he greatly preferred the gentler exercise of brushing my hat at home to that of waddling on a mule's back up the hills. At daybreak he came to me with a musket on his shoulder, a brace of pistols in his belt, and a sword by his side. "My stars!" I exclaimed, "Iachimo, you frighten me. With another gun, you would look as formidable as Robinson Crusoe!" "Signor Campobello," he said, gravely, "you don't know the country that you have come to. You may hear by their cries at night that there are jackals and hyenas all round Algiers; but what is worse, there are leopards and lions. Yes, a lion was killed not far from hence, and not long ago, who had teeth a foot long, and eyes as big as pompons. I know it for a fact, for I saw his skin with my own eyes." "Signor Iachimo," I replied with equal solemnity, "I have heard the sweet voices of the jackals, and I know they would make a cold collation of us if we were dead; but they will never attack a living person. As to the leopards and lions, I engage not only to kill, but to eat all that we meet with. So lay aside, I pray you, your sabre and firearms." He complied with a bad grace. Coming under the shade of the trees, I overheard him speaking about me in terms that were not flattering to my vanity. "Only think," he said, "of that Englishman with whom I live (he did not deign to call me his master) going down yonder ravine to gather flowers, like a bamboni!"

When I reached Mr. St. John's house, he and his lady received me with such hospitality, that in twenty minutes I felt as if I had been acquainted with them for as many years. One of their youngest daughters, Mrs. St. John told me, looked out of the window as I alighted at the gate, and exclaimed, "Oh! is this Mr. Campbell?"

"I dreamt of my lady, I dreamt of her shroud," repeating a line from my little poem of "Glenara," which it had been their day's task to get by heart.

In spite of some bad jokes that I may have made about children, I am sure, when they are endearing, that nobody loves them better. It is true that when I conjure up an idea of purgatory, I always imagine it to resound with the cries of cross brats. Virgil himself feelingly hints at this in describing the entry to Tartarus. But a beautiful child, I have often thought, is the only living thing that could bear to be transferred alive to heaven. If Nature had made me a painter, I certainly think that I should have devoted myself to the portraiture of children; and here I found perfect samples of beauty, that should have been my favourite studies, in a sixfold gradation from three years old upwards. Oh! I wish you could see the little St. Johns; they are little saints indeed.

Mr. St. John's house stands high on a hill-side, to the west of Algiers. In is an old Moorish mansion of the most elegant kind, which the Consul has improved by a large additional drawing-room, vaulted and pillared in the true Mauresque style. From a high hill, to the west of Algiers, it commands a wide view over the plan of Matidjah to the range of Mount Atlas. The garden and shrubbery team with every fruit and blossom which a rich soil under a powerful sun can be brought to produce. There I saw in flower, on the open ground, the yucca gloriosa, with its gigantic pyramid of white bells; the bignonia rose sinensis, double and single; with double oleanders, geraniums, and passion-flowers in abundance. For fruit-trees, there are the almond, the guava annona, or soursop, the banana, and others, too many to enumerate.

The only guest in the house beside myself was Mr. Brown, the American Consul, who, as he had been here during the French invasion, had been an eyewitness to all the fighting around Algiers, and, like Mr. St. John, could relate many interesting details. Mr. Brown was near enough to the scene of one of their battles to see a close conflict between bayonets and yatagans, and could descry a Kabyle, who had mastered a French soldier, cut off his head and bring it away with him under his arm. At first, the regular price of 100 dollars was given for every such trophy brought in to the Moorish Government; but a Kabyle warrior having been detected in bringing in a native instead of a French head, he lost his own for the attempted imposition, and the capitation prize-money was discontinued, though not before 20,000 dollars had been given for prisoners, dead or alive.

I slept at the Consul's country house, and had a long conversation with him next morning. Mr. St. John told me that, before the invasion, the Turkish garrison in Algiers itself consisted of about 5000 Levantine Turks, all of them of the worst description; and who having small pay, for the most part exercised different trades. Out of these it was the law that the Dey and the principal officers were to be chosen; so that an enlightened Government could not reasonably be expected. The last Dey had been a waiter in a coffee-house. It is but justice to say that, when he changed the napkin for the sceptre, he was, for a Dey of Algiers, one of the most clement princes that ever reigned. The Aga of the Janissaries, who married the Dey's daughter, had been a wrestler; and it was thought, if the French had not come, that he might have one day tripped up the heels of his father-in-law. The Minister of Marine, or Lord High Admiral, was, before his installation in office, a burner of charcoal; and his Excellency's manners continued to savour so much of the coal-burner, that none of the European Consuls could speak to him without a trial of temper.

It is strange, in looking back on public events, to find how little the Algerines were humbled by Lord Exmouth's victory, in comparison with the humiliation that ought to have been taught them, if England had followed up her victory with consistent spirit. I will not detail to you the insults that were offered to our Consul, Mr. Macdonnell, a man of excellent character (Mr. St. John's predecessor), because I am sure that the history of the whole affair must have been published in England. We had a dispute with the Dey of Algiers, as you may remember, in 1823. I am not speaking Mr. St. John's opinion on the subject; for my object was to get facts from him, and not opinions; and he could tell me no fact tending to shake my conviction that Macdonnell was an ill-used man, and that our compromise with the African barbarian was a stain on the honour of England. Whether the blame belonged to our Government, or to Sir Harry Neale, who commanded the squadron before Algiers, I will not take upon me to say; but so it was, that Admiral Sir H. Neale made two concessions to the Dey—the manner that they were secret—namely, that our flag should not be hoisted in the English Consulate in Algiers, and that Mr. Macdonnell should not return as Consul.

When Mr. St. John succeeded him, all the disgraceful ceremonies in the intercourse between the representative of Great Britain and the chief of the chastised pirates were continued. The British Consul, like that of the other Christian powers, was still obliged, whenever he came in sight of the Dey's palace, to walk bare-headed under the hottest sun. Like all the rest, he was obliged, on reaching the palace, to sit down on a stone bench in an open passage, where every porter could sit down beside him. He was not allowed to wear a sword in the Dey's presence, nor to ride by the Cassaba, though his own servants, if they were Mahometans, might do so. The Kabyles used to be on horseback, whilst the Christian Consuls went a-foot; nay, even when they passed the ancient palace of the Dey, where nobody had lived for twelve years past, they were obliged to uncover their heads as long as it pleased the Turkish soldiers who were sitting before it.

The concessions of Sir Harry Neale exalted the pride of the Algerines; and the Dey, in an altercation with the French Consul, gave him a blow with his fan. For this unwelcome conduct he refused to make any reparation; but the singularly inefficient blockade kept up by a squadron which the French sent out to Algiers raised his spirits to misanthropic insolence. He had been at Paris, and he used to compare the French blockading ships to the Cyprian girls around the gates of the Parisian playhouses, who beset all outgoers, but catch not one in a hundred.

Meanwhile the British Consul heard of Greek captives being brought to Algiers and doomed to labour as slaves, but without either pay or the usual sustenance allowed as slaves. He was answered that those Greeks were subjects of the Porte, and that England had no right to interfere for them.—To this the reply was obvious, that Lord Exmouth had extorted a bond from Algiers, sealed by the blood of a thousand Englishmen, that no Christian should hereafter be made a slave in the Regency. But the British Government relinquished their interference.

About the same time, there was another gross instance of Algerine barbarity, in the case of George Nicolaidi, a rich Greek merchant of Smyrna, who was arrested here, and, for an alleged intrigue with a Moorish woman, of which not a shadow of proof was produced, was beheaded, and his whole wealth was seized upon by the Dey. If Lord Exmouth's victory had bespoken liberty to Christians of every nation, the pacton surely implied their security against lawless forfeiture of life.

I forbear to send you an account of the French conquest of Algiers, because you will find it in many publications. Among the rest there is a pretty accurate description of it in the October number of the "United Service Journal," for 1830. I am trying only to recollect authentic anecdotes that have not been published. The Dey owed his fall to his insolence, ignorance, misinformation, all working together.

When told that the French could equip as many as thirty ships of the line, he exclaimed "It is impossible; I know that, except the force they have sent out to blockade me, they have not one ship of the line—I have it from my correspondent in Italy—England alone has ships." He suffered the French to land with little opposition, at Sidi Ferruch, from a firm persuasion that he was getting them like so many fishes into his net. An Armenian, who had served as an interpreter with the French army, was taken prisoner and brought before him; he questioned him about the different forces which the French had brought hither, and when the Armenian told him that he believed that the French had brought with them 200 cannons, his serene highness flew into a violent passion—"Take away that infidel dog," he said, "and cut off his head for telling me a lie." The order was instantly obeyed.

Mr. St. John's family had been removed to Malta in the expectation of the invasion, but the Consul himself remained at his post. The natives respected him so much, that, when they were coming down to cross his grounds, they retired and took a different route at his remonstrance; the French general commanding the troops in that quarter put a guard of seven men to protect the Consulate from any straggling party of the French.

At three o'clock of the morning of the 4th of July, 1830, the French, who had already advanced from Sidi Ferruch, had chased the Algerines before them in several engagements, and had posted themselves on the heights which command the town, opened their fire upon the Emperor's Fort. It lasted till one o'clock, when the native troops went out of the fort, setting fire to the powder magazine. At this crisis the Dey sent for the British Consul-General, and requested him to go on his (the Dey's) part to the French Commander-in-Chief, to know what terms he wanted. The Commander-in-Chief replied, that he required the town to surrender at ten o'clock to-morrow morning, promising at the same time the security of the Dey's person and property, as well as that of all the inhabitants of the town. This answer having been given in writing, it was sent by the Dey to his own secretary, who had gone out with the consul. On the following morning, the 6th of July, the Dey sent again for Mr. St. John, to know whether he could really depend upon his own safety and that of the inhabitants, as promised by the French general; in which case, he said, he was ready to surrender the town, and sign the convention offered him. Mr. St. John assured him that he might rely on the promise of the Commander-in-Chief. His Highness then put his seal to the convention, and requested the Consul to be its bearer to the French,—at the same time begging him to get the Commander-in-Chief to allow him two hours more for the removal of his family to his private house. The Consul complied with the Dey's wishes, and obtained the delay asked for by the Dey. The French troops were detained until one o'clock, at which hour they marched into the town and took possession of all the forts. The Consul, fearing that in the confusion some atrocity might be committed on the French prisoners, obtained their liberation from the Dey before he left his palace, and had them sent to the British Consulate.

During his second visit Mr. St. John was admitted by the Dey to the chamber of his treasures. It was paved with stone, for no wooden floor could have borne the weight of them. Golden coins, literally in millions, were lying heaped up like corn in a granary, and, several feet high in the walls, the plaster, which had been wet when they had been shovelled in, retained when dry the impression of the coins. In this hall of Plutus were contained not only some hundred thousands in gold and jewels, which the Dey took with him, but between two and three millions which the French owned to receiving. Considerable sums, it is known, disappeared unaccountably after the French had got possession of them, but Mr. St. John suspects that millions may have been secreted, though not brought off by the Dey himself. No man, certainly, in real life—if we except their owner and those who helped him to hoard them—ever looked around on such sums of solid money as Mr. St. John that day contemplated. It was like a scene in a dream, or in the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." But did the British Consul, you will ask me, receive any gratuity from the Dey for thus negotiating to save all his personal wealth. No! not a farthing. A pecuniary recompense I have no doubt our Consul's British pride would have refused; but there was something heartless in the barbarian's sailing off without leaving a keepsake or token of gratitude to one whom he had actually to thank for preserving to him an immense private fortune. Nay, Mr. St. John had to complain of still worse usage, when, in return for his interference which had saved Algiers from being taken by storm and delivered up to pillage and butchery, he found himself assailed by French scribbles, who misrepresented the whole history of events, and calumniated him as unfair and partial to the Algerines, and as an enemy to the French. Their calumnies deserve only this general answer that all respectable Frenchmen here now acknowledge the humanity of his conduct, and speak of him in terms of high estimation.

LETTER IV.

Algiers, Oct. 14, 1834.

My dear Friend,—I have just visited a place of gloomy memory in this city, namely the Bagnio, or prison, in which the Christian slaves used to be shut up after their daily toil. It is a dismal, ruinous-looking old hall, and if the tradition be true that it was once a Catholic chapel, it must be as old as the first ages of Christianity. It is about fifty feet long, and half as broad, with nothing in its appearance to beguile one's painful reflections on the many deep-drawn sighs of agony that must have been respired in the place during 300 years of Christian slavery at Algiers. There were formerly several more of the same night prisons, but this one alone continued to be used for its ancient purpose after Lord Exmouth's victory. When the French took possession of Algiers, they found 122 prisoners. Some of these were soldiers of their own army, who had been taken in the recent fighting, and rescued by the Turks from the yatagans of the Kabails and Arabs; others were individuals fortunate enough to have escaped from the massacres that were perpetrated by the wild natives on the crews of two shipwrecked brigs; the rest were some Greek and Genoese who had been in slavery for two years.

In this bagnio the Christian captives used to be shut up at sunset, and let out again to their labour at sunrise. Ah! what beauty there is in that word sunrise to the imagination of the free.* To us it recalls the carol of the lark, the freshness of flowers, the sounds of cheerful industry, and all the joyous intancy of the day; but to the captive in this prison—what was the daylight? It only broke the oblivion of his misery, or perhaps the dream in which he fancied himself restored to the land of his birth and love. The sun rose

*I find a similar sentiment better expressed, in a poem full of grace and sweetness, which has been lately published, and which I chanced to open for the first time after writing the above sentence:—

"How beautiful is Nature to the blest!
Sunbeams, that seem to mock the sad at heart,— Flowers, whose bright hues but sadden the oppress'd."
Bride of Siena.

only to glare on him like the fierce eyes of his taskmaster, and the black bread for his morning meal was thrown down to him as to a dog! In spite of all these reflections, when I think on this subject, I sometimes try to console myself with arguments for believing that the lot of these victims was not quite so miserable as our imaginations are apt to picture it. Certain it is, that the ransomed Christians who returned to Europe and became objects of popular interest, both as travellers and as sufferers for religion, were by no means anxious to undercolour the portraiture of their past tribulations, whether they depended on the alms of the compassionate, or were rich enough

"Around their fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all they felt and all they saw."

And indeed it would have been hard, after suffering so much among the infidels, if they had found Christian hearts slow to believe in their most wonderful narratives. I was talking the other day with an Algerine on this subject, and he expressed to me his conviction that the grossest exaggerations had been propagated in Europe respecting the maltreatment of Christian slaves at Algiers. God forgive me for joking on so grave a subject! But, in the course of our conversation, a ludicrous instance of Barbary cruelty to a countryman of my own came across my memory, and I upbraided my infidel acquaintance by relating it.—Once on a time, amongst the passengers of a ship that was taken by an Algerine corsair, there was a poor diminutive Scotch tailor, who was condemned to slavery. He was so weak in body that he could not work with the other slaves, but the Dey of Algiers inhumanly obliged him to sit from morning to night upon eggs, like a clucking hen, in order to hatch them. It may be imagined that all Scotland laughed at the little martyr when he came home and related this melancholy adventure. The Moor to whom I mentioned it was also much diverted by it, but resuming his gravity, he remarked, "This story is as improbable as it is ludicrous; for, if the man was a tailor, the Dey would have made fifty times more profit out of him by setting him to sew cloth than to hatch eggs."

"To be serious, though I abominate the memory of Christian slavery in this place, I am fain to hope that its horrors were somewhat exaggerated. All the religious orders in Europe, particularly in Spain, were laudably employed in collecting funds for the ransoming of Christians from Barbary. Those pious men soon discovered a truth, well expressed by Horace, namely, that appeals to the sense of sight touch the mind with incomparably more force than mere statements to the ear. So they preached to the eyes of the charitable. When delivered captives arrived in a Spanish city, they were publicly paraded through it, clad in rags which they had never worn before, and loaded with chains a great deal heavier than the Algerines had ever put upon them, but which had useful weight in the pathetic exhibition.

The circumstance which I am going to tell you carries no evidence at all in favour of the clemency of the Algerines towards their prisoners—but still it is a curious fact, that for a very long period the greater part of the Christian slaves at Algiers were those who had come voluntarily into slavery. Oran, which Spain possessed till 1782, and Malalquiver, were considered by the Moors as the chief nurseries of their Christian slaves; and, in 1785, it was gravely stipulated between the Spaniards and Algerines, that the latter should still receive, as usual, Christian deserters as slaves—whose numbers used annually to amount to a hundred. The garrison troops in the place I have mentioned were generally vagabonds from all nations, though the most of them, had been Spanish smugglers or Italian banditti. When those worthies had committed some error that threatened them with death or the cat-and-nine-tails, they scarcely exchanged their lot for a worse one, when they embraced Algerine slavery. Some of them also had hopes that the Consul of the European nation to which they belonged might interfere to procure their liberty.

The prisoners brought in by the Corsairs were divided into two classes. The first of these included the captain, the chief officers of the prize, and the passengers with their women and children; all these were put to labour less hard than that of the rest. The children were almost all sent to the palace of the Dey, or to the houses of the first families, and the women were made the servants of the Moorish ladies. The second part of the crew were openly sold to the highest bidders.

As to their general treatment, Leweson, a secretary to the Danish Consulate, who published a work about Algiers towards the latter end of the last century, and who seems a candid writer, gives a description which is not very revolting. Speaking from several years of observation, he thinks that, upon the whole, though he admits exceptions, the captives were neither overwrought nor cruelly treated. Their proprietors, he observes, in general had always more or less the prospect of selling them for a ransom, and were therefore interested in keeping them alive. Those who were condemned to labour at the public works were the most unfortunate. They were placed by day under the constant inspection of Turks, who were called their guardians, a gentle name for the office of those who guarded against their escape. From this account I gathered that they had three small loaves of coarse bread in the morning, with gruel and old butter or native oil, which is execrably rancid, and then in the evening a repetition of the bread and a few olives. There were many individuals even in this worst-off class who, when they were good workmen, could make a little money by performing services for the natives after sunset, on getting permission from their guardians to let them return to the lock-up house at a later hour, by which means they could obtain a good supper and a cup of wine. The dress granted them annually by the state consisted of a long shirt, a woollen tunic with long sleeves, and a cloak of the same material. For bedding, they had a woollen coverlet, a pillow, and a mattress. No mention is made of their being provided with shoes or stockings.

Slaves that belonged to individual proprietors, whether Turks, Moors, or Jews, (it was not permitted to Christians to have slaves at all, and Jews could have none who professed Mahometanism,) were generally better off than those that were the property of the state. In the city they mostly served as domestics; in the country their agricultural intelligence often raised them to the rank of bailiffs on estates, and there were instances of their becoming such favourites in families as to cause scandal and amputation of heads, on account of intimacy with wives and daughters. The Christian slaves who were taken into the domestic service of the Dey were also comparatively fortunate. They had little to do, they were well clothed, and fed sumptuously, and when they pleased their owners, it is probable that their only suffering (though, alas! it was a sad only) were their longings to return home, and the ennui of domestic confinement.

Besides the European Consuls and their families and secretaries, they were some other free Christians, such as merchants, artists, and Catholic as well as Greek, spirituals, who were permitted to exist at Algiers. To all this class of persons the proprietors of Christian slaves used to let them out as servants on moderate terms, and on the assurance that the hirer would be responsible if the slave escaped. Thus a few of the captives found Christian homes, nor were they required to repair at night to the bagnios, where, according to law, all slaves were to be shut up after daylight. Some of them after a time left the service of their patrons with money or credit enough to be able to set up taverns, where, by the sale of wine and spirits, they would sometimes make enough to purchase their ransom, and to return to Europe richer than they had left it. But the security exacted from free Christians against the elopement of such proteges was severe and dangerous; nay, the patron was even responsible to the proprietor for the value of the slave in case of his death. So the free Christians, it may be easily imagined, were very cautious as to the objects of their cautionary, and even when they gave it, generally required their fellow believer to wear a token of his obligation to them. Some free strangers from Christendom having seated themselves one day in a tavern, and called for wine, mine host brought it into them limping with an iron circle on one of his legs. "What," said they, "Boniface, do you keep this house, and are you yet a slave?"—"I am so, nominally," he answered; "a Moor is my proprietor, but Mr. so-and-so is my patron, God bless him!—he set me up in this shop, and gives security against my quitting Algiers without notice."—"Does the law oblige you to wear that iron?"—"No," said the arch fellow, "I wear it only to oblige my patron."—"Does he distrust you then?"—"Oh dear me no!—no more than he distrusts his own wife; but just by way of a ceremony, he gave his wife a ring to wear on her finger, and in the same way he gave me this iron ring to wear above my ankle." In reality, however, the ankle ring was not so easily slipped off as a finger one, and its notoriety was some security to the patron. Where its patronage was found without a badge?

Lastly, as a mitigating circumstance in Christian slavery at Algiers, it is but fair to mention, that when slaves were ill-treated, they had a right to repair either to the Dey's palace, or to the nearest Marabout or Mahometan chapel, and there to prefer their complaint. If the case of ill usage was proved, the proprietor was admonished: if it occurred twice, the slave was taken without compensation from his cruel master and transferred to another proprietor. Here there was at least some seeming recognition of the right of humanity. But put all the above circumstances together, and place Algerine slavery in its mildest light, it was still an atrocity that reproaches the tardiness of its extinction. The slave's right to appeal to the Dey in case of hard usage must have been for the most part the next thing to a mockery. Those candid travellers who are disposed rather to smooth than to aggravate our horror at the lot of the captives, admit that those who laboured at the public works were sometimes taxed to extreme toil, and that the numbers shut up every night in the bagnios suffered dreadfully from their hard beds, and the filth and stench of their incarceration. Altogether, whatever may become of the colony, let us thank the French for having at least obliterated the last vestiges of Christian slavery.

The history of that evil, now so happily abolished, may teach us that there is a moral reaction in the universe, which seldom leaves crimes without a progeny of crimes, and that the source of every great act of injustice may generally be traced up to some preceding one. The Roman Catholics were taught persecution by Roman Pagans, and they bequeathed their lessons to the Protestants, who, from Calvin down to the Irish Orangemen, retaliated on Catholics. In like manner Christian slavery at Algiers had its origin in the reflux of revenge and fanaticism from Africa back to Europe, after the Moors had been driven with horrible cruelty out of Spain. As often as the Moors show you the tomb of Barbarossa, they call him their avenger. Nor should it be forgotten, that most of the southern states of Europe—Spaniards, Sardinians,—the subjects of the Pope and the Maltese, till a recent period, condemned to the galleys all the people of Barbary who fell into their hands.

It is difficult to compute what the number of Christian slaves may have been at Algiers in times far gone by; but I am inclined to reckon that they were at least 2,000 during the early part of the last century, and in the preceding age they were probably many more. Leweson says that, in 1785, they amounted to 2,000—though the French had ransomed all natives of France. At the epoch of Lord Exmouth's victory they had been reduced to less than 1,000 and England lost a gallant mariner for every slave whom she delivered.

The sojourn of an European here, unless he is interested in trade or in the objects of a traveller, is not even now particularly enviable; but in former times it must have been dismal. Nay, at this moment I doubt, supposing two enamoured Protestants wished to enter on the state of matrimony, whether they could find a priest of their own church to link the fatal knot and afford religious consolation to the sufferers. I know not how they manage the matter at present, but formerly the Protestants used to apply, in case of marriages, christenings, and burials, to a Greek priest, who, to their great edification, repeated the service in a language of which they understood not one syllable.

But during the worst times at Algiers the free Christians were well off as to personal security. They had each of them a Turk for a protector, who accompanied them wherever they chose, and saw that they were neither offended nor injured. And woe to him or her who in word or deed ill used the protegee of this Turkish guardian! In the year 1786, the wife of a European consul, who was enceinte, was walking in the streets, when a Moorish lady came up to her, touched her on the stomach, and said something insulting to her. For this the Moorsess was instantly taken before the Cadi, and sentenced to the bastinado, which she underwent, though both the consul and his wife pleaded for her pardon.

The two principal outlets from Algiers are at the opposite gates of Bab-el-Oued and Babazoun. The outside of the latter used to be the scene of those hideous executions, which were not discontinued till very lately, though they had begun to be infrequent. A short way from Babazoun you find a miniature encampment of those natives, who have brought their country productions to town, and who, to save the expense of lodgings, sleep here under miserable tents with their dogs and beasts of burthen. The road, as you turn from this squalid scene, divides itself into two branches. In the lower direction it takes you, after passing a village tolerably well stocked with shops, along the level of the bay that stretches from Algiers to Cape Matifou. If you pursue this road for a league it will bring you to an establishment which the French call the Garden of Experiment and Naturalization. I rode out thither one morning with M. Descousse, and the head gardener showed us minutely over the whole Pépinière. The object of the establishment is great and useful; namely, to try among almost all horticultural productions what kinds will best succeed in this country. On a space of eighty acres there are twenty-five thousand trees, bushes, and plants. All this tells interestingly and honourably for France. The experiment seems magnificent, but, like a French compliment, it is more showy than substantial. I inquired of the head gardener how many labourers he had in the Pépinière. Twenty he told me. I am no great judge of the subject, but it struck me that twenty pair of hands were too few for eighty acres of nursery ground and 25,000 trees and plants. "For that matter," he replied, "if I had but twenty active fellows, and they were well paid, I should have no fear; but I have only miserable natives, or Europeans that are the scum of the earth, and even these are ill paid." "And what is your own salary, may I ask?" "Why, Sir, 1500 francs a year, but they are not regularly forthcoming. In short, the whole concern is starved by the French government; and though it would cost no great matter to get abundance, I have no more than a third part of what would suffice for irrigation." This the head gardener told me in the hearing of M. Descousse. I went the same evening to a large party of French people, and expressed my regret very strongly that so noble a project as their Experimental Garden should be starved from false economy. In so doing I neglected an advice that was once given me by a shrewd old Scotchman—"Speak the truth, my boy, as often and as freely as you can, but never for a moment longer than it is agreeable to your hearers." Next day I understood that I had given offence in a high quarter by my remarks, and an eminent functionary desired Mr. St. John to assure me that he (the functionary) was not in the least to blame in the business. I could with sincerity return him my assurance that I had never attributed any blame to him. The fault lies at Paris.

Apropos to horticulture—let me speak of the general efforts at cultivation which the French are making around Algiers. I derive my information chiefly from M. Lacrouz, the principal banker at Algiers, whose fortune, intelligence, and public spirit have prompted him to make large experiments in farming. He has favoured me with a manuscript book of his remarks on the subject. He has cultivated with success the tender sort of grain which the French call tuzelle, which has afforded him, even on ground that was not manured, a return of from 8.3.4 to 12.1.2 for the seed that was sown. Hard grain has not succeeded so well, and oats indifferently; but he has sown cotton, and the product has been abundant and of good quality. Some of his experiments in indigo have been also fortunate, and he has a roll of this material as beautiful as ever came from the East. On another of his estates, M. Lacrouz has constructed a mill for olive oil, one third part of which is as excellent as the best that ever came from Provence, whilst the rest, though inferior, was found to be useful and of some value.

From all that I can learn and observe, there seems to me to be no doubt that the intertropical productions, which the Algerine Regency is capable of rearing, might become a great source of wealth to France, and very soon make the country swarm with a prosperous population, if the difficulty of introducing abundant capital could be overcome. At present, whilst capital with us obtains some four per cent., it varies here, according to the confidence of the lender, from twelve to sixty per cent. This high rate of interest is palpably an obstacle to agricultural, or I should perhaps rather say horticultural, speculation; I mean to the rearing of those products which require patience and expense. Accordingly it is a fact, and one which I give with deliberate certainty, that out of the whole number of European colonists settled here, between 300 and 400, there are not more than five or six proprietors who are occupied in the culture of the olive and the mulberry—two products about the success and valableness of which to France, granted capital and industry, there can be no manner of doubt. As to what may be gained by the culture of indigo, cochineal, senna, cotton, tobacco, wine, and some other articles, a question may be raised, though in my humble mind, there is no scepticism as to the immense wealth that might be derived from Algerine wine and tobacco. But still, allowing that point to be debatable, nobody questions that fleet-loads of silk and oil might be freighted from Algiers. And what is likely to prevent this eventually? Why the scarcity of capital, and the want of a public bank to supply the horticulturist on the security of his land. Almost ninety-nine out of an hundred of the settlers are forced to get an immediate livelihood by rearing grain and vegetables which very poorly repay the expense of cultivation. The most eminent of them, a M. Couput, last year made some £150 sterling by his farm. A few rich men amuse themselves with pretty experiments; but this is, all child's work with regard to the chance of France ever repaying by importations the heavy expenses of her colony. How is capital then to be got? Why I think it might be obtained simply by making free ports of all the ports of the Regency; English capital, I conceive, would then flow into Algiers, and millions of our money would bring double the interest that it now fetches in England.

I mentioned this opinion to some of the most influential French officers, both civil and military. The latter class listened to the idea with an air of polite but jealous coolness. "Ah! you Englishmen," they said, "are true patriots, and you can see nothing in the world without wishing England to benefit by it; but what right has England, with so many colonies, to grudge France the fairly-won and exclusive possession of Algiers?" I said, "You mistake me; we don't grudge you Algiers; England would not accept of your colony if you were to offer it to her as a present to-morrow." Still it has been only a few of the more intelligent French officers that I have been able to make converts to this truth,—that England does not envy France the possession of Algiers. France is at this moment paying nearly a million and a half sterling a year for the right of maintaining 27,000 soldiers on the coast, who are decimated every year, and who, with their blockhouses, occupy a few miles of territory around Algiers, Oran, and Bona. M. Lacroux, the banker, treated my suggestion in a different manner from the military men; "It is my firm opinion," he said, "that the wisest thing France could do would be to make the Algerine ports all free."

If you are not already tired with my remarks, please to remember that I was lately speaking of the outlets to the country from the town of Algiers, and conceive me ciceroneing you in imagination out of the gate of Babazoun. Leaving that gate on the right, you are led by a fine spacious road, cut on the side of the hill by the orders of the Duke of Ragusa, and very creditable to his memory. In ascending, it is pleasant to look back below. There is a palm tree that, with its leathery foliage, gives an oriental character to the scene. Whether it is a gentleman or a lady tree I do not know; but whichever it is, it is fruitless, because it stands alone, for palm trees will not fructify unless they grow in couples. They have no notion of single blessedness. Heaven smiles on the gallant vegetables!

You see also from this ascent several picturesque Marabout chapels, and the guide pointed out to me a spot which he said was the tomb of Barbarossa.

At the top of this hill you get to the great road that goes towards Donera and Boufaric. From this eminence the view is superb—the bay with its mighty blue semicircle, fringed with creamy foam—the white country-houses with their orange-gardens—the marabouts, interspersed with here and there a palm tree—the plain below, where the vapours of the river Arach, as it discharges itself at Cape Matifou, are seen sporting in the sun, and the noble mountains towering behind the Metidjah. All these objects, when I looked around me, filled me with but vain regrets that I had not beside me some capital artist, to note the scene. The French sent hither the younger Verney; but he is long returned; and I have never been able to get a sight of his Algerine sketches. But England is exuberant in painters; and why are none of them here? What studies would not Wilkie find among the Arabs and Kabyls,—the laughing negroes and the merry Jew-boys of the market-place. What scope on these sea-shores for the grace of Callcott! and what mountain lights and shades for the sublimity of Turner! The altitude of those mountains I find differently estimated. I love them too well to quarrel about a few hundred toises as to their stature; but the highest of them seem to me to be twice the height of Ben Nevis. They have an aspect peculiarly bold.—Stretching in a long sweep, with visibly deep indentations and ravines—with cliffs that are purpled, and masses of precipices that are bronzed by the sun; they strike the fancy—if one may compare mountains to men—as soldier-featured beings, that bid defiance to invasion. And full sure, amidst those passes, the Kabyles have often taught both the Turks and French, that Freedom is a mountain nymph.

But the ascent to this excursion is too fatiguing for a pedestrian excursion, and at noon it is apt to be too sunny for a ride. You should go out thither on horseback, when the cryer from the minaret is chaunting to matin prayers, and when the cannon in the harbour announces day-break—whilst the jackal and hyena are skulking home through the dewy nopals—and whilst the daylight is blushing in Heaven like the life-blood returning to a lovely countenance.

The only foot promenade you can well enjoy at Algiers is on the outside of the gate Bab-el-Oued. The most interesting place to which this outlet takes you after you pass the fort of twenty-four hours (so called, because it is said to have been built within that time,) and the burial grounds, is the place still called the Dey's Gardens, which contain many buildings, marble paved courts, and magnificent fountains. The edifices, by the side of which the French have built numerous wooden barracks, have been converted into a military hospital, whilst the garden grounds are laid out as an experimental nursery for rearing the chief botanical productions which the French are ambitious of cultivating in Africa. The Bab-el-Oued Pépinière, however, is on a much smaller scale than the one to which you go out by Babazoun; it contains only a few acres. Here I have made acquaintance with the worthy and accomplished Mr. Maris, the head physician of the hospital, who allows me to come down every morning with a napkin full of wild flowers, the botanical names of every one of which he writes for me on a slip of paper, besides teaching me how to preserve the flowers. Domesticated with him, and equally hospitable. I find two twin brothers, who are the head botanists of the now existing establishment. Their likeness in form and face makes them perfectly undistinguishable, even when they are together, and they speak and laugh so similarly, that if you were to shut your eyes in overhearing their conversation, you would swear that it was a man speaking to himself.—Their studies and progress in life have been the same, and their very souls seem to be twins.

In those Gardens of the Dey you meet with both the cotton-tree and the cotton-bush, the sugar-cane, and the cochineal insect, feeding on that particular species of the Indian cactus which is without prickles. And how are these productions prospering, you will ask me? Why the botanists who tend them tell me they are succeeding admirably, and of the candour of those men I entertain not a doubt; but may not their very devotedness to the culture of them make them over-sanguine in their hopes? And supposing that those productions thrive well in a snug nursery, is that a sure prognostic that they will repay the cost of extensive field cultivation? On this subject, it would require the practical experience of a tropical farmer to speak with confidence. Commend me, therefore, to the sagacity of a young Dutchman whose acquaintance I have made here. His father has given him veral thousand pounds to buy land and settle as a colonist. The land, he told me, he had bought for a trifle; but that he should not put a spade or a plough into it, till he had been a year and a half on the other side of the Atlantic, and studied there the cultivation of sugar, indigo, &c.; for this purpose he is embarking for America.

Close by the Dey's Gardens and Palace, there are buildings now employed as barracks, which were formerly used as a Poudrière. If I understand that French word rightly, it means a powder-mill; a palace and a powder-mill in juxtaposition—is not that a droll alliteration? And yet this was the palace where they Deys used to keep their finest women. Did their highness wish to blow up the beautiful creatures in some case of emergency? No, surely, for they exposed themselves to the same peril. And this powder-mill stood so close to the sea, that an enemy's bomb-ship might have thrown a shell into it, without advancing dangerously close to the neighbouring batteries. The last Dey however had, for many years, discontinued to live in this country-house, having removed up to the Cassaba, from the fear of a blow up of a different nature among his Janissaries.

MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE.

This magnificent edifice was totally destroyed by that devouring element—Conflagration, on the night of the 16th December, 1835. That era in the history of the City of New-York, will be long remembered by the inhabitants of that portion of that city, which is now laid a barren waste—presenting as the scene does, an uninterrupted view from Wall street, to the east river, and thence to Coenties slip. The prospect is one of awful grandeur, as far as the eye can reach; here and there the sight is only obstructed by the ruins of towering edifices, which were but yesterday, the boast of the wealthiest, and now stand as if "in proud defiance" of the surrounding desert.

The Merchants' Exchange was one of the largest structures ornamenting the city, situated on the south-side of Wall street, occupying one hundred and fifteen feet front, between William and Hanover streets, extending in the rear to Exchange Place. It was three stories in height, exclusive of the basement and attic. The southwest front, one hundred and fourteen feet on Exchange Place; and the main front on Wall street was of Westchester marble. The first and second stories of the Ionic order, from the temple of Minerva Polias, at Prigene, in Ionia. A recessed elliptical portico of forty feet wide introduced in front. A screen of four columns and two antæ, each thirty feet high, and three feet four inches in diameter above the base, composed of a single block of marble, extended across the front of the portico, supporting an entablature of six feet in height, on which rested the third story, making a height of sixty feet from the ground. The columns are now splintered and mutilated from top to bottom, looking as picturesque as a Greek temple in ruins.

The principal entrance to the Rotunda and Exchange Room, was by a flight of ten marble steps, with a pedestal at each end. On ascending to the portico, three doors opened to the vestibule in front, while one at each hand opened to offices. The vestibule was of the Ionic order from the little Ionic temple of Illyseus. The Exchange Room, which was the Rotunda, represented in the accompanying view, measured seventy-five feet long, fifty feet wide, and forty-two feet high.

In the centre of the Rotunda, was lately erected by the liberality of our Merchants, a statue of General Alexander Hamilton, which is pictured at length in the view, sculptured by Ball Hughes, and on it inscribed:—

ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
By the Merchants of the City of New-York,
IN THE EXCHANGE, IN WALL-STREET.

The statue was about fifteen feet high, including the base on which it was elevated, and chiselled from the whitest marble. The figure represented him, holding a scroll in the left hand resting on the thigh, and a scarf partly covering the body. We have not been able to ascertain the probable cost of this statue.

Attached to the Rotunda, were several large rooms, one was occupied as the Exchange Reading-Room; in the rear, was that used for auction sales of real estate, shipping and stocks, and to the right of this, after ascending a flight of stairs, the saloon, in which the Board of Brokers assembled daily, presented itself to the spectator. The Post-office occupied the easterly portion of the basement.

The fire reached the dome of the Exchange, about half-past one o'clock, after having raged in the vicinity for five long hours. It crept silently and secretly along, till it burst forth in volumes of flames and smoke. The basement and the rotunda, were entirely covered with goods, which had been carried there for safety, no one imagining for a moment that the fire could extend so far. The flames spread with fearful rapidity, and at four o'clock, the dome had fallen with a tremendous crash, burying all beneath it, in a gulf of burning, smoking ruins, and shrouding forever from view, the noble statue of Hamilton.

Arrangements have been completed for the rebuilding of the Merchants' Exchange, upon an extended plan, taking in those lots to the west, as far as William street, and it is contemplated, that a square forty-feet wide shall surround the edifice.

THAXTED, Essex—England.

This extensive parish and large town occupies the whole of the northern part of the hundred of Dunmow; and the town is beside the river Chelmer, from the source of which it is not far distant. Thaxted is a considerable thoroughfare, the great road from Chelmsford to Cambridge passing through it; and, formerly, a large portion of its inhabitants were employed in an extensive cutlery manufactory, which flourished here. It is an irregularly-built town, with some good houses; and the stately and spacious church is a fine specimen of gothic architecture. Dissenters of various denominations have also handsome meeting-houses here. Anciently, this was a borough town, incorporated by charter from Philip and Mary, and its government vested in a mayor, bailiffs, and chief burgesses. This charter was confirmed by Queen Elizabeth, and additional liberties granted by King James the First; but all these privileges were tamely given up, either through fear or poverty, by the corporate officers, who, on being served with a quo warranto, in the time of James the Second, thought fit to retire from their offices in silence. From a visitation of heralds in 1637, it appears, that Thaxted had, at that time, a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, and about twenty principal burgesses, of whom ten had passed the mayoralty; and they had a common seal, but no arms. The market, which had long been discontinued, was some time ago revived, but it has not risen to much importance. It is on Thursdays; and there is a fair on the 27th of May, and another on the 10th of August, for cattle.

UNANIMITY.—A Reverend Clergyman in a sermon preached to his people on some particular occasion, said of them that they had always acted with great unanimity and candor; "for," says he, as often as I have chastised you from the desk, you deserved it, and when I have asked for more salary, you have unanimously refused it."

CONUNDRUM.—Why are the disciples of Gall and Spurzheim necessarily in favour of liberal education?
Because they are Free-knowledge-ists.

IDLENESS.—Burton, in his 'Anatomy of Melancholy,' describes idleness as being the cushion upon which the devil reposes." Dr. Johnson designates it as the 'rust of the soul.'

"Sir," said a collector, to a person who had borrowed several books of him and never returned them,
"I presume you find it much more easy to retain my books than what is contained in them."

The crow flies at the rate of 22 miles an hour, the hawk 42, the eagle more than 80. A hawk once flew from Fontainebleau, and was caught 24 hours after at Malta; thus travelling 1,000 English miles, or 42 miles an hour, and more than 3,000 feet a minute.

Plan for Financial Reform in Private Life.—All know the extravagant career of Mr. H—, but all are not aware of his ingenious plan for stopping it.—
"Why do you not do something or other?" said a friend; you will be ruined if you go on so." "I know it," replied Mr. H—, "but I'll tell you what I am going to do. I shall put an advertisement in the paper, telling the people not to trust me, for if they do they will certainly not be paid."

High Relations.—Nell Gwynne was often successful in throwing ridicule upon her rival, the Duchess of Portsmouth, originally Miss Querouaille. She pretended to be related to the best families of France; and whenever one of their members died she put herself into mourning. It happened that news of the Cham of Tartary's death had lately reached England.
A Prince of France was also recently dead, and the Duchess of Portsmouth was of course in sables. Nell came to Court in the same attire; and standing close by her Grace, was asked by one of her friends why she was in mourning? "Oh," said Nell, "have you not heard of my loss in the death of the Cham of Tartary?" "And what the deuce," replied her friend,
"was the Cham of Tartary to you?" "Oh," answered Nell, "exactly the same relation that the Prince of ——— was to Mademoiselle Querouaille."

AN OLD BACHELOR'S DREAM.

(On a piece of Wedding Cake.)

From the world's crooked paths of vexation
I enter'd a rich parterre,
And gazed on a summer's creation
Of flowers that linger'd there:
And the bubbling of fountains—the hum of the bee
Breath'd notes of tranquility soothing to me.

And here, from this scene of profusion,
'Twas promis'd I ne'er should depart,
But, through a long life of seclusion,
Dwell alone with the girl of my heart:
And ne'er in fancy's pure region of light,
Was pictur'd a being more lovely and bright.

She was there, with companions surrounded,
'Neath the shade of the Myrtle Tree,
And the garlands they'd woven, abounded
With that emblem of constancy.
I live o'er in memory the luxury yet
I enjoy'd when that wreath on my brow was set!

With slow, solemn step advancing,
Seem'd an object in sable dress'd;
And, as all eyes toward him were glancing,
His duties I quickly guessed.
He bade me repeat all the vows that are given,
And then offer'd up a brief prayer to heaven.

'Twas done—when I turned with emotion,
To gaze on that heavenly face,
And to mark if her vows of devotion
O'er its beauty a change would trace.
But naught on that visage could I discover,
"Save new beaming beauties which brighten'd all over."

In ecstasy, kneeling before her,
I clasp'd her pure bosom to mine
And repeated my vows to adore her,
As a being on earth—divine—
Then beckoning the crowd to retire now,
I tore off the garland they'd wreath'd on my brow.

But alas! how our fondest hopes perish,
When fancy no longer adorning,
Those objects in dreams we cherish,
Which flee from our couch in the morning:
For there I lay holding a Night Cap now
Which fancy—a Garland had twin'd on my brow

And all the dear objects surrounding
The spot where I lately reclin'd,
"Mid the blest charms of nature abounding,"
Had fled and left nothing behind—
Save him before whom all my vows had been told—
'Twas "Old Cæsar," to tell me my breakfast was cold.

RECORDS OF A STAGE VETERAN.

KEAN'S LEARNING.—When Kean first appeared, many contradictory reports were abroad, respecting his education, and a Mr. C—, resolving to put it to the test, wrote to him one morning a note in Latin, requesting some tickets for his benefit. "Well," said R—, and how did he construe it?" "Into an insult," was the reply. The same gentleman, who was always a warm partisan of Kean, being once hard pressed on the subject of Kean's academic deficiencies, exclaimed, "D—n it, Sir, surely a man may have drunk at the well of learning without being expected to swallow the bucket!"

G. F. COOKE AND MATHEWS.—For the first season or two that Mathews was in London, whenever Cooke met him, the conversation began and ended with an exhortation to Mathews "to avoid drink." "Young man, if you wish to rise to be a great actor, in fact, to be a Cooke, eschew drinking; by that sin fall the greatest, how then can a comedian hope to prosper by it?" In vain did Mathews truly affirm that he never so indulged; George always made this injunction the burden of his talk. [This strange impression on G.
F. Cooke's mind regarding the mimic, arose from a confused recollection of some potent potting at Mrs.
Judy Burn's, on which occasion George well remembered that one of the party was dead drunk, without being exactly certain whether it was Mathews or himself; we need not tell the reader it was not the former.]
Soon after Mr. Mathew's marriage with Miss Jackson (now his widow,) he was walking with an eminent divine, and met Cooke in one of his maudlin moods; George would not be avoided; he congratulated his friend on the happy event, and Cooke could be elegant, and even fascinating. The reverend gentleman was charmed; not so poor Mathews, for George wound up with the following rhapsody—"She is a lovely creature, an amiable creature, formed to make any man happy; God bless you Charles, your felicity is in your own power; but do let me intreat and implore you now, whatever you do, to avoid that d—d drink."

AMERICAN FEASTING (A KENTUCK).—When Mr.
Gallot went through the United States with Mamselle D'Jeck, the celebrated elephant, he, one evening, was warm in his praises of the hospitalities and socialities of the mother-country; amid other instances, he quoted one of the Rutland punch-bowl, which, on the christening of the young Marquis, was built so large that a small boat was actually set sailing upon it, in which a boy sat, who ladled out the liquor. "I guess," said one of the company, "I've seen a bowl that 'ud beat that to immortal smash; for, at my brother's christening the bowl was so deep, that when we young'uns said it warn't sweet enough, father sent a man down in a diving bell to stir up the sugar at the bottom."

DR. ABERNETHY AND P—, THE COMEDIAN.—P—, who was of a scorbutic habit, was, for a considerable time, the patient of Abernethy; the guineas followed one another into the pocket of the doctor, and the actor got no better. At length, in no pleasant humour, he presented himself. "No better, Doctor!" "Um," said Abernethy, "I'm afraid you don't strictly adhere to your regimen—vegetable diet." "Sir," said the enraged actor, "I've taken as much green stuff as a jackass, and yet I'm no better;" and flounced out of the house. Abernethy, who was too eccentric himself to be offended at eccentricity in others, had a prescription made up, and sent it with his red pills to Mr.
P—, with this direction:—"Let the jackass take one of these per night, and go on with his hot mash of green stuff as usual."

EGERTON'S REPLY.—It was often said of old Chapman, of Covent-garden Theatre, that he taught his sons to fight before he taught them to read; certain it is, that they were equally petulant and pugnacious; and the thing next heard of either S. or W. Chapman (after their engagement in any new company) was that they knocked up a play and knocked down the manager. This pugilistic propensity was most peculiarly developed in Samuel (the youngest and smallest,) who had fairly fought his way through the provinces. When the late Mr. Egerton took Sadler's Wells Theatre, S. Chapman wrote to him for an engagement. Eg-erton's reply was laconic, but decidedly to the purpose:—

"Dear Sam, "I can't fight.
"Yours truly,
"DANIEL EGERTON."

SWEET ELLEN O'MORE!

Throughout the green isle, while there's heart to adore,
Ah! who has not heard of sweet Ellen O'More!
In her eye there's a light,
In her voice there's a tone,
That speaks to my spirit
Like days that are flown.

E'en the rude peasant smiles, as she passes his door,
And blesses the face of sweet Ellen O'More.

Though the daughters of Erin are lovely to see,
Yet Ellen, sweet Ellen's the fairest to me;
While I see her advance
To join the gay throng,
The sylph of the dance,
And the syren of song,
My heart feels a passion ne'er cherish'd before,
And sighs for the love of sweet Ellen O'More!

ANECDOTES OF CHILDREN.

A lady was supplicating her little girl (these things are not uncommon with kind mothers) to be less violent in her play, to shriek in a less shrill key, as she had a headache. Her prayer concluded with the customary warning—"she would go out of her mind."—
The child caught at the idea of going out: her sharp note instantly changed to an insinuating whisper,—
"and if you do, mamma, will you take me with you?"

A far stronger degree of selfishness, with equal simplicity, is evinced in a circumstance that came the other day under the observance of a friend. A certain tragedian had presented a family with "orders" for the theatre. He played Pierre. The imagination of a little girl, who was of the party, was strongly excited. The gentleman who had obliged them, was about to be broken on the wheel! She had no misgiving as to that fact—but another more shocking still occurred to her little sympathising mind. When the interest was at its height, when her feelings were acute, she enquired anxiously—"Oh! is Mr. ——— to be put to death?" "Yes." "Will they chop his head off?" "Yes." Her sensitive heart could ill sustain the shock, and she had scarcely a breath to articulate, whilst the tears streamed from her eyes,—
"Oh! then he'll never give us any more orders!"

"Do you want to buy a rare prime lot of butter?"
said a Yankee notion dealer, who had picked up a lot from fifty different places, to a Boston merchant.—
"What kind of butter is it?" said the merchant. "The clear quill; all made by my wife, from a dairy of forty cows; only two churnings." "But what makes it of so many different colors?" said the buyer. "Darna-tion, hear that now. I guess you wouldn't ax that question if you'd seen my cows, for they are a darned sight speckled than the butter is."

A beef-stealer caught stealing a beef, by the beef itself.—A friend relates to us an amusing piece of thievery, which took place not long since, not a thousand miles from our goodly village. Two persons undertook to steal a piece of beef from a neighbour who had killed an ox and left it over night in his barn, suspended with a stick between the flanks, in the usual way. They agreed that one should mount the cross stick and cut away, whilst the other kept watch. He had scarcely commenced operations, when the stick slipped from under him, the ribs closed and fairly locked him inside the carcass, his arms extending above his head, and his feet projecting from the neck of the animal; his companion fled, leaving the prisoner to be released from his confinement by the owner of the ox, who upon opening his barn at sunrise, greeted him with a hearty good "morning."—Logansport Canal Telegraph.

A gentleman travelling in the interior of Brazil put up for a night at a farm-house, furnished in the primitive style of the country; but on the table, in company with a long tallow candle, were placed a handsome pair of plated snufflers and its stand, which he had received as a present from Rio de Janeiro. "What conveniences you invent in Europe," said the Brazilian to his guest: "before I received this present, I used, after taking off the candle snuff, to throw it about the floor, or perchance on the bench where I was sitting, or over my clothes—but now—mark the difference!" So saying, he pinched off the long snuff between his thumb and finger, put it carefully in the snufflers, and closed them up with a look of triumph at his highly amused spectator.—New Monthly Magazine.

JONATHAN'S HUNTING EXCURSION.—"Did you ever hear of the scrape that I and Uncle Zeke had duck-in on't on the Connecticut?" asked Jonathan Timber-toes, whilst amusing his old Dutch hostess, who had agreed to entertain him under the roof of her log cottage, for, and in consideration of a bran new tin milk pan. "No, I never did, do tell it," was the reply.

"Well—you must know that I and Uncle Zeke took it into our heads on Saturday afternoon to go a gunning after ducks, in father's skiff; so in we got and skulked down the river; a proper sight of ducks flew backwards and forwards I tell ye—and by'm by a few on'em lit down by the mash, and went to feeding on muscles. I caught up my peauder horn to prime and it slipped right out of my hand and sunk to the bottom of the river. The water was amazingly clear, and I could see it on the bottom. Now I could'n swim a jot, so I sez to Uncle Zeke you're a pretty clever teller, jest let me take your peauder horn to prime. And don't you think the stingy critter would'n't. Well says I, you're a pretty good diver, 'un if you'll dive and git it, I'll give you a primin. I thought he'd leave his peauder horn, but he did'n't; but stuck it in his pocket, and down he went—and there he staid"—here the old lady opened her eyes with wonder and surprise, and a pause of some minutes ensued, when Jonathan added—"I looked down and what do you think the critter was doin'?" "Lord!" exclaimed the old lady, "I'm sure I don't know." "There he was," said our hero, "sitting right on the bottom of the river pouring the peauder out of my horn into hizen."

A long time to Wait.—It is the custom at the chambers, in ins of courts, when attorneys or their clerks are absent, to put labels on the doors, thus—"Gone to the Temple; return in an hour, &c." A certain limb of the law having recently been non est inventus, and a charge of embezzlement brought against him, a friend fastened the following announcement to the doors of his chamber:—"Gone to Botany-bay: return in 14 years."

ADVICE TO UNMARRIED LADIES.

FOUND AMONGST SOME MSS. OF A LATE DOWAGER.

If you have blue eyes—languish.

If black eyes—leer.

If you have a pretty foot—wear short petticoats.

If you are in the least doubtful as to that point—let them be rather long.

If you have good teeth—don't forget to laugh now and then.

If you have bad ones—you must only simper.

While you are young—sit with your face to the light.

When you are a little advanced—sit with your back to the window.

If you have a bad voice—always speak in a low tone.

If it is acknowledged that you have a fine voice—never speak in a high one.

If you dance well—dance but seldom.

If you dance ill—never dance at all.

If you sing well—make no previous excuses.

If you sing indifferently—hesitate not a moment when you are asked; for few persons are competent judges of singing, but every one is sensible of a desire to please.

If in conversation you think a person wrong—rather hint a difference of opinion than offer a contradiction.

If you find a person telling an absolute falsehood—let it pass over in silence; it is not worth your while to make any one your enemy, by proving him a liar.

It is always in your power to make a friend by smiles—what a folly to make enemies by frowns!

When you have an opportunity to praise—do it with all your heart.

When you are forced to blame—appear, at least, to do it with reluctance.

If you are envious of another woman—never show it but by allowing her every good quality and perfection except those she really possesses.

If you wish to let the world know you are in love with a particular man—treat him with formality, and every one else with ease and freedom.

If you are disposed to be pettish or insolent—it is better to exercise your ill humor on your dog, your cat, or your servant, than your friends.

If you would preserve beauty—rise early.

If you would preserve esteem—be gentle.

If you would obtain power—be condescending.

If you would live happy—endeavor to promote the happiness of others.

CONS.—What medicine bespeaks in its name its fitness for dogs? Bark. Like what is a speech against money? Antimony. What is like a cutting reply? The Retort. What two articles would a hodman be most likely to carry out from a chemist's shop? Mortar and Plaster. What medicine are we reminded of by a man's beating his wife? Elixir. (He licks her.) What does a negro take when he is hung? Black Drop.

The Church in Danger.—An honest old woman who came from the country to the old church in Dundee, brought with her some bread and cheese, and a bottle of beer. Just as the clergyman was administering the order of baptism, owing probably to the weather, the cork flew to the ceiling, with a report like that of a pistol, the noise of which reverberating along the aisles, was heard by every one in the church. The honest woman attempted to look from her seat as it nothing had happened, but it would not do; she made a cork of her thumb, but still the liquor went on discharging itself in the church, crying fiz, fiz, fiz.—*Eng. THE WALTZ.

As many of the retired matrons of this city, unskilled in jestic lore, are doubtless ignorant of the movements and figures of this modest exhibition, I will endeavor to give some account of it, in order that they may learn what odd capers their daughters sometimes cut, when from under their guardian wings. On a signal being given by the music, the gentleman seizes a lady by the waist; the lady, scorning to be outdone in courtesy, very politely takes the gentleman around the neck, with one arm resting on his shoulder to prevent encroachments. Away then they go, about, and about, and about—"About what, sir?" About the room, madam, to be sure. The whole economy of this dance consists in turning round and round the room in a certain measured step, and it is truly astonishing that this continued revolution does not set all their heads swimming like a top: but I have been positively assured that it only occasions a gentle sensation which is marvelously agreeable. In the course of this circumnavigation, the dancers, in order to give the charm of variety, are continually changing their relative positions—now the gentleman, meaning no harm in the world, I assure you, madam, carelessly flings his arm around the lady's neck, with an air of celestial impudence; and anon, the lady, meaning as little harm, as the gentleman, takes him round the waist, with the most ingenious languishment, to the great delight of the numerous spectators and amateurs, who generally form a ring, as the mob do about a pair of amazons fighting, or a couple of mastiffs. After continuing this divine interchange of hands, arms, et cetera, for half an hour or so, the lady begins to tire, and with eyes upraised in the most bewitching langor, petitions her partner for a little more support. This is always given without the least hesitation. The lady leans gently on his shoulder; their arms entwined in a thousand seducing mischievous curves—don't be alarmed, madam—close and closer they approach each other, and in conclusion the parties being overcome with ecstatic fatigue, the lady seems almost sinking into the gentleman's arms, and then—"Well sir—what then?" Lord! madam, how should I know.—Washington Irving.

ANECDOTE OF LORENZO DOW.—The following anecdote of this eccentric character has been sent us in manuscript by a correspondent, who thinks it has never been published. We think we have some recollection of seeing it in print several years ago. At any rate, it is worth republishing.

"Some years since, Lorenzo preached in Charleston, South Carolina, and in the course of one of his sermons, attacked with some severity the character of a citizen who had lately died, and whose death he alleged was in consequence of his vices. For this he was at the instance of the relatives of the deceased, prosecuted and found guilty by a jury. The court sentenced him to pay a small fine, and endure a short imprisonment. The Governor of the state, however, pardoned him and paid the fine himself.

The next Sunday, Lorenzo preached to a crowded audience, commencing as follows:—

"There was, we learn from the New Testament, a certain rich man who lived, I think, in Jerusalem, and his name was Dives. He was clad in robes of purple linen, and fared sumptuously every day. That is, he lived high, or what may be called dissipated. Now there was also, I think, in Jerusalem, a certain beggar, named Lazarus, who asked to be fed only with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. He lay down at the gate of his palace, but the rich man would not hear him, but set his dogs on him. So this poor beggar died, and then his sorrows ended, for he was carried by angels to Abraham's bosom. Yea, Lazarus went up aloft—his spirit soared to heaven, where all good men will go when they die. But, my brethren, you will ask what became of Dives the rich man? Why, my friends, after awhile he died also, and I don't know but he died drunk. I will not, however, say so, positively, for I don't know but he has some relations among those who now hear me, and I may be prosecuted for defamation of character!"—Protestant.

PROPOSAL OF MARRIAGE.

A worthy young lover once sought for his bride,

A dame of the blue-stocking school;

"Excuse me, good sir, but I've vowed," she replied,

"That I never would marry a fool!"

"Then think not of wedlock," he answered, "my fair,

Your vow was Diana's suggestion,

Since none but a fool, it is easy to swear,

Would venture to ask you the question!

[Not so fast, my fond lover, she answered with glee,

Nor prate of chaste Di's intercession;

No wise one will take your opinion of me,

Because you're a fool by confession.]

An amusing anecdote of the eccentric tragedian, Mr. Booth, was told to us sometime ago by our friend Mr. C. H. Eaton. Both were engaged to perform at the same time in Washington—and the play in which they were to open was Othello. In the morning Mr. Eaton attended at the theatre, but no lago in the shape of Mr. Booth appeared—and of course there could be no rehearsal. In the afternoon while walking through Pennsylvania Avenue, Mr. Eaton encountered the delinquent. "Ah, Mr. Eaton," said the latter, "pardon me that I was not at the theatre." "Oh, it's of no consequence," answered Mr. E. "we can undoubtedly get along very well." "But it would be better to have a rehearsal," rejoined Mr. Booth:—"Suppose you take my arm, and rehearse up the avenue." They walked on, and the rehearsal proceeded. They had not gone far before the Baltimore manager met them—"Mr. Booth," said he, "I was in pursuit of you. I wish to have you perform at my theatre. I will give you one hundred dollars for—nights' performances." The tragedian answered with great gravity—"No, sir, I can't engage with you on those terms—I require two hundred and a clean shirt!" The manager smiled, "I'm not trifling, sir, answered he—"I will give you the sum I have named." Mr. B. opened his bosom, and displayed a shirt the "worse for wear."—"You see, sir, the condition I am in. Two hundred and a clean shirt." "Mr. Booth, I make a proper offer, sir—will you engage with me for two hundred?" "And a clean shirt"—persisted the actor without moving a muscle. "I have a shirt that you are welcome to," said Mr. Eaton. "Then, Mr. Manager," said Booth, "I can't engage with you. And the two walked on, while the rehearsal proceeded. They went to Mr. Eaton's rooms, where, without the least interruption of the dialogue, the shirt was produced, and Mr. B. denuded himself, and put it on—and then sought the street again. Soon the manager reappeared. "Well, Mr. Booth, will you accede to my terms?" "No," answered he, displaying his bosom, "I've got a clean shirt!"—N. E. Galaxy.

A GOOD CUSTOMER.—"What do you wish to get in your two bottles?" said a grocer to a little boy as he entered the store. "Mother wants to get a cent's worth of your best yeast." Which bottle will you have it in?" "I'll have it in both; and will you please to put a cork in 'em. Can't you send it home? 'cause I'm going another way?"—"Well, where's your cent?" "Mother says you must charge it!"

From the New Orleans Courier.

We present our readers with a poem of TOM MOORE's, never before published, for which we are indebted to a gentleman of this city. It was presented to him by the late celebrated Mrs. Siddons; the aunt of Mrs. Arkwright, who is only daughter of Stephen Kemble, and cousin to the present Mrs. Fanny Butler. The Irish bard in alluding to this poem observes:—"In these stanzas, I have done little more than relate a fact in verse, and the lady whose singing gave rise to this curious instance of the power of memory in sleep, is Mrs. Robert Arkwright."

THE DAY-DREAM.

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.

BY THOMAS MOORE.

They both were hush'd--the voice--the chords--
I heard but once the witching lay;
And few the tones, and few the words,
My spell-bound memory brought away.

Traces remembered here and there,
Like echoes of some broken strain;
Links of a sweetness lost in air,
That nothing now could join again.

E'en these, too, ere the morning fled;
And though the charm still linger'd on,
That o'er each sense her song had shed,
The song itself was faded--gone!

Gone, like the thoughts that once were ours,
On summer days, ere youth hath set,
Thoughts bright, we know, as summer flowers;
But what they were, we now forget!

In vain with hints from other strains
I wooed this truant air to come,
As birds are taught on eastern plains,
To love their wild and kindred home.

In vain;--the song that Sappho gave,
In dying, to the mournful sea,
Not muter slept beneath the wave,
Than this within my memory,

At length one morning as I lay
In that half-waking mood, when dreams
Unwillingly at last give way
To the full truth of day-light's beams--

A face,--the very face, methought,
From which had breath'd, as from a shrine
Of song and soul, the notes I sought,
Came with its music, close to mine.

And sung the long lost measure o'er,
Each note and word, with every tone
And look that lent it life before,
All perfect--all again my own!

Like parted souls, when, mid the blest,
They meet again, each widow'd sound
Through memory's realm had wing'd in quest
Of its sweet mate, till all were found.

Nor e'en in waking did the clue,
Thus strangely caught, escape again;
For never lark its matins knew
So well, as now I knew this strain.

And oft, when memory's wondrous spell
Is talk'd of in our tranquil bower,
I sing this lady's song and tell
The vision of that morning hour.

LITERARY PORT FOLIO.

LIFE OF WASHINGTON, in Latin prose: by Francis Glass, A. M. of Ohio. Edited by J. N. Reynolds. New York. Harper & Brothers.

The above work, from some cause or other--we suppose an oversight of the publishers--did not reach us until within a few days; and we embrace the earliest opportunity of recording our opinion of its merits. This, however, is almost an unnecessary task, since it has not only been eulogised by all the leading newspapers and reviews throughout the country--but also recommended to public attention by many distinguished scholars, among whom we might name Professor Arthon, of Columbia College, New York, and Professor Wylie of the Pennsylvania University in this city--no mean authorities.

American literature, it might be remarked, has long been a theme for the sneers of Transatlantic critics; and no one who is at all conversant with the English Reviews, can have forgotten the insolent assertion contained in the Quarterly, that centuries must elapse before we could become sufficiently indoctrinated in classical literature, to produce even a tolerable specimen of Latin composition. This prediction seems also to have been verified by numerous subsequent travellers, such as the Halls and Hamiltons, Trollopes and Fiddlers, who have proved, beyond a doubt, that, although we are tolerably well skilled in the art of constructing a canal or rail-way, yet we are utterly wanting in every thing that relates to classical education. But it was nevertheless reserved for a son of the wilderness--the inmate of a wretched hovel in the wilds of Ohio--a lonely and almost unfriended student, who had withdrawn himself from the world and its enjoyments, to disprove those malignant assertions, and prepare a work in Classical Literature, which should challenge the admiration of the scholar and sage, the philosopher and historian. That man, we need not say, was Francis Glass, who, like the great architect of St. Paul's Cathedral, needs no other monument than that of his works.

The preface to the Life of Washington, from the pen of the Editor, J. N. Reynolds, A. M. is replete with interest, and details, in a neat and unaffected style, the circumstances which induced him to cultivate the acquaintance of Mr. Glass: he also gives a brief sketch of his life and peculiar habits, and concludes with an account of the planing and execution of the "Vita Washingtonii." We make no apology for the following very interesting extract, which displays the philanthropic character of the editor no less than the erudition and amiability of the unfortunate Glass.

It is a duty we owe to society, to preserve every memorial of intellectual superiority, that chance may throw in our way, and, more particularly so, those productions which reflect honor on our native genius. The literature of a nation is not to be built up like a modern edifice, with suitable honors, "a true and trusty" corner-stone, conveying the memorabilia of the age; but must have accident and design, small things, as well as great, in its foundation.

The following classical production came into my possession in so singular a way, that I feel bound to give the reader the whole history of it. In the summer of 1823, I was a member of the Ohio University, and left that Institution, expecting to return to college to pursue my studies, in the winter; but circumstances, unnecessary for me to state, prevented me from joining my class at that time, and I was induced to seek, in the western part of the state, a person with whom I could prosecute my studies during the winter season. I heard of a competent teacher in Warren county, of which Lebanon is the shire, situate about thirty miles from Cincinnati. He had excited no small degree of interest among the few who were capable of appreciating his extraordinary attainments in classical literature.--This man was Francis Glass, the author of the following work, "The Life of Washington."

I found him in a remote part of the county, in a good neighborhood of thrifty farmers, who had employed him to instruct their children, who, in general, were then acquiring the simplest rudiments of an English education. The school-house now rises fresh on my memory. It stood on the banks of a small stream, in a thick grove of native oaks, resembling more a den for Druidical rites, than a temple of learning. The building was a low log-cabin, with a clapboard roof, but indifferently tight--all the light of heaven, found in this cabin, came through apertures made on each side in the logs, and these were covered with oiled paper to keep out the cold air, while they admitted the dim rays.

The seats, or benches, were of hewn timbers, resting on upright posts, placed in the ground to keep them from being overturned by the mischievous urchins who sat on them. In the centre was a large stove between which and the back part of the building, stood a small desk, without lock or key, made of rough plank, over which a plane had never passed, and, behind this desk, sat Professor Glass when I entered his school.

There might have been forty scholars present; twenty-five of these were engaged in spelling, reading, and writing, a few in arithmetic, a small class in English grammar; and a half a dozen, like myself, had joined his school, for the benefit of his instruction in the Greek and Latin languages, preparatory to a more extended course in one of the Ohio seminaries.

The moment he learned that my intention was to pursue the study of the languages with him, his whole soul appeared to beam from his countenance. He commenced in a strain, which in another would have seemed pedantic, but which, in fact, was far from being so on him.

The following imperfect sketch, drawn entirely from memory, may serve to give some idea of his peculiar manner:--"Welcome to the shrine of the Muses, my young friend, Salve! The temple of the Delphian God was originally a laurel hut, and the Muses deign to dwell, accordingly, even in my rustic abode. 'Non humilem domum fastidiunt, umbrosamve ripam.' Here, too, the winds hold converse, 'Eurus, and Caurus, and Argestes loud, and the goddesses of the Castalian fountain, the daughters of the golden-haired Mnemosyne, are sometimes silent with the lyre, 'citharâ tacentes,' that they may catch the sweet murmurs of the harp of Aeolus. Here, too, I, the priest of the muses, Musarum sacerdos, sing, to the young of either sex, strains before unheard, 'Virginibus querisque canto.' Plutus, indeed, that blind old deity, is far away; and far away let him be, for well has the prince of comic poets styled him a 'filthy, crooked, miserable, wrinkled, bald, and toothless creature!'

Such was my first interview. It was a display perfectly natural, and without the least apparent consciousness of effort on his part. From this moment he took the greatest interest in my studies, and I enjoyed not only his instruction during school hours, but--as I had taken up my lodgings at a farm-house about half a mile from his school, on the road to his own humble residence, situate a mile beyond--almost every evening, from his deep interest in my progress was spent with me at my dwelling.

While at the Ohio University, I had enjoyed the privilege of able instruction from the Professor of Languages in that institution; but so far as I was capable of judging, or making comparison, the attainments and readiness of Glass seemed altogether superior to any thing I had witnessed. While reading Horace, for instance, the happy illustrations applied to each line, or word, gave an interest to my studies absolutely fascinating. Sometimes, when in a happy mood—and I soon learned that he was not always happy—he would hold me a delighted auditor, for a whole evening, while analyzing and pointing out the beauties of a single ode. The whole range of classic authors was at his tongue's end, and he would recite from them with a facility and an accuracy truly astonishing. Every thing, by way of illustration or comparison, was introduced, with such an inimitable and sweet simplicity, that, to me, it seemed as if I had never before understood the beauties of the authors I had been reading, or properly appreciated the flow, strength, and grandeur of the Latin tongue.

Mr. Reynolds likewise explains, very clearly and satisfactorily, the mode adopted by Glass, for the expression of "Equivalents"—that is, the modern terms of science and art, which, owing to the state of society in ancient times, have no direct synonyme in the Latin. Thus, at the very outset, he removes obstacles which many able scholars have been unable to surmount, from too great a fastidiousness in adhering strictly to the ancient acceptance of words and phrases. Having thus cleared the way of these obstructions, Glass proceeds in an unadorned, concise manner, to detail the leading events in the Life of Washington, and the war of our independence—contriving to embody more narration and incident in a volume of about two hundred pages, than could possibly be compressed in double that number of pages in English. A history of our Revolution such as this, is the first which should be placed in the hands of youth, destined for a classical education; indeed, we cannot too strongly recommend its introduction into our preparatory schools as a substitute for those uninteresting (to the pupil) compends of Sacred History an ancient anecdote, which almost invariably disgust him with the study of the dead Languages. Not so, however, with the present work; the subject, alone—recording as it does, events almost daily alluded to in our conversation—will have for him a peculiar interest, it not a charm—and he will be led on, step by step, until he finds himself no mean proficient in classical studies. Our thanks are richly due to Mr. Reynolds, the enterprising editor, without whose opportunity and judicious aid, this work would never have been matured; and trust that he will not intermit his efforts in behalf of our national literature, for which he has already accomplished so much.

RIENZI.—This is unquestionably one of Mr. Bulwer's very best productions. It has none of the sparkling wit or classical allusion which you are disposed to laugh at in Pelham; nor the vague and dreamy speculation over which you sometimes ponder in Eugene Aram: it is a work of a different, and we might say, higher order, resting (in some measure) its claim to public favor, in the truth and fidelity of its historical delineations. The character of Rienzi, the devoted patriot—the stern and resolute soldier—the noble and majestic senator,—though sometimes approaching the mock-heroic—is finely drawn—and is beautifully contrasted with the affectionate Nina, or the still more gentle and confiding Irene. The character, too, of Adrain and Montreuil, are strikingly portrayed; the one, highminded and ingenious—the other, dark, subtle, and intriguing. In this respect the novel of Rienzi may be said to resemble a beautiful picture: the light and shade is distributed though it so admirably, that each character is presented to the eye of the reader in bold relief—the one, imparting life, brilliancy, and interest to the other. But it is not so much a matter of surprise, that Mr. Bulwer should write a series of splendid fictions, as that his two penny critics, who, it may be, have had their wits sharpened by dealing out musty volumes to the patrons of a circulating library, or some similar employment, should pronounce against him, and declare their non-approval of his works, when they, themselves, are incapable of writing a decent paragraph for the wretched hebdomadals which they assume to edit. It is the ignorance and vulgarity of such creatures, that disarms criticism of its legitimate and wholesome influence; and so long as they continue to disgrace themselves and the community by their illiberal and unmeaning strictures upon the literature of the day, we may look in vain for any thing like a correct appreciation of merit among those whose judgment they may have it in their power to sway.

The following is an extract from Rienzi, which, we think, will be read with interest by a majority of our readers.

THE PRISON.

The night slowly advanced, and in the highest chamber of that dark and rugged tower which fronted the windows of the Cæsar's palace, sat a solitary prisoner. A single lamp burnt before him on a table of stone, and threw its rays over an open Bible; and those stern but fantastic legends of the prowess of ancient Rome, which the genius of Livy has dignified into history. A chain hung pendant from the wall of the tower, and confined the captive; but so as to leave his limbs at sufficient liberty to measure at will the greater part of the cell. Green and damp were the mighty stones of the walls, and through a narrow aperture, high out of reach, came the moonlight, and slept in long shadow over the rude floor. A bed at one corner completed the furniture of the room. Such for months had been the abode of the conqueror of the haughtiest barons, and the dictator of the state—the least city of the world!

Care, and travel, and time, and adversity, had wrought their change in the person of Rienzi. The proportions of his frame had enlarged from the compact strength of earlier manhood, the clear paleness of his cheek was bespread with a hectic and deceitful glow. Even in his present studies, intent as they seemed, and genial though the lecture to a mind enthusiastic even to fanaticism, his eyes could not rivet themselves as of yore steadily to the page. The charm was gone from the letters. Every now and then he moved restlessly, started, resettled himself, and muttered broken exclamations like a man in an anxious dream. Anon, his gaze, impatiently turned upward, about, around, and there was a strange and wandering fire in those large deep eyes, which might have thrilled the beholder with a vague and unaccountable awe.

Angelo had in the main correctly narrated the latter of the adventure of Rienzi after his fall. He had first with Nina and Angelo betaken himself to Naples, and found a fallacious and brief favor with Louis King of Hungary; that harsh but honorable monarch had refused to yield his illustrious guest to the demands of Clement, but had plainly declared his inability to shelter him in safety. Maintaining secret intercourse with his partisans at Rome, the fugitive then sought a refuge with the Eremites, sequestered in the lone recesses of the Monte Mariella, where in solitude and thought he had passed a whole year, save the time consumed in his visit to and return from Florence. Taking advantage of the jubilee in Rome, he had then, disguised as a pilgrim, traversed the vales and mountains still rich in the melancholy ruins of ancient Rome, and entering the city, his restless and ambitious spirit indulged in new but vain conspiracies.

Excommunicated a second time by the Cardinal di Ceccano, and again a fugitive, he shook the dust from his feet as he left the city, and raising his hand towards those walls in which are yet traced the witness of the Tarquins, cried aloud, "Honored as thy prince—persecuted as the victim—Rome, Rome, thou shalt yet receive me as thy conqueror!"

Still disguised as a pilgrim, he passed unscathed through Italy into the court of the Emperor Charles of Bohemia, where the page, who had probably witnessed, had rightly narrated, his reception. It is doubtful, however, whether the conduct of the emperor had been as chivalrous as appears by Angelo's relation, or whether he had not delivered Rienzi to the pontiff's emissaries. At all events, it is certain, that from Prague to Avignon, the path of the fallen tribune had been as one triumph. The lapse of years—his strange adventures—his unbroken spirit—the disorders of Rome, when relieved from his inflexible justice—the new power that intellect daily and wonderfully excited over the minds of the rising generation—the eloquence of Petrarch, and the common sympathy of the vulgar for fallen greatness—all conspired to make Rienzi the hero of the age. Not a town through which he passed which would not have risked a siege for his protection—not a house that would not have sheltered him—not a hand that would not have struck in his defence. Refusing all offers of aid, disdaining all occasions of escape, inspired by his indomitable hope, and his unalloyed belief in the brightness of his own destinies, the tribune sought Avignon—and found a dungeon!

These, his external adventures, are briefly and easily told, but who shall tell what passed within?—who narrate the fearful history of the heart?—who paint the rapid changes of emotion and of thought—the indignant grief—the stern dejection—the haughty disappointment that saddened while it never destroyed the resolve of that great soul? Who can say what must have been endured, what mediated, in the hermitage of Mariella;—on the lonely hills of the perished empire it had been his dream to restore;—in the courts of barbarian kings;—and, above all, on returning, obscure and disguised, amid the crowds of the Christian world, to the seat of his former power? What elements of memory, and in what a wild and fiery brain! What recollections to be conned in the dungeons of Avignon, by a man who had pushed into all the terrors of fanaticism—four passions, a single one of which has, in excess, sufficed to wreck the strongest reason—passions which, in themselves, it is most difficult to combine,—the dreamer—the aspirant—the very nympholept of freedom, yet of power—of knowledge, yet of religion!

In a few minutes he was apparently absorbed in the lecture; so intent indeed was he in the task, that he did not hear the steps which wound the spiral stairs that conducted to his cell, and it was not till the wards harshly grated beneath the huge key, and the door creaked on its hinges, that Rienzi, in amaze at intrusion at so unwonted an hour, lifted his eyes. The door had reclosed on the dungeon, and by the lonely and pale lamp, he beheld a figure leaning, as for support, against the wall. The figure was wrapped from head to foot in the long cloak of the day, and, aided by a broad hat, shaded by plumes, concealed even the features of the visitor.

Rienzi gazed long and wistfully.

"Speak," he said at length, putting his hand to his brow. "Methinks either long solitude has bewildered me, or, sweet sir, your apparition dazzles. I know you not—I am sure?"—and Rienzi's hair bristled while he slowly rose—"Am I sure that it is a living man who stands before me!—Angels have entered the prison-house before now. Alas! an angel's comfort never was more needed."

The stranger answered not, but the captive saw that his heart heaved even beneath his cloak; loud sobs choked his voice; at length, as by a violent effort, he sprung forward, and sunk at the tribune's feet. The disguising hat, the long mantle fell to the ground—it was the face of a woman that looked upward through passionate and glazing tears—the arms of a woman that clasped the prisoner's knees! Rienzi gazed mute and motionless as stone. "Powers and saints of heaven!" he muttered at last, "do ye tempt me further!—is it?—no, no—yet speak!"

"Beloved—adored!—do you not know me?"

"It is—it is!" shrieked Rienzi, wildly, "it is my Nina—my wife—my—" His voice forsook him. Clapsed in each other's arms, the unfortunates for some moments seemed to have lost even the sense of delight at their reunion. It was as an unconscious and deep trance, through which something like a dream only faintly and indistinctly stirs.

At length recovered—at length restored, the first broken exclamations, the first wild caresses of joy over—Nina lifted her head from her husband's bosom, and gazed sadly on his countenance—"Oh what thou hast known since we parted!—what, since that hour, when borne on by the bold heart and wild destiny, thou didst leave me in the imperial court, to seek again the diadem and find the chain! Ah! why did I heed thy commands—why suffer thee to depart alone! How often, in thy progress hitherward, in doubt and danger, might this bosom have been thy resting-place, and this voice have whispered comfort to thy soul! Thou art well, my lord—my Cola? Thy pulse beats quicker than of old—thy brow is furrowed. Ah! tell me thou art well!"

"Well!" said Rienzi, mechanically. "Methinks so!—the mind diseased blunts all sense of bodily decay. Well!—yes! And you—you, at least, are not changed, save to maturer beauty. The glory of the laurel-wreath has not faded from thy brow. Thou shalt yet—" then breaking off abruptly—"Rome—tell me of Rome! And thou—how camest thou hither! Ah! perhaps my doom is set, and in their mercy they have vouchsafed that I should see thee once more before the deathman blinds me. I remember. It is the grace vouchsafed to malefactors. When I was a lord of life and death, I, too, permitted the meanest criminal to say farewell to those he loved."

"No—not so, Cola!" exclaimed Nina, putting her hand before his mouth. "I bring thee more auspicious tidings. To-morrow thou art to be heard. The favour of the court is propitiated. Thou wilt be acquitted."

"Ha! speak again."

"Thou wilt be heard, my Cola—thou must be acquitted."

"And Rome be free!—Great God, I thank thee!" The tribune sank on his knees, and never had his heart, in his youngest, purest hour, poured forth thanksgiving more fervent, yet less selfish. When he rose again, the whole man seemed changed. His eye had resumed its earlier expression of deep and serene command. Majesty sat upon his brow. The sorrows of the exile were forgotten. In his sanguine and rapid thoughts, he stood once more the guardian of his country,—and its sovereign!

PRACTICAL TREATISE ON THE CULTURE OF SILK.—Mr. F. S. Comstock, the editor of the Hartford "Silk Culturist" and secretary of the Hartford County Silk Society, has just issued a valuable little book entitled "A Practical Treatise on the Culture of Silk, adapted to the soil and climate of the United States." It contains all the necessary instructions relative to the mode of planting and treating the Mulberry tree,—the kinds of soil best adapted to it—the management of the Silk Worm from the egg, to the cocoons, and the reeling, manufacturing and dyeing of silk, with explanatory cuts, so complete yet simple, as to give a thorough insight into all parts of the business to the most inexperienced mind. It is a valuable manual to all persons desirous of embarking in the business, which is now spreading rapidly through the United States. As such it cannot fail to be in demand.

Messrs. Marshall & Co. booksellers, at the north west corner of Fifth and Chesnut streets, have the treatise for sale—price 50 cents.

DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH AND GERMAN LANGUAGES.—Such a work as this has long been needed by the American public: it is presented to us in a cheap and popular form; and is admirably adapted as a book of reference, instead of those large and expensive editions which have hitherto occupied our tables for every day use. The author is P. J. Hunst, now resident in this country, but formerly of one of the German universities—a ripe and able scholar. The work contains all the words in general use, designating the various parts of speech in both languages, with the genders and plurals of the German nouns, the division of words into syllables, and the separation of compound nouns by double-hyphens according to their formation. The author well remarks in his preface, "Some of the finest writings of the age are to be found in the German language, as well in the department of fiction and fancy as in the more substantial walks of science and philosophy. In mathematics, metaphysics, astronomy, and many other of the natural and speculative sciences, no people have made greater advances than the Germans, and yet for the want of a more perfect knowledge of their language, few in America are permitted to reap the advantages of their discoveries."

CARPENTER'S FAMILY DISPENSARY.—This is a beautifully bound volume which has just made its appearance in this city. It contains a select catalogue of Drugs, Chemicals, and Family Medicines, with the properties and doses of each article most approved of in domestic medicine. Appended to the work is also a concise description of diseases, with directions for the treatment of such as are unattended with serious consequences—showing the best immediate measures to be adopted, in those disorders and accidents which are destructive to life, when the physician is not at hand, or until his assistance can be procured. Mr. Carpenter acknowledges in his preface the assistance of a medical gentleman in the composition of the "Dispensary," which he designs more especially for the use of families who reside in the country, and at a distance from medical aid.

PARRISH'S SURGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—We are indebted to Messrs. Key & Biddle for a copy of a new valuable work, just published, under the title of "Practical Observations on Strangulated Hernia, and some of the diseases of the Urinary organs," by JOSEPH PARRISH, M. D. one of the oldest and most respected physicians of this city. The work comprises the personal observations of the author, on various important and critical diseases, incident to the human frame, during a long and very extensive practice, and it cannot but prove of great value to the Medical Faculty throughout the country. The volume is dedicated to Dr. Physick, and the dedication, which we append, is the nearest affair of the kind that we have ever seen.

TO PHILIP SYNG PHYSICK, M. D.

The fathers of the medical profession in the days of my pupilage are gone—but thou art still among us. Permit one who knew thee in the vigour of manhood, and listened with deep instruction to thy private lectures, before thy elevation to a Professor's chair, thus publicly to acknowledge the numerous acts of kindness and confidence received at thy hands.

Under these feelings, can I do other than cherish recollections of the past, accompanied with a desire, that now when the shadows of the evening are lengthened out, consolations may gather thickly around thee, soothed by a consciousness of a faithful discharge of duty, and remembering that a grateful community are prepared to acknowledge that thy "lamp has burned for the good of others?" THE AUTHOR.

GOLDSMITH'S HISTORY OF GREECE.—The same publishers have just issued a revised and improved edition of Pinnock's Goldsmith's History of Greece, abridged for the use of schools, and illustrated with thirty-two engravings on Wood. The additions to Dr. Goldsmith's work are, a brief sketch of modern Grecian history, several introductory chapters on the natural character of that people, abridged from Professor Heeren's work on the political history of Greece, and an account of Grecian literature and philosophy, calculated to excite in the mind of the student a desire for a more intimate acquaintance with Grecian history. This publication will prove a valuable addition to the school books of the day.

PHRENOLOGY.—We have before us two new works on the subject of Phrenology—one by Mrs. L. Miles, published by Carey, Lea & Blanchard of this city, and the other by Silas Jones, published by Russell, Shattuck & Williams, Boston. The first publication is designed more particularly for ladies, and the authoress, using the developments of Spurzheim and Gall, gives a brief but very satisfactory synopsis of the various branches of Phrenology, so arranged as to exhibit the moral influence of the science, and to serve as a manual or text book for schools. Mr. Jones's work is more full and elaborate, as, in addition to an exposition of the various organs, classed in Phrenology, he offers remarks on the qualifications necessary to the practical application of the science, and furnishes illustrations tending to establish its truth, in a critical examination of the heads of Burns, Sheridan, Chief Justice Marshall, Washington, Franklin, Michael Angelo, Black Hawk, Miss Clara Fisher, and several other distinguished characters. Both publications are well entitled to the consideration of those who feel any interest in this important science.

A LADY'S OPINION OF PAUL ULRIC.—We already have copied several notices of Mr. Mattson's new novel, Paul Ulric—enough at least to show with what favour it was generally received—but since a lady has also complimented the author we cannot refrain from adding the additional weight of her testimony in its favour. The notice alluded to, we find in a late number of the Pennsylvania Inquirer, which the editor states, is from the pen of "Mrs. Stephens, the accomplished editress of the Portland Magazine." It is as follows:—

"Here is another new book, by a new author, and one which disappointed us very pleasantly. The first sixty pages dragged off somewhat heavily—then the interest began to increase, and we entered upon the second volume in a very good humour with the author. This we read thoroughly without rising from our chair, and closed with the opinion, that 'Paul Ulric' is a good book—a very good book. The plot does not open quite early enough, yet it is skillfully developed, and some of his descriptions are fine.—Lans Lawler's death is thrilling and highly descriptive. The shipwreck is one of the most exciting portions of the book, and Meg Lawler's story, as a detached tale, is highly interesting."

No. 3. PHILADELPHIA.---MARCH. [1836.]

SKETCH OF MEXICO.

The Republic of the United States of Mexico is bounded E. by the Gulf of Mexico and Louisiana, W. by the Pacific Ocean, N. by the United States of North America, and S. by Guatemala, in Central America. It lies between 87° and 124° E. long. and 15° and 42° N. lat. extending over 27 degrees of latitude, or 1876 miles from north to south. Its greatest breadth, according to Humboldt, is 364 leagues, 25 to a degree. Hitherto our acquaintance with this extensive country has been very limited, journeys into the interior being almost impracticable, either for purposes of observation or trade, on account of the great numbers of unfriendly Indians who roam over those parts. Almost the whole of the immense region lying north of 28°, comprising 14 degrees of latitude, is uninhabited by whites, and has never been fairly explored. Previous to Humboldt's publication on Mexico, the elements of a good map did not exist, and many of the principal towns and rivers were entirely unknown. The works of Humboldt and Ward, have, however, furnished considerable information respecting this country, and the character of the people by whom it is inhabited, and the details which they present are deeply interesting. In the present sketch we have drawn largely from these publications, as condensed in the Encyclopedia Americana.

The territory of Mexico presents, according to Humboldt, a surface of 118,478 square leagues, of twenty-five to the degree; but this estimate does not include the space between the northern extremity of New Mexico and Sonora, and the boundary line of the United States. About one third of this territory lies within the torrid zone, but the peculiar geological structure of the republic exerts the most striking influence upon the climate. The Cordillera of Mexico separates into two branches, which, diverging to the north-east and north-west, form, as it were, the declivities of an elevated platform, or table-land, which, in the more central parts, is raised to an elevation of 7000 feet above the level of the sea, and extends to the north as far as the limits of the torrid zone. This remarkable elevation modifies the effect of the geographical position of the country in such a manner that, while the towns on the central plateau enjoy a mild temperature, those on the eastern and western coasts are exposed to a torrid sun, and the intervening space is filled with almost every modification of heat. In ascending from the low country, the climates succeed each other in layers, and in two days the whole scale of vegetation is presented to view. Again above this table-land rise ridges, or single prominences, in which the same appearances are exhibited. Durango is situated 6848 feet above the level of the sea; Zacatecas, 8169; Catorce, 9254; to the south, Jalapa, 4335; Perote, 7724; La Puebla, 7200; Chihuahua, 5428; to the west, Valladolid, 6434; Guanajuato, 6825; Queretaro, 6362; in the centre, Mexico is situated in a large valley, or basin, 7000 feet above the sea. Some of the haciendas, or residences, are about 10,000 feet high, and, in some instances, carriage roads pass over still more elevated positions. The principal summits are, Popocatepetl, 17,884 feet; Orizaba, 17,373; Cerro de la Leona, near Catorce, 10,645; and Istaccihuatl, 15,704. There are five volcanoes in activity, all near the 19th parallel of latitude—Orizaba, Popocatepetl, Tuxtla, Colima and Jorullo; earthquakes are frequent, but not destructive.

The inhabitants designate these successive climates by appropriate names: the low, hot country is called tierra caliente; the higher regions, tierra fria (cold country); and the intermediate regions, tierra templada (temperate country). Our division of the year, into four periods, is there unknown, the only distinction being into the rainy season, which commences about the end of May, and lasts four months, and the dry season, which comprises the rest of the year. Mexico suffers for want of water. The rivers are few and insignificant, if we except the Colorado, the del Norte and the Grande. The lakes, which abound, appear to diminish gradually; the principal are, Chapala, Zumpango, S. Christoval, Tezcuco, &c. in the valley of Mexico; Cayman and Parras, in the Bolson de Mapimi; and the Timpanogos, further north. Among the various productions are maize and other corn, the banana, manioc, tropical fruits, cotton, coffee, sugar, tobacco, indigo, vanilla, cochineal, &c. Maize is produced in almost every part of the country, and in great abundance; its flour forms the chief food of the bulk of the inhabitants. Wheat succeeds very well on the table-land, but in the tierra caliente, the ear will not form, and the difficulty of communication between the coast and upper country is such, that the former may be supplied, at a cheaper rate, from the United States of North America. Sugar is similar to that of the Sea Islands. The central part of Texas is prairie, nearly level, and abounding with a most luxuriant vegetation; the banks of the rivers being lined with timber, or skirted by ground, gently undulating, and covered with trees. Here the depth of rich alluvial soil is very considerable, and cotton, wheat, barley, rye, Indian corn, indeed, every production, both of more temperate climates and of Europe, is produced in equal abundance and perfection. The prairies, in their natural state, afford a constant supply of excellent pasture. The banks of the San Marcos were selected by the Spaniards as excelling in fertility, for the establishment of a colony, projected in 1804; and those of the Colorado and Nueces are also spoken of in very high terms by all who have visited them. In the North-western-most part of the mountainous district of San Saba, the ground is in general rocky and sterile. Towards the east there are also extensive hills, covered with fir-trees. This land is poor, but would evidently produce wine, since the vine grows there spontaneously, and in great abundance. There are three sorts, two of which are small and sour, but the grape of the other, although the skin is thick, is large and sweet. The valley of the Red River is stated, by the numerous North American settlers, to contain some millions of acres, exceeding in fertility even the celebrated Mississippi bottom, the valley of the Roanoke, or, indeed, any lands to be found in the United States. They have styled it the "Garden of the West," and the cotton which it already produces, far excels the Alabama, Tennessee, or, indeed, any, excepting that of the Sea Islands. I here ought to remark, that growing cotton possesses one great advantage. Children so young as to be unable to engage in any other occupation, can be employed in picking cotton, and at the age of nine or ten, probably do fully as much as grown up persons. Every species of grain thrives admirably in this fertile tract, and it is thought that the ribbed sugar-cane, lately introduced from the Philippines, and which arrives at maturity a month sooner than the common sort, would answer well there. In the valleys is found the red, or pencil cedar of the largest growth, also a great quantity of the Bois d'arc, of which the Indians make their bows. It is of a beautiful yellow colour, susceptible of the highest polish, not heavy, but exceedingly tough and elastic. In addition to these, trees of all the varieties which flourish in the United States are to be met with; white, red, dwarf, or scrub, and post oaks; (of the former of which staves are made; while the latter is so strong, hard, and tough, that it is frequently employed in lieu of iron to make the screws of the cotton presses;) together with iron-wood, hickory, and many other woods admirably adapted for the lathe. The sugar-maple is also very valuable: an auger-hole being bored in its trunk in the spring of the year, a small spout is inserted, and the liquor, which is subsequently evaporated to a consistency, is caught in a vessel. A single tree has been known to yield one hundred and fifty pounds of sugar; the average daily produce being from three to four or six pounds. I found its flavour very pleasant, but do not think it is nearly so sweet as the common sugar.

Those who have been settled in Texas a few months, really enjoy more comforts (and these, in addition to the opportunity of realizing a handsome property,) than any peasantry with which I am acquainted. One act of liberality and hospitality which is constantly practised by all his neighbours towards a new comer, whose character is found unexceptionable, would do honour to the most highly civilized people. They all assemble at the spot which he has fixed upon for his residence, with their axes and draught-oxen, fell the timber, and build for him his log-hut. This generally consists of three apartments, one for sleeping, another for eating, both closed in all round, while in the centre, which is left open on both sides, he keeps his saddles and tools, and takes his meals during the hot weather. The kitchen (also a log-hut) is usually separated from the house, as is also the smoke house, where his meat is smoked and kept.—The log-hut is by no means an inconvenient residence; indeed, some of them are roomy, neat, and durable, very strong, and well calculated to afford protection from every inclemency of the weather.

The wild animals to be met with in Texas, are the buffalo, or bison, known in this country as the bonassus, which enters Texas, from the North, in vast herds during the winter; the panther, leopard, bear, otter, beaver, antelope, deer, racoon, black fox, &c. Turkeys abound; there are two species of the partridge; swans often arrive in great numbers, together with immense flocks of wild ducks and geese. The flesh of the buffalo, especially its hump, is excellent, and generally prized far above beef; the bear's ham is also considered a great delicacy. But by far the most interesting animal is the wild horse. From Barbary, the Arab, transplanted into Spain, passed from thence to the New World, and torn loose by the first European settlers, it has peopled the rich plains of Texas with droves innumerable. The mustang, or wild horse, is not often large or heavy, but shows blood; it is well made, hardy, active, and, if caught young, very docile, although whenever an opportunity offers, apt to rejoin its wild brethren. The piebald, light brown, chestnut and dun colours prevail. Their defect is the tenderness of the hoof, which is too frequently to be met with amongst them, as bred on soft ground; whereas, throughout Mexico, those which are reared on a hard rocky soil, have a solidity of hoof which renders shoes unnecessary, even to the fore feet; the hind feet are seldom shod. The mode of catching them is similar to that by which wild elephants are caught in India. A space sufficiently large to contain a drove is inclosed with stakes, trunks, and branches of trees; the entrance is narrow, but gradually widens outwards, and a herd is driven, or decoyed into it by a horse taught for the purpose. I have seen instances of attachment on the part of a young colt thus caught to a careful master, far stronger than any that I ever before witnessed in a horse.

Of the many tribes of Indians, who either occupy fixed habitations, or wander over certain districts of this vast country, the Comanches are by far the most numerous. Their principal occupation is the chase of the buffalo, which they follow to the north during the summer, over the vast plains which lie between the head-waters of the Red River, the Arkansas, the Bravo del Norte, and the Missouri. In the winter, when the snow compels the innumerable herds of these animals to seek a milder climate, the Indians deposit the skins which they have obtained amongst the mountains of San Saba, and pursue the buffaloes to the frontiers of Cohahuila. At this period they have not unfrequently stolen across the River Bravo del Norte, killed the herdsmen, and carried off the cattle from different parts of the adjacent districts. They have also occasionally ventured to attack the Haciendas and hamlets, carrying off the inhabitants, some of whom have been sold, as is currently reported throughout Cohahuila, as slaves, on the borders of the United States.

If a wandering tribe can be said to have a residence, that of the Comanches is the mountainous district of San Saba, which they cross both in the spring and autumn, and where they deposit their families occasionally during their long expeditions. These Indians generally kill the buffalo with their bow and arrow, their horses being trained to carry them close to it, and on its right side. Sometimes they pursue, and with a sharp iron (crescent-shaped), passing its left flank, sever the ham-string of the right leg, when the animal falls away from the horse: they sometimes also shoot it with the rifle. The scent of the buffalo is however so acute, that it can be only approached from the leeward side: it is timid until wounded, but then its impetuosity is irresistible, and its attacks are repeated until it falls. Being both active, and from its vast bulk very powerful, the charge of an old bull is described as tremendous. The long shaggy hair which covers its head and breast, gives it a terrific appearance, as it rushes headlong at whatever it perceives, (often the smoke of the rifle,) blowing and snorting with astonishing loudness. Should it discover and throw down its antagonist, it gores and tramples upon him until (if desperately wounded) it falls dead by his side. The horns of the buffalo are short, but very sharp pointed, although thick at the base. Being very hard and black, they are highly prized for cups and other purposes. Its flesh, when fat, is excellent, especially the hump: the skins, covered with an excessively thick hair, nearly approaching to wool, are much used in the Northern parts of the United States, more especially as a wrapper when travelling in the sledges or sleighs, over the ice or snow. The Indians give a softness and pliability to these skins greater than that of the buck, or even doe-skin of Europe. The following is, I believe, the process adopted:—after tanning with sumach and bark, the skin is stretched over a hole in the earth, and smoked; the brains of the animal and alum are also rubbed into it. It is subsequently painted in cheques, diamonds, and similar figures, the colours being very durable.

Until the year 1823, excepting the wild Indian tribes, there were no inhabitants except at the town of San Antonio de Bexar, and in its immediate neighbourhood; at the fort of the Bahia del Espiritu Santo, and in the environs of Nacogdoch. The whole number hardly amounted to three thousand souls. Many small grants had been made to individuals of lands near the rivers Sabina, Nechas, and Angulino, but nearly all of them remained untenanted. The first persons who ever took efficacious measures to carry into effect extensive schemes of colonization in Texas, on their own private account, were Mr. Austin, an inhabitant of Louisiana, and Colonel Milam. The former, after traversing this vast country near the coast, fixed on the spot between the rivers Brazos and Colorado, where he obtained a very extensive grant from the Spanish Government. Embarrassments, owing to the failure of a large proportion of the banks of the Western States, together with the Revolution, prevented his reaping the fruits of his exertions. His eldest son, Stephen Fuller Austin, succeeded to the claims and to the indefatigable and enterprising spirit of his father, who died about the year 1820 or 1821. In 1823, he obtained from the first Independent Congress the recognition of the grant; and though inundations, which there was no reason to anticipate, have twice done serious injury to the infant colony, he has the merit of having succeeded in peopling a wilderness, and providing a number of industrious families with an ample subsistence, as well as with the means of acquiring not only comforts, but wealth. The settlers on his lands are all North Americans; nevertheless, it is but justice to state, that in the late business, when a few of their countrymen proclaimed Texas independent of Mexico, (the Fredonia scheme,) his and their conduct proved their fidelity to the Government of their adopted country; Austin, at the head of all who were capable of bearing arms, having offered to take them up in defence of the legitimate Government. This colony is in the neighbourhood of some small tribes of Indians, whose pilferings it has been often necessary to chastise. Colonel Benjamin Milam, endowed by nature with a strength of mind and spirit of enterprise almost peculiar to the inhabitants of the Western States of America, associated with the Indian tribes in order to explore the more Southern parts of this extensive country. He subsequently engaged in the war which gave independence to Mexico; and his courage, activity, zeal, and love of freedom, caused his rapid advancement. Finding that the lands on the South-west bank of the Red River were, in every respect, by far the most valuable in Texas, indeed, as he and all those who have examined them declare, far superior to those of any part of the United States which they have visited, he determined on settling there. Being, however, unable to obtain a grant in that quarter, he succeeded in his application for one on the river San Marcos, precisely at the spot where it was formerly intended by the Spanish Government to establish a colony.

Nature has evidently given to Texas commercial advantages, which she has denied to almost every other part of Mexico; indeed few countries, if any one, are more favourably situated for carrying on an extensive and lucrative foreign and domestic traffic.—The principal export doubtless will be cotton, which grows in the greatest abundance, and is in quality inferior only to that of the Sea Islands. As the capital employed in raising it is very inconsiderable, the Texas colonist will be able to undersell every competitor in foreign markets. His healthy lands, cultivated by free and cheap labour, cost him comparatively nothing; whilst the North American and West Indian require an interest on a large sum employed in the purchase of property and slaves, subject to many contingencies. Pot and pearl ashes will be obtained in clearing the lands. Texas will supply the West India Islands with timber, salted provisions, flour, and whatever else they now require from the United States, at least equal in quality, and at a lower price than they can be obtained from thence; mules and horses will also be exported to Cuba, and the Antilles. The Southern parts of the United States are already supplied from thence, and from Cohahuila with both; but more especially the former, which are sometimes embarked at the Brazos de Santiago, close to the mouth of the river Bravo del Norte, but more generally conveyed by land. It is thought that Texas may prove well suited for the growth of the Merino wool, both on account of the climate, and the extent of uncultivated land, over which they may be allowed to graze at liberty. The North Americans have exported wool from Cohahuila, but I have been informed, that although the staple is long, it is by no means fine, and there is a burr in it, which it requires much trouble to extract. The latter disadvantage will not be met with in Texas, except possibly amongst the mountains of San Saba; for I have observed throughout Mexico, that wherever the land is arid, burrs and thorny plants of every description abound, although wherever water is abundant, they are scarce to be found. Swamps, stagnant water, and a rank vegetation, together with the disorders arising from marsh-miasmata, render a large proportion of the Southern parts of the United States little better than a sickly desert. A circumstance that I have no where else observed increases the inundations, which are the real causes of these evils, to a very great extent. The ground is so level, that not only do the more considerable rivers overflow, but by their reflux into the smaller tributary streams, produce the same effect on both sides to a very considerable distance. This I remarked more particularly when ascending the Red River: a current from the Mississippi ran up it, not much less than one hundred miles. Nearly all the rivers of Texas, on the other hand, are "encaisses," and except near their mouths, seldom, if ever, produce inundations prejudicial either to property or health. Nevertheless, during the rainy season there is a sufficient rise in the rivers of Texas to render even the smaller branches navigable, and afford opportunities of conveying the produce of the interior by water-carriage to the coast. Texas is bounded on the Western side by the arid mountains of San Saba and by elevated plains, which serve only to afford pasture to the buffaloes and other wild animals, (the Bolson de Mapimi.) On the South side lie Cohahuila, New Leon, Tamaulipas, and San Luis Potosi, which, although in parts exceedingly fertile, contain large tracts of land in which the sterility of the soil and the want of water will always reduce the population to a very limited number. Consequently it may, in a great measure, be considered as an Oasis, and must always have considerable influence upon the destiny of the circumjacent districts.

THE SIEUR V—.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

The resolution which it was supposed had been formed by Morey, the accomplice of Fieschi, of starving himself to death, is not the first example of the kind on record. The same mode of suicide has on several former occasions been successfully adopted by accused and condemned persons. It has been remarked that the horrible tortures of hunger do not produce delirium, or even annihilation of the intellectual faculties, except when violently imposed by power superior to that of the victim. The suffering, on the contrary, when incurred for the purpose of suicide, and endured with energetic but fatal determination, seems to excite and invigorate the moral faculties, and to increase the acuteness of the senses. In spite of the exhaustion and prostration of the physical organization, the immaterial portion of the system acquires renewed strength, and attains an inconceivable development of power.

A very curious example of suicide by means of starvation, occurred some years ago in Corsica. During the elections, the Sieur V— rushed into the electoral college armed with a dagger, which he plunged into the breast of a man who had done him some injury. The man fell dead at his feet. This assassination was committed in the full light of day, and in the presence of an assembled multitude. Never was an act of Italian vendetta more signally executed.

V— was tried, found guilty and condemned to death. His high spirit and resolute character were well known; and it was suspected that he would seek, by a voluntary death, to evade the disgrace of perishing on the scaffold. He was therefore vigilantly watched; and every precaution was taken to deprive him of the means of putting an end to his existence. He resolved to starve himself to death during the interval which elapsed between the sentence of the Court of Assizes and the reply which the Court of Cassation would make to the appeal he had addressed to it.

He had succeeded in concealing from the observation of his jailors a portion of the food which they regularly took him, so as to make it be believed that he regularly took his meals. After three days abstinence, the pangs of hunger became insupportable. It then suddenly occurred to him that he might the more speedily accomplish the object he had in view, by eating with avidity. He thought that the state of exhaustion to which he was reduced would unfit him to bear the sudden excess, and that it would inevitably occasion the death he so ardently desired. He accordingly sat down to the food which he had laid aside, and ate voraciously, choosing in preference the heaviest things. The consequence was that he was seized with a violent fit of indigestion, from which, contrary to his expectation, the prison doctor speedily cured him.

He then resumed his fatal design. He suffered again what he had undergone before. The torture was almost beyond his strength. His thirst, too, was insupportable. It overcame his resolution. He extended his hand towards the jug of water which had been placed in his cell. He drank with avidity, and to use his own expression, he was restored to life.

To avoid yielding again to a similar temptation, he daily took the precaution of overturning the jug of water which was brought to him. Lest he should be induced to raise it to his lips, he threw it down with his foot, not venturing to touch it with his hand.

In this manner he passed eighteen days.

Every day at different intervals, he noted down in his album a minute account of his sensations. He counted the beatings of his pulse, and marked their number from hour to hour, measuring with the most scrupulous attention the gradual waning of his strength. In several parts of his melancholy memento, he declares that he felt it harder to bear the agonies of thirst than those of hunger. He confesses that he was frequently on the point of yielding to the desire of drinking. He nevertheless resisted.

He was surprised to find his sight become more and more clear, strong, and accurate;—it appeared to him like the development of a new sense. The nearer he approached his latter moments, the more his power of vision seemed to increase. On this subject he thus expresses himself:—"It appears as though I could see through the thickest walls."

His sense of feeling likewise attained the most exquisite sensibility. His hearing and smelling improved in a similar degree. His album contains many curious statements on these subjects.

The Sieur V— had devoted some attention to anatomy and physiology; and he attributes the increased acuteness of his senses to the way in which the intestinal irritation acted on the nervous system.

His ideas, he says, were numerous and clear, and were very different from anything he had experienced in moments of excitement or intoxication. They were all directed to logical investigation, whether he applied them to an analysis of material objects or to philosophic contemplation. He also felt himself inspired with a singular aptitude for mathematical calculations, a study for which he had previously felt very little inclination.

In short he declares that he never derived so much gratification from his intellectual condition, as throughout the whole duration of his physical torture.

He made notes in his album to the last moments of his existence. He had scarcely strength sufficient to hold the pencil with which he traced the following words:—"My pulse has nearly ceased to beat;—but my brain retains a degree of vigour which in my sad condition is the greatest solace Providence could bestow on me. It is impossible that I can live out this day. My jailors watch me and fancy they have adopted every precaution. They little think that I have outwitted them. Death annuls the sentence which has been pronounced on me. In another hour, perhaps, they will find nothing but a cold corpse..."

V— expired as he foretold. His album has been carefully preserved. It is a record replete with interest to medical professors. The slow torture, endured with so much courage, and described with such remarkable clearness, renders it one of the most curious documents in the annals of medical science.

Dr. Hunter, in his translation of Sounnini's Travels in Egypt, informs his readers that "at Malta, the ridges of the houses are flat terraces;" that "at Rosetta, the inhabitants cut the throats of their ducks, and in that situation keep them alive with their wings broken." And lastly, that "the orientals never take a walk but on horseback."

LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL.

LETTER V.

The population of the city of Algiers, and of all parts of the Regency that are actually occupied by the French, has been pretty well ascertained; but what may be the number of souls, reckoning a soul for every individual, inhabiting the whole territory, is more a matter of guess than computation. Hamdan, a living Moorish author, whose work on Algiers has been translated into French, begins his book with a bold assertion at the first sentence, that the population amounts to ten millions. This conjecture is rather too gay, as it would imply this savage country to be to be nearly as thickly peopled as England. Shaler thinks that they scarcely exceed one million, others compute them at two millions, and though I confess that I am only guessing through the guesses of others, I can scarcely suppose the whole population to exceed the latter amount. Dr. Shaw says, that according to the most exact observations which he could make himself, or receive from others, the length of the kingdom from Twunt on the east, to the river Zaine on the west, may be a little more or less than 480 miles; but here Dr. Shaw certainly means length as you would measure it on the globe, without including the undulations of the coast; for all the ship-masters with whom I have spoken describe the voyage between Bona and Oran as between 500 and 600 miles in length. The breadth of the kingdom is very unequal: in one part it exhibits only forty miles between the Mediterranean on the north, and the Zahara or Desert on the South; but to the eastward of Algiers it is very considerable, and Dr. Shaw thinks that at a medium the extent of what the Arabs call Tellie (meaning, that is,) the land proper for tillage, may be called sixty miles. Now, if we multiply say 500 miles for length by sixty for breadth, the result will be 30,000 square miles: the allowance of 100 heads to a mile would make out the population to be 3,000,000; but for a people half migratory this allowance is too large, and the whole regency does not probably contain above half that number.

But did the Deys of Algiers, you will ask, keep no registers of the subjects who paid them taxes, and cannot some census of Algerine population be inferentially computed from extant documents? Why, unfortunately, the French destroyed so many archives at the occupation of the Cassaba, as to leave themselves ignorant of much that it would now be their interest to know respecting the former finances of Algiers; but one Turkish document has been preserved by M. Geny de Bussy, which exhibits the imposts paid to the Dey by the various Arab tribes. From this register, it appears that the sums brought in by the tributary natives amounted in French money to a trifle more than 892,000 francs, less than £40,000 sterling. To estimate the population of the Algerine regency by this document is, however, impossible: before we can infer the population from their taxes, we must know the average value of money in the country; at what rate the natives were charged per head, and whether the imposts here registered were the only taxes exacted from them.

By looking at "Arrowsmith's Comparative Atlas of Ancient and Modern Geography," you will see that the modern regency of Algiers extending from Oran to Bona, corresponds to a locality in the ancient world which included almost, though not entirely, the whole of Mauretania Casariensis, the whole of Mauretania Sitensis, and the whole of what was strictly Numidia. Observe that with regard to this identity on the map of the modern Algerine Regency and the above Roman provinces, I speak only longitudinally or coastwise; for I believe that from north to south, the Roman dominion extended deeper into Africa than that of the Deys of Algiers ever went. I could inflict on you if I chose a great deal of classical speculation as to the ancient state of the country, and discourse lengthily on the names of Jugurtha, Juba, Syphax, &c.; but what would be the good of it if I did so? I should rise no higher in your opinion than Swift's servant-man, who used to show his learning by writing his name with the smoke of a candle on the roof of the kitchen. Let me be brief, then, in my allusions to antiquity: the Romans, after conquering Carthage, took possession of this country. Their vestiges are everywhere to be traced among ruins by the antiquary. The principal mosque of Algiers exhibits a stone with a Latin inscription on it. This stone had belonged, we may suppose, to a heathen temple in Icosium, and was thrown in accidentally into the materials for constructing a Mahometan one in Algiers. The very sewers under the streets of the city may be believed to be of Roman construction. During the decline of Roman power, Barbary was ravaged by the Vandals, and the white complexion of some of the Kabyles leaves a suspicion that they are of Vandal origin; but Belisarius, in the reign of Justinian, restored Africa to the Eastern empire, though only for a short time; for in 697 the Saracens reduced the whole coast, and Algiers became Mahometan. Centuries elapsed, however, before the place rose to any importance. It was not till the Moors were expelled from Spain, and that 20,000 of them settled here and in the neighbourhood; hence the most of the Algerines are reputed to be of Andalusian origin. The name of Algiers signifies in Arabic an island, owing to the first population of the town having dwelt on that insular spot which is at present connected to the continental harbour by a strong mole.

After the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, war had long continued between the Christians of Europe and the Mahometans of Africa, when, in the year 1516, a petty king of Algiers, named Eutemi, solicited the aid of the two memorable brothers surnamed Barbarossa, the younger of whom placed his newly acquired dominions under the protection of the Grand Signior, and received from him a Turkish garrison sufficient to overawe any attempt of his Moorish subjects to regain their liberty; Algiers thus became a Pachalic of the Porte.—At first the Sultan appointed the Deys or Pachas of Algiers; by degrees, however, it became the custom for the Turkish garrison, either directly or through their officers, to nominate their chief, at the same time the Grand Signior still reserved the right of confirming or refusing the election, by sending or withholding the carlon (or mantle) and the sabre of office.

In this manner the Turkish garrison came to form the warlike caste; the aristocracy, or we might rather say, the stratocracy of the Algerines. The Turkish government discouraged marriage among the Janissaries, and their numbers were yearly recruited by levies in the Levant. The sons of Turks who were born in Algiers, (they were called, as a class, Colonglis, or Coloris,) were not entitled by law to succeed to the Janissary privileges of their fathers—not even the sons of the Dey, for the throne was elective and not hereditary. This was the general rule, but it had exceptions, and I find instances of Colongli sons inheriting the Beylics of their fathers. Neither was the military force of the country exclusively composed of Turks, for it included squadrons of Moorish cavalry. Nevertheless, in a general view, the Turk regarded himself here as the lord of the creation. The Colongli was respected only because he was a Turk's son, and his African birth was an implied derogation from his grade. Those Colonglis or Coloris certainly now form no class of society in Algiers that is distinguishable by the superficial eye of a stranger from that of the gentlemen Moors. I have visited one of them, and had from him a polite, I may say hospitable reception; for though it was the time of the Mahometan fast, and he could not partake of the regale that he offered, he pressed me to coffee, sweet cakes, and sweet-meats. His father and uncle were successively Deys of Algiers: I trust, though I dare not vouch for it, that both of them died a natural death. The room in which he received my interpreter and myself struck me as extremely elegant; its furniture, though rich, was simple; an uncurtained bed, with a crimson coverlet, a bright amber-coloured floor-cloth of cane, low stools and sofas with gilded arms and legs, a clock and mirror of the most beautiful manufacture, and pistols and yatagans chased with gold and silver disposed about the walls.

Having caused it to be explained to my host that this was the first time I had ever been in the house of a Moorish gentleman, and that I hoped he would not think me ill-bred for looking curiously at his furniture, he smiled, and signified that he took my curiosity rather as a compliment; I, therefore, ventured to lift the coverlet of the bed, and found that its furniture consisted only of wool mattresses and bolsters, without feather-bed or blankets. These two last articles would indeed be insupportable in this climate. The poorer Moors, he told me have neither mattresses nor pillows, but use some sheep-skins for under-clothes and their haicks or bernouses for a covering. The principal subject of our conversation was a rumour very current here respecting the intentions of the French to give up the colony to the Turks. I do not believe a word of it myself, but I said nothing to him about my incredulity, in order that I might hear his sentiments. He was very discreet, as might be expected, in political conversation with an utter stranger, but through the veil of his reserve I could make out two points of his opinion. The first surprised me, namely, that I saw he gave credit to a report so utterly improbable. The other sentiment which he expressed was natural and reasonable. "If the French give us back to the Turks," he said, "will it not be an unfair transference? If the country is left to itself, who ought to govern it? Surely we, the Moors, who are the great majority, and the most civilized part of its inhabitants."

Of the Turkish aristocracy there is not a wreck left behind. I have seen a few Turks to be sure, but they are of the lower order. The rich and the landed proprietors have been banished to the number of hundreds. A few miles from town I have visited some of their deserted villas, and their orangeries and gardens, that have been desolated by the soldiers of the Christian civilizers. I sat down during my visit to one of these scenes in a marble kiosk, or summer-house, still shaded by fruit-trees, and looking out to a spot that is still luxuriant in its ruins. My companion was a man of law, grave and dry, though a Frenchman. "What a lesson," I said, "lies here to lawless pride! The Turk in Algiers was but lately distinguished from its other population, not more by his embroidery and the gaudy colours of his dress than by his air of command and his insolence, that obliged all who met him to step aside in the street until he passed. He entered the gardens of the natives at will, and ate their fruit with impunity; now is he an exile, and possibly dependent on charity." "Yes," said my matter-of-fact friend, "there were many insolent fellows among the Janissaries, and many of them were even drunkards, whose habits were connived at if not carried to scandalous excess." But they were not all of that description; and as to their banishment, it was enforced on the plea of a conspiracy against the French Government, the proofs of which were never established; and if there were no clear proofs, their treatment was a breach of Bourmont's convention.

The Col-uglis, or Algerine progeny of the Turks, may now be said to be merged in the Moorish population. But how are the Moors to be distinguished from the other inhabitants of Algiers and its regency? Why, in appearance it is not difficult to discriminate them from the negroes, Jews, Arabs, and Kabyls, not only by their turbans and better dress, but by their form and physiognomy. They have, particularly in comparison with the Jews and Arabs, fairer complexions and rounder features, and they are also generally more corpulent. Their eyes, instead of the mixed fire and darkness of those of the Arab breed, have a quiet and almost indolent expression; and their manners are calm and dignified, whilst the Arabs gesticulate even more than the French. Their costume differs little from that of the Turks, consisting of a urban, a shirt, prodigiously large small-cothes, (if it be not an Irishism to say so,) a jacket of coloured cloth, which is embroidered more or less, a large white outer mantle, and slippers. Some of them in winter, I am told, wear stockings.

But the Moorish ladies; how can I describe their apparel, having never seen them but in pictures, with the exception of the two or three dancing women whom I have mentioned, and who, though handsome, would probably give no better an idea of a modest Moors's dress than a figurante at the Opera would represent our female drawing-room costume? The commoner Moorish women are certainly to be seen, on foot, in the dark streets, veiled and looking like phantoms, as I have told you; but one can neither see them distinctly nor stop to question them about their toilette. On the country roads you will sometimes meet them; but they are travelling on horse-back, caged up in a box, and you can see only "Baz et preterea nihil." Anxious to see a Moorish lady at home, I got a French physician to introduce me into the house of a superior Moor, as an English doctor, with whom he wished to have a consultation on the state of his lady-patient. Under this pretext, I got actually over the threshold and through the servants' hall, and, with all the doctoral consequence that I could assume, I was mounting the first pair of stairs, when a black fellow, whose laugh and tap on the shoulder thrilled my bosom like a message from John Roe and Richard Doe, showed me his large white teeth, and said, "Massieu, on ne vous attend pas." So back I was obliged to come, and retrace my steps through a long hall lined with giggling niggers, like General Moreau retreating through the Black Forest. Next day I received from an English lady at Algiers a welcome and kind present, which I had elicited by expressing my curiosity to see the dress of a Moorish woman in superior life. My fair young countrywoman was so kind as to dress two dolls exactly in the embroideries and vesture of the respectable Moorsesses. There is no difference, except as to the colors of the silk, between the attire of the figures. The innermost dress is a fine linen shift, bordered at the breast with silk; the hair of the head is bound lengthily behind with a blue silk ribbon: a rich embroidered silk velvet jacket covers the arms and shoulders down to the waist, having at the elbows a long silk lace ruffle that reaches to the tops of the fingers, but which, I suppose, are never left long unfolded in order to show the arm and wrist bracelets. From the waist, silk embroidered pantaloons come down, but only to the knee: above this there is an embroidered silk gown, exactly like that of an European lady, from the shoulders to the ankles; But I understand that this last dress is generally dispensed with, and the pretty legs shown uncovered from the knee to the ankle; moiré rocco slippers, a veil, a shawl, ear-rings, and a necklace complete the female Moorish costume, which differs little from ours but in the absence of stockings.

A little circumstance that took place in consequence of my possessing the aforementioned dolls reminds me of an anecdote, respecting himself, that was told me by the late well-known Scotch lawyer, John Clerk. He had a great taste for sculpture, and used to amuse his leisure hours with modelling figures in stucco. His confidential copyist was a dry man, imbued with no sort of taste for the fine arts, and regarding his employer's amusement as a token of unaccountable puerility, he exclaimed to him one day, "Eh, Mister Clerk, I am astonished that a person of your sense can tak up your time wi' makin' stuccy men!" In like manner my squire Iachimo—I should tell you that I had given him notice to quit me, and he was therefore in no friendly mood—seeing the two dressed dolls on my table, took them up, and with the devil's own sneer on his Punchinello phiz, said something that conveyed to me, that having gathered flowers like a bambino, I was now playing with dolls like a fanciullo. The ludicrousness of the idea disarmed my indignation at his insolence.

As to the minds and manners of the Moorish ladies, I learn that they are exactly what you might expect from their limited education; that they are slatterns, though gaudy in their dress,—as silly as children in their conversation,—and, what astonished me most, by no means remarkable for their beauty;—that their negresses giggle and gossip with them like equals,—and that the highest subject of their discourse is about syrups and confections. As to their beauty, however, I believe that my informant had by chance only seen some homely Moorsesses.

Apocryph to those fair ones, it is a common report that the Mussulmans believe them to have no souls. But it is quite untrue. A Moorish Marabout, or Saint, to whom I put the question, assured me that the Koran inculcates no such doctrine. "Then why," said I, "do you not allow your young women to attend the mosques?" "Because," he replied, "the guardian angel of the mosque might detect in the hearts of men a human sort of devotion which would desecrate the place." "That danger," I told him, "could be easily obviated by convoking the male and female worshippers at different hours."—This remark rather poked him, and all that he had to say was, that it is difficult to change established customs. I believe him, however, as to the fact that there is no text in the Koran which mortalizes female souls.

I fear you will think I am grown a downright gossip when I tell you a bit of scandal that has reached me about the Moorish young ladies. They are fond of puppies. For that matter, you will perhaps reply, that the finest ladies also frequently show a predilection for that species of animal, both canine and human. Well, but likings take different modes of expressing themselves. A Canadian Indian was once asked if he had known the bishop of Quebec? "Yes, yes." "And how did you like him?" "Oh! vastly." "But how did you happen to know him?" "Happen to know him! Why I ate a piece of him!" In like manner my Mauritanian beauties are devouringly fond of puppies. You only fondle them, but they gobble them up by liters in their couscous. It is said, however, that they do this not so much from a carnivorous propensity, as from a belief that this sort of flesh is very fattening, and the fat of a Mahometan beauty is her glory.

The children of the Moors are dressed exactly like their parents. The little girls never going out without their faces veiled. The boys, however, have neither their heads shaved nor wear the turban till they are about eleven years old. Earlier than that age they let their hair grow and stain it like the females with the juice of henna, which gives it a red hue, varying, according to the original colour of the locks, from auburn to the hue of carrots. Jewesses and Moors alike stain their hair and nails with this dye. This is a very old custom of the country. It is curious to find St. Cyprian, 1500 years ago, inveighing against it in his work, "De Habitu Virginum." Speaking to the Mauritanian women, he says, "With bold and sacrilegious insolence you dye your locks. It is a frightful presage of your future destiny, that you already behold your heads in flames. Shame on your wickedness; you sin with your head, which is the noblest part of the body." In the passage which follows, St. Cyprian appears to have given an exceptionable gloss to the texts of Scripture to which he alludes,—namely, the verses in St. Matthew, xvii. and in Mark ix., which describe the transfiguration of our Saviour. All that is said by the Evangelists is, that our Lord's face shone as the sun, and that his raiment was white as light. But the Saint's audiences and readers not having been great critics, he takes the liberty of saying—"We are told in the word of God that our Lord's head was white as wool or as snow; but you excrete whiteness, and detest to wear locks of the colour of his. Do you not fear, I beseech you, that being such as you are, that when the day of resurrection comes your Maker will not recognise you? Are you not afraid, when you are coming up to enjoy his rewards and promises, he may waive you off and exclude you; and that, chiding you with the power of a censor and a judge, he may say 'This is not the work of my hand! this is not my image!' I tell thee, woman," continues the preacher, "that thou hast polluted thy skin with a false ointment,—thou hast changed thy hair to an adulterated colour,—thy figure is corrupted,—thy countenance is alienated,—and thou shalt not be able to see God when thou hast not the eyes which God gave thee, but which the devil painted. Thou hast imitated the red hair and the painted eyes of the serpent;—drest out by the arch enemy, thou shalt burn in the same flames with him."

There are still a good many rich Moorish families in Algiers; some living on the rents of houses and profits of lands, and others engaged in trade; but, generally speaking, since the cessation of piracy, the wealth of the Moorish nation has been declining. About fifty years ago Leweson describes the Moors as much more bigoted against Christians than the Turks, the latter of whom, he says, were insolently proud, but not fanatical. National character, however, is gradually changing from circumstances. If an Algerine be now a bigot, he is at least a well bred one. I go frequently into the shops of the Moorish artisans, many of whom speak French, or as much lingua Franca as enables me to converse with them. They show me their workmanship in embroidery, turnery, &c. with as much urbanity as if they were Christians, and really they seem to me to be ingenious workmen, particularly in embroidery, though, as you may easily suppose, their manufactories exhibit mechanics and art in a much lower state than with ourselves. Sitting one day in the shop of a Moorish artisan, I expressed my surprise at the beauty of his productions. "Ah!" he said, shaking his head, "you European artisans are fast supplanting us. I had a brother who learnt watchmaking in Europe, and once did some business here, but he cannot now get couscous for his family."

I have been all this time speaking of the Moors as a distinct race from Turk, Jew, Arab, &c. Your curiosity may naturally ask, for what period of time have they been settled in the country, or are they its oldest inhabitants? No; the antiquary tells us that the Kabyls or Berebers are the aborigines, and that the Mauri of antiquity were the descendants of an army of Medes who conquered the country, and partially blended their blood with the primitive people.

But as this genealogy of the Moorish race is carried back by chronologists to the days of Hercules, I will not dogmatize with you as to its certainty. The Algerine Moors, who principally led a city life, and form the great majority of civic population throughout this regency, I believe to be a race of multifarious origin, sprung from the oldest African, the Arabs, the emigrants from Spain, and the Turkish Janissaries, undoubtedly, also, with some mixture of Roman and Vandal blood. Among these different sources I am inclined to suppose the Andalusian immigrants, on their expulsion from Spain, to have been the most numerous progenitors of the present Moors, on account of the vast number whom we know to have arrived in Africa.

On this subject, however, what vast uncertainties must enumber the ablest inquirer. In our own island how complicated is the question, as to the descent of the great mass of us from Celtic or Gothic blood! The half of Scotland was once a Pictish kingdom, but nobody can assure us whether the Picts were Goths or Celts. Come, let us be off to talk with the living—I am weary of the dead, and their resurrection men the antiquaries. The Moors living in the country, I am told, distinguish themselves by their love of genealogy, and by keeping the traditions of their families even since the invasion of the Arabs. The Moors cannot go so far back, being generally sprung, as I have said, from those who were banished out of Spain and Portugal. Ages of despotism must, no doubt, have left some traces of barbarity on the Moorish character: but what right have the French to accuse them, as they universally do, of being fanatic and treacherous? Has a single Frenchman been assassinated by an Algerine Moor since the conquest of the country, and yet the Moors have seen their mosques and churchyards violated by the French! The Moors, with scarcely an exception, are frugal and temperate. Their greatest luxuries are fruit, sherbet, coffee, and tobacco. The quantity of animal food they consume is not a fourth part of that which is eaten by Europeans. Very few of them avail themselves of the right of polygamy. As fathers, they are gentle to their children; and as teachers to their pupils—I have been to see several of their schools—I had found it stated that the Moors actually anticipated us in our Lancasterian system of education. But this is surely not a fact. The very noise that prevails in their little seminaries is more calculated to produce mutual disturbance than instruction. The poor Moorish schoolmaster has generally about twenty scholars, whose education, as far as I could discover, had no further resemblance to that of Lancaster than that the pupils write upon slates or smooth boards. I saw only two that were casting up accounts, and the rest were writing and mumbling texts from the Koran. Their pedagogue has a rod, but he uses it rarely—very rarely, I believe—to correct them, but only now and then to give them a tap of warning. The bastinado, though once used in schools, I understand is now growing obsolete.

The Moors are in general extremely cleanly both in their persons and houses. The most of them also are industrious. They all, whether industrious or not, get up at sunrise, and repair either to their business, or if they have none, they kill their time in some coffee-house, smoking, drinking coffee, and I fear sometimes swallowing a little opium. Even the country coffee-houses are much frequented; they have commonly a spring beside them, and some shady trees. The Algerine cafés (I speak of those which are not held by the French) have scarcely any moveables beyond straw-mats, on which the guests sit and play at draughts or chess.

The Moors, even of the common class, have a gentle gravity of manner, and I am told by those who have seen the interior of their habitations, poor and rich, that they exhibit a scrupulous cleanliness, rivaling that of the Dutch. In the houses of the rich, breakfast consists of coffee, tea, and well-baked bread, sherbet and lemonade. The decoction of a native plant, which is cheap and wholesome, is used by the poor as a substitute for tea. Many burghers of the middle ranks are contented to dine at mid-day on bread and cheese, and fresh or dried fruits, according to the season; though the noon meal of the rich, it is unnecessary to say, is well supplied with savoury coucousou, pillau, garden-stuffs, pastry, and fruits. But among all classes, the evening meal is the most important; and a Moorish artizan tells me that all classes, down to the poorest, contrive to sup on pillau or coucousou, cooked with a little animal food. How strange is human superstition! A religious Moor will not eat meat that has been killed by a Jew or a Christian. In revenge, the Jews here are equally scrupulous. The Jewess maid-servant of this house refused to eat the relics of my dinner for her supper, because it was meat not slaughtered by a Jew.

There is one extraordinary coincidence between the death ceremonies of the Algerine Moors and the ancient Irish. Immediately after the death of a member of the family, all the women in a Moorish house break out into a howling cry, and their neighbours, friends, and relations, come to join in the ululation. They have also an Irish way of expostulating with the deceased on the absurdity of his having chosen to die. "Why did you leave us? did we not feed you, and clothe you, and love you?" The defunct, of course, puts up, in silence, with their reproaches. He is then given to the sexton, who washes his body, and lays him out in his grave-clothes upon a bier, in some chapel, from which he is carried to his burial place. The funeral ceremony is sometimes accompanied with a choral hymn from the Koran, but I believe the custom is not universal.

In my next, I shall speak to you about the Arabs, Jews, and negroes. Yours, &c. T.C.

PARLEZ BAS.*

Parlez bas! The moon is up,
And o'er the sleepy throng
The mocking bird's high notes are heard
In wild and witching song;
No eye shall trace thy footsteps here,
But fear thee not while love is near.
Parlez bas! Though here we meet,
In silence deep, alone,
No guilty thoughts disturb our soul,
Nor wish we fear to own.
Pure as the light you orb imparts,
Shall be the meeting of our hearts.
Parlez bas! A genial breath
Is wandering o'er earth's flowers,
Their fragrance mingles with thy voice,
And holy joy is ours.
Parlez bas! And let each tone
Echo the fondness of mine own.
Parlez bas! And now repeat
The vow those lips once made;
Mine is a love that cannot change,
A heart that ne'er betrayed.
O! say that thou wilt love me still,
Through storm or sunshine, good or ill.
Parlez bas! I bless thy words,
The last that I may hear:
Sweet on my brow thy breath I feel,
Upon my cheek thy tear.
Now take thee to thy bed and rest,
And be thou blest, as I am blest.

* Speak low.

INFLUENCE OF WOMEN.

We know of no place under the broad heavens—we know no circumstances in which the influence of women may not enter, either to be an evil or good—a blessing or a curse—a joy or a sorrow. She shares the thrones of monarchs, and of course their influence; and in many instances, woman herself has swayed the sceptre of a kingdom. In such case, the happiness or misery of millions hang on her fiat. Fortune and fame, prison and the scaffold, alike maintain her bidding. Christianity, with all its blessings, follows in her steps; and peace, religion, and prosperity adorn her reign, and make glad the nation; no vice, licentiousness and cruelty, disfigure her empire, and ensure the misery of her subjects. We might cite many examples of women who have held conspicuous places upon earth, and made or marred the fortunes of nations, as well as individuals: but it is for the most, a melancholy list, and we can only say, when influence is so extended and so perverted—"Oh, my soul enter thou not into their secrets! Unto their assembly mine honor be not thou united!"

Instances are not wanting, too, and they are noble ones, where the influence of woman has been extensive, powerful and salutary, through the medium of her own pen. We have only to mention the names of More, Taylor, Sherwood, Kennedy, and others, to feel that they have given dignity and honor to their sex, increased the moral loveliness of virtue, strengthened the power of principle, set forth religion in its most attractive garb, and, it may be, have been the means of winning many souls to Jesus. We love to rest upon such characters, we love to think that a wish to be useful, has caused their extended efforts, and to imagine the rich harvest of good that may attend their labors. And while paying a just meed to excellence, the self-denying, benevolent, saintly Mrs. Fry, should never be forgotten. Not content with visiting the poor and sorrowing in their own humble dwellings, she enters the prison doors, goes fearlessly among the criminals and the profligate, like an angel of light in the dark regions of despair and guilt, and proffers to the wretched convicts, pardon and salvation in the name of Jesus.

But it is needless to multiply examples. Every day's experience and observation, may convince us of the influence of women, in the relations of mother, wife, sister, daughter, friend—in fortune, fame, fashion, religion and happiness. She was given to man as his better angel, to dissuade him from vice, to stimulate him to virtue, and to make home delightful, and life joyous; and when in the exercise of these gentle and holy charities, she fulfils her high vocation. We have known her meekness, her tenderness, her patience, and her Christian firmness, to be triumphant under God, in subduing vice and awakening virtue, when all other means seemed powerless. We have seen the drunkard melt into tears of contrition and sorrow, at the mild and affectionate appeals of an uncomplaining and heart-stricken wife. We have seen the passionate man subdued to the docility of a child, by the soft and appeasing answers of an amiable daughter. We have seen the unblushing libertine bend with remorse, before the pure and dignified, and lovely of the earth, who, instead of encouraging his vices with smiles of approbation and blandishment, turned from him with virtuous and maidenly reserve.

Vice is to be discountenanced in all its forms.—Young ladies do not act as if they were aware of the influence they exert over the other sex. The gamester, the profane and the licentious, enter with impunity the society of the refined and elegant, and receive as warm a welcome, aye, and it is to be feared, a much warmer, often, than the pure, the pious and excellent. This ought not to be so. Leaving religion out of the question, delicacy, propriety and dignity forbid it.—She whose heart is warm with benevolence and sensibility, should never smile on the gamester, who, in his cold and utter selfishness, would not scruple to impoverish his friend; the maiden of softness and refinement, should never hear the name which she must fear, even if she does not love, mingled with blasphemy, in the coarse oaths and ribald jests of the profane and intemperate; youthful purity and loveliness should turn with abhorrence and disgust from the man who would prey upon innocence, or debase himself in the haunts of pollution.

If young ladies would enter into a mutual compact to discourage these vices, if they would resolve to hold no companionship with those who practice them; the aspect of society would very soon be changed, and the world see better fathers and better sons, better brothers and better husbands. This is not a dream of the imagination. Man, although he is lord of this lower world, cannot exist in comfort, without the softening, sweetening, subduing influence of gentle woman. She administers to his convenience, soothes his sorrows, assuages his resentment; by her tender care alleviates his sickness, shares his fortune in life, and seems like a ministering angel on the bed of death.

Is it possible that he should not prize her; that he should not seek her society; that, after the fatigues and vexatious pursuits, or the weariness of study, her winning ways, cheerful smiles, and balmy voice, should fall upon his vexed and burning spirit, like the soft dews of heaven upon the drooping plant? Man must love woman—necessity is laid upon him. She must affect his fortune, his judgment and his principles. If then she lend all her energies to the cause of truth, purity and goodness, she will soon rejoice in the conviction that her influence is as blessed as it is extensive.—If she has brothers, they but furnish new channels through which her pure principles may flow in countless others, encouraging their virtues, confirming the doubtful, and reclaiming the vicious. Thus she may become a public benefactress, although unknown, and the temporal and eternal happiness of multitudes be the offspring of her active and unobtrusive instrumentality. But the sweet luxury of doing good shall be her guardian in this world, and thought cannot picture the blessed reward which God has prepared for her in the world to come.

A GOOD WIFE.—A good wife should be like three things—which three things she should not be like;—First—she should be like a snail, always keep within her house, but she should not be like a snail to carry all she has upon her back: Secondly—she should be like an echo, speak when spoken to; but she should not be like an echo, always to have the last word.—Thirdly—she should be like a town-clock, always keep time and regularity; but not to speak so loud that all the town may hear her; and which, that it may be better remembered, has been thus turned into verse:

A wife, domestic, good and pure,
Like snail should keep within her door;
But not like snail in silver track,
Place all her wealth upon her back.

A wife should be like echo true,
Nor speak but when she's spoken to;
But not like echo, still be heard
Contenting for the final word.

Like a town clock a wife should be,
Keep time and regularity;
But not like clock harangue so clear,
That all the town her voice may hear.

Death-Bed of Alexander the Great.

On his bed the king was lying—
 On his purple bed,*
 "Tell us not that he is dying;"
 So his soldiers said,
 "He is yet too young to die.
 Have you drugged the cup you gave him,
 From the fatal spring;
 Is it yet too late to save him?
 We will see our king!
 Let his faithful ones draw nigh,
 The silver-shielded warriors—
 The warriors of the world!

Back they fling the fragrant portals
 Of the royal tent;
 Vainly to the stern immortals
 Sacrifice and vows were sent,
 Cold and pitiless are they!
 Silent in their stary dwelling,
 Nothing do they heed
 Of the tale that Earth is telling
 In her hour of need!
 They have turned their face away,
 Ye silver-shielded warriors,
 Ye warriors of the world!

In that royal tent is weeping;
 Women's tears will flow;
 There the queens their watch are keeping||
 With a separate woe.
 One still wears her diadem—
 One her long fair hair is rending,
 From its pearls unbound;
 Tears from those soft eyes descending,
 Eyes that seek the ground.
 But Roxana looks on them,
 The silver-shielded warriors,
 The warriors of the world!

*"While Alexander was on his death-bed the soldiers," says Arrian, "became eager to see him; some to see him once more alive, others because it was reported that he was already dead, and a suspicion had arisen that his death was concealed by the chief officers of the guards, but the majority from sorrow and anxiety for their king; they, therefore forced their way into his chamber, and the whole army passed in procession by the bed where he lay pale and speechless."

†Plutarch mentions that one of the popular reports was, that Alexander's death was occasioned by poison administered by Iolus, his cup-bearer. This poison, the water of a mountain-spring, was of so corrosive a nature as to destroy every substance but the mule's hoof in which it was brought.

‡Phylarchus gives a splendid account of Alexander's magnificence. His tent contained a hundred couches and was supported by eight columns of solid gold. Overhead was stretched cloth of gold, wrought with various devices, and expanded so as to cover the whole ceiling—Within, in a semicircle, stood five hundred Persians, bearing lances adorned with pomegranates; their dress was purple and orange.—Next to these were drawn up a thousand archers, partly clothed in flame-colored, and partly in scarlet dresses. Many of these wore azure colored scarfs. In front of these were arranged five hundred Macedonian Argaspidæ, soldiers, so called from their silver shields. In the middle was the golden throne, on which Alexander sat and gave audience. The tent on the outside was encircled by elephants drawn up in order, and by a thousand Macedonians in their native dress. Beyond these were the Persian guard of ten thousand men, and the five hundred courtiers allowed to wear purple robes.

In the east the day was reddening,
 When the warriors pass'd,
 In the west the night was deadening,
 As they looked their last.
 As they looked their last on him—
 He, their comrade—their commander—
 He, the Earth's adored—
 He, the god-like Alexander!
 Who can wield his sword?
 As they went their eyes were dim,
 The silver-shielded warriors,
 The warriors of the world!

Slowly passed the sad procession
 By the purple bed;
 Every soldier in succession
 Through that tent was led
 All beheld their monarch's face—
 Pale and beautiful—reclining,
 There the conqueror lay,
 From his radiant eyes the shining
 Had not passed away.
 There he watched them from his place—
 His silver-shielded warriors,
 His warriors of the world!

Still he was a king in seeming,
 For he wore his crown;
 And his sunny hair was streaming
 His white forehead down.
 Glorious was that failing head!
 Still his golden baldric bound him,
 Where his sword was hung:
 Bright his arms were scattered round him,
 And his glance still clung
 To the warriors by his bed—
 The silver-shielded warriors,
 The warriors of the world!

Pale and motionless he rested,
 Like a statue white and cold,
 With his royal state invested;
 For the purple and the gold
 In his latest hour he wore,
 But the eye and breath are failing,
 And the mighty soul hath fled!*

Lift ye up the loud bewailing,
 For a wide world mourns the dead!
 And they have a chief no more—
 The silver-shielded warriors,
 The warriors of the world!

§ Alexander's death was preceded by many omens which sacrifices vainly strove to avert.

|| After the Conqueror's death, Roxana allured her gentler rival into her power, and poisoned her. She was the beautiful daughter of a barbarian chief, made captive by Alexander, who was so struck with her charms, that he immediately married her. Statira was the child of Darius, and inherited the evil fortunes of her ill-fated race.

¶ Pearls were favorite ornaments with the Persian ladies, who often wore them wreathed in their hair.

 The death of Alexander plunged all his vast empire into anarchy and slaughter. He was the soul that animated the mighty force that afterwards wasted its energies in petty warfare. The popular saying attributed to him might well be true, "That the survivors would celebrate his obsequies with bloody funeral games."

† If you attempt to please everybody, you will probably please nobody, but will most assuredly displease somebody; your best plan therefore is to please yourself—you may perchance please somebody—and nobody has a right to censure you.

CAPT. MARRYATT'S STORIES.

In the 'Naval Annual' for 1836, we find an article of great length entitled 'The Three Cutters,' which is characterized by all our author's more admired peculiarities. We give two extracts—the first, illustrative of life and story-telling on ship-board, being a description of a scene on board

CUTTER THE SECOND.

Reader, have you ever been at Portsmouth? If you have, you must have been delighted with the view from the saluting battery; and, if you have not, you had better go there as soon as you can. From the saluting battery you may look up the harbour, and see much of what I have described at Plymouth; the scenery is different; but similar arsenals and dock-yards, and an equal portion of our stupendous navy are to be found there.—And you will see Gosport on the other side of the harbour, and Sally Port close to you; besides a great many other places, which, from the saluting battery, you cannot see. And then there is Southsea Beach to your left. Before you, Spithead, with the men-of-war, and the Motherbank, crowded with merchant vessels; and there is the Bony, where the Royal George was wrecked, and where she still lies, the fish swimming in and out of her cabin windows; but that is not all; you can also see the Isle of Wight, Ryde, with its long pier, and Cowes, where the yachts lie. In fact, there is a great deal to be seen at Portsmouth as well as at Plymouth; but what I wish you particularly to see, just now, is a vessel holding fast to the buoy, just off the saluting battery. She is a cutter; and you may know that she belongs to the Preventive Service, by the number of gigs and galleys which she has hoisted up all round her. She looks like a vessel that was about to sail with a cargo of boats. Two on deck, one astern, one on each side of her. You observe that she is painted black, and all her boats are white. She is not such an elegant vessel as the yacht, and she is much more lumbered up. She has no haunches of venison over her stern; but I think there is a leg of mutton, and some cabbages hanging by their stalks. But revenue-cutters are not yachts. You will find no turtle or champagne; but, nevertheless, you will, perhaps, find a joint to carve at, a glass of grog and a hearty welcome.

Let us go on board. You observe the guns are iron, and painted black, and her bulwarks painted red; it is not a very becoming color; but then it lasts a long while, and the dock-yard is not very generous on the score of paint—or lieutenants of the navy troubled with much spare cash. She has plenty of men, and fine men they are; all dressed in red flannel shirts, and blue trousers, some have not taken off their canvass or tarpawling petticoats, which are very useful to them, as they are in the boats night and day, and in all weathers. But we will at once go down into the cabin, where we shall find the lieutenant who commands her, a master's mate, and a midshipman.—They have each their tumbler before them, and are drinking gin-toddy, hot, with sugar—capital gin too, 'bove proof; it is from that small anker, standing under the table. It was one that they forgot to return to the custom-house when they made their last seizure. We must introduce them.

The elderly personage, with grizzly hair and whiskers, a round face, and a somewhat red nose (being too much in the wind will make the nose red, and this old officer is very often "in the wind," of course from the very nature of his calling,) is a Lieutenant Appleboy. He has served in every class of vessel in the service, and done the duty of first-lieutenant for twenty years; he is now on promotion—that is to say, after he has taken a certain number of tubs of gin, he will be rewarded with his rank as commander. It is a pity what he takes inside of him does not count, for he takes it morning, noon, and night. He is just filling his fourteenth glass; he always keeps a regular account, as he never exceeds his limited number, which is seventeen; then he is exactly down to his bearing.

The master's mate's name is Tomkins; he has served his six years three times over, and has now outgrown his ambition, which is fortunate for him, as his chances of promotion are small. He prefers a small vessel to a large one, because he is not obliged to be so particular in his dress—and looks for his lieutenantcy whenever there shall be another charity promotion. He is fond of soft bread, for his teeth are all absent without leave; he prefers porter to any other liquor, but he can drink his glass of grog, whether it be based upon rum, brandy, or the liquor now before him.

Mr. Smith is the name of that young gentleman, whose jacket is so out at the elbows; he has been intending to mend it these last two months, but is too lazy to go to his chest for another. He has been turned out of half the ships in the service for laziness; but he was born so—and therefore it is not his fault. A revenue-cutter suits him, she is half the time hove to; and he has no objection to boat-service, as he sits down always in the stern-sheets, which is not fatiguing. Creeping for tubs is his delight, as he gets over so little ground. He is fond of grog, but there is some trouble in carrying the tumbler so often to his mouth; so he looks at it and lets it stand. He says little, because he is too lazy to speak. He has served more than eight years; but as for passing—it has never come into his head. Such are the three persons who are now sitting in the cabin of the revenue-cutter, drinking hot gin-toddy.

"Let me see, it was, I think, in ninety-three or ninety-four. Before you were in the service, Tomkins."

"May-be, sir; it's so long ago I entered, that I can't recollect dates,—but I know, that my aunt died three days before."

"Then the question is, when did your aunt die?"

"Oh! she died about a year after my uncle."

"And when did your uncle die?"

"I'll be hanged if I know!"

"Then, d'ye see, you've no departure to work from.—However, I think you cannot have been in the service at that time. We were not quite so particular about uniforms as we are now."

"Then I think the service was all the better for it. Now-a-days, in your crack ships, a mate has to go down in the hold or spirit room, and after whipping up fifty empty casks, and breaking out twenty full ones, he is expected to come on the quarter-deck as clean as if he was just come out of a bandbox."

"Well, there's plenty of water alongside, as far as the outward man goes, and iron dust is soon brushed off.—However, as you say, perhaps, a little too much is expected; at least, in five of the ships in which I was first lieutenant, the captain was always hauling me over the coals about the midshipmen not dressing properly, as if I was their dry nurse. I wonder what Captain Prigg would have said, if he seen such a turn-out as you, Mr. Smith, on his quarter-deck."

"I should have had one turn-out more," drawled Smith. "With your out-at-elbows jacket, there, heh!" continued Mr. Appleboy.

Smith turned up his elbows, looked at one and then at the other; after a fatiguing operation he was silent.

"Well, where was I? Oh! it was about ninety-three or ninety-four, as I said, that it happened—Tomkins, fill your glass, and hand me the sugar,—how do I get on?—This is No. 15," said Appleboy, counting some white lines on the table by him; and taking up the piece of chalk, he marked one more line on his tally. "I don't think this so good a tub as the last, Tomkins, there's a twang about it—a want of juniper,—however, I hope we shall have better luck this time.—Of course, you know we sail to-morrow."

"I presume so by the leg of mutton coming on board."

"True—true—I'm regular—as clock work.—After being twenty years a first lieutenant, one gets a little method—I like regularity. Now the admiral has never omitted asking me to dinner once, every time I have come into harbor, except this time—I was so certain of it, that I never expected to sail, and I have but two shirts in consequence."

"That's odd, isn't it? and the more so, because he has had such great people down here, and has been giving large parties every day."

"And yet I made three seizures, besides sweeping up those thirty-seven tubs."

"I swept them up," observed Smith.

"That's all the same thing, you know.—When you've been a little longer in the service, you'll find out that the commanding officer has the merit of all that is done—but you're green yet.—Let me see, where was I? Oh!—It was about ninety-three or ninety-four, as I said. At that time I was in the Channel fleet—Tomkins, I'll trouble you for the hot water—this water's cold—Mr. Smith do me the favor to ring the bell—Jem, some more hot water.”

“Please, sir,” said Jem, who was barefooted, as well as bareheaded, touching the lock of hair on his forehead, “the cook has capsized the kettle—but he has put more on.”

“Capsized the kettle! hah!—very well—we’ll talk about that to-morrow.—Mr. Tomkins do me the favor to put him in the report, I may forge it. And pray sir, how long is it since he has put more on?”

“Just this moment sir, as I came aft.”

“Very well, we’ll see to that to-morrow.—you bring that kettle aft as soon as it is ready.—I say, Mr. Jem, is that fellow sober?”

“Yeess, sir, he be sober as you be.”

“It’s quite astonishing what a propensity the common sailors have to liquor. Forty odd years have I been in the service, and I’ve never found any difference. I only wish I had a guinea for every time I have given a fellow seven-water grog during my servitude as first-lieutenant, I wouldn’t call the king my cousin. Well, if there’s no hot water we must take lukewarm—it won’t do to leave to. By the U—d Harry! who could have thought it!—I’m at No. 16!—Let me count—yes! surely I must have made a mistake. A fact, by heaven!” continued Mr. Appleboy, throwing the chalk down on the table. “Only one glass, after this—that is, if I have counted right—I may have seen double.”

“Yes,” drawled Smith.

“Well, never mind—Let’s go on with my story.—It was either in the year ninety-three or ninety-four, that I was in the Channel fleet—we were then a-breast of ‘Torbay.’”

“Here be the hot water, sir,” cried Jem, putting the kettle down on the deck.

“Very well, boy.—By-the-bye, has the jar of butter come on board?”

“Yes, but then it be broke all down the middle; I tied him up with a ropeyarn.”

“Who broke it, sir?”

“Coxswain says as how he didn’t.”

“But who did, sir?”

“Coxswain handed it up to Bill Jones, and he says as how he didn’t.”

“But who did, sir?”

“Bill Jones gave it to me, and I’m sure as how I didn’t.”

“Then who did, sir, I ask you?”

“I think it be Bill Jones, sir, ‘cause he’s fond of butter, I know, and there be very little left in the jar.”

“Very well, we’ll see to that to-morrow morning. Mr. Tomkins, you’ll oblige me by putting the butter jar down in the report, in case it should slip my memory. Bill Jones, indeed, looks as if butter wouldn’t melt in his mouth—never mind. Well, it was, as I said before—it was in the year ninety-three or ninety-four, when I was in the Channel fleet; we were then off ‘Torbay,’ and had just taken two reefs in the topsails. Stop, before I go on with my story, I’ll take my last glass—I think it’s the last; let me count—yes, by heavens, I make out sixteen, well told! Never mind, it shall be a stiff one. Boy, bring the kettle, and mind you don’t pour the hot water into my shoes, as you did the other night. There, that will do. Now, Tomkins, fill up yours; and you, Mr. Smith; let us start fair, and then you shall have my story—and a very curious one it is, I can tell you: I wouldn’t have believed it myself, if I hadn’t seen it. Hilloa! what’s this? Confound it! what’s the matter with the toddy? Heh, Mr. Tomkins?”

Mr. Tomkins tasted, but, like the lieutenant, he had made it very stiff; and, as he had also, taken largely before, he was, like him, not quite so clear in his discrimination; “It has a queer twang, sir; Smith, what is it?”

“Salt water,” drawled the midshipman.

“Salt water!” so it is, by heavens!” cried Mr. Appleboy.

“Salt as Lot’s wife!—by all that’s infamous!” cried the master’s mate.

“Salt water, sir!” cried Jem, in a fright—expecting a salt cel for supper.

“Yes, sir,” replied Mr. Appleboy, tossing the contents of the tumbler in the boy’s face,—“salt water. Very well, sir—very well!”

“It warn’t me, sir,” replied the boy, making up a piteous look.

“No, sir, but you said the cook was sober.”

“He was not so very much disguised, sir,” replied Jem.

“Oh! very well—never mind. Mr. Tomkins, in case I should forget it, do me the favor to put the kettle of salt water down in the report. The scoundrel! I’m very sorry, gentlemen, but there’s no means of having any more gin toddy—but never mind, we’ll see to this to-morrow. Two can play at this; and if I don’t salt-water their grog and make them drink it, too, I have been twenty years a first lieutenant for nothing—that’s all. Good night, gentlemen; and,” continued the lieutenant, in a severe tone, “you’ll keep a sharp look-out, Mr. Smith—do you hear, sir?”

“Yes,” drawled Smith, “but it’s not my watch; it was my first watch, and just now, it struck one bell.”

“You’ll keep the middle watch, then, Mr. Smith,” said Mr. Appleboy, who was not a little put out; “and, Mr. Tomkins, let me know as soon as it’s daylight. Boy, get my bed made. Salt water, by all that’s blue! However, we’ll see to that to-morrow morning.”

Mr. Appleboy then turned in; so did Mr. Tomkins; and so did Mr. Smith, who had no idea of keeping the middle watch because the cook was drunk and had filled up the kettle with salt water. As for what happened in ninety-three or ninety-four, I really would inform the reader if I knew, but I’m afraid that that most curious story is never to be handed down to posterity.

The next morning, Mr. Tomkins, as usual forgot to report the cook, the jar of butter, and the kettle of salt water; and Mr. Appleboy’s wrath had long been appeased before he remembered them. At daylight the lieutenant came on deck, having only slept away half of the sixteen, and a taste of the seventeenth salt water glass of gin toddy. He rubbed his grey eyes, that he might peer through the grey of the morning; the fresh breeze blew about his grizzled locks, and cooled his rubicund nose. The revenue-cutter, whose name was the ‘Active,’ cast off from the buoy; and, with a fresh breeze, steered her course for the Needles’ passage.

Our additional extract consists of a story of fashionable life told by a briefless barrister on board ‘Cutter the First,’ a pleasure-yacht, which has put to sea, bearing a ‘goodly company,’ bound on an April excursion from Plymouth to Cowes. The colloquy which follows he professes to have overheard the day preceding, while on a visit to a gentleman of quality, and entitles it

“FIVE THOUSAND ACRES IN A RING-FENCE.”

“I will, then, William,” observed Mr. Ponsonby, stopping, and turning to the nephew, after a rapid walk up and down the room with his hands behind him under his coat, so as to allow the tails to drop their perpendicular about three inches clear of his body. “I may say, without contradiction it will be the finest property in the country—five thousand acres in a ring-fence.”

“I dare say it will, uncle,” replied William, tapping his foot as he lounged in a green morocco easy-chair; “and so, because you have set your fancy upon having these two estates enclosed together in a ring-fence, you wish that I should also be enclosed in a ring-fence.”

“And a beautiful property it will be,” replied Mr. Ponsonby.

“Which, uncle?—the estate or the wife?”

“Both, nephew, both; and I expect your consent.”

“Uncle, I am not avaricious. Your present property is sufficient for me. With your permission, instead of doubling the property, and doubling myself, I will remain your sole heir, and single.”

“Observe, William, such an opportunity may not occur again for centuries. We shall restore Forest Wild to its ancient boundaries. You know it has been divided nearly two hundred years. We now have a glorious golden opportunity of re-uniting the two properties; and when joined, the estate will be exactly what it was when granted to our ancestors by Henry the Eighth, at the period of the Reformation. This house must be pulled down, and the monastery left standing. Then we shall have our own again, and the property without encumbrance.”

“Without encumbrance, uncle!—You forgot that there will be a wife.”

“And you forgot that there will be five thousand acres in a ring-fence.”

“Indeed, uncle, you ring it too often in my ears, that I should forget it; but much as I should like to be the happy possessor of such a property, I do not feel inclined to be the happy possessor of Miss Percival; and the more so as I have never seen the property.”

“We will ride over it to-morrow, William.”

“Ride over Miss Percival, uncle? that will not be very gallant. I will, however, one of these days, ride over the property with you, which as well as Miss Percival, I have not as yet seen.”

“Then I can tell you she is very pretty property.”

“If she were not in a ring-fence.”

“In good heart, William—That is, I mean an excellent disposition.”

“Valuable in matrimony.”

“And well tilted—I should say educated, by her three maiden aunts, who are the patterns of propriety.”

“Does any one follow the fashion?”

“In a high state of cultivation; that is, her mind highly cultivated, and, according to the last new system—what is it?”

“A four-course shift, I presume,” replied William, laughing; “that is, dancing, singing, music, and drawing.”

“And only seventeen!—Capital soil, promising good crops—What would you have more?”

“A very pretty estate, uncle, if it were not the estate of matrimony. I am sorry, very sorry, to disappoint you; but I must decline taking a lease of it for life.”

“Then, sir, allow me to hint to you, that in my testament you are only tenant at will. I consider it a duty that I owe to the family, that the estate should be re-united. That can only be done by one of our family marrying Miss Percival; and, as you will not, I shall write to your cousin James, and if he accept my proposal, shall make him my heir. Probably he will more fully appreciate the advantages of five thousand acres in a ring-fence.”

“Stop, my dear uncle,” cried William, rising up from his easy-chair; “we do not quite understand one another. It is very true that I would prefer half the property and remaining single to the two estates and the estate of marriage; but, at the same time, I did not tell you that I would prefer beggary to a wife and five thousand acres in a ring-fence. I know you to be a man of your word:—I accept your proposal, and you need not put my cousin James to the expense of postage.”

“Very good, William; I require no more: and as I know you to be a man of your word, I shall consider the match as settled. It was on this account only that I sent for you, and now you may go back again as soon as you please—I will let you know when all is ready.”

“I must be at Fattersalls, on Monday, uncle: there is a horse I must have for next season. Pray, uncle, may I ask when you are likely to want me?”

“Let me see—this is May—about July, I should think.”

“July, uncle! Spare me—I cannot marry in the dog-days.—No, hang it, not July.”

“Well, William, perhaps as you must come down once or twice to see the property—Miss Percival, I should say—it may be too soon—suppose we put it off till October.”

“October—I shall be down at Melton.”

“Pray, sir, may I then inquire what portion of the year is not with you, the dog days?”

“Why, uncle, next April now—I think that would do.”

“Next April.—Eleven months, and a winter between. Suppose Miss Percival was to take a cold, and die!”

“I should be excessively obliged to her,” thought William.

“We have had no hard frosts lately, William.—We may wait for years.—The sooner it is over the better.—Go back to town, buy your horse, and then come down here, my dear William, to oblige your uncle—never mind the dog-days.”

“Well, sir, if I am to make a sacrifice, it shall not be done by halves; out of respect for you I will even marry in July, without any regard to the thermometer.”

“You are a good boy, William. Do you want a cheque?”

“I have had one to-day,” thought William, and was almost at fault. “I shall be most thankful, sir—they sell horseflesh by the ounce now-a-days.”

“And you pay in pounds.—There, William.”

“Thank you, sir, I’m all obedience; and I’ll keep my word, even if there should be a comet. I’ll go and buy the horse, and then I shall be ready to take the ring-fence as soon as you please.”

“Yes, and you’ll get over it cleverly, I’ve no doubt.—Five thousand acres, William, and—a pretty wife!”

“Have you any further commands, uncle?” said William, depositing the cheque in his pocket-book.

“Now, my dear boy, are you going?”

“Yes, sir; I dine at the Clarendon.”

“Well, then, good-by.—Make my compliments and excuses to your friend Seagrove.—You will come Tuesday or Wednesday.”

“Thus was concluded the marriage between William Ponsonby and Emily Percival, and the junction of the two estates, which formed together the great desideratum, five thousand acres in a ring fence.”

THE SUICIDE.

Deep vale of sorrow! from life’s early day
Amid thy cypress shades a sojourner,
Woes of dread name have marked my winding way,
And forc’d from feeling’s fount, the burning tear;
The tear for unrequited love and truth,
For honor fall’n, the purple blush of shame,
The rending sigh o’er vanquish’d hopes of youth,
The pang of woman’s pride for blasted fame,
All these are mine, and more, I may not, durst not name.

Dark dregs and bitter!—yet let no one think,
Unnerv’d her energies, and quench’d her fire,
Tame the maddening draught shall Ella drink,
No! rather let me rouse each latent ire;
And nobly spurning the low beaten track,
The world’s cold scorn, and pity of the good,
With Portia’s, Arria’s courage, render back,
Of being’s weight the insufferable load,
A bootless gift at best—resume thy loan, my God!
The deed is done! the steel hath gleam’d on high,
The crimson tide of life is ebbing fast,
Soon shall this breast expel the final sigh,

And these quick fluttering pulses throb their last!
Soft in the earth this wilder’d head shall rest,
Nor dream of ill disturb the long repose,
The daisied turf surmount this bursting breast,
Nor Ella’s heart be wrung with Ella’s woes,
Prison’d from sorrow there, and safe from all her foes.
Ha! do I rave? the mist that veil’d my sight,
Life’s laboring, panting breath hath swept away,
And conscience, habited in beamy light,
Opens her broad page, and points the informing ray.
Passion’s loud gust is hush’d, nor longer drowns,
Her awful voice, as erst ’twas wont to do;
Truth, told in thunder, my stunn’d ear confounds,
And o’erwhelms me with its weight of woe;
Where, my distracted soul, for refuge canst thou go?
Saviour of sinners? to thy wounded side,
Though long condemned, fain would my spirit flee;
Sole ark of safety, where the guilty hide
From floods of vengeance—yet no shield for me!
Too late! too late! Oh, give me back to life!
The flintiest path that ever mortal trod,
Its keenest sorrows, and its sharpest strife,
Its veriest ignominious scorn and load,
I could endure for aye—but not thy frown, Oh God!
“Laugh’st thou at my calamity?” I rush’d
Dreadless to meet thee at thy dreadful throne;
With every vile and untam’d passion flush’d,
I dar’d the doom and pluck’d the vengeance down.
Dark boils the gulph of Death, that now I pass,
No change to meet but deep and deeper ill;
For, on the opening gates of daring wrath,
I read thy unreversed and righteous will,
“He that comes filthy here let him be filthy still.”

From the Saturday Evening Post.

THE RING,

OR LOVERS' MISTAKES.

"A something light as air—a look,
A word unkind, or wrongly taken—
The love that tempests ne'er had shook,
A touch, a tone like this, has shak'n."—Moore.

"AND Miss Livingston's really going to be married to old Gen. Swann! Miss Livingston!—that proud airish creature, that thought the world was made only to worship her, and no beau worthy to touch the tip of her little finger, going to have a man old enough to be her great-great-grand-father—and as ugly as sin into the bargain!!! Well, this is retribution, if ever there was such a thing," said a pert miss with long cork-screw curls of flaming red, dangling in masses on each side of a goblin face, deeply pitted with the small-pox—a hare-lip, and standing in the full dignity of four feet three inches, as the centre figure of an exclusive group at a gathering of fashionables in the town of ——. "Oh! how I'd like to see her, now her degradation's made public, and that high head of hers hung down, as I make no doubt it is."

"Don't flatter yourself with that belief, Delia," cried another fair one, the esprit fort of the clique—and on the strength of that title, indulging herself in a grossness of phrase and idea, hardly surpassed by Mrs. Fanny Kemble Butler, in her renowned journal performance; "Miss Livingston has impudence enough to brazen it out if she were going to act upon the amalgamation doctrine, and take a mulatto fellow for better for worse. I suppose she's tired, as well she may be, of playing at the stale game of Old Maid; but upon my soul, I don't think, considering her age and prospects, that the dainty pride has done so much amiss in bringing her damaged battery of attraction to bear upon the leering dotard at Swann's Court. But pray is the thing certain? and what does young Virrian say to it?"

"What should he say or care about who picks up a person that he's had the refusal of?" tartly asked the first spokeswoman, (for be it known to the reader that these two ladies ranked as the oracles and pro-lacutors of their faction of ultra fashionists,) by way of reply: "If she's not Mrs. Virrian ages ago, every body knows on whose side the fault is; but I always upheld my friend Ernest as a man of too much taste to fancy a sallow, skinny, shrewish girl on the wrong side of thirty, solely because she had the assurance to set herself up for his admiration along with that of the town!"

"By Jove! Miss Jeffers," interposed one of the attendant beaux, with a smile replete with most sarcastic meanings—"a fine picture you draw of the reigning favourite; it does equal justice to the judgment of our sex and the charms of yours. Can't your superior optics, that have spied out so much invisible to others, pierce yet a degree or two further, and detect some absolute deformity in the divine Evinia? The becoming twist of a feature, or a slight hobble in her gait, for instance?"

The damsel thus invoked, and perhaps reflected upon, darted a fiery glance at the scoffing speaker, and seemed collecting her abusive powers for a rejoinder that should annihilate such audacity; but ere the catastrophe chanced, a pretty piece of silliness, alike innocent of acquaintance with Miss Livingston or the cabal against her, and taking for gospel all that we have cited as said to her disparagement, broke in with

"La! now, De dear, I miss Livingston's all out of shape so, and not so very young, I'm sure Gen. Swann must be a great match for her. He's immensely rich, and quite good-looking too—besides not being so mighty old neither. Then there's that sweet barouche of his, and four such lovely greys. I declare, for all you laugh so, Mr. Kane, I'm all but ready to have him myself for the sake of them."

"And his enormous debts, ten times as much as he's worth in the world, and the pistols he's obliged to ride with to keep off the sheriff, ain't they very charming things too? and well worth marrying him for?" retorted the gentle Delia. "Suppose you try, love, and cut out the lucky lady; 'twould be a rare match between you; arrogant, affected, and antiquated against fair, frivolous and fifteen. And the prize is well worth all your trouble, bankrupt and only sixty-six."

"Sixty-six! add a dozen good years on the back of that, and you'll be nearer right," chimed in the esprit fort. "And to sum up all, he's a downright niggard as well as a ninny, and as crabbed as any cynic to boot; but what with the gout, and a grown-up daughter like his, that's not so much to be wondered at, poor man!"

"A ninny! did you say, madam?" inquired a gentleman present in a tone of surprise. "I have always understood Gen. Swann to be a lawyer of pre-eminent fame and ability; and his daughter's gentility and intelligence as admitted beyond dispute."

"Pooh! mere humbug," returned the sapient lady, looking down upon her querist with ineffable scorn—yet unable even from that dignified impulse, to suppress an ebullition of censorious vulgarity—"the admission of a parcel of fools more competent to pronounce upon the breed of Spanish-jacks and jennies than on the qualities constituting civilized folks. Gentility and intelligence quotha? I presume the son, too, that treble-refined zany, Xenophon, is a monstrous smart and genteel somebody; witness his going in full uniform, clad cap-à-pié, upon the parade, and claiming command of a division of militia under a power of attorney from his father, the general, to transact his business while he was away at the South. As to the old Swann and his female cygnet, I grant you they both shine in their sphere; he as the butt of the bar, and she as the show of the ball-room; but his vaunted head-piece is just that of a Merino-ram, frizzled without, and empty within—and she fitter to cackle on a dung-hill than in parlours and to ears polite." And the caricaturist who had been accused of certain abortive designs against the peace of the opulent counsellor, closed her speech with a burst of merit as portentous as the cachination of the laughing hyena.

"Hush! hush! ma chère," whispered the least impertinent of the railing coterie; "here comes Maria Swann herself tricked out like some Arcadian shepherdess, all ribbons and roses; and though she might forgive and even join in your spite against her belle-mère that is to be—it would not be so mighty pleasant to let her overhear us quizzing her folly and her good papa! For pity sake, do be still."

"For mischief's sake, dear ladies, for that is your element and delight, go on with your flattering strictures, and provoke Miss Maria to a battle-royal; she's a perfect Penthésilæa in point of spunk, and I'll back her against the whole of you by any money," said the incorrigible Mr. Kane, sotto voce, as he bowed and made way for a "little fairy figure," as she was wont to call herself, but a low and rather stout young woman, as with a due regard to veracity we must however reluctantly describe her, came dashing forward with such a mien and grimaces as one would extol in the part of Lady Handy, by a clever actress. Her dress was, as before intimated, a travesty of the peasant style. A gipsy hat of white chip, with blue trimmings and prodigious guirlande's of field-flowers, just rested on the back of her head; a jacket of blue crape à la bergère, laced and pointed with silver—a short muslin petticoat and apron edged with blue—and gloves and sandals of the same colour composed such an equipment as is sometimes seen figuring on the stage in a rustic dance in character; but in the present case, it set off little, if any, of the prettiness proverbial in country lasses. None of Perdita's graces belonged to the modish Miss Swann, where, truth to say, it would have been rather unreasonable to have expected them. High cheek-bones, a large and ill-shaped mouth—great staring eyes of whitish blue, and a fierce colour that seemed put on in emulation of the French style of painting, when it was done, and exaggerated as a symbol of rank, formed a face, which was nevertheless, (such is the magic of wealth and pretension,) generally reckoned handsome. The figure was something better, a little full in proportion to its height, and the gait free almost to boldness. Such was the tout ensemble of the "lady gay," who flitted or strided along, crying out with the prettiest affectation of childishness—and ever and anon interrupting herself by slight recognition of divers persons—

"Oh! ciel! what barbarism! I find myself completely betrayed. Foi de dame de l'honneur, I thought I was asked to a fancy ball, and here is every body in plain dress. How d'ye do, Miss Jeffers; you are looking vastly well to-night; I positively should not have known you except by that unfortunate chevelure of yours. I think its growing a little paler though. But why don't you try the Essence of Tyre? 'tis the only thing the wise ones say for hair that's grey or red. Unhand me, do, Col. Ennis," shrinking back with a gesture of horror and disgust, from the most distinguished man in the room—an ancient but very gallant bachelor, who pressed forward to conduct her; "I vow I feel old age creeping all over me at your touch. Monsheer Foucachon, ravie à vous voir; any news from la belle France? Oh! dear delightful Paris, quand vous reviendrez je? Ah! Virrian! are you there? Do come and take care of me through this horrid mob; for I would fain "pass on in unbleached majesty," if that is possible in an assembly made up of soap-boilers and tallow-chandlers."

And rudely elbowing the female partner of a civic dignity belonging to the latter craft—and levelling her eye-glass, that appropriate appendage to a shepherdess, full in the face of each one she passed, the lady paramount of the beau-monde, moved on, leaning upon the handsome Ernest Virrian; her plump person, ducking and diving in a succession of what were meant for French courtesies—but which came much nearer the abasement of Eastern prostration,—and her voice, not silvery sweet but shrill—dying away in murmurs of "Waltz! oh! yes—certainly—tout-à-l'ore—when the crowd gets a little more dense. My harp? I have not seen or touched it this age."

"The harp that once thro' Tara's halls,

The harp of music shed—

Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls,

As if that soul were fled."

Its strings are all out of tune, and jar like those of my heart. Excuse me, do, I beg. Sur mon honneur I am not up to "Little Winnie Wilkins;" to night, I feel strangely "inclined to the melting mood." But I'll give you "Young Lochinvar," if that will be acceptable."

And so said, so done. The fingers blundering and flying over the piano-keys, flourished away in a series of bounds, jerks, and capriccios, intended to depict the progress of the knight

"So faithful in love, and so dauntless in war," from his first "coming out of the West," to the "raging and chasing on Cannobie Lee;" while a pair of lungs, that might have excited the envy of Stentor, screamed forth after such preliminary coquetry, and with no variation of time or tone. The whole eight verses, whereby "the lovely Lady Heron," prompts and entrances her royal lover. But exquisite as Scott's ballad must be ever held, alack for the age of chivalry! its present rehearsal failed to elicit any thing like the rapturous hearing accorded to the original performance. Mr. Virrian vanished at the first notes of the prelude; so did sundry other young men of note, who swore that the girl might as well sing Chevy Chase itself, and expect them to listen: and though the rest of the circle stood their ground, and smiled and beat time, and whispered their complimentary comments, it was merely to hide the half-yawns and expressive shrugs, which at the close, found vent on a long and simultaneous sigh of relief. Still it was necessary thus to undergo martyrdom through complaisance; Miss Swann had been dubbed in insane prose and dull verse, the tenth muse and fourth grace; it was the fashion to follow and applaud her—and few had the hardihood to dissent from an observance so orthodox and penitential.

This leader of American ton, and ape of every foreign adventurer, who came in her way, was the sole daughter, though not heiress, of a lawyer conspicuous for wealth, family and talent. Credulous to excess, and extravagant in his habits, Gen. Swann, notwithstanding his large patrimony and professional income, had more than once contrived by bad bargains and other imprudencies, to get himself deeply embarrassed, though hardly to the extent affirmed by the malicious Miss Jeffers. But the tact of his wife, the first financier in the country, and who at this crisis, conceived herself, like our present chief magistrate, justified in assuming both legislative and executive functions, extricated him in a great measure; thereby showing conclusively the advantages attendant on the concentration of all power in the hands of an individual: and this autocratix had moreover the consideration to depart this life, to the infinite relief of the husband, who durst not say before her that his soul was his own—at the precise moment, when she could best be spared; the estate being nearly disencumbered, and trebled in value through her admirable management. She left him another source of consolation in two children; the eldest, a son, ugly, awkward and not particularly acute—but a business-man, thoroughly imbued with her precepts and notions, and content to slave himself to death for the good of the family, or rather as it would prove in the long run, his own; for the lady of Swann's Court wisely holding dismemberment to be ruin, and as zealous for the male succession as any of the Salick dynasty, had enjoined, or more properly speaking, ordered her husband to make Xenophon sole legatee.

The daughter, her father's darling, and a girl of some shrewdness and vivacity, was early cried up as a prodigy of talent, and with judicious instruction, might have turned out a superior woman; but the pride and vanity insatiable in the maternal mind—clogged and counteracted as it was by habitual parsimony, ruined all by an attempt to educate Maria, as she might have bought a bargain of goods, at first cost. Hence the plan proceeded upon was for her to pick up all sorts of accomplishments by indirect and imperfect means, and the result proved worthy of the generous aim. She grew up with her mind deteriorated by irregular and superficial cultivation—her moral impulses totally neglected, and her shreds and snatches of attainments, solid and ornamental—resembling in their garbled and incongruous confusion, a piece of coarse patch-work. Forward but not elegant, mistaking flippancy for naïvete, and effrontery for ease; she set up for a wit, and professed to be, not deep, but the most delicate shade of blue—was the first to patronize the (in these rude days) objectionable harp and more odious waltz—talked what she and her crowds of admirers miscalled French, but in reality a patois such as Moliere puts in the mouths of his low provincial characters, sung Italian songs that might have passed with a native of Florence for Iroquois—danced fancy-dances in public ball-rooms, and esteemed herself a combination of the polished artlessness of the wild Irish girl—and the superhuman graces and endowments of Mme. Dalmatian. And in sooth she did not unwisely in thus taking state upon herself; for throughout our happy Union—from Savannah to Saratoga—wherever the vain-glorious pretender appeared, she found polite society full ready to sustain, and even to surpass her high self-appraisal. Miss Swann was acclaimed the quintessence of ton and refinement, and lauded and poetized as a second Anne Killegrew: Miss Swann could boast lovers of every age and degree, and conquered and coquetted away without pause or mercy.

"Strange graces still and stranger flights she had,
Was just not ugly—and was just not mad;"

and yet the proudest beauties were unseen by her side, her nonsense preferred to the sallies of brightest wits. It was a hallucination as complete and irrational as the mania for military chieftains, pet banks, or any other popular delusion; its object seemed fairly and at once installed as perpetual dictatrix, and surrounded with every temptation to be as silly and tyrannical as she pleased: no wonder her head was turned by such elevation; no wonder she lost sight of her true interest, and forgot to make hay while the sun shone.

But time sped—and the theme of all tongues and desire of all hearts, remained plain Miss Swann without an establishment, and further than ever from a suitable husband. The sunny side of twenty-five—that day of doom to quaking spinsters was passed; and still no duke had in person or by proxy, presented himself as a candidate for the peerless prize of her hand. Maria was amazed and indignant beyond measure; but with "the main of waters" rolling its three thousand miles of wave and sea-weed between—how could she punish the noble loggards who had doubtless heard her praises waited across, on the loftiest notes of fame's trumpet—and yet presumed to condemn the call? Since the mountain did not care to come to Mahomet, the only way was for Mahomet to go to the mountain; but this was a step more easily talked of than taken. A trip to England—the Eden of aristocracy, had been actually projected and conned over to the utter bewilderment of Miss Swann's brain; but less fortunate than certain rich emulators of her freaks and follies, who went abroad, contrived to "hook" insolvent lords—and realized in the simple ken of the republican countrymen they disdained, the antediluvian marvel of the daughters of men being taken to wife by the sons of God—the sinews of war were wanting—or to speak plainly—ready money sufficient was not to be had without endangering certain pecuniary plans as sacred and unchangeable as the Jewish year of jubilee. Her London triumph which our female despot looked forward to, as did Napoleon to his coronation at Milan, with the iron crown of Charlemagne! was therefore, held subject to procrastination, and her vain mind a prey to all the pangs caused by that insidious "thief of time."

Her lady mother, to whose able policy her extraordinary success had been chiefly owing, died, and matters grew worse. If Danae was won by a shower of gold, so had been most of Maria's admirers, though doomed to see theirs fall only by anticipation. Mrs. Swann's will, as it was jocosely called, seemed considered as valid as if it had been expressed under his hand and seal—the whole being duly on record in the county court, the general's dying division and bequests. The impression was decisive, and fatal to sundry attachments most tender and true.

"Her city-beaux and country cousins Lovers no more flew off by dozens,"

and the forsaken fair one not deficient in discernment, began to open her astonished eyes. Still her position continued apparently the same; she had lost suitors not subjects—and though less courted was as much admired as ever. She clutched the sceptre that seemed slipping through her grasp; yet wiser than most actual monarchs in a similar situation, began to cast about for the ways and means of a graceful abdication, where she found herself in danger of being momentarily deposed. A love-match instead of the mariage de convenance, that was to whisk off the peeress or ambassadress in a coach and six—romance in place of ambition, sentiment and sacrifices to supercede the "pomp, pride and circumstance of a glorious" hyemal in high life, occurred to her at a moment, when she felt half inclined to fall in love, for the first time in her life, with the handsomest man of the day—we might almost say of the age.

This, as my young lady-readers have already divined, could be no other man than Ernest Virrian, an Adonis in propensities as well as person—hunting hares no less eagerly than hearts—famous for horses, dogs, and intrigues—a charioteer after the fashion of Jehu—a dead shot, just such a finished and intellectual fop as Henry Pelham—and as much enamoured of himself as the hapless Narcissus. He was, moreover, the last male scion of a house time-honoured as the Montmorencies of the State; and in possession of a large fortune, not more, according to credible report than two thirds dipped. All circumstances concurred to produce what the delectable Tony Lumpkin terms "a concatenation accordingly." A hereditary friendship existed between the Swann's and the Virrians; the representative of this last race, made frequent visits to Swann's Court, and himself an adept in the art, evinced every disposition to get up a flirtation with the accomplished jilt, who, setting aside the advantage of seniority, was as thoroughly versed in her métier of coquette, as Ninon de L'Enclos, the patron saint of the sisterhood. She, therefore, flattered herself, and that not without some ground, with hopes of success, and the eclat of a sensation, such as could not fail to attend the conquest of the young lord of Long-Lane, a reputed invincible who derided all thoughts of ever compromising himself by the commission of matrimony. There was, however, one little obstacle overlooked by the lady in the heat of attack; the gentleman with a most pardonable inconsideration of her particular views, had contrived to get not a little, but very deeply entangled in another quarter.

To return from our long digression to the company, Miss Jeffers, who, likewise, made les deux yeux at this paragon of coxcombs—and who, if she was absolutely frightful in favour, valued herself, and was valued by others for being indisputably rich, stood scowling her ugliest scowl at the "airs and triumph and all that" of her regal rival, as she languished on a sofa,

"With crowds of well-dressed males, before her filing,
Who passing bow'd and mingled with her chat;"

while she, regardless of them all, kept dipping her embroidered handkerchief in lavender-water, and bathing first her own and then Ernest's temples. He in a frock-coat and pantaloons, (a deviation from the orthodox mode, perfectly heretical) of fawn-coloured cloth, lined with blue silk, and displaying limbs such as were before supposed to exist only in the marble of the matchless Apollo, booted and spurred—a horse-whip in his hand, and his Hyperion curls covered with a sable cap banded and tasseled with gold, reclined in a negligent posture beside her, playing the disdainful with half a hundred of the finest women in town—and resolutely turning his back on all female blandishments save those of his royal coz, as he affected to style the co-sovereign of fashion's realms. Miss Swann had waited repeatedly,—though such an innovation had cost her more than one eligible lover; for, at that savage period, when we were just blessed with the dawn of civilization, many men and some ladies were found stupid enough to dispense with seeing one of the modest sex submit to be whirled out of her senses and all show of delicacy, or order to the amusement of a room-full of gaping and mocking spectators. Nothing troubled by such idle scruples, the bold and belted belle rose again to perform something even worse than the indecorous German gyration; this was the far-famed Turkish shawl-dance, the most revolting of fancy-measures, except when done in a select circle, and by a very young person. The fair Maria was really a fine dancer; all crowded around an exhibition so novel and seldom then to be seen even upon the stage; and inspired by the general gaze and plaudits, the obliging gentlewoman, who thus degraded herself below a public danseuse, doing that from choice, which the latter is compelled to by necessity, surpassed her former outdoings in the certainty that this full and free display could not fail to arouse the belamour, usually so engrossed by himself. Her eyes singled out this charming, because most careless creature—seeking to read in his admiration, if not enthusiasm, in requital of her gestic lore. Uncovered, animated, and as completely oblivious of her as though they had never met, she beheld him standing not ten steps off, or rather leaning in earnest ecstasy over a chair occupied by Miss Livingston, who had entered in time to witness yet hardly enjoy the oriental pas seul. Wounded vanity co-operated with love, or what the morified flirt was pleased so to call; and both were perhaps a little aided by excess of fatigue, arising from her various and violent salutary exertions during the evening. An opportune dizziness came over her, but there was method even in this half-swoon. She tottered, as if by accident, towards the couple who had so horrified her by their mutual engagement of looks and discourse; twenty gentlemen sprang to her support, but she had already caught hold of Virrian's arm, and sunk into the seat whence his startled companion instantly sprung. But, though the lovers, as her jealous fears had more than once surmised them, were interrupted and divided, the intruder gained nothing else by her manoeuvre; Ernest walked sullenly off without taking the least interest in her recovery,—and though the late object of his devoirs was assiduous in her attempts to bring it about, he evidently disliked and reproached her notice of any body but himself. But this ungrateful hero was the only defaulter; a perfect panic pervaded the assembly, and as much alarm and inquiry and bustle were afloat as at the attempted assassination of the President. Gen. Swann, a tall, thin man, in a blue coat, scarlet waistcoat, and white cassimere breeches, with his hair queued and profusely powdered—a most patrician air—and all the formal suavity of the old school characterizing his address, came hastening as fast as his measured dignity of movement could be urged, to his daughter's side, who rejecting all the sympathy and attendance proffered by her swarm of beaux, begged to go home directly, and that her dear, kind Evinia would have the charity to accompany her in case of a second seizure by the way, which that young lady, unconscious of the manner in which her name was connected with that of the father, who seconded Maria's request with great eagerness, readily did, leaving Miss Jeffers and Co. to pour forth a fresh torrent of invectives against her person, manners, age and luck.

Evinia Livingston—the subject of all this and a great deal more envy and abuse, was destitute of parents and almost of fortune—yet one of the few and favoured, whom partial nature delights to enrich beyond compute. Not so regularly beautiful as attractive, and as might be inferred from her time of life, which (the misrepresentations of her enemies notwithstanding,) was yet in its spring—

"More a wit than wise,
Her tongue bewitch'd as sweetly as her eyes;"

yet neither exercised their spell frequently or indiscriminately. Proud rather than vain, as fastidious as refined, she retreated from public and promiscuous admiration, and kept herself almost as much and jealously out of view, as the Invisible Girl. But there is no surer way to excite observation than by running away from it. The celebrity of our heroine kept pace with her reserve till she became—no: not the belle; that title belonged exclusively to the dashing Miss Swann; for, gentle ladies, the distinction that you are most of you so emulous of, cannot be attained without immense sacrifice of dignity, and taking undue means to propitiate, and endless pains to preserve general favour. "Those who aspire to govern others, rather than themselves," writes Lacon "must descend to meanness, which the truly noble cannot brook; nor will such stoop to kiss the earth though it were like Brutus for dominion;" and this is no less true of toasts than statesmen. To retain supremacy in either state, it is necessary to cajole as well as defy; not always to shine but to stoop upon occasion: hence Miss Swann, in the plenitude of her power, might have exclaimed with the Athenian orator—"Oh! ye Americans! how hard do I work to obtain your applause!" Her coy antithesis was both too stately and surpassing for these unfeminine practices; she could neither tawn nor bully nor brag of herself—shrunk from the trouble and turmoil of canvassing for suffrages, and battling against contending claimants—not merely as intolerable drudgery—but as something horrible almost beyond the abominations of a poissarde—and scorned to make herself a name at the cost of being all things to all men and all women. The one was an enthroned demagogue, a female Robespierre, domineering over the multitude, shunned and dreaded by the noblesse of society; the other, a born-princess, her sway confined to its natural sphere—but willingly acknowledged by all the high-bred, the courtly, and the witty. Few, (comparatively speaking) had ever experienced the full witchery of Evinia's manner and charms; but those so graced, spoke of her as unique in fascination; and all her acquaintances, gentle or simple, male or female, for or against—bore testimony, spontaneously or otherwise, to the many and rare requirements, which made her an epitome of intellectual excellence.

The aunt, with whom she lived, not as a dependant—for her predominating mind rendered that impossible; but as a beloved protégée, or rather an only child—exerted herself to the utmost in putting her niece forward in gay society, as far as the latter would acquiesce in her doing so—and counted upon her brilliant settlement as an event as certain, though to every body else it seemed as distant as the Millennium. But the judgment of the old lady happened to be more correct than that of the many, inasmuch as it was founded on surer premises. Miss Livingston was never known to speak of a rejected suitor; she abhorred that most dishonorable and ungrateful procedure, which repays the highest compliment that can be offered to a woman, by a cruel and wanton exposure of the pretensions, surely enough humiliating by a repulse without the additional and perhaps severer, pang of feelings laid bare to the scoffs and banter of friend and foe. Never even to her kind protectress, did she depart from this settled principle of action; much less, according to the wont of too many of her sex, go about making confidantes of one half of her acquaintance, under strict injunction of secrecy with the implied understanding that circulation is meant thereby. The public, accustomed to hear the changes rung upon the attentions of Mr. such-a-one—the conquest of Miss so-and-so—somewhat hastily concluded, that, as Evinia made no boasts, she could have no proposals to prate about. She was by no means solicitous for the enlightenment either of the world or her kinswoman, whose observation could not fail however, to make very shrewd guesses as to the truth in most cases—and continually reproved her niece's anxiety to avoid rather than allure suitors. Evinia, resembling La belle Hamilton in her concern about the quality, and not quantity, of incense offered on her shrine, was more apt to be humbled than flattered by the unpremeditated captures sometimes occurring in spite of herself. She could no more have endured the imputation of addresses actually made her, than the stigma of a personal disgrace; she felt debased by them even in her own esteem: and yet the persons so repelled and despised, belonged to the general run of beaux, eagerly squabbled for, and caught up among her young associates. But then on the other hand, there had been more and loftier homage laid at her feet; the vows and sighs of "men of mark," whose casual notice conferred distinction, and in whose preference she was content to exult, without betraying and thereby becoming unworthy of it. Thus had she gone on till the age of twenty-four; at which epoch, we introduce her to the favour of our readers, and the pursuit of Ernest Virrian, who had run down so much fair game.

The set of gossips, whose can-can is detailed on our first pages, were, however, a little premature in their statements: matters, though really en train between Miss Livingston and the ancient proprietor of Swann's Court, the most superb of rural domiciles, had not yet gone the length of acceptance and engagement. The lady was vibrating in all the agonies of indecision, and a subdued, though not extinct partiality for another. Evinia, as if from an instinctive sense of all she was one day doomed to suffer, had hitherto steered clear of the rocks and quicksands, on which so many of her sex are continually wrecked by love. Greatly addicted to books, and of a high contemplative turn of mind, she cherished the most exalted ideas, borrowed from romance, of congenial souls and masculine and sympathetic perfection. The depth and diffidence of devotion, such as a knight of yore dedicated to the lady-love, who now and then deigned a smile of approval on his deeds of bold emprise, and whose favour was to be won by years of servitude signalized by unswerving fidelity and obedience, all the communion betwixt them comprised in glances or the casual contract induced by a service rendered, or a prize bestowed at joust or tourney; such she persuaded herself was the passion capable of moving her, such the hero she could adore and vow herself to forever. Her enthusiasm did not quiver extend to belief in the possibility of realizing this day-dream; firmly fancying that she could never descend to blush and tremble and glow at the look or touch or words of a man, walking the round of every-day life, and daring to woo her as his equal and no more; the fair visionary had, from the first, made up her mind to aggrandize herself by marriage. But though postponed, her time was still to come, and that when her feelings, not having expended themselves at their earliest development, had grown with her growth, and strengthened with her strength. With no nearer relative than Mrs. Russell, whom she tended with the love and observance of a daughter, she had a vast fund of dispassionate affection on hand against a demand; but this, and all the energy of her nature besides, seemed too little for a heart like hers to give, when once alive to "all the sweet effects of mutual hopes."

She saw Ernest Virrian for the first time with the startled yet intense delight, that attends our first gaze on the master piece of the sculptured god of day. "Is it possible," one asks with incredulous triumph, "that the semblance of human forms and limbs can express such rapt majesty; such superb superiority; such sublime, yet beautiful divinity of mien and motion?" Even so did Evinia feel as she stood and looked upon the figure before her; yet the impression was evanescent as exquisite, and to be awakened again and again ere it deepened into any thing beyond that admiration, which young and old of both sexes bestowed upon this admitted model of manly grace. Mr. Virrian, if less struck by Miss Livingston's appearance—was infinitely more smitten during their first interview. He did not endeavour after her notice; that was contrary to his system of tactics; but through-out that and their succeeding meetings, which were "few and far between," he watched and waited around her with an impatience of any man's approach, an astonishment at her apparent disregard of him, and at last a distrust of his own transcendent attractions, which could scarcely be reassured by the complaisant eye-beams, ever and anon suffered to stray towards him. He read therein admiration extreme, but not impassioned—such as he had seen her lavish on a picture, a rare flower or a beautiful child. That dignity so perfect in its self-possession, that purity of air and tone emanating like a glory from the presence of a modest woman; one who guards the treasury of these feelings precious beyond pearls of great price, with a vestal vigilance, and scorns to be won unsought; for she is in some sort won, who permits herself to love unasked, gave him no hope of surprisal or spontaneous surrender. He sought her side, but each time with diminished confidence; his haughty security, his idolatry of self, the habitual insensibility engendered by perfect vanity, all his panoply of defence was lost and gone, and his whole soul ensnared and subdued ere he could flatter himself with having produced the least favourable effect in return. The bold brigand of hearts had at length met with a fair and mightier robber, and was forced to own himself a slave. But intolerable as he deemed those bonds, while tormenting himself with the dread of being, for once in his life, the only captive—he soon found them not merely endurable but glorious; not that he ever felt entirely satisfied with the sentiments given in exchange for his. In person and character literally an incarnation of Byron's finest creation, Sardanapalus, the heroic voluptuary, the kingly trifler, "who dallies with Bellona as her bride-groom, for his sport and pastime—and whose hands the spear or fan, the shield or shining mirror becomes equally well,"—he longed after the wild and intense overflowings of a Myrrha's fervour, and was hardly put off with the pure but regulated sensibilities of a Zavina, constant, tender, yet striving to conceal even from herself the excess of enamoured devotion, evinced not by caresses, and the warm effusion of unsexual sentiment, but by the stealthy and unwearying ministrations of such disinterestedness as moves

"Mortals the nearest, the angelic nature."

Still the first days of this mutual passion, mutual that is by implication rather than avowed, were blissful beyond all of past enjoyment or imagination, and not the less so because some degree of uncertainty and reluctance had preceded and enhanced the fruition of their tacit understanding, for it never amounted to much more. Evinia, dazzled as she could not help being by that exterior, exceeding

"The demi-deity, Alcides in His majesty of superhuman manhood," was not of the ardent temperament, which virtuous maids and matrons have not hesitated to eulogize in Shakespeare's Juliet as the essence of female perfection. She could admire at sight, but to be touched more tenderly was another matter; and all the sweet and holy sensations embalming our love-thoughts like the perfume around the rose; all the fond and feminine devotion, which hallows passion and raises it from selfish to sublime, not starting to instant life in her—could only be called forth by long and earnest service, and by at least the appearance of endearing and lofty qualities. When a woman once becomes attached, she will continue so after the illusion vanishes, and perhaps even the more because of the defects thus left unveiled and conveying the strongest appeal to her guardian-care; and well it is for man, imperfectly constituted as he must own himself, that it is so. But this is "love in full life and length, not love" inceptive, and our heroine's was yet in its first stage, and she herself destined to illustrate, like Hazlitt. The grievous consequences of a want of self-knowledge. She never dreamed of danger to her heart from one so unlike, the heroic vision haunting her wrapt fancy. And yet, as experience taught too late, the most dangerous of characters is that, which blends a certain captivating irregularity with some show of high, honorable strain, or what passes for such in the eyes of romantic and prepossessed youth. Miss Livingston was but little versed in human kind, any more than in that species of wisdom emphatically recommended by the saying of the Milesian sage; she had not as yet begun to study either herself or others; and the young Alcibiades who strove to enshrine himself in her affections, had preserved, amid all the dissipation of his career, some of the amiable traits originally his; an ingenuousness that spoke in every look and tone; a reverence for virtue more than lip-deep, and a capacity for appreciating and by way of bonne bouche, exemplifying the best part of the Epicurean ethics, which, disguising and dignifying his worst excesses, contrasted with the effect of light upon darkness, the slighter yet not less taking points, formerly enumerated as his characteristics. He was, moreover, daring to recklessness—an attribute specially patronized by woman; and last not least, he bowed with a devotion, wordless indeed, but legible in every glance and action, before her ascendancy, and hers alone. This is a tribute irresistible, when coming from such a quarter, with the coldest and hautiest she, that ever aspired to pass on.

"In maiden-meditation, fancy free;"

a triumph, for which Diana herself would stoop from her saintly sphere: and if ever one, who, from "love's weak childish bow hath liv'd unharmed," loses her indifference and is made a thrall, 'tis when assailed by the suit of a habitual breaker of vows and chains, who has dallied with and defied a host of amatory encounters. The feud is held a kind of holy warfare, the whole sex arms in crusade against the roving rebel, and his capture becomes a contest wherein neutrality is as heinous and unallowable as by Solon's celebrated law. Happy is the fair, who achieves the miracle, worthy to be dwelt on as the recalling a rank idolater of himself—one more criminal than the worshippers of Baal—to the service of the true divinity, at whose altars woman stands as the natural priestess. So Evinia flattered as much as fluttered by the obvious though silent submission of this arch heretic, from the pure faith, lent herself unsuspectingly in furtherance of Cupid's aim at her own breast, while deeming only to revenge the insulted common cause. Perhaps, after all, the great charm lay in manner, and that sympathetic yet inexplicable communion so finely touched upon by the poet:

"Mysterious are his ways, whose power
Brings forth that unexpected hour
When hearts that never lov'd before,
Meet, blend, unite to part no more."

If these circumstances prove no excuse for my heroine, I have no other to offer, and must even leave her liable to the verdict of wholly indefensible. It is the historian's province to give facts, not commentary; and certain it is, that, in course of time, Virrian found by several infallible signs that he had no reason to despair.

On his side the attachment, though less progressive, did not establish itself without a manful struggle. Libertine as he was, Ernest, never, for a moment misconstrued the disposition of his mistress—or thought of debasing her from her high estate, as he had done so many others without compunction; this was impossible, not only by reason of her superiority, but his own feelings. Egotist and sensualist as we have painted him, it was chiefly owing to the force of circumstances that he became so, and his stars were to be blamed as more in fault than he. Left an orphan in the cradle, his only blood-relation, nearer than second-cousins, was a half sister, whom he had been always estranged from, less through inclination than accident. Educated by an aunt on the mother's side, who professed the strictest tenets of the presbyterian sect, Louisa Virrian had imbibed her doctrine in its full extent, and held all mirth to be sin—pleasure as a mortal offence against the revealed will of the Deity, and this fair earth, so fraught with the gracious provision of an Almighty Father for the enjoyment of his children, as one vast penitentiary, where, not only our actual trespasses, but every gay and worldly emotion, every thought that had other than our future and final state for its subject, was to be expiated by prayer and perpetual suffering. Cold and composed in countenance and manner, she was not devoid of sensibility; though it displayed itself in a way the most distasteful to a headstrong young man, intoxicated by success and adulation. She loved her brother as an elder sister must always love the bright boy, who has nestled in her arms and been fondled as the dearest, because most intractable of pets. But on his exceeding comeliness she now looked with admiration and abhorrence strangely mingled; taken with its concomitants, expensive dress and unlicensed amours, it disquieted her as something too closely bordering upon the suspicious vesture, wherein Satan shines as an angel of light; and his wild ways, as it went in common parlance, filled her with a holy horror, continually expressing itself in homilies and exhortations too well calculated to chill his feelings and keep him at a distance from her. Miss Virrian, under the influence of these prejudices, had declined a residence at the family-seat, where Ernest, from the time of his coming of age, kept up the state and luxury befitting a young sybarite. Full of the gloomy notions of a religious fatalist, she viewed him as something alien from heaven, and akin to the children of perdition, with whom she dared not, however, predestinate as she was, totally to confound one so near and dear to her. His outward favour, the splendour of his position in society, the "golden opinions" these circumstances enabled him to "gather from all sorts of men;"—all, in short, that would have recommended him to the special love of most sisters, seemed to her fanaticism so many aggravations of the snares set by the Evil One for the profane and unwary—the daintiest devices of that enemy, the devil, "who goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour." Thus minded, the deprecating girl wept and wrestled for him in agonies of prayer and spiritual supplication—but knew not how to render the person so endangered and cared for, the better service of drawing him to her by the effusion of sisterly confidence and frankness, that would have been irresistible to Ernest, who was naturally of an affectionate temper, and therefore, the most effectual way to reclaim and keep him out of temptation.

It is not to be supposed that our modern Lovelace greatly affected the company of this pious Louisa, who, young and pretty and gentle as she was, threw away all these advantages, and was lost to him and the world, not "by lot severe," but through her excessive and obstinate bigotry. There was nothing in common between the two—no similitude of feeling and pursuits, to form a point d'appui, whereon sympathy and intimacy might rest. Still so few were his ties of kindred, and such his opinion of the innate worth and kindness, thus sadly alloyed, that they gave their possessor a certain degree of influence over him, and his regard, such as it was, for this apparently frigid zealot, was the only pure and tender emotion Ernest was sensible of previous to his passion for Evinia. Holy and intense as this last sentiment soon became, it remained long a question with him whether to quell or indulge it. And though the first proving impracticable—the latter was, of course, the case, we cannot say how much of his engouement arose from a spirit of contradiction. Disgusted with easy victories, he would not have cared a straw for his present idol, had her carriage towards him been such as he had cloyed and sickened of in his other favourites; and perhaps the fascination he now owned himself under, lay less in her merits than in a manner often deemed Miss Livingston's only fault. While beauty, grace, and intellect varying as they beamed, might have flashed upon, without enkindling him to a glow, the novel and refreshing pudency of a demeanour such as adorned Valeria, had a charm for the yearning taste of the sated voluptuary like a draught of "the blest sherbet sublimed with snow," upon a palate fevered by the last night's debauch; and though her other attractions, when fairly brought into play, composed so many links, it was her seeming indifference that put the rivet to the chain. Still, like all others of his cast, young Virrian, even in the height of his enchantment, demurred about paying the price affixed to possession, and tossed and turned and toyed with what he deemed his infatuation like a moth flitting around the flame, in which, sooner or later his wings are sure to be singed. Matrimony! he shivered at the very sound; and not Benedict himself declaimed more vehemently against such a falling off from good fellowship and bachelor-hood, at the very moment he was, step by step, approaching the awful catastrophe. The coyness of his mistress greatly contributed to keep up this humour; for a very Don Giovanni as long as idle or lawless gallantry led him on, Ernest required, under the influence of a serious prepossession, tending to an honorable end, a vast deal of encouragement, and was apt to be chilled and repelled by every dubious glance and word that could be construed into rebuke. In a high degree obnoxious to that timidity, which every man, even the most abandoned roue, feels in the presence of her he truly desires to please, the confession, while near Evinia, perpetually hovering on his lips—was as often repressed from want of nerve to speak it; and when out of her sight, the pride of the spoiled Adonis, the false shame swaying the half-reformed rake, would rally with arguments to deter him from falsifying all his former manifestoes against marriage. Much of this was because of his uncertainty as to the reception awaiting his suit, and for him, the phoenix of the age—the idol of womankind—the Caesar of hearts, who hitherto had only to come and see and conquer, here to ask and be refused! it was preposterous, incredible—the bare idea of his ever subjecting his dignity to such a venture! This faint-heartedness produced alternately hot and cold fits, which, though assisting his conquest of Miss Livingston's affections, by allowing full time for their growth, did not accelerate the conclusion, which each in secret cherished the hope of; and while with every interview, his antimatrimonial prejudices gave way, and in their stead,

"The noble sister of Publicola,
The moon of Rome,"

"Came thronging soft and delicate desires,"

it was still in vain these prompted him how fair Evinia was, while she took no steps to evince how fond she could be.

She, for her part, terrified as every woman of feeling and delicacy must be at the first glimpse disclosing the real state of her heart; inexperienced in the inconsistencies of passion, and fancying that the secret so oppressive to her sense of self-respect, must be as evident to the whole world as to herself—sought to draw the double veil of coldness and dissimulation over the partiality as yet unsanctified by a positive proposal. The impatient inamorate, for some time a dupe to the self-control of the charming dissembler, could neither deceive nor decoy her. With that feminine intuition, unerring in such cases, she saw him daily growing more enraptured, and more decided in his attentions; she was as well aware of her empire over him as if the most explicit declaration had revealed it; and yet so far from facilitating, she shrunk from the moment of eclat, with that indisposition to own a flame, always urging woman to conceal to the very last. One word!—one look from her would have vanquished all his doughty resolves, and lured him from his high perch to prostration at her feet; and yet that word she could not have spoken—that look she could not have cast, had their fate hung upon her condescension. At length after consorting together for weeks; after conning over set speeches, imagining ecstatic scenes, and making and finding opportunities only to let them slip by unimproved, the ice was broken in a moment of excitement, originating in accident. But the chance, that favoured, likewise frustrated a complete explanation; the lovers were separated ere more than the first imperfect yet how full avowal. The magic phrase, that levelled all barriers between them, was uttered, and each at liberty to revel in a brief enjoyment of paradise.

Once persuaded of Evinia's preference, all doubts and irresolution vanished from the mind of our quondam marriage-hater; and like Claudio, he felt "time go upon crutches till love had all his rites." Still to come out with the awful proffer! to propound, in so many express words the substance of a love-suit, and disfranchise himself, in good set terms, at once and forever. The more he meditated upon it, the more awkward and difficult appeared the achievement; and with all his impatience to conjugate, this preliminary of putting, or being put to the question, lay as a stumbling block in Ernest's path. How did he curse the mischance, that had cut him short, ere he could round off his first soft speech with an impromptu proposal! And then Miss Livingston, re-assured upon the subject of her dearest concern—all doubts smoothed—every anxiety appeased, and that goal attained, where she could now

"Rest as after much turmoil,
A blessed soul doth in Elysium."

perversely refused to participate in his paroxysms—and, women-like, had no notion of precipitating matters, which, of themselves, to the wedding complexion must come at last. The mere knowledge of a return of love sufficed for her happiness, and she had long wanted only a verbal confirmation of that fact. Again and again, the couple met without opportunity for more than the broken sentence, half-sigh, half-vow, that expresses more than the overflow of most impassioned eloquence. But the crisis of the affair was close by—closer, indeed, than the parties interested would have cared for, had they foreboded the adverse issue. Evinia had been walking, not alone, but in a party with her lover. They had wandered far and merrily through the fields, in that free and favourable mood, always induced by the exhilaration of exercise and the open air; the lads and lasses flitting and fluttering around each other, like butterflies sporting in the sun-shine—all restraint thrown aside, and the ceremony and state of behaviour, befitting the shaded and circumscribed drawing-room, discarded as something unnatural and impossible to preserve on the smooth green sward, and in the regions of light and liberty. Never had our heroine, whose spell lay in the sorcery of seductive motion, appeared to such advantage in the eyes of the hypercritical, because oracular arbiter of beauty and fashion. Animated by the infectious spirit of mirth, away she went—now half warbling in bird-like glee, the snatch of some simple song, or laughing the graceful laugh, that delicately clear, came ringing on the charmed ear like the sound of a silver bell—now bounding hither and thither, with the airy step of a young Atalanta, sure to win in the race of love, her bonnet off and hanging on her arm—her long locks, "a wilderness of Amaranthine curls," escaped from confinement and streaming as she flew. Ernest gazed till every faculty seemed absorbed in the sense of sight, and for the first time, his attachment was suspected and whispered around,

"The thrilling pressure of the hand,"

"The violet sunset with ethereal dyes, Voluptuous blushed along the balmy skies," ere the gay group dispersed, and the two found themselves returned and alone in the piazza adjoining Mrs. Russell's parlour. The air around was "Filled to faintness with perfume."

The evening star twinkled down upon them through the purple twilight of summer; and Evinia in a glow of confusion and delight, conscious only that Virrian, the admired Virrian, he so carressed and celebrated as

"Th' expectancy and rose of the fair state," was at her side, and his lips about to second the world of oftentreaty imagined in those ardent eyes—longed, yet trembled to hear his voice, put an end to the tremour of excessive expectation. He murmured a few passionate phrases, prefacing

"The kiss so guiltless and refined

That love each warmer wish forbore—

These eyes proclaimed so pure a mind,

E'en passion blush'd to plead for more."

Emboldened by this boon, the encroaching lover, after much fond dalliance with the hand he held, withdrew from it a ring of plaited hair, and pearl—which he essayed to replace with a plain circlet of gold, such as is given in token of consenting in wedlock. "An exchange is no robbery sweet lady mine," said he in timid tones; "let me keep yours, and wear this, which is vowed only to go where I'd wish to place the marriage-ring."

Fatal action! more fatal device, which he had exulted in as the readiest mode of preferring his final claim. For, perfect as were Evinia's bodily proportions, she had ever fretted at her hand as

"E'en of the largest for a female mould," and that, wherein it now reposed might have shamed the size of Lord Byron's. Her keen sense of this personal blemish, and a dread of its effect upon her lover whom she recollected to have heard particularly eloquent in praise of taper-fingers and rose-tinted palms, so disconcerted her little remaining self-possession, that she did not comprehend, indeed scarce heard the significant sentence, which corroborated his startling effort; all she sought was to escape the perilous test, in which, after a brief struggle, she succeeded. The satrap-signior of Long Lane, who had pushed matters so far beyond all past daring, and quailing before the least symptom of disapprobation, with an instant and entire change of countenance, dropped the hand that so resisted his motion, retreated from the vicinity he had just coveted so closely, and fixed on her one long melancholy look, where love, dismay, and surprise were equally blended. Not a word was uttered on either side; the lady, on whom the full import of his speech flashed when too late, knew not how, indeed had no time allowed her to retrieve the ground thus unwittingly lost; Ernest, after sitting a few minutes in embarrassed and indignant perturbation, rose, and abruptly took his leave.

The foolish pair, thus thrown farther than ever from each other, still continued their intercourse, though not on its previous footing of growing complaisance. Mutual dissatisfaction resulted from this slight misapprehension, which was but the beginning of a host of mistakes and troubles. The gentleman, who, after such mighty efforts had screwed his courage to the proposing point, and hugged himself in rapture at his ingenious plan for exposing himself to the least painful denial, did not find Evinia's mere gesture of repugnance one whit more palatable than the most cutting words, and was hugely affronted at what he conceived a summary and most haughty dismissal of him. She not understanding all he meant and hoped for in return, was no less mortified and incensed at his omitting to renew the theme, and believed herself vastly ill-used, when they fell into each other's company more than once without his referring at all to the particular matter between them. And by the time, the disappointed suitor had a little recovered from the shock of a repulse, the farthest in the world from her thoughts, and under the impression that he might have been too prone to displeasure, made some faint advances to another trial. Miss Livingston, vexed at his unceremonious proceeding, and thinking herself disgraced by such dependency on the breath of an every day trifler, a professed evapore of the very first water—was in no mood to be gracious according to his will and pleasure. For the first time since their acquaintance, she felt disposed to find severe fault with the peculiar character of her provoking follower, for he seemed resolved to become nothing beyond. 'Tis true, she had loved him even the better for that character, forgetful of all her pristine lofty visions, she cherished a kind of compassionate tenderness for the being so preternatural in beauty and bewildered in tale, a fond and pitying regret as distinct as possible from the contemptuous commiseration that we all pray to be delivered from, for the errors of his course, and an anxiety to be the blessed instrument of winning him back to the right path, and the happiness inseparable from virtue, such as may move angels towards those to whom they are sent as holy and disinterested messengers. But somewhat of this extreme attachment

"From passion's dross refined and clear," abated under her persuasion (false indeed, but not the less firm) of the careless and transient penchant ill-repaying it. 'Twas, however, if a natural, a gross mistake, her supposing Ernest's love to be so slight and unworthy in comparison of hers, or rather she totally failed in discriminating between the impulse as it shows itself in man, and sways and engrosses woman. It was not till long after-years that she became aware of her misconception, and learned not only to credit but appreciate the difference that individualizes the sentiment in each sex while most uniting them under it. Now she grew more and more humbled under the idea of having given so much and received so little, or rather naught from the ungrateful Virrian; while he, in high dudgeon at her continued coldness, was just as much out in deeming Evinia disdainful because it was not in her nature to be demonstrative, even had his assiduities justified it. Thus they kept on playing at cross purposes; and ceasing, not to love, but to be indulgent to the inconsistencies, often making the passion wear the guise of hate.

Nor did their own sensitive hearts and aptness to exaggerate the little crosses always imagined or caused by over-earnest regard, alone make against a speedy reconciliation: other, and not inferior circumstances opposed it. Miss Swann, as we have seen, was not averse, in default of a British nobleman, to take up with the most admired of native patricians, or inclined to recede from her assault upon him for any thing short of his being put hors du combat by Hymen, or giving her pretensions the cut-direct, a piece of philosophy quite alien from the coxcomical practices of our love-monger. True, after Ernest's serious thoughts of Evinia, he grew strangely callous to Maria's advances; but her eagle eye was the first to perceive something amiss between the lovers, and this was enough for one, who, in matters of coquetry, had the tact of Talleyrand, and Machiavel's want of principle. Piqued into perseverance by the contempt evinced for her by this "man of men," to say nothing of the pressing argument so sternly enforced by the thirtieth birthday, as terrific in its passage as a spectre; and seeing with the science of her sect, a sure way to conciliate him through that vanity, which his elevated mistress could not descend to flatter; she proceeded, though slowly, and with due circumspection, to excite and envenom that distrust already more than latent between the two. A lucky coincidence favoured her design; Gen. Swann, a much better match, in the estimation of prudent elders, than the extravagant, though peerless debauchee, who was dashing headlong to ruin—began to give sign of his ripeness for a second wife; his wily daughter thought him not far from in love with Miss Livingston; she knew that he stood first on Mrs. Russell's list, and that could she contrive to edge him on to a proposal for Evinia, the aunt would probably throw all her influence into his scale. Another assistant she hoped for in Miss Virrian, who, for no reason that any one could suggest, looked with particular disgust upon the prospect of her brother's alliance with the only woman, who had power to lure him from his devious ways. She, therefore, rather encouraged him in the minor evil of a flirtation with the experienced hand at Swann's Court; never, for a moment, dreaming in the simplicity of her unworldliness, that the lady would think of marriage with a man eight years her junior, or indeed that she had lowered those views so long fixed on a coronet.

Ernest was, however, no docile subject at the beck and call of either. He slighted all the challenges of his mature assailant, backed as they were by the half-way patronage of the unskillful Louisa, and continued, not to court, but to haunt the unimpressible lady of his heart, less though to her discomfiture, than his own disappointment. Nor could his visits well prove productive of an auspicious pacification, as long as made in the spirit of distrust and jealousy. When Evinia's bosom, melting under a return of tenderness, prompted her to deal graciously towards her perverse knight, he was seldom in a frame to avail himself of its overflows; and she, who, upon occasion, could assert her dignity at the expense of her happiness, grew less and less inclined to vouchsafe the opportunities so totally contemned. She loved him as well, perhaps better than ever, in spite of all her struggles to dislodge his image from her breast; as the efforts of the fish, snared by the angler, to escape, serve only to plunge the barbed hook deeper into its flesh. A sudden wrench might wrest her heart away from him so undeserving of it; but the love vibrating in every nerve and palpitation, could only "sink by slow decay;" as yet it retained all its vitality, and though bleeding, seemed likely to beat, as did his, which he held so despised and trampled upon. Nor was our ingenious self-tormentor long without a fresh subject of disquietude. This was nothing else than the frequent apparition of his old friend—to him the first, not of jurists, but of bores, coming and going at Mrs. Russell's with quite the air of l'ami de maison, and addressing himself at times to the object of his own choice, with a manner for which Ernest felt strongly tempted to knock him down. To be sure when the idea first occurred to him, he scouted it in perfect scorn. Old Gen. Swann, a sexagenary, with those spindle-shanks, that queened and powdered head, and ridiculous formality of aspect and grimace, his rival! The rival of Ernest Virrian "framed in the prodigality of nature"—at whose name every beau in the land turned pale with envy and alarm! He walked to the glass, took a long and complaisant survey of the celestial figure, radiant face, and ambrosial curls which had driven so many of either sex to despair, and asked himself whether his brain were not a little touched by the ill-treatment of that false and most insolent girl, that it amused itself in coining such whimsies.

Still when he revisited the field of action, the notion—ridiculous as it was, returned upon him. He found, or fancied a change in the behaviour of the aunt, who had hitherto connived at all the têtes à têtes between him and her lovely charge. Now she seemed strangely observant of their converse, obviously discouraged, if she did not absolutely forbid, any meeting without witnesses, and took good care that the distinguished personage, whose circumstances were now established as flourishing beyond example, should not be thrown into the back ground by the brilliant but insidious exquisite, whose finances, she understood from her forerunning favourite, to be fast approaching a state of most admired disorder. But, though misdoubting, and that with good reason, the manoeuvres of Mrs. Russell, Ernest as yet, did Evinia the justice, to exempt her from any concurrence in them. He never, for an instant, imagined that the woman, who had once loved him, as, at times, he fully persuaded himself the one in question did, could turn away from worshipping

"That unmatched form and feature of blown youth," to hearken at the pleadings of another, and that other, a quizz, aged and unbearable: so heedless of the old lady's schemes as long as the young one continued uncontaminated by them, he went on alternately storming and sighing—by turns forswearing and following her, whom he railed against as a modern edition of Petrarch's Laura.

This state of things, uncomfortable as nonsensical, was destined to have its end at the party, which we treated our readers to at the beginning. Mr. Virrian there seized upon by the unscrupulous Maria, had acquiesced with some symptoms of interest in her flirting demonstrations. This courteous fit lasted till "metal more attractive" appeared, and no longer.

"A substitute shines brightly as a king,
Until a king appear; and then his state
Empties itself."

so says Portia; and so the dazzling ruler of the "Twenty score

Of well bred persons called the world," felt. At once the coquette was deserted and forgotten, and Evinia accosted with that mixture of fervour and timidity, once her daily incense, and still too grateful to her heart. A correspondent change immediately marked her manner—and the lovers were approximating more closely than they had done for days—or as they conceived, ages, to their former feelings; when Miss Swann, like Satan prowling about Paradise, saw and sought to turn delight into dole.

Ernest felt highly exasperated at the readiness of his divinity to render that assistance—after all no more than one lady had a right to expect from another—to the daughter of a man, who he could not help suspecting of some pretensions to her favour. He bit his lip till the blood came, when he saw the girl, but now all smiles and softness to him, retire in compliance with the artful entreaties of the pseudo-invalid—and on the arm so unworthy, yet as promptly accepted as tendered. For the first time, it struck him as possible, that this miracle of her sex, so coy and capricious in her various phases—so insensible to the attractions that could enchain the world beside—might be willing to barter away her charms for their value in gold, and was the secret feodary of her mercenary kinswoman. All the violence of his nature was aroused, and sent the boiling torrents through his veins at this conjuncture, which was just plausible enough to fire a lunatic or a lover, (we believe Shakspeare makes the terms synonymous.) What then was the fury, amounting to madness, with which he heard the comments of the foul-mouthed Miss Jeffers and her set, all opening like a pack in full cry, against the trio just withdrawn—and understood, upon the indisputable authority of the voracious daughter, that Miss Livingston, at whose side he had served and lingered in such sweet hope and fervent fidelity, who had dared to dally with, and, in the face of day, disdain him—was actually affianced, engaged beyond the shadow of a doubt, to a dotard, fitter to represent a death's head than a bridegroom. The nursery-legend of Beauty and the Beast, was nothing to this absurd monstrosity. He now recollected having heard several speeches, tantamount to assertion of the incredible fact, buzzed into his ears by the fair Maria, while half-lounging, half-dozing beside her on the sofa. With clenched teeth and hands, a burning brain, and the fierce gesture of passion enforced, indeed, to calmness, but ready to boil over at a touch, he pushed his way out of the house, consigning the whole party to perdition in a volley of most emphatic curses; and it would have been with absolute pleasure, had he learnt of Miss Livingston's meeting her death on the road to Swann's Court, whither she had gone off in triumph, and as he swore on purpose to insult his feelings.

After a night spent in a state somewhat similar to that of the Orlando Furioso under banishment from the fair and frail Angelica, he made his toilette with redoubled récherche, and proceeded himself to the same obnoxious abode, in order to ascertain at once and certainly, whether what had so disordered him was entitled to credence or otherwise. Enjoying the entrée of the house, he made his way to the sanctuary, whence issued the choice edicts of ton, a sort of place betwixt museum and boudoir, or rather a burlesque of both, even before he took a seat or had exchanged the forms of salutation, began to catechize his fair tenant in most uncourteous fashion. She was, by no means backward in imparting information more copious than exact—which she did in such an adroit manner, mixing her narrative most cunningly with sly sarcasms and hits at him, purporting to be Evinia's, and as such doubly galling—the whole winding up with her constant boast of the facility, with which she had led him on blindfold, and then jilted him—that the young man in a transport of vehemence alighted to frenzy, burst out in a torrent of vituperation, alleging her so belied as a bride-elect, to doat upon him to distraction, and defying her so far to forget him as to form a matrimonial connexion with any body else. The smile of malignant triumph, which hailed this most ungenerous brag, instantly convicted the rash speaker of its unmanliness; and he eagerly sought to retract and explain it away: but the attempt was hopeless. His auditor had treasured up this slip of the tongue so pat to her purpose, against the first chance of repetition to the person disparaged thereby, and in the constancy and fervour of her secret soul so little deserving it.

Our heroine, thus condemned unheard—beset by "a love-suit, unto her as fearful as a siege," and daily and hourly assailed in every way that could move a proud and sensible nature by her anxious chaperon, who like all the dowagers within fifty miles round, thought Gen. Swann the first of mankind and of matches, still stood her ground firmly, and would never have yielded one inch as long as she was able to rely on Ernest's sincerity. Yet though keeping the obsequious price of antiquity, whose courtship would have crowned her wishes a short time back (as the troublesome aunt took good care incessantly to remind her,) at bay with consummate address—and in private never suffering him to come within ear-shot of her, she was continually forced into his company, and compelled to associate with the daughter so disagreeable to her in every respect, and the more so for affecting a sudden and inordinate hankering after "her dear sweet Evie's superior conversation." With a zeal truly filial, she availed herself of every occasion to insinuate her father's flattering flame, and expatiate upon his manifold excellencies, outward and internal on his splendid talents and sumptuous country-seat—his fine temper, and finer equipage. Mrs. Russell, a woman of the world and a devotee—at once the slave of cards, company and conscience, and a strong stickler for godliness, but of that sort which is great gain, was on the alert to renew and enhance the topic so fertile and fascinating; till little by little, it took some hold of her niece's mind. Indeed, it was high time, as her mistress urged a little too often, for her to reflect seriously on her situation: if deprived of that mistress, her sole stay and solace, she would be left friendless, houseless, hopeless, with the bloom of life wearing fast away—and let romance-writers rave as they will, these considerations must have their weight with the most exalted female mind. Evinia blushed at the weakness of loitering over remembrances so injurious and degrading as these, summing up the history of her first and only affaire de cœur; and since it appeared that she was not to be blessed as Virrian's wife, the fond moralizer grew careless of her fate, and ready to give herself to any one else recommended by the authority she revered as maternal. But these were merely the musings of her calmer hours; the sight of the recreant hero, the bare sound of his voice or mention of his name, would arouse every dangerous and irrepressible emotion, and in a moment, the fabric so painfully reared by reason, fell before the mere breath of omnipotent love. But the weaker yet worthier power was mightily reinforced by the tale Miss Swann had hastened to tell, and that without the laudable adherence to truth exacted in Fairyland. Ernest's taunt, unpardonable in itself, came doubly atrocious from her tongue; and especially because certified by some circumstances known only to Miss Livingston and her ungenerous delinquent, which allowed no room for doubt or disbelief. It was listened to in silent and scornful composure; not a glance fell, not a muscle quivered under the infliction; for like the Indian warrior bound to the stake, our heroine had long since schooled herself to endurance; and after the intermeddling Maria had said her say and dwelt and dilated with most malicious accuracy on the heinous assertion, the insulted party bowed her thanks, and with a smile fraught with civil disdain both of the story and its retainer, passed to another subject as carelessly as if they had been discussing the most trivial thing in the world. Baffled in one aim by this seeming unconcern, her "friendly foe" next proceeded to earnest suit for her Evie's indispensable concurrence in an attempt at private theatricals about to be enacted at the residence of her ancient adorer.

A travelling actor and author, entertained there, had, to humour the young (or rather single) lady of the mansion, scribbled the scenes of a mask founded on the story of Narcissus. The corps dramatique had been drafted from the élite of the town, the characters cast, and every thing in a state of prosperous progression. The hero of the piece, the supernal youth, who sighed his life away in pining worship of his own shadow, of course, found a representative in the no less dazzling Ernest Virrian, full likely, according to the report of many slighted fair ones, to make good the parallel, and verify the line,

"As equal were their charms, so equal were their fates."

After his metamorphosis, duly bewailed by Evinia, (whose powers of recitation were held perfect) as Echo with a lyre and loosened hair, Venus, personated by, if not the beautiful the body-raised Maria Swann, appeared upon the scene, attended by the loves and graces—recalled the victim of his unnatural folly into life, and the whole ended with his coronation and reception into her train in place of the lost minion Adonis. This entertainment had been projected some time before; but in assigning the part of the love-sick nymph, who was to pursue Narcissus through more than one passage, that made Helena's fond importunity of Demetrius, appear tame and delicate—to Miss Livingston, the lady-manager had reckoned without her hostess. From the first, Evinia would not hear of being brought into public contact, and that of a most equivocal kind in their relative position, with the man before whom, she could scarce at any time, command herself to indifference, much less since the estrangement existing between them; and this refusal, the surest proof of a flame smothered, not quenched, had aggravated Ernest's anger not a little. Now she recoiled in utter horror from the thing, and delivered herself in answer to the bold beggar for her compliance, with a severity and haughtiness that, at any other time, would have gone near to produce an irreconcilable breach between the rival damozels. But on the present occasion, when there was so much at stake, "Little Winny Wilkins," a soubriquet familiarly applied to the lawyer's dashing daughter, on account of her perpetual repetition of that then popular song, was fain to swallow and digest a few hard words. She apologized and recanted, rallied and implored, till "Evie—her own Evie," without whose help she protested, they must all be lost, bent upon showing Ernest how she, too, could shine in other people's eyes—agreed to take part in the grand performance; and this promise extorted, Maria withdrew to arrange her several plots and counter-plots.

And how felt the young lady, this makebate had so wounded and left? Even as one oppressed with the darkest and final doom of utter condemnation. She, once the high-minded sovereign of herself and others besides—now a wretch that had struck the flag of her affections before a vile and treacherous Lothario, conquering only to ravage, and wooing to destroy—she the mock and dupe of Mr. Virrian!—set in a jest-book, rated and reviled—her fond devotion cast in her very teeth! and then, oh! treble torture! cut to the quick by the impertinent condolence of the confidante, no doubt, prompted and put up to it by him! Transported out of all tenderness for herself or him that had thus traduced her—for, certainly whatever had been her inward emotions of regard, they had been taught to counterfeit disguise, and to

"Droop within their silent cell," she repressed, with such an effort of resolution as supports the martyr chained to the burning pile, every impulse tending towards grief or complaint. A forced gaiety like that of one mouldering under despair, buoyed her up, and she laughed, and sung, and skipped about the house as if possessed with the airy spirit of Shakespeare's Beatrice. Upon the rich old lawyer, who sedulously sought her smiles, she lavished them and many a gracious word besides, till he and the advocate of his cause thought it gained—and the fair creature, who constituted both judge and jury, all their own. For several days did she continue in this state of unnatural sprightliness, which could her bosom have been looked into, would have been found to border on insanity. Worn out by the exertion necessary to sustain her in it, and as exhausting as the struggles of a strong wrestler for the mastery of his antagonist—that elasticity, which may be termed the muscular energy of the mind, gave way the moment she was alone, and her nights were spent in a leaden slumber as heavy as that of the tomb. But the light of each morning brought the signal for rallying, and not in vain. Never had Miss Livingston been pronounced so charming; every body raved of her graceful glee, and ascribed such unwonted and improving effervescence to her triumph over the heart of the wealthy widower; all but his crafty daughter, the author of this and so much other mischief. She alone had the key to the mystery of this sudden outbreak, and construed it rightly as a sign of the hidden but effective operation of her subtle poison.

And now the plot thickened, and its dénouement drew nigh. The "Long-Lane Apollo," as he was commonly called, enlarged at the indecorous exultation of the betrothed, as he firmly believed her—lumbering and fretting at her perseverance in declining to act with him, and at the thought of being sacrificed to a competitor as quizzical and antiquated as any of the patriarchs, flew for consolation to the sympathizing Maria, who without appearing to notice, soothed every turn of his humour, flattered him as only a glazing female tongue can do, and, effectually to hinder any clearing up of the affair, wrought his indignation up to such a pitch as could hardly be restrained from open insult of his perfidious mistress. But this mood was (contrary to the incendiary's hopes) of brief duration. Once and again had the late lovers found themselves in the same company, and smarting under that calm contempt, so easy and innate to female tact, that cut all the deeper by reason of its smooth edge, the violent because really adorning young man reigned in his wrath, or strove to exhibit the same cool carelessness as herself. But failing to attain that fine tone of sustained yet civil indifference, but one shade removed from open disdain, and perhaps more galling—he treated the object of his recent idolatry, the creature on "whose words of so sweet breath composed," he had hung with a fondness akin to rapture, with insolence almost brutal, and relying entirely with his reported taunt. Doubtless did he thus disgrace himself on the night appointed for the dramatic display, which had put the whole town in a fever, and was to be attended by a select audience, of which every body with the least pretension to fashion was wild to make one. There never was more scuffling, intriguing, and negotiating for Almack's vouchers.

"Wild as the wind and raging as the waves;"

The theatre, wherein our amateur-actors were to make their début, was something after the redoubtable Bottom's arrangement—"a green plot for the stage, a bush for the scenery, and a brake, the tiring-room." Swann's Court boasted a perennial spring as beautiful as the fountain at Vaucluse, and situated within ten yards of the house. They were in the midst of the midsummer-heats, and, Maria, raving of a fête champêtre, resolved to kill two birds with one stone, and bring out her mask in the open air. This saved expense, gave novelty to the design, and was infinitely pleasanter at that season than confinement within doors, where stifling smoke and sultry streams were inevitable. Several clumps of trees, (the tall poplar and majestic oak intermingled) and the shrubbery surrounding the pure and salient gush of waters, waved sparkling with a fairy-like illumination, developing fruitage, and flowers, vellum-like leaves, rough trunk and glossy stem, as perfectly and more pleasantly than day-light; the orchestra embowered amid clustering creepers, and consisting of flutes and violins, was heard with double zest, because unseen and harmonizing with the murmurs of the rippling "wave of watery light;" a soft air, such as Procris invoked, came stirring and whispering through the foliage, lit up beyond the region of lamps by myriads of the fire-fly, that winged and dainty torch-bearer, how much more poetical and meet, to flash at clin revels than its European rival, the grovelling glow-worm! Seats, advantageously placed, afforded from every point, a full view of the theatric esplanade, flanked on one side by a screen of roses blooming as "the bower on Bendemeer's stream"—on the other by thickets of black-trees and Scotch broom, forming side-scenes for the entrance and exit of the performers, with a background of hot-house plants and rare exotics, rising over each other, and receding in rows redolent of verdure, blossoms, and fragrance as the interwoven maze of Eve's unfolding arbour. Above all was the clear blue of a June sky, starry and serene in its ethereal depths; and the coup d'œil, which owed its idea and arrangement to her, who was expected soon to call the villa her own, was really striking in the highest degree. The company, punctual to a minute had assembled, and been introduced to the sylvan scene, which elicited a burst of unanimous applause.

All were seated; the waning beams of dewy Vesper denoted the approach of the witching, though not midnight, hour; and expectation stood, not in horror, but in ecstasy, which was not allayed but confirmed by the appearance of

"Narcissus fair,

Over the fabled fountain hanging still."

Virrian in a costume strictly classical—for, in whatever concerned, the adornment of his matchless person, our glass-gazing hero studied and would not stop short of perfection, and in a mood to value himself more than ever, in consequence of the contumacy of the false Evinia, whom he had pre-determined to "blast by excess of light;" burst upon the eye, when a drapery of overhanging vines, hitherto concealing him, was adroitly drawn back on either side like the folds of a curtain, in a blaze of glory, such as might array

"An incarnation of the poet's god,
In all his marble-chisell'd beauty."

Every attitude was grace, every movement harmony; and even those who had most scanned and appreciated, the faultless symmetry so "perfect and so peerless," gazed, and wondered, and seemed now fully sensible of it for the first time. He declaimed, too with admirable effect, and after venting his self-ennamoured soliloquies in tones that thrilled through the hearts of ladies fair, like so many love-pleadings prevailing with each one, gave the last scene inimitably and pined and drooped and died away in such sad sweet languishment, amid the flowers, immortalized by his fate, and there springing up in clustering luxuriance over and around him, that many of the gentle and grieving spectators were tempted to forestall Miss Jeffers, who, (preferred to the vacancy created by the secession of the hated Livingston)—now came flying in for the third time, lyre in hand and tear in eye, and flung herself on the hallowed ground, whence the bright vision of boyhood had just disappeared, weeping and wailing, and distorting the grotesque countenance, half seen through her dishevelled hair, to such hideousness as amply excused the defunct Narcissus for his disdain of the addresses, which she had previously thrust upon him with more plague than pathos. After a scene in which the slighted nymph tore her uncouth passion to tatters, and turned the current of tragic feeling into the merriment, accompanying broad farce—she sung or rather screeched out, a long rhapsody, emphasized by sundry scratchings and pawings on the tortured lyre—and then out she ran, invoking the rocks and woods, the pity of fawns and aid of hamadryads, her voice sounding fainter and fainter, farther and more far, till in truth it became only an Echo, though not of the sweetest sort.

Again,

"A change came over the spirit of the scene."

Venus, all tinsel and trappings, rouge and pearl-powder, combining a nudity of bust and ankles hardly such as were reconcileable with our conception of the proportions adorning the Paphian Queen—with the affectation of a long veil of silver gauze, and a train, outmeasuring "the mad duchess of Newcastle," sailed in surrounded by Cupids and graces. With such strainings after majesty as reminded one of the frog puffing and swelling herself out in the fable, she tottered and tossed about, sighed and lisped, and cast her meretricious glances around, as if bright Cynthia, glassed in grace, had palmed some inferior hoyden from the outskirts of Olympus in her stead. In the midst of her most energetic passage, where the compassionate divinity, after bewailing him "gored by the tusked boar," revokes the doom of Narcissus, who starts to life at the enlivening call, out flew the busk from the panting and heaving bosom it hardly confined, full in the face of the resuscitated paragon of juvenility, whom it hit a smart, yet by no means beautifying blow. Nothing abashed by this contre-temps, so calculated to overwhelm an ordinary maiden, "the beauty of the skies" stopped short in her ranting recitation, held out her hand for the refractory slip of whalebone, which Euphrosyne at her beck started out to pick up, replaced it with all the sang-froid imaginable, and resumed her speech. The thunder of involuntary acclamation extorted by her impudence that most desirable quality now-a-days, in woman, she modestly attributed to admiration of her scenic powers, and with a dignity of self-complaisance worthy de Clairon in one of her most sublime classic characters, went through the coronation ceremony, in the course of which she bestowed on the radiant youth one or two endearments, which the author of the revel, sneered at as interpolations, and not exactly improvements. The piece concluded with a dance, wherein Venus, her new favourite, nymphs, cupids and all, even to the vanished Echo, who, likewise re-incarnated, came bounding on the stage with the glee and grimaces of Dixon as Jim Crow—joined, and the curtain, in that prescriptive phrase, more hyperbolic than true, "fell with unbounded applause."

But this was not all the exhibition; the best part of it was yet in store. The tale of Beauty and the Beast dramatized into an extravaganza by the same pen, was to be represented by Evinia, (who stung by the recent rudeness of her heart's tyrant, rejoiced in this chance of requiting him by the juxta position she knew him to abominate)—Gen. Swann, and his heir Xenophon, as the chief of the dramatis personæ. The performance commenced, and unsustained by the fitness and vérité semblance of the locale, was yet enjoyed as infinitely beyond the mask. Miss Livingston, in voice, gait, and gesture, combining the attributes of histrionic excellence, played her part, which was diversified and full of interest, to the very life; while young Swann, the most conceited and pudent of buffoons, out-heroded Herod, and proved himself as well entitled to an asses' head from the hand of Fuck as his prototype, the ambitious weaver. Beauty, the brilliant, bewitching Beauty, shone the belle-ideal of actresses, having "the greater art to conceal art," and make herself the very personage she counterfeited; and her brute lover, with his mistakes that defied the correction of prompter, his most comic pomposity of mien, and bombast of words and actions alike high-sounding and ludicrous, convulsed the audience, if possible, still more diverted by the anxious countenance and ill-repressed admiration, with which their polished host viewed the antics of the one, and the perfect graces of the other. Miss Swann, poor Echo, and the rest of that train, could have cried for spite at being thus excelled; especially when rapturous plaudits, breaking the entranced attention, prolonged beyond its close, encored a song, which showed that the gifted Beauty added the notes of a nightingale to the favour of a sylph. Glad was the envious and outdone tribe of mimmers, when the last words of the epilogue, spoken by Miss Livingston in character, were succeeded by the final courtesy, and the circle of spectators rose up to ramble about the scene of their past entertainment.

Ernest, who, in the sense of his high triumph, endeavoured to indemnify himself for the destruction of his dearest hopes, encompassed by all the fair and the gay, and obsidè with flatteries and admirers, suffered himself to be specially attended by his late celestial patroness, and arm-in-arm with her goddess-ship, made it a point whenever they crossed the path of Beauty, who was closely guarded by the loving senior, so lately and more fitly enacting her sire—to evince by looks and words intelligible enough to her they were meant to annoy, how intolerable and impertinent he could be under the excitement of wounded vanity. Evinia, burning with indignation at this, no less than the taunt so expertly amplified by "lut'e Winny Wilkins," alias Venus, played off old and new scores by a pleased attention to the soft speeches of her gallant old beau, sufficient to lash the fiery lord of Long-Lane into fury. He mistook the glow of resentment on her cheek for the blushes with which woman hears the protestations of a favoured suitor—the downcast glances of that dark eye still shunning to meet his, for the shyness symptomatic of acceptance. Like the "scorpion girt by fire," a charmed circle was around him, which he could not overpass:

"Inly search'd by thousand throes," and impelled to self destruction, as it virtually proved in his case, he no longer checked himself, but, shaking off the fond hanger-on upon his arm, proceeded to play the eaves-dropper on the pair, whose conjunction so harrowed up his soul.

All now was ease and enjoyment, sociability, chattering and scandal; refreshments less abundant than choice, were handed about, and every body, for a while, busy with them. But Miss Swann, intent upon Ernest—and Ernest alone—and tired of playing at hide-and-seek after him in the bushes, took out her repeater, and striking the hour, proclaimed aloud, a return to the house in order to supper. All ears were pricked up at this welcome sound, and the scattered groups began with all speed to collect themselves around her. Clusters of belles, beauteous, and therefore, heartless—others happier, inasmuch as they had contrived to secure one captive as a conductor, thereby reminding the by-stander of the times foretold in Scripture, when seven women are to cling to one man—strings of males pouring along like the dispersal of a militia-muster; all thronged the scene, but still no Virrian. The lord of the least and his charming companion were likewise reported among the missing; but who were they in comparison of the truant Narcissus? In vain his Maria questioned and wondered about him; in vain she applied to the last stragglers, Xenophon and the garrulous Delia, who, appreciating the spirit of each other's performance, had stuck together like wax from the moment their task was over. The gentleman after quoting three pages of poetry, wholly irrelevant to the matter, assured his sister that he knew nothing of her paramour an expression eliciting a shout of laughter, that electrified him, and well nigh provoking a cuff from a hand less soft than swift; the lady simpering, sighing and twisting her rigid figure into a poke, probably the origin of that now in vogue as "the Grecian stoop," which misnomer should read, corrected, as the bend of the long-armed ape—deposed to having seen the hero of the evening, rolling over and over upon the grass as if he had fallen down in a fit. This piece of news astounded others besides the foundress of the revel, who, with a cry like that uttered by the nymphs on Proserpine's disappearance, flew in the direction indicated, with a view to avert the dire catastrophe impending, and thus unfeelingly announced. But to no purpose, did she search and sob; to no purpose did every body join in a labour, which seemed pretty much like that of looking for a needle in a hay-stack, or Miss Mitford's hunt after her keys as narrated in her "Day of Distress." The fugitive had vanished; but whether transported by some cruel enchanter to another sphere—transformed into the flower, whose perfume still sweetens his name—or gone quietly home to bed, remained a mystery, inscrutable for that night at least. All that could be certainly ascertained was the absence of the prodigy.

Meanwhile Beauty, and, not the Beast, but one scarce more attractive, had wandered up and down, around and about; and still the suave and stately amorist who held the creed of the olden time, and abhorred the indecorum of wooing a lady otherwise than à la Grandison, maintained a kind of Parthian attack, flinging his dart and then retreating, hovering round and round, and coming mighty near the mark, without actually attaining it. She, only bent on keeping up a smiling face to the perfidious man, whom she perceived haunting her steps, behaved in such a manner as to sanction the supposition that she was ready to accord a favourable hearing to all her obsequious suite might be pleased to say. None cared to interrupt the agreeable discourse in which the ill-matched couple seemed engrossed; and insensibly, for our heroine, pre-occupied and plunged in the pangs of reflection, took little note of their meanders, they found themselves in a thick tuft of laburnums, where, in due form and style, and suiting the action to the word, Gen. Swann laid himself and his fortune at her feet. Though, from his previous manner, she ought to have anticipated nothing else, Miss Livingston, recalled from her reverie, was taken perfectly by surprise. Already the words of denial, polite indeed, but not the less decisive, were on her lips, when raising her eyes to enforce them, she caught a glimpse of Ernest, peeping through the foliage near her with an expression that struck her as beautiful yet fiendish as that of Conrade in Miss Lee's thrilling tale of Kruitzner. That glance—that single look, changed the whole complexion of her destiny. The thoughts of how she had loved—and how she had been left—of her sufferings—and her sin in withstanding the wishes of her adopted mother—of her secret struggles—her inward agonies—of all the evils, in short, arising from the attachment, whose purity and utter freedom from selfishness deserved a better reward, came sweeping across her mind like the torrent of lava, entombing the ancient Roman city.

"In that moment seem'd to roll
Winters of memory o'er her soul,
And gather in that drop of time,
A life of pain—an age."

not of crime, but of mischance. Above all his want of her love, his defiance of her desertion, appeared written in characters of flame, within her eye-lids, as she closed them over the hot and throbbing orbs beneath. And here he stood, the triumphant villain—the insolent and heartless scoffer, meanly skulking near to hear her make good his infamous words. The spirit so outraged rose with the reflection like the soul of the warrior at the war-trumpet sounding to battle, and the person rose with the spirit that animated it. With a calm self-possession, a dignified elegance that spoke her full sense of the honor she conferred, Evinia referred the General to her aunt, first requesting him to rise; but he persisted in retaining his kneeling posture; while imprinting on the hand abandoned to his clasp, the kiss of acknowledged debt, oh! how different from that, the first and only one ever granted, that had created an era in her life, and after all been taken by a trifler and a traitor. Staying the florid and somewhat fade raptures that repaid her condescension, Miss Livingston led the way towards the company, her bosom swelling with a tumult of emotions almost too powerful to bear, and leaving Ernest to enact that scene of frenzied passion, which Miss Jeffers, whose scorned love, had unto hatred turned, more coarsely than truly described, as rolling over and over upon the grass.

The evening closed how differently to the principal actors in its pageants! General Swann rejoiced in "A sober certainty of waking bliss;"

he loved Evinia truly and tenderly, and doubted not to make and find a scene of felicity. His daughter, in despair at the defection of the slippery Narcissus, and out of humour with him, herself, and every thing else, exerted herself to dismiss rather than detain her guests—and what with stunning them to deafness with her shrill file-like songs, and giving free scope to the snappish pertness so often crowned with the garland due to wit, she contrived speedily to make a clear course. But her angry passions all subsided to a halcyon state, when her satisfied sire, deeming the occasion worthy of all formal observance, summoned her and Xenophon to a solemn conclave in his study—and then and there, with all the dignity of a lord upon the wool-sack, rehearsed the state of matters between himself and the lovely Miss Livingston. The son, who would as lief have drunk poison as seen his father wed again, attempted no congratulations but sat in awkward and sullen silence, revolving a scheme suggested by the night's adventures, and which the paternal declaration so unexpected and overwhelming, determined him to carry into immediate effect, as he did, most triumphantly, before the week's end. Maria, however, made up for all his unfeeling deficiencies, hanging upon her father's neck, and showering on him all the names and caresses, more suitable to a favourite lap-dog or monkey, than to a parent. But hers, thinking

"Good, easy man! full surely His happiness was a-ripening," repaid her in kind, and more effectually to gild the pill she had to swallow, promised that with her friend's kind permission, she should assuredly officiate as bride's-maid. Nothing, however, was farther from her wishes than this last honor, since the important and welcome news just communicated, gave her great hopes of playing the first part herself, in a similar solemnity, about the same time; and she withdrew to rest, with a head so full of delicious visions of plans consummated—bridal white and silver, and wedding favours and equippages that, notwithstanding the manifold fatigues of the day, she stood no chance of getting a wink of sleep.

Miss Livingston, too, was a watcher—though from emotions exactly opposite. It had been arranged for her to sleep at Swann's Court; but this would not do after its proprietor had proposed in form to her: so home she went, and glad in her present state of mind to be spared an interview with Mrs. Russell, who was sometime gone to bed, she betook herself to her chamber with the sensations of a criminal remanded to prison, after sentence of death has been pronounced upon him. This one night of free, unrestrained heart-breaking sorrow—all that, now the die was cast, she meant to allow herself, was necessary to save her reason, perhaps her life; and, alone and uninterrupted, she luxuriated in the last sad indulgence. The next morning found her so changed by the immoderate effusion of sighs and tears, continued through all the long, weary hours of darkness that her aunt, who, in unfeigned astonishment at her untimely return, came up to inquire into the reason of it, was quite startled, and insisted on her not attempting to rise. But Evinia had other business on hand, besides playing the invalid, and that the good lady acknowledged, when her niece came to open her budget before her. In raptures with herself for recommending, and her protégée for realizing this grand parti, she ran on so fluently and vividly in her excess of relation, that the latter, sickening under the theme, was forced to beg that it might be adjourned over to a more congenial season, this was soon granted to the impatience of the delighted dowager. Gen. Swann waited on her early in the day—stated his pretensions to the fair hand in her gift, as he politely professed to hold it and was favoured with her consent by word of mouth—and that of his "belli bone" (which high-flown and obsolete phrase he conjured up after great study for the nonce)—by proxy. Mrs. Russell was now at liberty to proclaim the engagement to the whole world, and showed herself by no means slack in using her privilege. After a due interval, the young lady was prevailed upon to confirm her aunt's assurances with her own lips; and her mind being made up as to the expediency—indeed necessity of her course, and considering herself as she bent all the energies of her principles and understanding to the performance of her voluntary assumption: so that her ancient but very sincere lover had no cause to be dissatisfied with her demeanour towards him. It was indeed an arduous task Evinia had undertaken, and one that doomed her to labour, long and unremitting. It could not, as the reader may suppose, be the work of a day to eradicate feelings and affections so deeply seated as her's had been—to pull down an unlawful idol, and erect the tabernacle of a holy and reasonable worship on its shrine; but the noble achievement was not all her own. The axe had been laid to the root of her love by Ernest's own hand, and it only remained for her to persist and finish what he had so cruelly begun. Unlike these heroines, recorded in romance, who find their struggles to pursue the right defeated by destiny, most perversely bent on crossing their good purposes—none of the obstacles in these august cases made and provided, lay in our heroine's path; no lover faithful, not barely unto death, but through the far severer ordeal of scorn, separation and utter hopelessness; no husband harsh as Bluebeard, and jealous as Bellmere, by his suspicious provoking the very "fate his fretting lips foretold." Virrian, a monster, whose love was not of that Werter sort to live and hope against hope—never interfered to prevent the sacrifice, which was her own free choice, or to persuade her to their mutual destruction, by an elopement, as soon as Hymen had set his seal upon her front. Each, the distracted lover, and the faithless maid, kept the contrary tenor of their way, striving to regain the peaceful path, which their joint steps had strayed from in a vain search after bliss. In this attempt at lost repose, and the healing of wounds, whose scars long imprinted their hearts, the lady was most successful: still her recovery was slow—though unimpeded by relapses, it was complete. When she gave her hand to Gen. Swann, if her heart went not with it, her esteem and confidence did; and though subdued and changed in tone and character, by the spiritual process of purification, originated by her amatory disappointment, and so perfected as to enable her to say, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted," the short period of her wedded life, if barren of raptures, was fertile in many pleasant circumstances and feelings. Among these, the ability of contributing to the comfort and enjoyments of her, to whom Evinia's life from infancy had owed nurture and tenderness—and the delights of maternal love, were paramount, and how superior to all the glow of the most intense and prosperous passion! But we are anticipating.

"pledged her spousal faith to wed,"

The day following the play at Swann's Court, and the next day and the next after that, passed by without aught seen or heard of Ernest. Miss Swann beside herself with impatience and apprehension—for, now or never was the time to move him, at last she thought her of a visit to Louisa Virrian, from whom she learnt equally to her anger and dismay that her brother had gone down to Long Lane, as a step preparatory to foreign travel. There was not a moment to lose; once gone, he was gone forever, at least to her: so ere night fell, the indefatigable schemer, who no longer a pluralist in love-affairs, dedicated herself so commendably to a single one—had spread through the town, or rather the upper part of it, the incredible news of Miss Livingston's rejection of the restless Ernest Virrian, and her engagement to the dignified father of the celebrated Maria Swann. There was deep policy in this report so unpalatable to her own vanity, as the event proved. The fugitive, from the field of his defeat, who, with the arrow yet rankling in his breast, had shut himself up at his country-seat, not there to brood over love-lorn woe—but to hide from the world his present state of spirits, while completing the arrangements indispensable to his absence abroad—was roused like the worried lion in his lair, by letters from his friends, (who, a set of pestilent fellows, by the way, themselves fulfilled of all unrighteousness, yet first in the highest and most correct circles, felt the want of their choice and leading spirit) complaining of the abominable slander afloat, and hinting at his temporary return to his old haunts as the most effectual mode of contradiction. All that Ernest had suffered from his bootless passion seemed as nothing when weighed against this, the very master-stroke of persecution—the last and bitterest drop in the cup of shame. He, the hero of a hundred flirtations—the atlas who held up the world of fashion on his shoulders, who had been painted as a model, dressed after by all pretending to taste or ton, and whose mere appearance in the stage-box, had interrupted the finest scenes of Shakspeare, and caused the first actresses to pause and trip in their part—he, to be published as rejected!!! cast down! retreating! about to become an absentee—though first caricatured as a disconsolate Strephon, sighing and plaining to the shades of his mistress' perfidy!!! Away with the thought! it was death! dishonor! He tore the communicative epistles into a thousand shreds, ordered his dogs, valet, and currier, and in ten minutes, was on his way to town, driving as if life depended on his speed.

When there, all his thoughts centered in disproving the supposition so destructive to his rest and fame: Miss Swann, though, had been before-hand with him. She heard on all sides of the double rumour so skillfully put into circulation by her own sly self; and naturally applied to for the truth of it, would shrug her shoulders, and confirm the approaching nuptials of "papa, so suddenly and strangely possessed towards that Livingston girl, that she must have given him love-powder." As to the other branch of the story, it was denied in toto; and woe be to the wight, who ventured to intimate faith in it. He was threatened with her royal and heaviest displeasure; and then while positively asserting Virrian's engagement in another quarter, as prior to Miss Livingston's. The wily advocate would look down to blush, and look up to sigh—and play off the thousand grimaces, which mock-modesty employs to intimate what it affects to disclaim. Those, who understood our belle's character, or believed in her omnipotence of attraction, would in turn, proclaim her the arbitress of Ernest's destiny; an inference though half discouraged, never denied. The hero himself was now upon the ground, and diligent in making his own defence. In the course of his progress, as bright and erratic as a comet's track, he heard every month open in praise of his late champion—the alacrity with which she had espoused his cause, and the high way she had taken to put down the scandal; and the object of her exertions could not but be grateful for them. The sense of a service all important in his eyes, and the desire of showing that he was occupied elsewhere, and had no claim upon the affianced Evinia, led him constantly to her rival's side; by her flatteries and fondness so soothing after the late mortification to his vanity, and such as soon gave rise to the report that Maria Swann, the most admired woman on the continent, who had set her foot on the heels of ambassadors and senators, was desperately in love with the Long Lane Apollo—the "single lady wishing to be double," recommended herself greatly to him. She went on putting forth all her blandishments and allurements, and wove their meshes so surely and subtly around him, that his high mightiness, the incomparable Ernest Virrian, found himself, like the royal brute of the forest, snared and secure in her toils, ere he was aware of them.

The wedding-day arrived, and Evinia, decked in "gems rich and rare," yet less so than the loveliness that shined her—and surrounded by each splendid art,

"Which, if it cannot cheer the heart
May stun and stupify its smart,

For one gay, busy day!"— became a bride, and saw herself consigned not only to the dull duty of tending the ailments and humors of a man three times her age, but to a principled oblivion of him so fatally beloved. But she no longer thought of the past with yearning and despair; it was never referred to, save to praise God that the peril was over, and that her safe way lay straight and clear before her. Her husband, though not the minion of her fancy, was an upright and gifted man, recommended by reason and gratitude; and earning her kind thoughts of him by the most unbounded trust and devotion. Though so different from the winged dreams of ecstasy, irradiating the morning of life, the lot she had drawn was not the less blessed; for, taught by the despair of a heart, whose tenderest earthly ties had been disrupted, she had applied herself to seek wisdom from on high, and had obeyed that gracious invitation so tenderly made, yet made only to be slighted, for the weary and heavy-laden to take upon them the Saviour's easy yoke. She was greatly aided in this happy tendency by the step, which Ernest, to his own amazement, no longer free but bound, took soon after her marriage. This was nothing less than bestowing his hand and name, for he gave her nothing else—that hand, which many a princess might have sighed to take—that name synonymous with every thing splendid and surpassing, on Maria Swann, the superannuated coquette, and would-be fine lady, as little worthy of him as the Loathly Lady of Sir Gawaine. This match capped the climax of the bathos, and put the cope-stone on his downfall; all the country rung with its absurdity, for, in fact, it amounted to the bride-groom's abdication of his fashionable supremacy. He was laughed at for being taken in by over-age, and a downright courtship; after all his protestations against marriage; and such a descent from the sublime to the ridiculous, was not to be retrieved.

Evinia strove to be on cordial terms with this ill-sorted pair, and in some degree succeeded; though her former lover could never divest himself of a certain constraint in her presence. Maria, the very essence of impudence, was always at her ease, and soon laughed and rallied her husband and "mamma" so freely on her recent love-passages between them, that, accidentally and piece-meal as it were, the whole affair so perplexed of intricacies & darkened by mistakes from the first, following the offer and refusal of the Ring—became clear and comprehensible in all its bearings; and they, who had been thus bewildered and baffled in the matter dearest to their hearts, awoke, as if out a dream, to wonder at their own shyness and stupidity. Mrs. Swann, however, under the influence of that grace, which enabled her to say,

"In each event of life how clear,

"Thy ruling hand I see!"

had grown perfectly reconciled to this appointment of Providence; she only sighed in mistrust of Ernest's chances of conjugal happiness; but they were beyond her power to relieve or recall. All she could do was to commend him in many a pure and fervent prayer to that Power, on whom she cast the burden of all her own cares and troubles, and whose most grievous dispensations were not merely sacred, but merciful in her eyes.

Not so the duped and disgusted Virrian, who, like the hapless stag that Esop commemorates—had lost himself through the very graces in which he had so exulted. Never in the least, attached to the woman whom in a moment of pique against another, he had so rashly and revengefully made his wife, he daily became more and more averse from her company and caresses, and ashamed of having saddled himself with such a yokemake. For awhile she liked him as well as she could any thing; as long that is, as she could excite the envy of her compeers by producing as a husband, him, who once moved a demigod amongst mortals. But Ernest did not tamely submit to be shown about as her appendage. In despair of relief, and loathing the banquet and the ball, the victim to his own vanity and violence of temper—a very Narcissus bound to the hateful Echo, addicted himself to a species of dissipation as yet untried; and in draining the goblet to banish reflection, too often found his better senses likewise submerged. At first the remedy did not reach the disease—and amid all his excesses, he felt that

"While pleasure fir'd the maddening soul,

"The heart—the heart was lonely still."

Evinia's image, at such moments, would arise on his memory, like a star that once had trembled over the deep of his existence, then turned away its lovely beams. But she survived only as a sweet and cherished recollection; the Miss Livingston of the past, he could not identify with the Mrs. Gen. Swann, forming so conspicuous and charming a part of the present; and little by little the precious picture, so fondly painted by love on the tablet of remembrance, faded away, leaving scarce a trace behind. Louisa, his pious sister, bitterly repenting her, now that Evinia had turned out a pattern-wife, of the fatal interference, that had directed her brother towards the cajoling Miss Swann, was all that brother could cling to as near and dear to his breast. The fashionable lady, who had just saved her distance, and by a bold stroke for a husband, made out to gain harbour among the matronage—soon fell into his careless train; and their union, unblest of children, was, though not formally dissolved, de jure rather than de facto.

Things went on at this rate till our heroine, after three years wedlock, was left a widow with one infant. And now were to be made known the actual contents of Gen. Swann's will, and the ultimate ownership of that property, upon which public curiosity—that is to say, the tongues of those gossips of either sex, who so benevolently devote themselves to the settlement of other people's affairs—had been so intent. Every body, when the truth was at last disclosed, declared it to be exactly as they had expected; and yet the estate, so long and currently assigned to the heir male by the solemn obligation of an oath on the Bible to that effect, taken beside the death-bed of his first wife, was found to be given in fee simple to the general's young relict—the whole placed absolutely and unconditionally at her disposal, who was now accused of having sold herself for this ample consideration.

Direful was the disappointment and virulent the vituperation of the eldest children; especially Xenophon, who, taking alarm in time, had within one week after the écât of their joint buffooneries as Echo and the Beast, allied himself in matrimonial bands with the amiable Miss Delia Jeffers, thus precipitating matters lest his father's wedding designs should get wind, and defeat his own. The lady's fortune was ample—her affections warm; she was bent upon a husband, and young Swann, the heir-apparent of that high house-ranked as a capital catch. So far, so good. Xenophon, disdaining the common and ungallant idea that he saw his charmer's visage in her purse, professed to be vastly smitten with what he styled her "unbleached majesty," a misquotation particularly complimentary to its object, who was as brown as mahogany. But though credulously inclined in the days—or rather hours of courtship, that happy disposition did not promise to continue; for, as a wit observed of the red-haired bride—if less civil than an orange, she was, literally and figuratively of the same jealous complexion: and her husband, who, in the plenitude of his self-conceit, had fancied that he should act the Solomon to this queen of Sheba, found himself domineered over in all ways, and matched with one, proving herself the flower of brimstones, and cream of tartars. Luckily his temper was good; and broken in to the yoke by the high-handed practices of his lady-mother, he resigned all aspirations after the crown matrimonial—and devoting himself to the management of his wife's possessions, made shift to lead a peaceable life, and acquit himself to admiration in the capacity of a steward.

Nothing could have more surprised and pained Evinia than her husband's entire bequest. Luckily it was in her power to do that justice, which, reposing the highest confidence in her integrity and disinterestedness, she believed he had only deputed her to perform. Without delay, the generous legatee executed a deed making over under certain provisions securing the gift from their creditors, the portion that Mrs. Virrian would have been, of right, entitled to an equal division of the estate, to herself and her partner, thereby relieving them from serious distress: and winning the esteem even of the cold and prejudiced Louisa; and Ernest eventually owed his preservation from poverty and ruin, to the hand of the only woman he had ever really loved.

She thought not of a second choice—but engrossed with the education of her daughter, continued to reside at Swann's Court, diffusing around her the light and force of an example lovely in all christian and womanly graces, and making her villa the seat of virtue.

And thus ends the series of mischances and mismatches, arising from the RING, and LOVES' MIS-TAKES.

LACONICS—No. V.

Young men are frank and open because they have not often been deceived, and credulous for the same reason. They imagine they know more than they do, and for that reason are apt to be too positive.

Derive all possible advantage from every circumstance or accident.

Overlook affronts when it is not your interest to resent them.

Love and esteem are the first principles of friendship, which always is imperfect when either of these two is wanting.

The most reluctant to promise is always the most faithful to his word.

A man never becomes learned without studying constantly and methodically.

A polite, an active, and a supple behaviour are necessary to succeed in life.

You must prefer the opinion of the company to your own—or even to truth.

Cheerfulness bears the same friendly regard to the mind as to the body; it banishes all anxious cares and discontents, soothes and composes the passions and keeps the soul in a perpetual calm.

Neither the cold nor the fervid, but characters uniformly warm, are formed for friendship.

A contented mind and a good conscience will make a man happy in all conditions.

Liberality consists less in the gift, than in the manner of giving.

All faults are pardonable when one has the courage to avow them.

If politeness does not inspire a man with goodness, equity, complaisance, gratitude; it at least gives the appearance of these virtues, and makes a man appear outwardly what he ought to be inwardly.

I believe one reason why such numerous instances of erudition occur among the lower ranks is, that with the same powers of mind, the poor student is limited to a narrow circle for indulging his passion for books, and must necessarily make himself master of the few he possesses ere he can acquire more.

Let every man do as he pleases, it concerneth not you what another man doeth, provided you are not injured by it, or it interfereth not with your plans and pursuits.

Keep your ideas, opinions, plans and intentions, as much as possible within your own breast.

There are three kinds of men who are indiscreet: an impudent man, a man drunk, and a fool.

Scorn to depress thy competitor by dishonest or unworthy methods; strive to raise thyself above him only by excelling him: so that thy contest for superiority be crowned with honor if not with success.

From the experience of others do thou learn wisdom, and from their feelings correct thine own faults.

In all thy undertakings let a reasonable assurance animate thy endeavours; if thou despairst of success thou shalt not succeed.

Benignity is preferable to munificence.

So far a man ought to make use of suspicions as to provide, as if that should be true that he suspects, it may do him no hurt.

A charitable man censures not his neighbour, he believeth not the tales of envy and malevolence, neither repeateth he their slanders. He assisteth the poor in their trouble; he rejoiceth in furthering the prosperity of all men.

Endeavour to be first in thy calling whatever it be; neither let any one go before thee in well doing; nevertheless do not envy the merits of another, but improve thine own talent.

Laugh not at your own wit and humour, leave that to the company.

Be not eager to interrupt a person speaking, nor uneasy at being yourself interrupted: give all leave to speak in their turn.

In company, think yourself, or make it appear to others that you think yourself of no consequence; put on an appearance of humbleness and modesty, and deference, if you possess them not—these are the surest means of acquiring the good will and cordiality of the company.

A more glorious victory cannot be gained over another man than this, that when the injury began on his part, the kindness should begin on ours.

Your opinions of persons, places, communities and countries should be expressed with caution and care—unless your speech conveys flattery—for if you shoot an arrow into the crowd it will probably hit somebody.

Look only to your own interests; enter not into the cabals, disputes or quarrels of others.

Avoid discussing politics and religion as much as you can.

Be firm in your resolutions—but weigh well before you resolve.

Accurate knowledge is the best, and indeed the only true foundation of true eloquence. Lord Chesterfield seems to think otherwise; but the eloquence he recommends is like his favourite system of manners, not solid, but showy and superficial.

Contempt and esteem are more or less to be regarded, according to the wisdom or goodness of him who esteems and contemns. To have the esteem of fools, can gratify none but fools; to be despised by such can never dishearten a man of spirit.

To be praised for good qualities which we are conscious that we do not possess, is, to a generous mind, not pleasing but mortifying.

With one you think yourself acquainted at first sight; of another, after long trial, you can make nothing, and if he is very cautious he may elude your acutest observation for years.

A man can scarce allege his own merits with modesty, much less extol them; a man cannot sometimes brook to supplicate or beg, and a number of the like; but all these things are graceful in a friend's mouth which are blushing in a man's own. If he have not a friend he may quit the stage.

It is a secret known but to few, yet of no small use in the conduct of life, that when you fall into a man's conversation, the first thing you should consider is, whether he has a greater inclination to hear you or that you should hear him. The latter is the most general desire; and I know very able flatterers that never speak a word in praise of the persons from whom they receive daily favors, but still practise a skillful attention to whatever is uttered by those with whom they converse.

Good breeding, which all who understand their own interests are anxious to acquire, always assumes the look and language of humility: a proof that it is universally pleasing: as ostentation and pride are to the same extent and in the same degree offensive.

Be patient under the reproofs of thy master; and when he rebuketh thee, answer not again. The silence of thy resignation shall not be forgotten. Be studious of his interests, be diligent in his affairs, and faithful to the trust which he reposes in thee.

From the Saturday Evening Post.
THE PASSING YEAR.

Why do those deep reverberating notes,
So wont to fall upon the slumberer's ear,
And lull it to forgetfulness or serve
A theme for fancy's airy hand to weave
Her ever busy tale,—now break upon
The solemn stillness of the hour as if
To rouse, "pale midnight on her starry throne,"
Chasing sleep's finger from the half closed eye,
Waking to lonely musing—yes, they breathe,
The knell of fleeting time—the dying year!—
Roll on, thou billow of eternity!—
Thou movest as does the rushing restless wave
Of the impetuous torrent to o'erleap
Thy bounds, like those before thee gone and sink
In the dim misty ocean of the past.—
To summon up thy joy in retrospect,
It seems as if but a fleeting summer's day,
Since first we welcomed thee newborn with joy,
And fondly listened to the tales of bliss,
Which bright anticipation read in thee.
Another page in Time's deceiving book,
The course of the grand wheel of nature hath Fulfilled its round.—Twelve times the evening stars
Have hailed the moons new crescent—and as oft
Have bid its waning lamp adieu, and in Its course the busy husbandman has sown
And reaped, and ever varied earth has worn
Spring's flow'ry garb—and summer's gorgeous green,
And autumn's yellow leaf—and the rude blast
Has strewn them rustling to the earth and laid
Its icy hand upon the general pulse of life—
And yet, where are thy trophies fleeting year,
The victor spoils of time, a share of which Thy brow, a link in its vast chain,—should wreath,—
These are no lasting monuments to leave:—
Faint hold on immortality were these
To point the eye of coming years, and show
Thy fleeting reign, thy hurried footsteps in
The track of time,—and soon forget, for spring
Again in bloom will come, and summer too,
The grove left leafless by the wasting hand,
Will soon display in all its sylvan pomp—
And spread its verdant carpet o'er the mead,
Decked with the daisy and the violet,—
The mountain rivulet will laugh again—
As onward chimes its chrystal course, and the Blithe birds shall warble carollings as sweet,
As when they sang for thee, and nature shall
Not bear a trace of all thy ravages,
And thou wilt be forgot!—forgot by earth—
The studded firmament—the omnipresent wind,
The waving wood—the deep-toned thunder, and e'en
Old ocean's voice, leaving the moonlit shore,
Shall whisper nought of thee, and thou wilt pass
As but a light and rippling wave upon
The beach of blank oblivion.—But man!—
Man is thy monument, a tablet on which Thy passing hand ne'er fails to leave a slight Memento of its power—yes, thou hast stole
The rose from beauty's cheek,—sown silver hairs
Amid the raven locks of manhood's pride—
And left another furrow deep upon
His brow, indelible,—the cheerless hearth,
Forsaken chair, and silent hall, so late
The abode of happiness, now desolate.—
All speak thy reckless hand—thy trophies
Sleep in memory's shrine dewed with affection's tears,
And there the lonely heart will read them—but adieu!
We turn to hail thy new successor, and to greet
The sun that with his rosy beams proclaims
His birth fresh from the hand of God—
A boon all-worthy of the Glorious Giver,
Another long,—another happy year!— J. W. S.

THE WIFE.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

She was a beautiful girl, when I first saw her. She was standing up at the side of her lover at the marriage altar. She was slightly pale—yet ever and anon, as the ceremony proceeded, a faint tinge of crimson crossed her beautiful cheek, like the reflections of a sunset cloud upon the clear waters of a quiet lake.—Her lover, as he clasped her hand within his own, gazed on her for a moment with unmingled admiration, and the warm and eloquent blood shadowed at intervals his manly forehead, and "melted into beauty on his lip."

And they gave themselves to one another in the presence of heaven, and every heart blessed them as they went their way rejoicing in their love.

Years passed on, and I again saw those lovers.—They were seated together where the light of summer's sunset stole through the half closed and crimson curtain, lending a richer tint to the delicate carpeting, and the exquisite embellishments of the rich and gorgeous apartments. Time had slightly changed them in outward appearance. The girlish buoyancy of the one had indeed given place to the grace of perfect womanhood, and her lip was somewhat paler, and a faint line of care was slightly perceptible upon her brow. Her husband's brow too was marked somewhat more deeply than his age might warrant; anxiety, ambition and pride had grown over it, and left the traces upon it; a silver hue was mingled with the dark of his hair, which had become thin around his temples, almost to baldness. He was reclining on his splendid ottoman with his face half hidden by his hand, as if he feared that the deep and troubled thoughts which oppressed him were visible upon his features.

"Edward, you are ill to-night"—said his wife in a low, sweet, half-enquiring voice, as she laid her hands upon his own.

Indifference from those we love is terrible to the sensitive bosom. "It is as if the sun of heaven refused its wonted cheerfulness, and glared upon us with a cold, dim and forbidden glance. It is dreadful to feel that the only being of our love refuses to ask our sympathy—that he broods over the feelings which he scorns or fears to reveal—dreadful to watch the convulsive features and the gloomy brow—the indefinable shadows of hidden emotions—the involuntary sigh of sorrows in which we are forbidden to participate, and whose character we cannot know."

The wife essayed once more. "Edward," she said slowly, mildly and affectionately, "the time has been when you were willing to confide your secret joys and sorrows to one, who had never, I trust, betrayed your confidence. Why, then, my dear Edward, is this cruel reserve? You are troubled, and yet refuse to tell me the cause."

Something of returning tenderness softened for an instant the cold severity of the husband's features, but it passed away and a bitter smile was his only reply.

Time passed on, and the twain were separated from each other. The husband sat gloomy and alone in the damp cell of a dungeon. He had followed ambition as his God, and he had failed in a high career.—He had mingled with men whom his heart loathed, he had sought out the fierce and wronged spirits of his land, and had breathed into them the madness of revenge. He had drawn his sword against his country—he had fanned rebellion to a flame, and it had been quenched in human blood. He had fallen—miserably fallen—and was doomed to die the death of a traitor.

The door of the dungeon opened and a light form entered and threw herself into his arms. The softened light of sunset fell upon the pale brow and wasted cheek, of his once beautiful wife.

"Edward—my dear Edward," she said "I have come to save you; I have reached you after a thousand difficulties, and I thank God, my purpose is nearly executed.

Misfortune had softened the proud heart of manhood, and as the husband pressed his pale wife to his bosom, a tear trembled on his eye-lash, "I have not deserved this kindness," he murmured in the choked tones of agony.

"Edward," said his wife, in an earnest but faint and low voice, which indicated extreme and fearful debility, "we have not a moment to lose. By an exchange of garments you will be enabled to pass out unnoticed. Haste, or we may be too late. Fear nothing for me. I am a woman, and they will not injure me for my efforts in behalf of a husband dearer than life itself."

"But Margaret," said the husband, "you look sadly ill. You cannot breathe the air of this dreadful cell." "Oh, speak not of me, my dearest Edward," said the devoted woman. I can endure any thing for your sake. Haste, Edward, haste, and all will be well," and she aided with a trembling hand to disguise the proud form of her husband in a female garb.

"Farewell, my love, my preserver," whispered the husband in the ear of the disguised wife, as the officer sternly reminded the supposed lady, that the time allotted to her visit had expired. "Farewell! we shall meet again," responded his wife—and the husband passed out unsuspected and escaped the enemies of his life.

They did meet again—the wife and husband—but only as the dead may meet—in the awful commings of another world. Affection had borne up her exhausted spirit, until the last great purpose of her exertions was accomplished in the safety of her husband—and when the bell tolled on the morrow, and the prisoner's cell was opened, the guards found wrapped in the habiliment of their destined victim, the pale but still beautiful corpse of the devoted WIFE.

LORD CULLEN, THE MIMIC.

Robert Cullen, the son of the celebrated physician, and who finally officiated as a judge in the court of sessions, possessed amazing powers of mimicry, which were manifested in his earliest years. One evening, when his father was going to the theatre, he entreated to be taken along with him, but, for some reason, was condemned to remain at home. Some time after the departure of the doctor, Mrs. Cullen heard him come along the passage, as if from his own room, and say, at her door, "Well, after all, you may let Robert go." Robert was accordingly allowed to depart for the theatre, where his appearance gave no small surprise to his father. On the old gentleman coming home, and remonstrating with his lady for allowing the boy to go, it was discovered that the voice which seemed to give the permission had proceeded from the young wag himself.

In maturer years, Cullen could not only mimic any voice or mode of speech, but enter so thoroughly into the nature of any man, that he could supply exactly the ideas which he was likely to use. His imitations were therefore something much above the mimicries—they were Shaksperian representatives of human character. He has been known, in a social company, where another individual was expected, to stand up in the character of that person, and return thanks for the proposal of his health; and this was done so happily, that, when the individual did arrive, and got upon his legs to speak for himself, the company was convulsed with an almost exact repetition of what

Cullen had previously uttered, the manner also, and every inflection of the voice, being precisely alike. In relating anecdotes, of which he possessed a vast store, he usually prefaced them with a sketch of the character of the person referred to, which greatly increased the effect, as the story then told characteristically.—These sketches were remarked to be extremely graphic, and most elegantly expressed.

When a young man, residing with his father, he was very intimate with Dr. Robertson, the principal of the University, and the celebrated author of the life of Charles V. To show that Robertson was ill to imitate, it may be mentioned, from the report of a gentleman who has often heard him making public orations, that, when the students observed him pause for a word, and would themselves mentally supply it, they invariably found that the word which he did use was different from that which they thought suitable. Cullen, however, could imitate him to the life, either in his more formal speeches, or in his ordinary discourse.—He would often, in entering a house which the Principal was in the habit of visiting, assume his voice in the lobby and stair, and when arrived at the drawing-room door, astonish the family by turning out to be only Bob Cullen. Lord Greville, a pupil of the Principal's, having been one night detained at a protracted debauch, where Cullen was also present, the latter gentleman next morning got admission to the bedroom of the young nobleman, where, personating Dr. Robertson, he sat down by the bedside, and, with all the manner of the reverend Principal, gave him a sound lecture for having been out so late last night.—Greville, who had fully expected this visit, lay in remorseful silence, and allowed his supposed monitor to depart without saying a word. In the course of a quarter of an hour, however, when the real Dr. Robertson entered, and commenced a harangue exactly duplicating that just concluded, he could not help exclaiming, that it was too bad to give it him twice over. "Oh, I see how it is," said Robertson, rising to depart; "that rogue Bob Cullen must have been with you."—The Principal became at length quite accustomed to Bob's tricks, which he would seem, from the following anecdote, to have regarded in a friendly spirit. Being attended during an illness by Dr. Cullen, it was found necessary to administer a liberal dose of laudanum. The physician, however, asked him, in the first place, in what manner the laudanum affected him.—Having received his answer, Cullen remarked, with surprise, that he had never known any one affected in the same way by laudanum, besides his son Bob.—"Ah," said Robertson, "does the rascal take me of there too?"

Mr. Cullen entered at the Scottish bar in 1764, and distinguished himself highly as a lawyer, was raised to the bench in 1796, when he took the destination of Lord Cullen. He cultivated elegant literature, and contributed some papers of acknowledged merit to the Mirror and Lounger; but it was in conversation that he chiefly shone. We are informed by the late Sir William Macleod Bannatyne, who was his early associate, that the late George IV. always spoke of him as one of the most delightful men he had ever met. Lord Cullen died on the 28th of November, 1810.

SINGULAR SECURITY.

"What pity 'tis," said John the sage,
"That women should, for hire,
Expose themselves upon the stage,
By wearing men's attire."
"Expose," cries Ned, who loves to jeer;
"In sense you surely fail:
What can the darlings have to fear,
When clad in coat of male?"

LARRY BRANNIGAN; OR, THE FAIRY'S FIDDLER.

"Is it yondher fiddler ye'd be afther maning, my lady? Ye're sartainly right, whin ye say the praties or the corn we might grow on id 'ud keep ourselves an' the childer from starvin'—that is, if any blessed thing we could get to grow on id. But I'd be sorry Pat should risk the thryin' to put spade on that 'arh any how. But may be ye nivir heard the reason why that fiddler runs wild and untoucht, whilst many a poor lad 'ud be glad to cultivate it, but that the good people have takken it intirely for their own. Well, I'll tell ye then, ma'am. There was once in these parts, a broad, short, merry-faced lad, by name Larry Brannigan, by reason he come of genteels, (a thirteener of whose money he nivir set his eyes on,) 'ud live on the bit gain he could get by 'tending the christenin's and weddin's roun' the country, as a fiddler. He was ever the welcome visitor, for if praties wur scarce, or bacon dear, (and the Blessed Virgin have care on us, 'ud 'tis too often the case, my lady,) well, whatever ill was in the cabin, Larry was the lad to make 'em forget it althegither. He'd pass the joke, and when's the time he has even brought the whiskey himself to the fore,—for whin he was lavin' some kindly cabin, on a cowlid night, may be the purty bride 'ud bring him a bottle of somethin', and tell him, 'It 'ud keep the frost out on his road home;' and then, if Larry could bethink him iv a wake, or any sorrowin', where they might be short of the whiskey, to that place he'd be shure to turn his steps. So you see he'd the charitable soul, my lady; an' the pratie says that 'ud go nigh to savin' us from harm.

"But poor Larry had a besittin' sin, and that was a love of the whiskey, just a taste too much. Ye wud be shure nivir to see him at a sorrowin' widout the crathur anyhow, and often he'd take the sup too many, an' thin Larry was givin' to boastin' how he'd bin come of genteels, and how his skhill in the playin' come of the larnin' he'd got.

"Well, every one, they say, has somethin' or other to be wishin' for in this world, and poor Larry wished for nothin' more nor less than the purty colleen May Dooney. Arrah, an no wondher, for she was as bright as the month she was named afther, and as sweet. Such beautiful brown hair, such beamin' hazel eyes, and such scarlet lips, as made the heart of many an' her besidhes Larry's leap like a fish in its own filament; and Larry, though he tould the tale, and laughed and jokked till it did every body good as heard him, had the sorrow at his heart, as any one might tell as looked at him when others were jokin'.—Faith, and 'twas thin ye might see Larry was not what he seemed, happy and joyful, but had the trouble and the care like all the rist iv us. Do ye ask what trouble could Larry have? It was that same May Dooney as made his happiness too. 'Tis quare, ma'am, that thin two things ginirally goes thegither, but so it is. What we hope for as our greatest happiness affen turns out our greatest misery. But I'll not be talkin' to ye of what ye'll know, but just till ye that May Dooney did't love him at all, at all. She'd givin' her heart to a boy as she thought more fittin' her station, for she had got many a thirteener put by in an old brogue in the chimney corner. Well, wherivir May Dooney was seen, there was shure to be poor Larry Brannigan; but, as I said afore, ye mightn't have guessed he was miserable, for he played so merrily (more especially when May was lootin' it,) as if he'd been mad, but sorra a bit too fast for her, for she was the queen of dancin' as well as beauty; an' whin she'd lave the fiddle, Larry 'ud put down his fiddle, and take a long draught of whiskey.

"Well, at last, as most such things do, May's coor-tin' came to the weddin', and the askin' wint roun' and roun' to the merry-makin'. Amongst the rist, of course poor Larry was not last to be thought of, and he was called to it. Some have said as 'twas cruel in May to ask him, but others said as she nivir tho't the love iv her lay deep in Larry's heart, an' it seems likely such a light-hearted colleen, who wudn't look beyond his giniral appearance mght not think iv such a thing; an' evin if she hadn't asked him, it is said as he was herd to say 'he'd go to the dancin' that night if the 'good people' should kiver his path from one cabin to the other.' Others say, that he vowed alther that night 'he would nivir play agin not even for the queen of the fairies beisel.' No doubt, if he did say either iv these things, it wud gratefully offend the 'good people,' who do not like to be made light of, for all the love an' beauties in the world.

"Well, to the weddin' he wint, an' those that heard him play that night say, 'twas the shrangest sight an' hearin' in ould Ireland, for his face glowed like crimson, his eyes almost leaped from his head, an' his laugh was 'he loudest iv any; but, above all, his fiddle gav' out the shrangest soun's, quire like the wailin' of some unearthly crathur, an' that, too, whin he was playin' the merriest dances iv any. 'The time at last passed away, and thin come the cloakin' an' hoodin', an' the sly kiss wid the helpin' 'em on; an' Larry, playin' till the last, they'd all left before him. At length it came time for him to lave too, and the purty May Dooney comin' up to him, gav' him a large leather bottle iv the whisky, sayin' so swately, 'Larry, ye must tak' this for the sake iv the bit iv love there was once, or as ye fancied there was once, in yer heart for May Dooney.' All the rist, whin they took lave, kissed and blessed the bride, but Larry caught her in his arms, and hugged her so tight that she could scarcely breathe. He thin sazed the whiskey in his hand an' drank it off there an' thin.

"Well, the cabin where he had been used to stan' a little funder up the country, an' this very road on which we are now standin' is the one he tuk for his own home. I must now tell ye, my lady, that next mornin' poor Larry was found on that same field, lyin' as tho' he was dead, and whin he came to his senses, he seemed stark ravin' mad; but it was only the good people that ud bewitched him, for he could tell all what happened to him from the first to last. He got on quite well till he reached yondher field, and just as he touched it his head began to turn roun' and roun' just as if he had been whirlin' in the dance, and sparks of fire whirled about his eye. Iv a sudden he heard some strange singing close to his ears, and down he fell to the earth. No sooner was he down than all he had said of the good people went into his head, and sure enough he foun' out how offended they were. They at first danced roun' an' roun' him, and thin they crawled upon the top iv him, and began stamping on the strings iv his fiddle. All the time one little crathur, as he said was the queen, kept laughing and callin' him her fiddler; and thin they bade him get up, which he was obliged to do the mimit they tould him to do so, tho' he was very sore and stiff, and to play while they danced till the morning began to dawn. It was not long alther this that some of them that had been with him the evenin' found him just as dead. He said too, that the queen had tould him to come every night to play for her, and shure enough the next night, altho' they did all in their power to keep him in the cabin, he slipped from them, and away to the fairy ring. I can but just remember him, for he died whin I was quite one iv the little childer; but May Dooney nivir let him want for the bit or dir-p so long as she lived, tho' she died before him; an' afther that he got but the little that one or another could spare from their childer. I've heard genteels talk away about it, an' say as he nivir saw the fairies at all, at all; but they were Englishers, as did not know the 'good people' of Ireland. They said as the quantity iv whisky he drank took the effect of makin' him giddy and fall down, and that the rist about the fairies was a dhrame althegither; and thin they sed he was realy mad from the occurences of the night, an' the whisky wid them, but there niver was madman so kind and good-natured, even to childher, as Larry.

"Well, ma'am to finish my raisons why niver a boy in the country would be turnin' the sod of yondher piece, poor Larry still plays there every night. Many's the one has heard the screechin' iv his fiddle not so long since, as they returned from weddin' or wake, and I myself have seen bright sparks come from the groun' on a dark night. Most likely 'twas the light feet of the queen herself, whirlin' and caperin' to the tunes played up by Larry Brannigan." E. A. C.

THE POETRY OF FLOWERS.

BY SARAH STICKNEY.

There is one circumstance connected with the rose, which renders it a more true and striking emblem of earthly pleasure than any other flower—it bears a thorn. While its odorous breath is floating on the summer gale, and its blushing cheek, half hid amongst the sheltering leaves, seems to woo and yet shrink from the beholder's gaze, touch but with adventurous hand the garden queen, and you are pierced by her protecting thorns; would you pluck the rose and weave it into a garland for the brow you love best, that brow will be wounded: or place the sweet blossom in your bosom, the thorn will be there. This real or ideal mingling of pain and sorrow, with the exquisite beauty of the rose, affords a never-ending theme to those who are best acquainted with the inevitable blending of clouds and sunshine, hope and fear, weal and wo, in this our earthly inheritance.

With every thing fair, or sweet, or exquisite in this world, it has seemed meet to that wisdom which appoints our sorrows, and sets a bound to our enjoyments, to affix some stain, some bitterness, or some alloy, which may not inaptly be called, in figurative language, a thorn. St. Paul emphatically speaks of a "thorn in the flesh," and from this expression, as well as from his earnestness in having prayed thrice that it might be removed, we conclude it must have been something particularly galling to the natural man.—We hear of the thorn of ingratitude, the thorn of envy, the thorn of unrequited love—indeed of thorns as numerous as our pleasures; and few there are who can look back upon the experience of life, without acknowledging that every earthly good they have desired, pursued, or attained, had had its peculiar thorn.—Who has ever cast himself into the lap of luxury, without finding that his couch was strewn with thorns? Who has reached the summit of his ambition without feeling on that pinnacle that he stood on thorns? Who has placed the diadem upon his brow, without perceiving that thorns were thickly set within the royal circles? Who has folded to his bosom all that he desired of earth's treasures, without feeling that bosom pierced with thorns? All that we enjoy in this world, or yearn to possess, has this accompaniment. The more intense the enjoyment, the sharper the thorn; and those who have described most feelingly the inner workings of the human heart, have only unfailingly touched upon this fact with the melancholy sadness of truth.

Far be it from one who would not willingly fall under the stigma of ingratitude, to disparage the nature of the number of earthly pleasures—pleasures which are spread before us without price or limitation, in our daily walk, and in our nightly rest—pleasures which are scattered around our path when we go forth upon the hills, or wander in the valley; when we look up to the starry sky, or down to the fruitful earth—pleasures which unite the human family in one bond of fellowship, surrounded us at our board, cheer our fireside, smooth the couch on which we slumber, and even follow our wandering steps long—long after we have ceased to regard them with gratitude or joy. I speak of the thorn which accompanies these pleasures not with murmuring or complaint. I speak of the wounds inflicted by this thorn with a living consciousness of their poignancy and anguish; because exquisite and dear as mere earthly pleasures may sometimes be, I would still contrast them with such as are not earthly. I would contrast the thorn and the wound, the disappointment and the pain which accompany all such pleasures as are merely temporal, with the fulness of happiness, the peace, and the crown, accompanying those which are eternal.

A Love-Lighted Eye.

I have gold in my coffers, 'tis good and 'tis bright,
I have gems in my case would illumine the night,
I have ships on the ocean, and steeds in the stall,
But the dark eye of beauty is better than all.

Gold and gems fall away like the leaves from the tree
They were yours, they were his, now they're settled on me;

The galleys will perish, the coursers will die,
But eternity shines in a love-lighted eye.

Mutual Sympathy indispensable to Domestic Felicity.—The courtship of the last but one Earl of Pomfret, and the heiress he afterwards married, was conducted after the following fashion:—"Do you like buttered toast?" "Yes."—"Buttered on both sides?" "Yes."—"So do I; don't you think we had better be married?" "Yes."—"The lady's fourth "Yes" was pronounced before the altar.

Pere la Chaise, Monuments of Massena, Lefebvre, &c.

Monuments of Massena, Lefebvre, &c. Pere la Chaise.

Massena and Lefebvre were among the bravest and ablest of the Imperial generals.

The former had seen fourteen years' service in the army before the Revolution, and we find him a general of division of high character in 1793. He was with Napoleon in all his celebrated Italian campaigns; was selected by him to take to Paris the ratification of the Peace with Austria; and made governor of Rome, where he is accused of having acted with great rapacity. During Buonaparte's absence in Egypt, he was commander-in-chief in Italy, and, being afterwards commissioned to hold Genoa, was compelled to surrender it to the enemy. We now hear no more of him until 1805, when he forced the passage of the Adige in the presence of a superior force, and afterwards attacked and routed the whole Austrian line strongly posted near Caldiero. His name is subsequently and most honorably connected with the battles of Eylau, Pfaffenham, Landslut and Eckmuhl; and particularly with the defence of the villages of Aspern and Essling, from the latter of which he took in 1809, the title of "Prince." Napoleon called him at this time "his right arm." In 1810 he compelled the British, under Wellington, to retire through Spain to Torres Vedras, but in the beginning of the following year was only able to exhibit his skill in a masterly retreat through the Peninsula, and Buonaparte, being dissatisfied, did not afterwards employ him.

By Louis XVIII. though he confirmed him in his rank, Massena thought himself neglected; he therefore rejoined the Imperial standard during the Hundred Days, but acted indcisively: on the Second Restoration he retired wholly from public life, and died rich, April 4, 1817.

Lefebvre's career was also long and brilliant. He was a veteran-sergeant at the opening of the Revolution, a general of division at the close of 1793, and fought bravely under Pichegru, Moreau, Hoche, and Jourdan, sustaining alone, at Sidekbach, the attack of 36,000 men with 8000. On this occasion he was severely wounded.

When, on the 18th Brumaire, the other leaders of the Revolution were paralysed by the opposition they encountered, this general entered the Council of Five Hundred at the head of a file of grenadiers, and by rescuing the President, Lucian Buonaparte, gave a decisive turn to the events of the day. Napoleon seems never to have forgotten this service.

Lefebvre was distinguished in all the campaigns with Russia in 1805, and in 1807 invested and took Dantzic, sustaining in person several assaults of the enemy. Buonaparte now created him Duke of Dantzic. In 1809 he successfully defended the passes of the Tyrol, and was subsequently engaged at Thaur, Abersberg, and Eckmuhl. In the disastrous Russian campaign he commanded the Imperial Guard.

Louis XVIII. created him a peer of France, but he rejoined his old master's standard in 1815. This, however was graciously pardoned on the Second Restoration, and the marshal died in peace and with a high character for disinterestedness, September, 1820.

Remains of a Moorish Bridge on the Darro.

Following the course of the Darro, and leaving the principal entrance to the Alhambra by the street of the Gomez to the right, the tourist reaches the remains of an old Moorish bridge, which crossed the river at this point, and connected the ancient mint, which lay on the opposite side, with the Alhambra.—The battlements of the fortress immediately overhang the old houses which are built upon the foundation of the old bridge; whilst in the distance is seen the summer palace of the Generalife, high overshadowed by its ancient cypress trees, said to have been planted by the fair hand of one of the sultanas. One of these is still pointed out by tradition, as being that beneath which the unfortunate sultana of Granada was accused of having formed assignations with the noble Abencerrage. Still keeping along the bed of the Darro, the tourist comes to the Alameda, and crossing the stream, ascends the ravine that divides the Alhambra from the Generalife by the pass of the Mulinos, immediately above which the judicious artist took his view of the Tower of Comares.

Force of Imagination.—A few years ago, a celebrated physician, author of an excellent work on the force of imagination, being desirous to add experimental to his theoretical knowledge, made application to the minister of justice to be allowed an opportunity of proving what he asserted, by an experiment on a criminal condemned to death. The minister complied with his request, and delivered over to him an assassin, a man who had been born of distinguished parents.—The physician told him that several persons who had taken an interest in his family had obtained leave of the minister that he should suffer death in some other way than on the scaffold, to avoid the disgrace of a public execution; and that the easiest death he could die would be by blood-letting. The criminal agreed to the proposal, and counted himself happy in being freed from the painful exhibition which he would otherwise have been made of, and rejoiced at being thus enabled to spare the feelings of his friends and family. At the time appointed, the physician repaired to the prison, and the patient having been extended on a table, his eyes bound and every thing being ready, he was slightly pricked near the principal veins of the legs and arms with the point of a pin. At the four corners of the table were four little fountains filled with water, from which issued small streams falling into basins placed there to receive them. The patient, thinking that it was his blood that trickled into the basins, became weaker by degrees, and the remarks of the medical men in attendance in reference to the quality and appearance of the blood (made with that intention) increased the delusion, and he spoke more and more faintly, until his voice was at length scarcely audible. The profound silence which reigned in the apartment, and the constant dropping of the fountain, had so extraordinary an effect on the brain of the patient, that all his vital energies were soon gone, although before a very strong man, and he died without having lost a single drop of blood.—Le Chamelion.

Things that I like 'Powerfully.'—I like to hear candidates for office agree in politics with every man they converse with—it looks so much like principle.

I like to hear men denounce others for things which they themselves are guilty of—it looks so much like consistency.

I like to see young women peep through windows or the cracks of half-opened doors to catch a glimpse of the young men, and when they come in their presence appear over-modest—it is so admirable.

I like to see plenty of churches, yet having no ministers to preach in them—it looks so much like a wise disposition of charity's funds.

I like to see a parcel of young men stand before a church door, at the close of service, and stare every female full in the face as they pass out—it looks so much like good breeding.

And for your special benefit, Mr. Editor, I would add that I also like to see subscribers forget to pay the Printer—it must really be very encouraging.

THE CONSUL'S DAUGHTER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "VIVIAN GRAY."

At one of the most beautiful ports in the Mediterranean, Major Ponsonby held the office of British consul. The parliamentary interest of the noble family with which he was connected had obtained for him this office after serving his country, with no slight distinction, during the glorious year of the Peninsula. Major Ponsonby was a widower, and his family consisted of an only daughter, Henrietta, who was a child of very tender years when he first obtained his appointment, but who had completed her eighteenth year at the period, memorable in her life, which these pages attempt to commemorate. A girl of singular beauty was Henrietta Ponsonby, but not merely remarkable for her beauty. Her father, a very accomplished gentleman, had himself superintended her education with equal care and interest. In their beautiful solitude, for they enjoyed the advantage of very little society save that of those passing travellers who occasionally claimed his protection and hospitality, the chief and certainly the most engaging pursuit of Major Ponsonby, had been to assist the development of the lively talents of his daughter, and to watch with delight, not unattended with anxiety, the formation of her ardent and imaginative character: he had himself imparted to her a skilful practice in those fine arts in which he himself excelled, and a knowledge of those exquisite languages which he himself not only spoke with facility, but with whose rich and interesting literature he was intimately acquainted. He was careful, also, that, although almost an alien from his native country, she should not be ignorant of the progress of its mind; and no inconsiderable portion of his income had of late years been expended in importing from England the productions of those eminent writers of which we are justly as proud as of the heroes under whose flag he had himself conquered in Portugal and Spain.

The progress of the daughter amply repaid the father for his care, and rewarded him for his solicitude: from the fond child of his affection she had become the cherished companion of his society; her lively fancy and agreeable conversation prevented solitude from degenerating into loneliness: she diffused over their happy home that indefinable charm, that spell of unceasing, yet soothing excitement, with which the constant presence of an amiable, a lovely, and accomplished woman can alone imbue existence; without which life, indeed, under any circumstances, is very dreary; and with which life, indeed, under any circumstances, is never desperate.

There were moments, perhaps, when Ponsonby, who was not altogether inexperienced in the great world, might sigh, that one so eminently qualified as his daughter to shine even amid its splendour, should be destined to a career so obscure as that which necessarily attended the daughter of a consul in a distant country. It sometimes cost the father's heart a pang that his fair and fragrant flower should blush unseen, and waste its perfume even in their lovely wilderness; and then, with all a father's pride, and under all the influence of that worldly ambition from which men are never free, he would form plans by which she might visit, and with advantage, her native country. All the noble cousins were thought over, under whose distinguished patronage she might enter that great and distant world she was so capable of adorning; and more than once he had endeavoured to intimate to Henrietta that it might be better for them both that they should for a season part; but the consul's daughter shrunk from those whispers as some beautiful tree from the murmurs of a rising storm.—She could not conceive existence without her father—the father under whose breath and sight she had ever lived and flourished—the father to whom she was indebted, not only for existence, but all the attributes that made life so pleasant, her sire, her tutor, her constant company, her dear, dear friend. To part from him, even though but for a season, and to gain splendour, appeared to her pure, yet lively imagination, the most fatal of fortunes; a terrible destiny—an awful dispensation. They had never parted, scarcely for an hour: once, indeed, he had been absent for three days; he had sailed with the fleet on public business to a neighbouring port; he had been obliged to leave his daughter, and the daughter remembered those terrible three days like a frightful dream, the recollection of which made her shudder.

Major Ponsonby had inherited no patrimony—he possessed only the small income derived from his office, and a slender pension, which rewarded many wounds; but in the pleasant place in which their lot was cast, these moderate means obtained for them not merely the necessities, but all the luxuries of life. They inhabited in the town a palace worthy of the high, though extinct nobility, whose portraits and statues lined their lofty saloons, and filled their long corridors and graceful galleries; and about three miles from the town, on a gentle ascent facing the ocean, and embowered in groves of orange and olive trees, the fanciful garden enclosed in a thick wall of Indian fig and blooming aloe, was a most delicate casino, rented at a rate for which a garret may not be hired in England, but, indeed, a paradise. Of this pavilion Miss Ponsonby was the mistress; and here she lived amid fruit and flowers, surrounded by her birds; and here she might be often seen at sunset glancing amid its beauties, with an eye as brilliant, and a step as airy, as the bright gazelle that ever glided or bounded at her side.

One summer day, when every body was asleep in the little sultry city where Major Ponsonby, even in his siesta, watched over the interests of British commerce—for it was a city, and was blessed with the holy presence of a bishop—a young Englishman disembarked from an imperial merchant brig just arrived from Otranto, and according to custom, took his way to the consul's house. He was a man of an age apparently verging towards thirty, and, although the native porter who bore his luggage and directed his path proved that, as he was accompanied not even by a single servant, he did not share the general reputation of his countrymen for wealth, his appearance to those practised in society was not undistinguished. Tall, slender, and calm, his air, though unaffected, was that of a man not deficient in self-confidence; and whether it were the art of his tailor, or the result of his own good frame, his garb, although plain, had that indefinable style which we associate with the costume of a man of some mark and breeding.

On arriving at the consul's house he was ushered through a large, dark, cool hall, at the end of which was a magnificent staircase leading to the suite of saloons, into a small apartment on the ground floor fitted up in the English style; and which, although it offered the appearance of the library of an English gentleman, was, in fact, the consular office. Dwarf book-cases encircled the room, occasionally crowned by a marble bust, or bronze group. The ample table was covered with papers, and a vacant easy-chair was evidently the consular throne. A portrait of his Britannic majesty figured on the walls on one part of the chamber; and over the mantel was another portrait, which immediately engaged the attention of the traveller, and, indeed, monopolized his observation. He had a very ample opportunity of studying it, for nearly a quarter of an hour elapsed before he was disturbed. It was the full-length portrait of a young lady. She stood on a terrace in a garden, and by her side was a gazelle. Her form was of wonderful symmetry; but although her dress was not English, the expression of her countenance reminded the traveller of the beauties of his native land. The dazzling complexion, the large deep blue eye, the high white forehead, the clustering brown hair, were all northern, but northern of the highest order. She held in her small hand a branch of orange-blossom—the hand was fairer than the flower.

"Signor Ferrers, I believe," said a shrill voice. The traveller started, and turned round. Before him stood a little parched-up, grinning, bowing Italian, holding in his hand the card that the traveller had sent up to the consul.

"My name is Ferrers," replied the traveller, slightly bowing, and speaking in a low, sweet tone.

"I have the honour to be the chancellor of the British consulate."

It is singular that a mercantile agent should be styled a consul, and his chief clerk a chancellor.

"I have the honour to be the chancellor of the British consulate," said the Italian; "and I will take the earliest opportunity of informing the consul of your arrival. From Otranto, I believe? All well, I hope, at Otranto?"

"I hope so too," replied the traveller; "and so I believe."

"You will be pleased to leave your passport, sir, with me—the consul will be most happy to see you at the casino: about sunset he will be very happy to see you at the casino. I am sorry that I detained you for a moment, but I was at my siesta. I will take the earliest opportunity of informing the consul of your arrival; but at present all the consular messengers are taking their siesta, the moment one is awake I shall send him to the casino. May I take the liberty of inquiring whether you have any letters for the consul?"

"None," replied the traveller. The chancellor shrugged his shoulders a little, as if he regretted that he had been roused from his siesta for a traveller who had not even a letter of introduction, and then turned on his heel to depart.

The traveller took up his hat, hesitated a moment, and then said, "Pray, may I inquire of whom this is a portrait?"

"Certainly," replied the chancellor; "'tis the Signora Ponsonby."

It was even upon as ignoble an animal as a Barbary ass, goaded by a dusky little islander almost in a state of nudity, that, an hour before sunset on the day of his arrival, the English traveller approached the casino of the consul's daughter, for there a note from Major Ponsonby had invited him to repair, to be introduced to his daughter, and to taste his oranges. The servant who received him led Mr. Ferrers to a very fine plane-tree, under whose spreading branches was arranged a banquet of fruit and flowers, coffee in cups of oriental flagree, and wines of the Levant, cooled in snow. The worthy consul was smoking his chibouque, and his daughter, as she rose to greet their guest, let her garter fall upon the turf.

The original of the portrait proved that the painter had no need to flatter; and the dignified yet cordial manner, the radiant smile, and the sweet and thrilling voice with which she welcomed her countryman, would have completed the spell, had, indeed, the wanderer been one prepared, or capable of being enchanted. As it was, Mr. Ferrers, while he returned his welcome with becoming complaisance, exhibited the breeding of a man accustomed to sights of strangeness and of beauty; and, while he expressed his sense of the courtesy of his companions, admired their garden, and extolled the loveliness of the prospect, he did not depart for a moment from that subdued, and even sedate manner, which indicates the individual whom the world has little left to astonish, and less to enrapture, although, perhaps, much to please. Yet he was fluent in conversation, sensible and polished, and very agreeable.

It appeared that he had travelled much, though he was far from boasting of his exploits. He had been long absent from England; had visited Egypt and Arabia, and had sojourned at Damascus. While he refused the pipe, he proved, by his observation on its use, that he was learned in its practice; and he declined his host's offer of a file of English journals, as he was not interested in their contents. His host was too polished to originate any inquiry which might throw light upon the connexions or quality of his guest, and his guest imitated his example. Nothing could be more perfectly well-bred than his whole demeanour—he listened to the major with deference, and he never paid Miss Ponsonby a single compliment; he never even asked her to sing; but the fond father did not omit this attention. Henrietta, in the most unaffected manner, complied with his request, because, as she was in the habit of singing every evening to her father, she saw no reason why he should, on this occasion, be deprived of an amusement to which he was so accustomed. As the welcome seabreeze rose and stirred the flowers and branches, her voice blended with its fresh and fragrant breath. It was a beautiful voice; and the wild and plaintive air in which she indulged, indigenous to their isle, harmonized alike with the picturesque scene and the serene hour. Mr. Ferrers listened with attention, and thanked her for her courtesy. Before they withdrew to the casino, he even requested the favour of her repeating the gratification, but in so quiet a manner that most young ladies would have neglected to comply with a wish expressed with so little fervour.

The principal chamber of the casino was adorned with drawings by the consul's daughter: they depicted the surrounding scenery, and were executed by the hand of a master. Mr. Ferrers examined them with interest—his observations proved his knowledge, and made them more than suspect his skill. He admitted that he had some slight practice in the fine arts, and offered to lend his portfolio to Miss Ponsonby, if she thought it would amuse her. Upon the subject of scenery he spoke with more animation than on any other topic: his conversation, indeed, teemed with the observations of a fine eye and cultivated taste.

At length he departed, leaving behind him a very favourable impression. Henrietta and her father agreed that he was a most gentlemanlike person; that he was very clever and very agreeable; and they were glad to know him.—The major detailed all the families and all the persons of the name of Ferrers of whom he had ever heard, and with whom he had been acquainted; and, before he slept, wondered, for the fifteenth time, "What Ferrers he was?"

The next morning, Mr. Ferrers sent his portfolio to Miss Ponsonby, to the consul's house, in the city; and her father called upon him immediately afterwards, to return his original visit, and to request him to dine with them. Mr. Ferrers declined the invitation; but begged to be permitted to pay his respects again at the casino, in the evening. The major, under the circumstances, ventured to press his new acquaintance, to comply with their desire; but Mr. Ferrers became immediately very reserved, and the consul desisted.

Towards sunset, however, mounted on his Barbary ass, Mr. Ferrers again appeared at the gate of the casino, as mild and agreeable as before. They drank their coffee and ate their fruit, chatted and sang, and again repaired to the pavilion. Here they examined the contents of the portfolio;—they were very rich, for it contained drawings of all kinds, and almost of every celebrated place in the vicinity of the Mediterranean shores; Saracenic palaces, Egyptian temples, mosques of Damascus, and fountains of Stamboul. Here was a Bedouin encampment, shaded by a grove of palms; and there a Spanish Signorita, shrouded in her mantelle, glided along the Alameda. There was one circumstance, however, about these drawings which struck Miss Ponsonby as at least remarkable. It was obvious that some pencil-mark in the corner of each drawing, in all probability containing the name and initials of the artist, had been carefully obliterated.

Among the drawings were several sketches of a yacht, which Mr. Ferrers passed over quickly, and without notice. The consul, however, who was an honorary member of the yacht club, and interested in every vessel of the squadron that visited the Mediterranean, very naturally inquired of Mr. Ferrers, to whom the schooners in question belonged. Mr. Ferrers seemed rather confused; but at length he said: "Oh, they are stupid things: I did not know they were here. The yacht is a yacht of a friend of mine, who was at Cadiz."

"Oh, I see the name," said the major: "The Krakan. Why, that is Lord Bohun's yacht!"

"The same," said Mr. Ferrers; but perfectly composed.

"Ah! do you know Lord Bohun?" said Miss Ponsonby. "We have often expected him here. I wonder he has never paid us a visit, papa. They say he is the most eccentric person in the world. Is he so?"

"I never heard much in his favour," said Mr. Ferrers. "I believe he has made himself a great fool, as most young nobles do."

"Well, I have heard very extraordinary things of him," said the consul. "He is a great traveller, at all events, which I think a circumstance in every man's favor."

"And then he has been a Guerilla chieftain," said Miss Ponsonby; "and a Bedouin robber; and—I hardly know what else; but Colonel Garth, who was here last summer, told us the most miraculous tales of his lordship."

"Affectations!" said Mr. Ferrers, with a sneer. "Bohun, however, has some excuses for his folly; for he was an orphan, I believe, in his cradle."

"Is he clever?" inquired Miss Ponsonby.

"Colonel Garth is a much better judge than I am," replied Mr. Ferrers. "I confess I have no taste for Guerilla chieftains, or Bedouin robbers. I am not at all romantic."

And here he attracted her attention to what he called an attempted at a bull-fight; and the conversation dropped, and Lord Bohun was forgotten.

A fortnight passed away, and Mr. Ferrers was still a visitant of our Mediterranean isle. His intimacy with the consul and his daughter remained on the same footing. Every evening he paid them a visit; and every evening, when he had retired, the major and his daughter agreed that he was a most agreeable person, though rather odd; the worthy consul always adding his regret that he would not dine with him, and his wonder as to what Ferrers he was.

Now, it so happened that it was a royal birth day, and the bishop, and several of his leading persons of the town, had agreed to partake of the hospitality of the British consul. The major was anxious that Mr. Ferrers should meet them. He discussed this important point with his daughter.

"My darling, I don't like to ask him; he really is such a very odd man. The moment you ask him to dinner, he looks as if you had offered him an insult. Shall we send him a formal invitation? I wonder what Ferrers he is? I should be gratified if he would dine with us. Besides, he would see something of our native society here, which is amusing. What shall we do?"

"I will ask him," replied Miss Ponsonby. "I don't think he could refuse me."

"I am sure I could not," replied the major smiling.

And so Miss Ponsonby seized an opportunity of telling Mr. Ferrers that she had a favour to ask of him. He was more fortunate than he imagined, was his courteous reply.

"Then you must dine with papa, to-morrow."

Mr. Ferrers' brow immediately clouded.

"Now, do not look so suspicious," said Miss Ponsonby. "Do you think that ours is an Italian banquet? Is there poison in the dish? Or do you live only on fruit and flowers?" continued Miss Ponsonby. "Do you know," she added, with an arch smile, "I think you must be a ghoul."

A sort of smile struggled with a scowl over the haughty countenance of the Englishman.

"You will come!" said Miss Ponsonby, most winningly.

"I have already trespassed too much upon Major Ponsonby's hospitality," muttered Mr. Ferrers; "I have no claim to it."

"You are our countrymen."

"Unknown."

"The common consequence of being a traveller."

"Yes—but—in short—I—"

"You must come," said Miss Ponsonby, with a glance like sunshine.

"You do with me what you like," exclaimed Mr. Ferrers, with animation. "Beautiful—weather," he concluded.

Mr. Ferrers was therefore their guest, and strange it is to say, that, from this day, from some cause which is now useless to ascertain, this gentleman became an habitual guest at the consul's table; accepting a general invitation without even a frown; and what is more remarkable availing himself of it, scarcely with an exception.

Could it be the consul's daughter that effected this revolution? Time may, perhaps, solve this interesting problem. Certainly, whether it were that she was seldom seen to more advantage than when presiding over society; or whether, elate with her triumph, she was particularly pleasing, because she was particularly pleased; certainly, Henrietta Ponsonby never appeared to greater advantage than she did upon the day of this memorable festival. Mr. Ferrers, when he quitted the house, sauntered to the mole, and gazed upon the moonlight sea—A dangerous symptom. Yet the eye of Mr. Ferrers had before this been fixed in mute abstraction on many a summer wave, when Dian was in her bower; and this man, cold and inscrutable as he seemed, was learned in woman, and woman's ways. Shall a consul's daughter melt a heart that boasted of being callous, and clear a brow that prided itself upon its clouds?

But if the state of Mr. Ferrers' heart were doubtful, I must perforce confess, that, as time drew on, Henrietta Ponsonby, if she had ventured to inquire, could have little hesitated as to the state of her own feelings, her companion her constant companion, for such Mr. Ferrers had now insensibly become, exercised over her an influence, of the power of which she was unconscious,—only because it was unceasing. Had for a moment the excitement of her novel feelings ceased, she would have discovered, with wonder, perhaps with some degree of fear, how changed she had become since the first evening he approached their pleasant casino. And yet Mr. Ferrers was not her lover. No act,—no word of gallantry; no indication of affection, to her inexperienced sense, ever escaped him. All that he did was, that he sought her society; but, then, there was no other. The only wonder was, that he should remain among them; but, then, he had been every where. The vague love of lounging and repose, which ever and anon falls upon men long accustomed to singular activity and strange adventure, sufficiently accounted for his conduct. But, whatever might be his motives, certain it is, that the English stranger dangerously interested the feelings of the consul's daughter; and when she thought the time must arrive for his departure, she drove the recollection from her mind with a swiftness which indicated the pang which she experienced by its occurrence. And no marvel either that the heart of this young and lovely maiden softened at the thought, and in the presence of her companion; no marvel, and no shame; for nature had invested the Englishman with soul-subduing qualities. His elegant person; his tender, yet reserved manners; his experienced, yet ornate mind; the flashes of a brilliant, yet mellowed imagination, which ever and anon would break forth in his conversation; perhaps, too, the air of melancholy, and even of mystery, which enveloped him, were all spells potent in the charm that enchants the heart of woman. And the major, what did he think? The good consul was puzzled. The confirmed intimacy between his daughter and his guest alike perplexed and pleased him. He certainly never had become acquainted with a man whom he would sooner have preferred for a son-in-law, if he had only known who he was. But two months, and more than two months, had elapsed, and threw no light upon this most necessary point of knowledge. The consul hesitated as to his conduct. His anxiety almost mastered his good-breeding. Now he thought of speaking to Mr. Ferrers, and then to his daughter. There were no objections to each line of conduct; and his confidence in Mr. Ferrers was very great, although he did not exactly know who he was; he was decidedly a gentleman; and there was, throughout his conduct and conversation, a tone of such strict propriety; there was so much delicacy, and good feeling, and sound principle, in all he said and did, that the consul at length resolved that he had no right to suspect, and no authority to question him. He was just on the point, however, of conferring with his daughter, when the town was suddenly enlivened, and his attention suddenly engrossed, by the arrival of two other English gentlemen.

It must be confessed that Captain Ormsby and Major McIntyre were two very different sort of men to Mr. Ferrers. Never were two such gay, noisy, pleasant, commonplace, persons. They were "on leave" from one of the Mediterranean garrisons, had scamped through Italy, shot red legged partridges all along the Barbary coast, and even smoked a pipe with the Dey of Algiers. They were intoxicated with all the sights they had seen, and all the scrapes which they had encountered; and which they styled "regular adventures;" and they insisted upon giving every one a description of what every body had heard and seen. In consequence of their arrival, Mr. Ferrers discontinued dining with his accustomed host; and resumed his old habit of riding up to the casino, every evening, on his Barbary ass, to eat oranges, and talk to the consul's daughter.

"I suppose you know Florence, Mr. Ferrers?" said Major McIntyre.

Mr. Ferrers bowed.

"St. Peter's, of course, you have seen?" said Captain Ormsby.

"But have you seen it during Holy Week?" said the major. "That's the thing."

"Ah, I see you have been every where," said the captain. "Algiers, of course?"

"Never was at Algiers," replied Mr. Ferrers, quite rejoiced at the circumstance; and he walked away, and played with the gazelle.

"By Jove," said the major, with elevated eyes, "not been at Algiers! why, Mr. Consul, I thought you said Mr. Ferrers was a very great traveller indeed; and he has not been at Algiers! I consider Algiers more worth seeing than any place we ever witnessed." "Don't you, Ormsby?"

The consul inquired whether he had met any competitors at that famous place. The military travellers aswered, that they had not; but that Lord Bohun's yacht was there; and they understood his lordship was about to proceed to this island. The conversation for some time then dwelt upon Lord Bohun, and his adventures, eccentricities, and wealth. But Captain Ormsby finally pronounced "Bohun a devilish good fellow."

"Do you know Lord Bohun?" inquired Mr. Ferrers.

"Why, no!" confessed Captain Ormsby; "but he is a devilish intimate friend of a devilish intimate friend of mine."

Mr. Ferrers made a sign to Miss Ponsonby; she rose, and followed him into the garden. "I cannot endure the jabber of these men," said Mr. Ferrers.

"They are very good-natured," said Miss Ponsonby.

"It may be so; and I have no right to criticise them. I dare say they think me very dull. However, it appears you will have Lord Bohun here in a short time, and then I shall be forgotten."

"That is not a very kind speech. You would not be forgotten, even if absent; and you have, I hope, no thought of quitting us."

"I have remained here too long. Besides, I have no wish to play a second part to Lord Bohun."

"Who thinks of Lord Bohun? and why should you play a second part to any one? You are a little perverse, Mr. Ferrers."

"I have been in this island ten weeks," said Mr. Ferrers, thoughtfully.

"When we began to count time, we are generally weary," said Miss Ponsonby.

"You are in error, I would willingly compound, that the rest of my existence should be as happy as the last ten weeks. They have been very happy," said Mr. Ferrers, musingly; "very happy, indeed. The only happy time I ever knew. They have been so serene, and so sweet."

"Any why not remain, then?" said Miss Ponsonby, in a low voice.

"There are many reasons," said Mr. Ferrers; and he offered his arm to Miss Ponsonby, and they walked together, far away from the casino. "These ten weeks have been so serene, and so sweet," he continued, but in a calm voice, "because you have been my companion. My life has taken its colour from your character. Now, listen to me, dearest Miss Ponsonby, and be not alarmed. I love you!"

Her arm trembled in his.

"Yes, I love you; and, believe me, I use that word with no common feeling. It describes the entire devotion of my existence to your life; and my complete sympathy with every attribute of her nature. Calm as may be my speech, I love you with a burning heart."

She bowed her head and covered her face with her right hand.

"Most beautiful lady," continued Mr. Ferrers, "pardon me if I agitate you; for my respect is equal to my love. I stand before you a stranger, utterly unknown; and I am so circumstanced, that it is not in my power, even at this moment, to offer any explanation of my equivocal position. Yet, whatever I may be, I offer my existence, and all its accidents, good or bad, in homage to your heart. May I indulge the delicious hope that, not if now accepted, they are at least considered with kindness, and without suspicion?"

"Oh, yes! without suspicion," murmured Miss Ponsonby,—without suspicion. Nothing, nothing in the world shall ever make me believe that you are not as good as you are—gifted."

"Darling Henrietta!" exclaimed Mr. Ferrers in a voice of melting tenderness; and he pressed her to his heart, and sealed his love upon her lips. "This is confidence; this is the woman's love I long have sighed for. Doubt me not, dearest; never doubt me! Say you are mine; once more pledge yourself to me. I leave our life this night. Nay, start not, sweet one! 'Tis for our happiness; this night, I shall return to claim my bride. Now, listen, darling! our engagement, our sweet and solemn engagement, is secret. You will never hear from me until we meet again; you may hear of me, and not to my advantage. What matter? You love me; you cannot doubt me. I leave with you my honour; an honour never sullied. Mind that—Oh no, you cannot doubt me!"

"I am yours: I care not what they say; if there be no faith and truth in you, I will despair of them for ever."

"Beautiful being! You make me mad with joy. Has fate reserved for me, indeed, this treasure! Am I at length loved, and loved only for myself?"

He has gone; Mr. Ferrers has departed.—What an event! What a marvellous event! A revolution had occurred in the life of Henrietta Ponsonby: she was no longer her own mistress; she was no longer her father's child. She belonged to another; and that other a stranger, an unknown, and departed being! How strange! And yet how sweet! This beautiful young lady passed her days in pondering over her singular position. In vain she attempted to struggle with her destiny. In vain she depicted to herself the error, perhaps the madness, of her conduct. She was fascinated. She could not reason; she could not communicate to her father all that had happened. A thousand times her lips moved to reveal her secret; a thousand times an irresistible power restrained them.—She remained silent, moody, and restless; she plucked flowers, and threw them to the wind; she gazed upon the sea, and watched the birds in abstraction wilder than their wings; and yet she would not doubt her betrothed. That voice, so sweet, and solemn, and so sincere, still lingered in her ear; the gaze of that pure and lofty brow was engraven on her memory: never could she forget those delicate adieus!

This change in his daughter was not unmarked by the consul, who, after some reflection, could not hesitate in considering it as the result of the departure of Mr. Ferrers. The thought made him mournful. It pained his noble nature, that the guest whom he so respected might have trifled with the affections of the child whom he so loved. He spoke to the maiden; but the maiden said she was happy. And, indeed, her conduct gave evidence of restlessness rather than misery; for her heart seemed sometimes exuberantly gay; often did she smile, and ever did she sing. The consul was conscious there was a mystery he could not fathom. It is bitter for a father at all times to feel that his child is unhappy; but doubly bitter is the pang when he feels that the cause is secret.

Three months, three heavy months passed away, and the cloud still rested on this once happy home. Suddenly Lord Bohun arrived, the much talked of Lord Bohun, in his more talked-of yacht. The bustle which the arrival of this celebrated personage occasioned in the consular establishment was a diversion from the reserve, or the gloom, which had so long prevailed there. Lord Bohun was a young, agreeable, and somewhat affected individual. He had a German chasseur and a Greek page. He was very luxurious, and rather troublesome, but infinitely amusing, both to the consul and his daughter. He dined with them every day, and recounted his extraordinary adventures with considerable self complacency. In the course of the week he scamped over every part of the island; and gave a magnificent entertainment on board the Kraken, to the bishop and the principal islanders, in honour of the consul's daughter. Indeed it was soon very evident that his lordship entertained feelings of no ordinary admiration for his hostess. He paid her on all occasions the most marked attention; and the consul, who did not for a moment believe that these attentions indicated other than the transient feelings that became a lord, and so adventurous a lord, began to fear that the inexperienced Henrietta might again become the victim of the fugitive admiration of a traveller.

One evening at the casino, his lordship noticed a drawing of his own yacht, and started. The consul explained to him, that the drawing had been copied by his daughter from a sketch by an English traveller, who preceded him. His name was inquired, and given.

"Ferrers!" exclaimed his lordship. "What, has Ferrers been here?"

"You know Mr. Ferrers, then?" inquired Henrietta, with suppressed agitation.

"Oh yes, I know Ferrers."

"A most agreeable and gentleman-like man," said the consul, anxious, he knew not why, that the conversation should cease.

"Oh yes, Ferrers is a very agreeable man. He piques himself on being agreeable,—Mr. Ferrers."

"From what I have observed of Mr. Ferrers," said Henrietta, in a firm, and rather decided tone, "I should not have given him credit for any sentiment approaching to conceit."

"He is fortunate in having such a defender," said his lordship, bowing gallantly.

"Our friends are scarcely worth possessing," said Miss Ponsonby, "unless they defend us when absent. But I am not aware that Mr. Ferrers needs any defence."

His lordship turned on his heel and hummed an opera air.

"Mr. Ferrers paid us a long visit," said the consul, who was now desirous that the conversation should proceed.

"He had evidently a great inducement," said Lord Bohun. "I wonder he ever departed."

"He is a great favourite in this house," said Miss Ponsonby.

"I perceive it," said Lord Bohun.

"What Ferrers is he?" inquired the consul.

"Oh, he has gentle blood in his veins," said Lord Bohun. "I never heard his breeding impeached."

"And I should think, nothing else," said Miss Ponsonby.

"Oh, I never heard any thing particular against Ferrers," said his lordship; "except that he was a rouse; and a little mad. That is all."

"Enough, I should think," said Major Ponsonby, with a clouded brow.

"What a rouse may be, I can scarcely be supposed to judge," said Henrietta. "It, however, it be a man remarkable for the delicacy of his thoughts and conduct, Mr. Ferrers has certainly some claim to the title. As for his madness, he was our constant companion for nearly three months; if he be mad, it must be very little indeed."

"He was a great favourite of Henrietta," said her father, with a forced smile.

"Fortunate man!" said the lord. "Fortunate Ferrers!"

Lord Bohun stepped into the garden with the consul; Miss Ponsonby was left alone. Firm as had been her previous demeanour, now that she was alone, her agitated countenance denoted the tumult of her mind. A rouse! Could it be so! Could it be possible! Was she, while she had pledged the freshness of her virgin mind to this unknown man; was she, after all, only a fresh sacrifice to his insatiable vanity! Ferrers a rouse! That lofty-minded man, who spoke so eloquently, and so wisely, was he a rouse, an eccentric rouse; one whose unprincipled conduct could only be excused at the expense of his intellect? She could not credit it; she would not credit it; and yet his conduct had been so strange, so mysterious, so unnecessarily mysterious; and then she recollected his last dark muttered words. "You may hear of me, and not to my advantage!" Oh, what a prophecy! And from him she had never heard. He had, at least, kept this sad promise. Very sorrowful was the consul's daughter. And then she bethought herself of his pledge, and his honour that had been never sullied. She buried her face in her hands—she conjured up to her recollection all that had happened since his arrival, perhaps his fatal arrival, in their island; all he had said, and done, and seemed to think. She would not doubt him. It was madness for a moment to doubt him. No desolation seemed so complete, no misery so full of anguish, as such suspicion: she could not doubt him; all her happiness was hope. A gentle touch roused her. It was her gazelle; the gazelle that he had so loved. She caressed it, she caressed it for his sake; she arose and joined her father and Lord Bohun in the garden, if not light-hearted, at least serene.

There must have been something peculiarly captivating in the air of our island; for Lord Bohun, who, according to his own account, had never remained in any place a week in the whole course of his life, exhibited no inclination to quit the city where Major Ponsonby presided over the interests of our commerce. He had remained there nearly a month, made himself very agreeable, and, on the whole, was a welcome guest, certainly with the consul, if not with the consul's daughter. As for the name of Mr. Ferrers, it occasionally occurred in conversation. Henrietta piqued herself upon the unsuspected inquiries which she carried on respecting her absent friend. She, however, did not succeed in eliciting much information. Lord Bohun was so vague, that it was impossible to annex a precise idea to any thing he ever uttered. Whether Ferrers were rich or poor, really of good family, or, as she sometimes thought, or disgraceful lineage; when and where Lord Bohun and himself had been fellow-travellers—all was alike obscure and shadowy. Not that her noble guest was inattentive to her inquiries: on the contrary, he almost annoyed her by his constant devotion; she was almost, indeed, inclined to resent his singularly marked expressions of admiration as an insult; when, to her utter astonishment, one morning her father astounded her by an announcement that Lord Bohun had done her the honor of offering her his hand and heart. The beautiful Henrietta was in great perplexity. It was due to Lord Bohun to reject his flattering proposal without reservation: it was difficult, almost impossible, to convince her father of her expediency of such a proceeding. There was in the proposal of Lord Bohun every circumstance which could gratify Major Ponsonby. In the wildest dreams of his paternal ambition, his hopes had never soared higher than the possession of such a son-in-law; high birth, high rank, splendid fortune, and accomplished youth, were combined in the individual whom some favouring destiny, it would seem, had wafted to this distant and obscure isle to offer his vows to its accomplished mistress. That his daughter might hesitate, on so brief an acquaintance, to unite her eternal lot in life with a comparative stranger, was what he had, in some degree, anticipated; but that she should unhesitatingly and unreservedly decline the proposal, was conduct for which he was totally unprepared. He was disappointed and mortified—for the first time in his life he was angry with his child. It is strange that Lord Bohun, who had required a deputy to make a proposition which, of all others, the most becomes and most requires a principal, should, when his fate was decided, have requested a personal interview with Miss Ponsonby. It was a favour which she could not refuse for her father required her to grant it. She accordingly prepared herself for a repetition of the proposal from lips, doubtless, unaccustomed to sue in vain. It was otherwise never had Lord Bohun conducted himself in a more kind and unaffected manner than during this interview: it pained Miss Ponsonby to think she had pained one who was in reality so amiable; she was glad, however, to observe that he did not appear very much moved or annoyed. Lord Bohun expressed his gratitude for the agreeable hours he had spent in her society; and then most delicately ventured to inquire whether time, might, perhaps, influence Miss Ponsonby's determination? And when he had received her most courteous, though hopeless answer, he only expressed his wishes for her future happiness, which he could not doubt.

"I feel," said Lord Bohun, as he was about to depart; "I feel," he said, in a very hesitating voice, "I am taking a great, and unwarrantable liberty; but believe me, dear Miss Ponsonby, the inquiry, if I could venture to make it, is inspired by the sincerest desire for your welfare."

"Speak with freedom, Lord Bohun; you will ever, I am sure, speak with kindness."

"I would not willingly despair then, unless I believed that heart were engaged to another."

Miss Ponsonby bent down and plucked a flower, and her brow covered with blushes, with an agitated hand tore the flower to pieces.

"Is this a fair inquiry?" she murmured.

"It is for your sake I inquire," said Lord Bohun.

Now an irresistible conviction came over her mind that Lord Bohun was thinking of Ferrers, and a desire on her part as strong to learn at length something of her mysterious lover.

"What, indeed, if I be not mistress of my heart?" She spoke without raising her head.

"In that case I will believe that it belongs to one worthy of such a treasure."

"You speak of Edwin Ferrers?" said Miss Ponsonby.

"The same."

"You know him?" she inquired, in a choking voice.

"I know and honour him. I have long believed that the world did not boast a man more fitted; now I know that it does not possess a man more blessed."

"Shall you see him?" she inquired, in a quick tone.

"Probably you will see him first: I am sufficiently acquainted with his movements to know that he will soon be here. This Greek boy whom you have sometimes noticed in his page: I wish him to join his master again; and methinks the readiest way will be to leave him in this isle. Here, Spiridon, bow to your new mistress, and be dutiful for her sake, as well as that of your lord's—Adieu! dearest Miss Ponsonby!"

This strange conversation with Lord Bohun at parting, was not without a certain wild, but not unpleasant influence over the mind of Henrietta Ponsonby. Much as it at first had agitated her, its result, as she often mused over it, was far from being without solace. It was consoling, indeed, to know that one person, at least, honoured that being in whom she had so implicitly relied. Lord Bohun, also, had before spoken of Ferrers in a very different tone; but she felt confidence in the unusual seriousness of his last communication; and with satisfaction contrasted it with the heedlessness, or the levity, of his former intimations. Here, too, was the page of Ferrers at her side—the beautiful and bright-eyed Spiridon. How strange it was! how very strange! Her simple life had suddenly become like some shifting fairy tale: but love, indeed, is a fairy, and full of marvels and magic—it changes all things; and the quietest domestic hearth, when shadowed by its wing, becomes as rife with wonders and adventure as if it were the passionate theatre of some old romance. Yes! the bright-eyed Greek page of her mysterious and absent lover was at her side—but then he only spoke Greek. In vain she tried to make him comprehend how much she desired to have tidings of his master. The graceful mute could only indulge in airy pantomime, point to the skies and ocean, or press his hand to his heart in token of fidelity. Henrietta amused herself in teaching Spiridon Italian, and repaid herself for all her trouble in occasionally obtaining some slight information of her friend. In time she learned that Ferrers was in Italy, and had seen Lord Bohun before the departure of that nobleman. In answer to her anxious and often-repeated inquiries whether he would soon return, Spiridon was constant in his consoling affirmative. Never was such a sedulous mistress of languages as Henrietta Ponsonby. She learned, also, that an Albanian scarf, which the page wore round his waist, had been given him by his master when Spiridon quitted him; and Henrietta instantly exchanged the scarf for a Barbary shawl of uncommon splendour.

Now it happened one afternoon towards sunset, as the Greek page rambling, as was his custom, over the neighbouring heights, beheld below the spreading furt, the neighbouring straits, and the distant sea, that a vessel appeared in sight, and soon entered the harbour. It was an English vessel—it was the yacht of Lord Bohun. The page started and watched the vessel with a fixed and earnest gaze; soon he observed the British consul in his boat row to the side of the vessel, and almost immediately return. At that moment the yacht hoisted a signal—upon a white ground a crimson heart—whereupon Spiridon, drawing from his breast a letter, kissed it twice, and bounded away.

He bounded away toward the city, and scarcely slackened his pace until he arrived at the consul's mansion—he rushed in, dashed up the staircase, and entered the saloons. At the window of one, gazing on the sunset, was Henrietta Ponsonby—her gaze was serious, but her beautiful countenance was rather tinged by melancholy than touched by gloom—pensive, not sorrowful. By her side lay her guitar, still echoing, as it were, with her touch, and near it the Albanian scarf, on which she had embroidered the name of her beloved. Of him, then, were the gentle musings? Who can doubt? Her gentle musings were of him whom she had loved with such unexampled trust. Fond, beautiful, confiding maiden! It was the strength of thy mind as much as the simplicity of thy heart that rendered thee so faithful and so firm! Who would not envy thy unknown adorer? Can he be false? Suspicion is for weak minds and cold-blooded spirits. Thou never didst doubt; and thou wast just, for, behold, he is true!

A fluttering sound roused her—she turned her head, and expected to see her gazelle; it was Spiridon; his face was wreathed with smiles as he held towards her a letter. She seized it—she recognised in an instant the handwriting she had so often studied—it was his! Yes! it was his. It was the handwriting of her beloved. Her face was pale, her hand trembled; a cloud moved before her vision; yet at length she read these words:—

"If, as I hope, and as I believe, you are faithful to those vows, which, since my departure, have been my only consolation, you will meet me to-morrow, two hours before noon, in our garden. I come to claim my bride; until my lips have expressed to you how much I adore you, let nothing be known to our father."

"My dearest Henrietta," said the consul, as he entered, "who, think you, has returned! Lord Bohun."

"Indeed!" said Henrietta. "Have you seen him?"

"No, I paid my respects to him immediately, but he was unwell. He breakfasts with us to-morrow at ten."

The morrow came, but ten o'clock brought no Lord Bohun; and even eleven sounded: the consul sought his daughter, to consult her—he was surprised to learn that Miss Ponsonby had not returned from her early ramble. At this moment a messenger arrived from the yacht to say, that, from some error, Lord Bohun had repaired to the casino, where he awaited the consul. The major mounted his barb and soon reached the pavilion. As he entered the garden, he beheld, in the distance, his daughter and—Mr. Ferrers. He was, indeed, surprised. It appeared that Henrietta was about to run forward to him; but her companion checked her, and she disappeared down a neighbouring walk. Mr. Ferrers advanced, and saluted her father.

"You are surprised to see me, my dear sir?"

"I am surprised, but most happy. You come, of course, with Lord Bohun?"

Mr. Ferrers bowed.

"I am very desirous of having some conversation with you, my dear Major Ponsonby," continued Mr. Ferrers.

"I am ever at your service, my dear sir; but at the present moment I must go and greet his lordship."

"Oh, never mind Bohun," said Mr. Ferrers, carelessly. "I have no ceremony with him—he can wait."

The major was a little perplexed.

"You must know, my dearest sir," continued Mr. Ferrers, "that I was to speak to you on a subject in which my happiness is entirely concerned."

"Proceed, sir," said the consul, looking still more puzzled.

"You can scarcely be astonished, my dearest sir, that I should admire your daughter."

The consul bowed.

"Indeed," said Mr. Ferrers, "it seems to me impossible to know her and not admire: I should say, adore her."

"You flatter a father's feelings," said the consul.

"I express my own," replied Mr. Ferrers. "I love her—I have long loved her, devotedly."

"Hem!" said Major Ponsonby.

"I feel," continued Mr. F., "that there is a great deal to apologize for in my conduct, both towards you and herself: I feel that my conduct may, in some degree, be considered even unpardonable; I will not say that the end justifies the means, Major Ponsonby, but my end was, at least, a great, and, I am sure, a virtuous one."

"I do not clearly comprehend you, Mr. Ferrers."

"It is some consolation to me," continued that gentleman, "that the daughter has pardoned me: now let me indulge the delightful hope that I may be as successful with the father."

"I will, at least, listen with patience to you, Mr. Ferrers; but I must own your meaning is not very evident to me; let me, at least, go and shake hands with Lord Bohun."

"I will answer for Lord Bohun excusing your momentary neglect. Pray, my dear sir, listen to me."

"I wish to make you acquainted, Major Ponsonby, with the feelings which influenced me when I first landed on this island. This knowledge is necessary for my justification."

"But what is there to justify?" inquired the Major.

"Conceive a man born to great fortune," continued Mr. F., without noticing the interruption, "and to some accident of life, which many esteem above fortune; a station as eminent as his wealth—conceive this man master of his destiny from his boyhood, and early experienced in that great world with which you are not unacquainted—conceive him with a heart, gifted, perhaps, with too dangerous a sensibility; the dupe and the victim of all whom he encounters—conceive him, in disgust, flying from the world that had deceived him and divesting himself of those accidents of existence which, however envied by others, appeared to his morbid imagination the essential causes of his misery—conceive this man, unknown and obscure, sighing to be valued for those qualities of which fortune could not deprive him, and to be loved only for his own sake—a miserable man sir!"

"It would seem so," said the consul.

"Now, then, for a moment imagine this man apparently in possession of all for which he had so long panted; he is loved, he is loved for himself, and loved by a being surpassing the brightest dream of his purest youth; yet the remembrance of the past poisons, even now, his joy. He is haunted by the suspicion that the affection, even of this being is less the result of his own qualities, than of her inexperience of life—he has every thing at stake—he dares to submit her devotion to the sharpest trial—he quits her with the distinct understanding that she shall not even hear from him until he thinks fit to return; and entangles her pure mind, for the first time, in a secret from the parent whom she adores. He is careful, in the mean while, that his name shall be traduced in her presence—that the proudest fortune, the loftiest rank, shall be offered for her acceptance, if she only will renounce him, and the dim hope of his return. A terrible trial, Major Ponsonby!"

"Indeed, most terrible."

"But she is true—truer than even truth—and I have come back to claim my unrivalled bride. Can you pardon me? Can you sympathize with me?"

"I speak then——" murmured the astonished countess.

"To your son, with your permission—to Lord Bohun!"

FOREIGN FORTUNE-HUNTERS.

A CHAPTER FOR THE LADIES.

Baden has lately been resorted to by foreign fortune-hunters, in pursuit of English heiresses. To some of these adventurers a few hundred pounds are an object, and the wife that must be taken along with the money no very great hindrance. If the lady cannot find herself in her new situation, she can return, broken-hearted and penniless, to her friends; she can take to gallantry, or obtain a German divorce: these things are easily managed on the Continent. It may be as well, while I am at a fortune-hunting station, to give my fair country women a little information on the pursuit generally.

And, first, you must know, as you are yourselves decided title-hunters, that an edict was promulgated in 1828, forbidding any Russian or Polish subject from taking the title of count or prince unless there was attached to the former rank a sum equal to £35, and to the latter about £50 per annum. You see, therefore that title implies no very great station in those countries. You must further know that all Russians who are termed knesen at home, translate that appellation into prince the moment they cross the frontier, though it is not even a title, and corresponds to our term esquire more than any thing else. The French, German, and Italian nobility you have learned to know to your cost. In those countries a nobleman's sons, let him have as many as he will, are all noble; their descendants again are noble ad infinitum,—so that the countries are overrun with a pauper population of counts and barons. A foreign title gives you, therefore, no rank in a foreign country, and it is altogether a very different thing from an English one. An English lady, not of noble birth, had, while at Dresden, been in the habit of going to court, where, as she well deserved, she was always well received. She married a Saxon nobleman, and was then refused admittance, having, by her marriage, become a Saxon lady, but not being of noble birth.—Remonstrance at Dresden proved fruitless; she, therefore, applied to Mr. Canning, then Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who declined, however, to interfere at the court of Saxony in favour of a Saxon baroness, but undertook to write a sort of half-official letter in her favour. The object of the epistle was to express a hope that Miss M. had not so far degraded herself by her marriage, with a Saxon nobleman as to deserve exclusion from the court to which she had before been admitted.

You must further know, that there are persons in Paris, who are always ready to fit out good-looking young foreigners for a fortune-hunting tour to England. They are, in proportion to their looks, tourneurs and assurance, furnished with money, titles, decorations, and introductions, even to good families. The thing is looked upon by the French themselves as so fair a pursuit, so complete a despoiling of the enemy, that no French lady or gentleman will hesitate about soliciting letters from their English friends pour un jeune seigneur about to visit England. I have known such letters obtained through the medium of milliners and chamber maids. Having once got footing in a good house, the gentleman makes the most of it; and asks for further introductions, even to the best families, without the least scruple. The adventures of a Greek count at Brighton are well known. He was anxious to get into the house of a nobleman of some station in the fashionable world, but had been unable to manage the affair. Hearing, at last, that a family of his acquaintance were going to a ball given by his lordship, he called upon them, and requested permission to accompany them, insinuating that he had an invitation to the party; but, being a stranger, wished to go along with some one who could introduce him on his first appearance at the mansion. The trick nearly succeeded; the noble hostess was just going to introduce Monsieur le Comte to a partner for the next quadrille, but, not having heard his name very distinctly, applied for information to the introducer, asking the "title of his foreign friend." This led to an explanation, which ended in the count being walked out of the room, instead of being walked up to a partner. The "untoward" event by no means cooled the Greek's courage; he stood the laughs and sneers of the place for a week, at the end of which the adventure was forgotten, and he very composedly resumed his former station in society. This gallant Mereot was not ultimately so fortunate as from his modest assurances might have been expected. He got two wives indeed, but they proved to be without fortune; and, the double arrangement having been discovered, he was obliged to leave the country, as he entered it, before he could secure a third.

It is no unusual thing for a married foreigner to take an additional wife in England, provided he can get a little money with her. The chances are that a moderate sum keeps the foreign lady quiet, it even she hears of the affair. If she is troublesome, it is only going back to the Continent with the English money and without the English wife. I have myself known three cases of this kind; and, strange to say, the heroes, as it intended to serve as samples of their respective nations, were all three from different countries. The one was an Italian, the other a Frenchman, and the third a German. The Italian managed best; he contrived to hush up the business, and to reconcile the parties. The Italian wife, who is by far the prettiest of the two, lives at the expense of the English one, and sometimes pays her a sentimental visit, and is very kind to the Anglo-Italian children.—The German took advantage of his English lady's indignation on hearing of the previous marriage, and obtained, in some of the little principalities of Germany, a favourable divorce, which left him in possession of the best part of the English fortune. The Frenchman mismanaged the affair; and was obliged to run for it; and I do not know how matters have been settled; families like to keep these things quiet, or we should hear of many more,—for they are now of almost daily occurrence. It is indeed generally asserted that Prince Puckler Muskau himself only came to this country in order to marry a rich widow, now higher than a countess, but then only a discountess.—That he had a wife living, seemed no great objection in his eyes; the ill-natured world abroad say, that it was the only objection in the lady's eyes.

I could fill volumes with accounts of English misdoings and undoings at Florence; but have at present

MRS. HEMANS.

BY W. G. CLARK.

We weep not, when the yellow sheaves are gathered,
While Autumn's peace and plenteousness abound;
When, from the tinted boughs, like rainbows withered,

The golden fruits drop richly to the ground;
When solemn Nature round her sadness throws
A mellow glory and a warm repose.

We weep not then, amid the fruitage falling,
Whose affluent incense rises in the sky;
Though then we hear soft spirit-voices calling,
That tell how loved and cherished things must die;

For to the fairest blooms a change must come,
That the ripe treasures may be garnered home.

'Twas thus with thee, Beloved! their holy mission
Thy heart and soaring lays at last fulfilled;
Then rolled the cloud beyond thy spirit's vision,
Till all the music of thy lyre was stilled;
And like a melting wave, or wanning sun,
Passed from this vale of ill, the Gilded One!

'Tis well, divinest Soul, with thee! for Heaven
Had filled thine inmost thoughts with sacred dreams;

And to thy reverie and song was given
A world of radiant and immortal gleams;
Yea, gorgeous pictures of a better land
Did ever to thy view their scene expand.

Now, all their fadeless pomp and glow perceiving,
Thou breathest freely, in celestial air;
The tender heart hath ceased its weary grieving,
And the pure mind is bathed in rapture there;
While, mid fair ways no earthly foot hath trod,
In white thou walkest, present with thy God!

Thou hearest melody, whose flowing numbers
Once came but faintly to thy mortal ear,
When ills of time were lost in evening slumbers,
And magic Fancy brought her Eden near;
Thou hast thy yearning hopes' fruition now,—
The wreath of Paradise surrounds thy brow!

Thou hearest harps delicious, sweetly ringing,
And sister Spirits fan thee with their wings:
With them thou minglest, and with them art singing,
Where, named of Life, the crystal river springs:
Where, like some changing prism, expand the skies,
And purple hills from vernal vales arise.

Thou art in glory, oh rejoicing Spirit!
Thou look'st on flowers that no pale frosts may stain:

And from a changeless Friend, thou dost inherit
A lyre triumphant, breathing not of pain:
Thou hast thy Home at last, from sorrow free,
And all is blessedness and peace with thee!

Sir William Scott, third Laird of Harden, being made prisoner by Sir Gideon Murray of Elbank, in a bloody border feud, was condemned to lose his head or to marry Agnes, a daughter of his captor, known by the descriptive appellation of "Muckle-mouthed Meg." To the latter alternative he consented, but not before he ascended the Scaffold. He lived with the lady, however, long and happily, and had by her eight children; from the eldest son springs the present Laird of Harden, (who is now claiming before the House of Lords the title of Polworth,) and from the third lineally descended the late Sir Walter Scott.

only time to give a couple of characteristic sketches of Anglo-Italian conduct and manners.

A lady of some property, so far advanced in years as to be safe against the attacks of ordinary scandal and gallantry, was induced by her friend to settle at Florence, where she had relations living, in order to get over some family differences that for a time rendered her stay in England unpleasant. On her arrival in the Etrurian capital a young Italian nobleman was introduced to her, who offered his assistance in settling up her establishment. The offer being accepted, the Marquis was all attention, and certainly proved himself very useful; but it so happened that he always, by some chance or other, called exactly at dinner time.—At first our good countrywoman invited him to stay; but, getting tired of his regular attendance, she left off inviting him, and he then invited himself; and when, at last, desired to make himself scarce, he flatly refused, declaring that dinners, and all such trifles, were perquisites of the amico,—a character in which he considered himself regularly established, not merely by public voice, but, he hoped, also by the lady's good will and affection. The idea that such a thing should ever have been thought possible, frightened the good old lady into a fit of sickness, from which she only recovered in order to take flight, fearing to tell, even her friends, of the cause of her departure. On settling her accounts, it appeared that Monsieur le Marquis had not only dined in the servants'-hall every day when she herself happened to be out, but that he had breakfasted there regularly—the servants having all been of his own providing. He also received a certain commission from all the tradespeople. Well this man is now one of the leading dandies in Florence; and was courted, even in the first circles in London, when he came over, as the world said, in search of an English heiress.

Another English lady of a certain age, possessing a fortune of two or three hundred a-year, came out to visit relations in Florence. Pour passer le temps, she joined the younger branches of the family in taking Italian lessons from a gallant who taught both love and language; indeed he taught the former branch of useful knowledge so well, that he persuaded the lady in question to elope with him from the house of her relatives. Italians are gay deceivers; but they deceive for money, and not for love; he therefore married the lady in order to get possession of her fortune, and then left her immediately. She hardly ever saw him afterwards, nor would he contribute one farthing to her support; on the contrary, she was grossly insulted by his family for withholding from them, as they said, her large fortune, in order that she might bestow it on her English relations. Charity enabled her to return to England, where she now gains her bread by teaching the language the learning of which caused her ruin.

THE DRUNKARD AND HIS BOTTLE.

Sober. Touch thee! No. Viper of vengeance!
I'll break thy head against the wall.
Did you not promise?—ay—
To make me strong as Sampson—
And rich—rich as Croesus—
(I'll wring thy villainous neck,)
And wise—wise as Solomon,
And happier than the happiest!
But instead of this—villain!
You've stripped me of my locks—
Left my pocket empty as a cuckoo's nest
In March—fooled me out of all my senses—
Made me ragged—made me wretched,
And then laid me in a ditch!
Touch thee! sure as there's vengeance
In this fist, I'll scar the moon
With thy broken skull!

Marriage.—A man should marry by all means, yet I am convinced that the greater part of marriages are unhappy; and this is not an opinion which I give as coming from myself, it is that of a very excellent, agreeable, and sensible lady, who married the man of her choice, and not encountered, ostensibly, any very great misfortune, as loss of health, riches, children, &c. She told me this unreservedly, and I had never any reason to doubt her sincerity. For all this, I am convinced a man cannot be truly happy without a wife. It is a strange state of things we live in; a tendency so natural as that of the union of the sexes ought to lead only to the most harmonious results; yet the reverse is the fact; there is certainly something wrong in the constitution of society; the times are out of joint. It is strange, too, what little real liberty of choice is exercised by those even who marry according to what is considered their own inclinations. Doctor Johnson once proposed to have all matches made by the Lord Chancellor, affirming that the amount of happiness would be as great as is produced by the actual system. I believe him. The deceptions which the two sexes practice on each other brings into the Temple of Hymen as many ill assorted couples as could be joined by the arbitrary pairings of a legal matchmaker. Many a man thinks he marries from choice, who only marries by accident. In this respect men have less the advantage of women than is generally supposed.—Lord Byron's Conversations.

ADVICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

The education of young ladies has undergone an infinite number of changes. For a long period, nothing was thought of but teaching them dancing, music and painting, without paying the smallest attention to the cultivation of their minds. After spending twelve years in teaching to dress elegantly, to dance gracefully, to sing and to play on musical instruments in the most dashing manner, they were married from motives of ambition, or suitableness of rank and fortune, and were then pushed forward into the world with this grave advice:—"Go, be modest and unaffected; let your inclinations be always sound and moderate; never fascinate any one—it would be a crime; and above all things, be always insensible to the praise you may receive for your personal beauty and accomplishments." One may easily conceive the effect of such advice on a young lady of sixteen, who during the intervals of her occupations, has never been able to think of anything but the happiness and the glory of obtaining the distinguished success at a ball or a concert.

The Flying Parson.—In the first village we occupied, (Mortigo,) the only character worthy of note was a most active half-starved curate, whose duty it was to marry and to bury every body within a wide range, besides performing the usual services in sundry chapels in that and the adjoining villages. He was so constant at a gallop on horseback in pursuit of his avocations that we dubbed him the Padre volante.—(the flying parson.) We did there, as in all Spanish villages the moment we took possession, levelled the ground at the end of the church, and, with wooden bats cut out in the shape of rackets, got up something like an apology for that active and delightful game.—Our greatest enjoyment there was to catch the Padre in one of his leisure moments and to get him to join in the amusement, of which he was remarkably fond, and he was no sooner enlisted than it became the malicious aim of every one to send the ball against his flank ribs. Whenever he saw that it was done intentionally, however, he made no hesitation in shying his bat at the offender; but he was a good-natured soul, as were also his tormentors, so that every thing passed off as was intended. The Padre, in addition to his other accomplishments, was a sportsman, and, as he was possessed of a pointer dog, (a companion which, as we had more mouths than food, we were obliged to deny ourselves,) his company in the field on that account was in great request; whatever his feats might have been there, however, he generally came off but second best. I remember that two of our gentlemen accompanied him the first day, and, when they sprung the covey, the Padre's bird, out of the three shots, was the only one that came to the ground, but, notwithstanding, one of the officers immediately ran up and very coolly placed it in his own bag. The Padre ran up too, and stood gaping open-mouthed thinking he had pocketed the bird in joke; however, the other went on deliberately loading as if all had been right. Meanwhile, the other officer coming up, said, "Why, S., that was not your bird, it is the Padre's!" "My dear sir," he replied, "I know it is not my bird, but do you suppose that I would allow a fellow like that to think that he had killed a bird! My good sir, I would not allow him to suppose for one moment that he had fired at it!"—Kincaid's Random Shots.

From the Saturday Evening Post.
MY LADY LOVE.

Come lady, love, the flowing tide
Returns to bear our bark away,
Come, let us o'er its bosom glide,
And through yon fertile woodland stray.

The stars beam from their vaulted dome,
And glitter in the glassy wave,
The wandering night-bird leaves her home,
And seeks the pebbled shore to lave.

The mountain-breeze from off the height
Surcharged with fragrance rich and free,
Waits ambient through the silent night
And spreads an incense o'er the sea!

The moonlit-spire gleams in the air
The green-topped pine ascends in pride,
The arching cypress clusters there,
And sweetly flows the evening tide.

Come dearest to the pearly strand
Our bark's impatient to be gone,
Come, let us to yon fairy land,
And sport upon its dewy lawn.

We'll wander through its spicy grove,
Where grapes in clusters strew the ground,
Where, though the parting trees above
The hallowed moonbeams play around.

Yes! where the wild-flowers thickly spread
Their blushing petals to the gaze,
There we will haste with lightsome tread,
And follow through each winding maze.

Will watch the glorious orb of night,
That upward mounts the spacious sky,
The twinkling stars that shed their light,
And shine refulgent from on high.

And when we see them each depart
Amid the hills that crown the west,
I'll clasp thee, dearest, to my heart,
And one fond kiss shall seal our rest.

Come lady, love, the swelling gale
Floats onward with that rising star,
Come let us up yon distant vale,
And o'er the bright blue lake afar. E. B. G.

LIFE IN ARKANSAS.

BY ALBERT PIKE.

 I left Crawford county in July, 1833, and travelled down the river some forty miles, to the country of Pope, where I intended to take up (as they say here) a school. After travelling over a fine, rolling, upland country, I descended into the bottom of a creek called Little Piney, nine miles from the river—and came at once upon a small log house. I stopped to take a survey before entering; for I had been directed to the settler who lived there. It was like most other settlements in this country. A field of about forty acres was under cultivation,—filled with huge blackened trunks, gigantic skeletons of trees, throwing their bare, withered, sapless branches forth as though a whirlwind had been among them with its crashing destruction. About the house were a number of peach trees, scattered about with very little regard to regularity. The house itself was roughly built of logs, and in front was a shelter made of poles, covered with green branches. The owner of the clearing was sitting in front, dressed throughout in leather, and playing lustily on the fiddle. Hearing that sound, I judged there would be no churlishness in his disposition, and I marched boldly up. He greeted me heartily, and without any attempt at politeness, and in two minutes we were on the best terms in the world. He, too, had been at Santa Fe, and, as old travellers over the prairie, we had a claim upon one another's kindness. The heart naturally warms to one who has been through the same scenes of danger, difficulty, and privation, as yourself.

With deference to those respectable gentlemen of former ages, called troubadours, romancers, et cetera, I incline to believe that the best and most gallant knights of olden time were much such men as the old and stalwart backwoodsmen. The same bold, brave, and careless demeanour—the same contempt of danger and recklessness of the finer courtesies and sympathies of life—the same fighting, revelling, carousing, and heedless disposition—the same blunt and unpolished manners exist in the latter which are recorded to have belonged to the former. My present host was one of the purest specimens of the bone and sinew of the West. Tall and athletic, he would hardly have feared a death-grapple with a bear. His frame was close knit, muscular, and well-proportioned. He combined the activity of the panther, the strength of the lion, with much of the silent, quick, and stealthy movements of the Indian. He had been a journeyer over deserts and mountains, and a soldier at the battle of New Orleans. Of course he was an excellent Jackson man.

My object being, as I said before, to get a school, I opened the subject to my host, and inquired what might be the prospect? "Why," said he, "if you would set in, right straight, I reckon thar' might be a right smart chance of scholars gittin', as we have had no teacher here for the best end of two years. Thar's about fifteen families on the creek, and the whole tote of 'em well fixed for children. They want a school-master pretty much, too. We got a teacher about six months ago—a Scotchman, or an Irishman, I think. He took up for six months, and carried his proposals round, and he got twenty scholars directly. It weren't long, though, before he cut up some ferocious, and got into a priminary; and so one morning he was found among the missing."

"What was the trouble?"
"Oh! he took too much of the essence of corn, and got into a chuck of a light—no great matter, to be sure; but he got whipped, and had to leave the diggings."

"And how am I to manage to get a school?"

"I'll tell you. You must make out your proposals to take up school; tell them how much you ask a month, and what you can teach; and write it out as fine as you can, (I reckon you're a pretty good scribe) and in the morning there's to be a shooting-match here for beef; nearly all the settlement, (laying the accent on the last syllable) "will be here, and you'll get signers enough."

I followed his advice. The neighbours gathered in the next morning; I was duly introduced to them, and soon had twenty scholars subscribed. Reader, didst ever see a shooting-match in the West? I dare swear you never have, and therefore there may be no tediousness in a description of one. I hate your set descriptions; laid out, formally, in squares and parallelograms, like an old fashioned garden, wherein art hath not so far advanced as to seem like nature. You can just imagine the scene to yourself. Conceive yourself in a forest, where the huge trees have been for ages untouched by the axe. Imagine some twenty men—tall, stalwart, browned hunters—equipped in leather, with their broad knives by their sides, rifles in hand, and every man with his smoke-blackened board in his hand. The rivals in the first contest were eight sturdy fellows, middle-aged and young men. The ox for which they were to shoot was on the ground, and it was to be the best six shots out of eleven. The four quarters, and the hide and tallow, were the five prizes; they were to shoot off-hand at forty yards, or with a rest at sixty, which is considered the same thing. Two judges were chosen, and then a blackened board, with a bit of paper on it about an inch and a half square, was put up against a tree. "Clare the track!" cried the first marksman, who lay on the ground at his distance of sixty yards, with his gun resting over a log. The rifle cracked, and the bullet cut into the paper. "Put up my board," cried another—"John shade my sight for me!" and John held his hat over the sight of the gun. It cracked, and the bullet went within half an inch of the centre. "My board!" cried another; "I'll give that shot goos!" and he did; fairly boring the centre with the ball. The sport soon became exciting. It requires great steadiness of nerve to shoot well, for any irregularity in breathing will throw the bullet wide of the mark. The contest was longer than I had anticipated; but it was decided without quarrel or dispute. The judges decided, and their decision was implicitly obeyed. The whole eleven shots of one man, who won two quarters, could be covered with a half dollar. You have made a show of Davy Crockett; but there are thousands of men in the West who are better marksmen, better bear-hunters, and every whit as smart as Davy himself.

Speaking of him, however, reminds me of an anecdote of him, which may, perhaps, be contained in his autobiography; if not, it is too good to be lost, for it does him more honour than the fact that he has been in Congress. Before he was a candidate, or had any idea of being one, there was a season of scarcity in the Western District, where he lived. He went up the Mississippi, and bought a flatboat load of corn, and took it to what he calls his "old stamping ground." When a man came to him to buy corn, the first question he asked was—"Have you got the money to pay for it?" If the answer was in the affirmative, Davy's reply was, "Then you can't have a kernel. I brought it here to sell to people who have no money." It was the foundation of his popularity.

We naturally slip from the sublime to the ridiculous. Let us leave Crockett and come to school-keeping. My school-house was a small log house, with a fireplace the width of one end—no floor—no boarding or weather-boarding—a hole for a window, and one for a door. In that place I taught a collection of urchins two months, and then was taken possession of by the fever and ague, which lasted me another month, and ended my school-keeping in this mortal life. I was to get my pay, half in money and half in pigs; and I managed to get three dollars of the former, and omitted to say any thing of the quadrupeds. That made four and a half months, during which I had laboured at mine office and vocation. For the first six weeks I got just enough to pay my board; and for the last school, as I said before, three dollars. How many pigs I may have at this day in Pope county, it is impossible for me to tell. However, while I was employed in this thankless office, I wrote "hapes" (as my predecessor in the school would have said) of poetry, part of which I have since published in a book. If it did not make me famous, it ought to have done it; for it was all I got for my three or four months' hard work.

WITCHCRAFT IN NEW ENGLAND.

As a story of witchcraft, without any poetry in it, without anything to amuse the imagination, or interest the fancy, but hard, prosy, accompanied with all that is wretched, pitiful, and withering, perhaps the well known story of New England witchcraft surpasses any thing else upon record.

The prosecutions continued with little intermission, principally at Salem, during the greater part of the year, 1692. The accusations were of the most vulgar and contemptible sort,—invisible pinchings and blows; fits, with the blasting and mortality of cattle; and wains stuck fast in the ground or losing their wheels. A conspicuous figure in nearly the whole of these stories was what they named the "spectral sight," in other words, that the profligate accusers first leigned for the most part of the injuries they received, and next saw the figures and action of the persons who inflicted them when they were invisible to every one else. Hence, the miserable prosecutors gained the power of gratifying the wantonness of their malice, by pretending that they suffered by the hand of any one whose name first presented itself, or against whom they bore an ill will. The persons so charged, though unseen by any but the accuser, and who in their corporal presence were at a distance of many miles, and were doubtless wholly unconscious of the mischief that was hatching against them, were immediately taken up and cast into prison. And what was more monstrous and incredible, there stood at the bar a prisoner on trial for his life, while the witnesses were permitted to swear that his spectre had haunted them and afflicted them with all manner of injuries. The poor prosecuted wretch stood astonished at what was alleged against him, was utterly overwhelmed with the charges and knew not what to answer, was all of it interpreted as so many presumptions of his guilt. Ignorant as they were, they were unhappily and unskilful in their defence; and if they spoke of the devil, as it was natural, it was instantly caught at as a proof how familiar they were with the fiend that had seduced them to her damnation.

The first specimen of this sort of accusation in the present instance was given by one Paris, minister of a church at Salem, in the end of the year 1691, who had two daughters, one nine years old, the other eleven that were afflicted with fits and convulsions. The first person fixed on as the mysterious author of what was seen, was Tituba, a female in the family, and she was harassed by her master into a confession of unlawful practices and spells. The girls then fixed on Sarah Good, a female known to be the victim of a morbid melancholy, and Osborne, a poor man that had for a considerable time been bed-ridden, as persons whose spectres had perpetually haunted and tormented them: and Good was twelve months after hanged on this accusation.

A person who was one of the first to fall under the imputation, was one George Burroughs, also a minister at Salem. He had, it seems, buried two wives, both of whom the busy gossips said he had used ill in their life time, and consequently it was whispered that he had murdered them. This man was accustomed foolishly to vaunt that he knew what people said of him in his absence; and this was brought as a proof that he dealt with the devil. Two women, who were witnesses against him, interrupted their testimony with exclaiming that they saw the ghosts of the murdered wives present (who had promised them they would come,) though no one else in the court saw them; and this was taken in evidence. Burroughs conducted himself in a very injudicious way on his trial; but when he came to be hanged, made so impressive a speech on the ladder with protestations of innocence, as melted many of the spectators into tears.

In such a town as Salem, the second in point of importance in the colony, such accusations spread with wonderful rapidity. Many were seized with fits, exhibited frightful contortions of their limbs and features and became a fearful spectacle to the bystander. They were asked to assign the cause of all this, and they supposed or pretended to suppose, some neighbor, already solitary and afflicted, and on that account in ill odour with the townspeople, scowling upon them, threatening and tormenting them. Presently, persons, specially gifted with the "special sight," formed a class by themselves, and were sent about at the public expense from place to place, that they might see what no one else could see. The prisons were filled with persons accused. The utmost horror was entertained, as of a calamity which in such a degree had never visited that part of the world. It happened, most unfortunately, that Baxter's Certainty of the World of Spirits had been published but the year before, a number of copies had been sent out to New England.—There seemed a strange coincidence and sympathy between vital christianity in its most honorable sense, and the fear of the devil, who appeared to be "come down unto them with great wrath." Mr. Increase Vailther and Mr. Cotton Mather, his son, two clergymen of highest reputation in their neighborhood, by the solemnity and awe with which they treated the subject, and the earnestness and zeal which they displayed, gave a sanction to the lowest superstition and virulence of the ignorant.

All the forms of justice were brought forward on this occasion. There was no lack of judges and grand juries, and petty juries, and executioners and still less of prosecutors and witnesses. The first person that was hanged was on the 10th of June; five more on the nineteenth of July; five on the nineteenth of August; and eight on the twenty-second of September. Multitudes confessed that they were witches, for this appeared the only way for the accused to save their lives. Husbands and children fell down on their knees and implored their wives and mothers to own their guilt. Many were tortured by being tied neck and heels together till they confessed what was suggested to them. It is remarkable, however, that no one persisted in her confession at the place of execution.

The most interesting story that occurred in this affair was that of Giles Cory and Martha his wife. The woman was tried on the 9th of September, and hanged on the 22d. In the interval, on the 16th, the husband was brought up for trial. He said he was not guilty; but being asked how he would be tried, he refused to go through the customary form, and say, "By God and my country." He observed that of all that had been tried, not one had as yet been pronounced not guilty; and he resolutely refused in that mode to undergo a trial. The judge directed, therefore, that, according to the barbarous mode prescribed in the mother country, he should be laid on his back, and pressed to death with weights gradually accumulated on the upper surface of his body, a proceeding which had never yet been resorted to by the English in North America. The man persisted in his resolution, and remained mute till he expired.

The whole of this dreadful tragedy was kept together by a thread. The spectre seers for a considerable time prudently restricted their accusations to persons of ill repute, or otherwise of no consequence in the community. By-and-by, however, they lost sight of this caution, and pretended they saw the figures of some person well connected, and of unquestioned honor and reputation, engaged in acts of witchcraft.—Immediately the whole fell through in a moment.—The leading inhabitants presently saw how unsafe it would be to trust their reputation and their lives to the mercy of these profligate accusers. Of fifty-six bills of indictment that were offered to the grand jury on the third of January, 1693, twenty-six only were found true bills and thirty thrown out. On the twenty-six bills that were found, three persons only were pronounced guilty by the petty jury, and these three received their pardon from the government. The prisons were thrown open; fifty confessed witches, together with two hundred persons imprisoned on suspicion, were set at liberty, and no more accusations were heard of. The "afflicted," as they were technically termed, recovered their health; the "spectral sight" was universally scouted; and men began to wonder how they could ever have been the victims of so horrible a delusion.

THE WIFE'S FIRST LOVE.

"I pray you play on this pipe—Hamlet."

Adelheid, hearing her husband's approaching footsteps, hastened to extinguish the little taper that was burning on the table, and adjusting her collar and collar before the mirror, unlocked the door of the boudoir, and went forth to meet him with an unembarrassed air. "Comment! ma belle Hermite, toujours au boudoir! I was looking for you at the Tuileries this very day. Truly, my incomparable, I shall begin to grow jealous of that crimson fautuil, whose arms encircle you so often." As De Morier playfully spoke thus, he drew his Adelheid affectionately towards him, but she complained of a slight indisposition, averted her face, and withdrawing herself from his clasp, pointed his attention to some passing object in the street, and began to talk of their projected tour to Fontainebleau.

Adelheid Eichrodt was a young and lovely Berlin-ese, who, at the age of seventeen, had been introduced to the Count de Morier, a Frenchman of family and distinction. He became deeply enamored of her beauty and simplicity. The offer of his hand was graciously accepted, and he brought her in triumph to his hotel in the Faubourg St. Germain; where notwithstanding the little dissensions, that a difference of national tastes and prejudices is apt to occasion, they lived in the very plenitude and perfection of conjugal concord.

They had been married about a year and a half, when De Morier fancied he observed an alteration in his wife's habits and manners. It appeared to him that his adored Adelheid was becoming less frank and confiding towards him; she was reserved, dis-
There was an air of mystery in her proceedings. In fact, it was evident that she had some secret with which she was sedulously desirous he should remain unacquainted. He was constantly in the habit of finding scraps of paper scattered about the floor, for the appearance of which she accounted in various unsatisfactory ways. He more than once surprised her in whispered conference with old Karl, a German domestic, who, having lived in her father's service since the period of Adelheid's infancy, had on the event of her marriage requested to be allowed to accompany his young mistress to Paris. On his approach they would suddenly separate, and, as it seemed to him, in something of confusion. He had also on one occasion been exceedingly perplexed and mortified, by overhearing two ladies in society, after extolling the undeniable beauty and grace, and affability of Madame de Morier, make an exception to her prejudice, (the "particulars" did not reach his ear) which was immediately followed by an exclamation of "Mon Dieu! ce ne pas possible—une bete, un monstre affreux degoutant." He was not quite sure that the epithets were applied to his wife, but he more than suspected they were. It was not long after, that, on entering her apartment unexpectedly, he saw her rush towards the open window, and dash something to the ground. "Bah, bah! Adelheid, why surely I have entered Houbjant's fabrique, in mistake for my own hotel! Essence de Millefleurs! Attur du Rose! What are all these scents that you are scattering about the room? You will suffocate me with your many sweets. I have often told you of my aversion to strong perfumes."

The suspicious husband having observed Madame, in one of her late mystic meetings with the old steward, confide a large purse of gold to his possession, hastily quitted the room, full of vague apprehensions and surmises, and lully resolved to take an early opportunity of satisfying himself in what manner his wife was in the habit of employing the intervals of his absence from home, which, owing to a pending law suit, had become of late very frequent and protracted. Yet he loved and respected her too much to distress her with open and direct inquiries on the subject of her visible confusion. Accordingly on the day following this little busquerie, he took occasion during breakfast, to signify that he was engaged out on business for the whole of the day, and should probably be detained until the evening of the morrow. Not long, however, after the usual hour of dinner, he made his appearance: the old steward opened the door.

"What Karl! as I left you in the morning I find you in the evening—tojours la pipe! Always smoking! Is Madame at home?"—"Non, Monsieur, non."—"No! I think you are mistaken Karl; I am nearly positive that I saw her close the jalouse of her boudoir this moment in a white dress gown. Is she alone?"—"Yes, Sir—alone Sir! to be sure she's alone—at least, that is—I will tell her you are come, and—"—"I thank you, I can inform her myself."—"Why no; that is—just if you please, sir to allow me—may be she might be engaged, or—"—"Engaged! how, what, with whom?"—"Oh, with nobody, Sir."—"Let me pass old man, what does this mean?"—"Nothing Sir, but if you would only now—do, Sir only just wait a moment that I may tell my lady, Sir, she will be so frightened—you will be so angry."—"Angry, yes, I am angry at your unaccountable detention of me. In truth I do begin to have some evil surmises and suspicions. Hear me Karl—tell me all you know of your lady—why does she speak to you in whispers—give you gold?"

The old steward trembled. "Oh, pray don't ask me, Sir; I can't tell you, my lady is a sweet and beautiful angel; but it is certainly lamentable that she should be so fond of that great long—"

The Count trembled in turn. "What! Who? What is my wife fond of—"

Only a little, Sir; sometimes by way of recreation she does not often, and they do say people's inclinations are not in their power."

The Count's brain instantly took fire. Imagination mastered reason; yet he adopted a reasonable course in resolutely shaking the old man from his hold, and striding swiftly and silently along the range of rooms that led to his Adelheid's apartment. In a state of considerable excitement, he pushed open the boudoir door with vehemence, but stood transfixed on the threshold at the spectacle that presented itself to his view.

His young and lovely wife was reclining listlessly in the large arm chair, her foot reposing on a low foot-stool, her elbow resting on a small table at her side, while her delicate hand sustained an enormous chibouque, from which she was puffing clouds of fragrant incense.

His astonishment soon relaxed into immoderate laughter. "So, so, my fair Mussulman, I've caught you at last—now the secret's out, and the mystery, like most other mysteries, ends in smoke. That Jesuitical old Karl, too, to conspire against me. Truth, Adelheid, I don't know that I ever saw you look so graceful, charming, more eminently lovely. Nay, don't pout and blush and cry, and throw down that most magnificent chibouque so disdainfully; I'll buy it of you, mignon; will you sell it to me, eh?" and throwing his arms around her, he hid her tears of mortification in his bosom. "And now, my sweet wife," resumed De Morier, as Adelheid released herself from his lengthened embrace; "we will put away this pretty toy, if you please, until we go back to Berlin. Custom here is everything. Now, the Parisian ladies are not yet accustomed—that is, not yet the fashion here, in short, my love, the Parisian ladies don't smoke."—London Court Journal. CAMILLA.

A MAN AND TIGER COMBAT.

The next scene was of a far more awful character. A man entered the arena armed only with a Coorg knife, and clothed in short trousers, which barely covered his hips, and extended half way down the thighs. The instrument which he wielded in his right hand was a heavy blade, something like the coulter of a plough, about two feet long, and full three inches wide, gradually diminishing towards the handle, with which it formed a right-angle. This knife is used with great dexterity by the Coorgs; being swung round in the hand before the blow is inflicted, and then brought into contact with the object intended to be struck with a force and effect truly astounding.

The champion who now presented himself before the rajah was about to be opposed to a tiger, which he volunteered to encounter almost naked, and armed only with the weapon I have just described. He was rather tall, with a slight figure, but his chest was deep, his arms long and muscular. His legs were thin, yet the action of the muscles were perceptible with every movement; whilst the freedom of his gait and the few contortions he performed, preparatory to the hazardous enterprise with which he was about to engage, showed that he possessed uncommon activity, combined with no ordinary degree of strength. The expression of his countenance was absolutely sublime when he gave the signal for the tiger to be let loose; it was the very concentration of moral energy, the index of a high and settled resolution. His body glistened with the oil which had been rubbed over it in order to promote the elasticity of his limbs. He raised his arms for several moments above his head when he made the motion to admit his enemy into the arena. The bars of a large cage were instantly lifted from above; a huge royal tiger sprang forward and stood before the Coorg, waving his tail slowly backward and forward, erecting the hair upon it, and uttering a suppressed howl. The animal first looked at the man, then at the gallery where the rajah and his court were seated to see the sports, but did not appear at all easy in its present state of freedom; it was evidently confounded at the novelty of his position. After a short survey, it turned suddenly round and bounded into its cage; from which the keeper who stood above beyond the reach of mischief, tried to force it but in vain. The bars were then dropped, and several crackers fastened to its tail, which projected through one of the intervals.

A lighted match was put into the hand of the Coorg, the bars were again raised, and the crackers ignited. The tiger now darted into the arena with a terrible yell; and while the crackers were exploding, it leaped, tamed, and writhed, as if in a state of frantic excitement. It at length crouched in a corner, snarling as a cat does when alarmed. Meanwhile its retreat had been cut off by securing the cage. During the explosions of the crackers, the Coorg stood watching his enemy, and at length advancing towards it with a slow but firm step. The tiger roused and retreated, the fur on its back being erect, and its tail apparently dilated to twice the usual size. It was not at all disposed to commence hostilities, but its resolute foe was not to be evaded. Fixing his eyes intently upon the deadly creature, he advanced with the same measured step, the tiger retreating as before, but still presenting its front to its enemy. The Coorg now stopped suddenly; then moving slowly backward, the tiger raised itself to its full height, curved its back to the necessary segment for a spring, and lashed his tail, evidently meditating mischief. The man continued to retire; and so soon as he was at so great a distance that the fixed expression of his eye was no longer distinguishable, the ferocious brute made a sudden bound forward, crouched, and sprang with a short, sharp growl. Its adversary, fully prepared for this, leaped actively on one side and as the tiger reached the ground, swung round his heavy knife, and brought it with irresistible force upon the animal's hind leg, just above the joint. The bone was instantly severed, and the tiger effectually prevented from making a second spring. The wounded beast roared; but turning suddenly upon the Coorg, who had by this time retired several yards, advanced fiercely upon him, his wounded leg hanging loose in the skin, showing that it was broken. The tiger, now excited to a pitch of reckless rage, rushed forward upon its three legs towards its adversary who stood with his heavy knife upraised, calmly awaiting the encounter. As soon as the savage creature was within his reach, he brought down the ponderous weapon upon his head, with a force which nothing could resist, laid open the skull from ear to ear, and the vanquished foe fell dead at his feet. He then coolly wiped the knife on the animal's hide, made a dignified salutation to the rajah, and retired amid the loud acclamations of the spectators.

DOG ANECDOTE.—Like most little dogs, Rover had a great soul, yet, as must have been expected, he was no match for the generality of his species. But what he wanted in physical strength, he made up for in policy. He wisely employed a portion of his riches in subsidizing his poorer but stronger neighbour; and thus acquired a weight and an importance among his own race in the village to which he could not otherwise lay claim. In plain language, Rover kept a dog in pay to fight his battles for him. This I discovered, by observing, that, whenever he got a bone which he could not compass, he immediately hid it, and then went off in search of the baker's mastiff, whose more potent jaws soon demolished the provision. This I at first set down to generosity, or a natural love of patronage; till I ascertained the true motive, by observing that, whenever he was attacked by a larger dog than himself, he forthwith set off in search of his Swiss, the said mastiff, to whom he delegated the office of thrashing his opponents.—Blackiston's Twenty Years in Retirement.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

My Married Daughter could you see.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAILY.

My married daughter could you see,
I'm sure you would be struck;—
My daughters all are charming girls;
Few mothers have such luck.
My married one—my eldest child—
All hearts by magic wins;
And my second so resembles her,
Most people think them twins!

My married daughter spoils her spouse,—
She's quite a pattern wife;
And he adores her—well he may—
Few men lead such a life!
She ne'er had married mortal man
Till he had won her heart;
And my second darling's just the same,—
They're seldom known apart.

Her husband oft has press'd my hand,
While tears were in his eyes,
And said, "You brought my Susan up—
With you the credit lies."
To make her a domestic wife,
I own was all my aim;
And my second is domestic too,—
My system was the same.

Now do you know, I've often thought
The eldest of the two
(She's married, so I may speak out)
Would just have suited you!
You never saw her?—how shall I
My eldest girl portray?
Oh! my second is her counterpart,
And her you'll meet to-day.

A Puritan preacher was one day struck with surprise on beholding a beautiful set of curls on the head of a lovely maid, and a member of his class, whose hair had been usually very plain. "Ah! Eliza," said he, "you should not waste your precious time curling your hair; if God intended it to be curled, he would have curled it for you." "Indeed," said the witty maid, "I must differ with you. When I was an infant, he curled it for me, but now that I am grown up, he thinks I am able to do so myself."

IDLENESS.—Burton in his 'Anatomy of Melancholy,' describes idleness as being 'the cushion upon which the devil reposes.' Dr. Johnson designated it as the 'rust of the soul.'

EXTREMELY POLITE.—A young widow of very polite address, whose husband had lately died, was visited soon after by the minister of the parish, who inquired as usual about her husband's health, when she replied, with a peculiar smile, "He is dead, I thank you."

"Milk is so dear," exclaimed a young widow to her milkman, for the twentieth time at least; "I wish I could afford to keep a cow of my own." "Wouldn't it be cheaper, ma," replied her little daughter, archly, "to keep a milkman of your own?"

THE VERY LAST.—"Grandmam," said an urchin to his father's mother, the other day, living somewhere in Worcester. "Grandmam, the Railroad is coming through our town." "Is it, 'Siah," said the venerable dame. "Well, I hope it will come through by daylight, for I long to see one terribly."

THE DUBLIN AUDIENCE.—The visitors of the galleries in the Dublin, and indeed all the Irish theatres, differ in conduct from the natives of any other country. They single out individuals whom they know in pit or boxes, and keep up a fire of interrogatories by no means pleasant and not always decorous. On one occasion a Mr. C—, a wine merchant, about whom some delicate affair was then murmured, was in the pit: a lad in the gallery began to enquire of Mr. C—, "How's Mrs. So-and-so, Mr. C—? Why wouldn't you bring her along wid you, Mr. C—?" &c. &c. Mr. C—bore this for some time with great good humor, but at last rose, and said, "As the gentleman wishes to have a chat with me, will some of ye just throw him over to the pit, and then we shall be able to converse at our ease?" On another occasion when there was a cry of "sit down in front," a gentleman at the back of the gallery immediately replied, "Wid all my heart; only let me get there, I'll sit down fast enough." When Tom Cooke was leader of the band, they used to call him whenever any body in the course of the scene had to make love to Mrs. Cooke, (who played the chambermaids,) and a song of, "when I'm a widow," was commonly honored with double encore, that the gods might reiterate again and again, "d'ye hear to that, Tom Cooke?" I am speaking of Dublin theatres twenty years since, when they were, if they took to an actor, the most liberal auditors in the world; but woe betide the unhappy wight to whom they did not take.—New Monthly Magazine.

ANECDOTE.—At the opening of a small canal in an obscure country town, the squire of the village delivered a speech, and a large party assembled at the village inn to partake of a collation. After the cloth was removed the company called for something to wash down the toasts. Flash, the landlord, immediately appeared—"Gentlemen," said he, making a respectful bow, "I have some good wine—some excellent wine, gentlemen—and more than twenty barrels of prime cider, the best you ever tasted gentlemen—will you have some cider?—The company applied in the affirmative. "Well, gentlemen, you can have it—and good cider it is too, I can assure you. Here Johnny, take the pitoher and draw the gentlemen some of our best cider—d'ye hear? draw it from the fourth barrel on the left side in the arch, Johnny." The boy started for the cellar with a pitoher in one hand and a candle in the other. In about ten minutes Johnny came posting back without the pitcher, bellowing like a good fellow. "Oh Johnny," said Boniface, "what's the matter of ye?" Oh! daddy, daddy," exclaimed he, with a pathetic grunt, "I've tipped over the great jug and spilt all the cider!"

Anecdote of a Turtle.—A British officer, on board of a ship which touched at the island of Ascension on her way to England, informed me that they took in several large turtles, and amongst others, one which from some accident had only three fins. The sailors on board called it "Lord Nelson," and it was marked in the usual way; by having certain initials and number burnt upon its under shell with a hot iron, which marks are never to be obliterated. Owing to various causes the ship was delayed on her voyage, many of the turtles died, and others became sickly. This was the case of Lord Nelson, and it was so near death when the ship arrived in the British Channel, that the sailors threw it overboard, in order, as they said, to give it a chance. Its native element, however, appears to have revived it; for two years afterwards the very same turtle was again found at its old haunts in the island of Ascension. The proofs brought forward of the accuracy of the statement places the fact beyond doubt, and affords a wonderful instance of the instinct of this fish.—English Paper.

ELLISTON AND THE CRYER.—Elliston had several relatives and many friends in the church; visiting one of the latter, who had some occasion to call upon his clerk, who was also the public cryer, Elliston accompanied his friend; the cryer was from home, and whilst the reverend gentleman explained to the good man's wife the purport of his business, Elliston looked over two or three things that had been left to be cried that afternoon, amongst others one was of a dog lost, who, mid his peculiar spots and blemishes, had "sore eyes;" Elliston, allways on the qui vive for a frolic, altered the word "sore" to "four." The cryer came home, took up the several matters, and commenced his duties, enunciating in sonorous tones, "Loss: a black and tan-coloured terrier, answers to the name of Carlo, has two white legs and four eyes." "You scoundrel," cried a traveller, who was the owner of the animal, "how d'ye think I shall ever get my dog if you describe it in that manner?" The cryer protested it was according to copy, and on examination it was evident the paper had been tampered with. Home went the cryer, boiling with indignation; his wife had informed him of the call of his reverend employer, but had said nothing of his companion, and therefore no doubt remained in the official's mind that the clergyman himself had played him the trick. He awaited patiently until Sunday for his revenge, and before he took his seat as clerk, removed the book of St. John from the New Testament. The clergyman gave out the lesson, as the 2nd chapter of St. John, and then began to look in vein for the book in question; at last he whispered to the clerk, "What has become of St. John?" "He can't come," was the reply, "he has got sore eyes."

There is a certain prettiness in the JEU DES MOTS in this little song, about little things, which is amusing.

There was a little maid, and she wore a little bonnet,
And she had a little finger, with a little ring upon it;
And what's a little odd, her little heart was then
In love, but not a little, with the little best of men,

For the little youth had exercised his little flatt'ring tongue,
And down before her little feet his little knees had flung;
He pressed her little hand, and in her little face he gazed,
And looked as though his little head had been a little crazed.

Alas! her little lover did with little warning leave her,
And she found him little better than a little gay deceiver;

Then in a little moment, stifling all her little wishes,
She took a little jump all above the little fishes.

Now all you little maidens whose little loves grow
fonder,
Upon the little moral of this little song may ponder;
Beware of little trinkets, little men, and little sighs,
For you little know what great things from little things may rise.

A little fellow having been sent to church by his mother alone, his father being sick, thought it was a good opportunity to have a morning play. It happened luckily for him to see the people coming from church: he a cordingly hastened home. Soon after his arrival he was asked by his mother what was the text? he replied "and Jonas swallowed a whale three days," his mother supposing he had misunderstood the text, asked him who preached? "Quotha," said Jack, "the preacher, who do you think?"

SMOOTH CIDER.—A friend of ours has just returned from the country where he met with the following adventure. At the house of an old acquaintance, his host was determined that the guest should have the very best the house afforded. Molly, the help, made two trips to the cellar before a bottle of cider from the right corner could be produced—and when the entertainer had poured out a sparkling goblet of it, he stood with "an attent ear" to hear the commendation which he expected would come of course. Disappointed by hearing no spontaneous burst of praise, he inquired—"Aint it good?" "Why—ah yes, but it has a queer flavor, I must acknowledge." "Molly, where did you get the cider?" "Under the arch." "Well, there!" exclaimed the old lady, "if that aint one of the castor oil bottles."

AN ORIENTAL PARADISE.
A Persian's heaven is easily made—
'Tis but black eyes and lemonade.

An itinerating dentist lately called at a house and applied for business. "Don't you want your teeth drawn?" says he to the owner. "No." "Don't your wife?" "No." "None of the children?" "No." Can't you give me some sort of a job?" says the dentist. "Why," says the gentleman, "I have got on old cross cut-saw, the teeth of which are out of order. You can have that job, if you'll fix 'em."

VERY NICE.—The captain beckoned to us the other day across the street—and there was such a quizzical look on his face that we knew he had something new in his 'gourd.' No sooner had we reached his side, than he threw back his head and for two minutes indulged in a soundless laugh. Then his eye twinkled, he threw his rusty broad brim a little back—laid his finger on his nose—caught us by the button, and then began. "Upon my word I've something now, first rate, and true too—it is't often now-a-days that you can double these together. It's a specimen of consolation. There's an old woman in the town of H— whose house caught fire lately, and when the neighbors ran up to help her, the old lady lanted herself right before the door and screamed, 'No, no, them stairs has just been washed—I cleaned them with my own hands, and I aint a goin to have you runnin up and down with your great clumsy feet—I wont so, arter I've scrubbed them myself.' So there she stood and away went the house, and in a little while the fire made prodigious love to it, and carried it pretty much all off. 'Well, well,' said the old woman, 'I do n't believe there's a house in Massachusetts could burn down cleaner than that, for I scrubbed it with my own hands—and that's some consolation!'"—Bos. Galaxy.

FORENSIC WIT.—At the last Gloucester Assizes, whilst Mr. Alexander was busily engaged in the cross-examination of a witness, he was interrupted by one learned brother, on his right, who, addressing the bench, said, "My Lord, I apprehended"—but he in his turn, was assuddenly stopped short in his commentary, by the interruption of another learned friend on Mr. Alexander's left, who began to address the Judge in the same phraseology. "My Lord, I apprehend"—whereupon Mr. Alexander thus drily addressed the Bench—"My Lord, what am I to do? here I stand between two apprehensions—while I seek only for one fact."

HAPPY PUN.—A gentleman who was blessed with a mouth of unusual dimensions was once asked by a friend, if he had a lease of that mouth of his. "No," said the good humouredly rejoined the other, "I have it only from year to year."

PREDICTIONS FOR THE YEAR 1836.

This year will be famous for a thousand wonderful things. From January to December, the days will consist of twenty-four hours each: and there will be such a number of eclipses, that many wise people will be in the dark. There will be fogs in Maine, fires in Constantinople, and a lack of brains in many a fool's head.

South America, this year, will not extend beyond Cape Horn; and the North Pole will be exactly in 90 degrees of latitude. Those who lose money will look sad, and those who are in want of cash when they borrow, will want it more when they come to pay.

Wisdom will cry aloud, but few will regard it.—There will be long speeches in Congress; but, for all that, Lake Superior will not be upset.

Quadrupeds, this year, will go upon four legs, pretty generally; and cow's horns will be crooked. The fate of lottery tickets will be dubious; but whether there be a war with France or not, mortal wounds will be apt to kill, and he that is sick with old age will have a disease harder to cure than the mumps or chin-cough.

The celestial aspects indicate that political parties will not agree for some time to come; but whoever is President, water will run down hill, and ducks will waddle as heretofore.

Cabbages, this year, will be rather round than three-cornered, and carrots will be decidedly red. Coals will be as black as ever; cats will love fish, but hate to wet their feet, and all on account of Halley's comet.

The world, this year, will turn upside down, but not in consequence of the Governor's proclamation. The crop of hay will depend upon the weather; but whether it rains or not, there will be plenty of sand at Cape Cod.

Whoever sells his house to buy moonshine, will hardly get his money's worth. Whoever runs to catch the rainbow, will get out of breath for his pains. For all that, eastern lands may be had for the buying.

Locomotives and auctioneers' tongues will run fast. There will be mortal war between cats and rats, as well as between a dervish and roast turkeys. People will talk about the end of the world, but it is ten to one that the solar system will not run against the dog-star between now and next December.

Sea Serpents, this year, will be hard to catch, and none but a conjurer will be able to get a quart into a pint bottle. Those who have wooden legs, will suffer a little when they freeze their toes. Wigs are expected to be fashionable among the bald, but blind folks will have some difficulty in seeing.

Divers steam-boats will blow up this year, yet it is hardly possible that any southern slang-whanger will be able to set the Mississippi on fire. Apples will ripen about October, sooner or later; but that is all one, provided we have cider enough. Foxes will pay particular attention to poultry; there will be very few old birds taken with chaff, and wild geese will not lay tame eggs.

But, most of all, there will prevail, this year, a horrible epidemic, worse than the cholera, small pox or plague, which there will be no escaping, and for which there will be no cure. The Italians call it poco danaro; the Germans, kein geld; the French, faute d'argent; in this country it goes under various appellations, but it is most commonly known by the name of empty pockets.

"How many kinds of motions are there," said a professor of physics to one of his very bright pupils. "Three, Sir," was the reply. "Three! name them." "The Retrograde, the Progressive, and the stand still motion."

AN ARISTOCRATIC OSTLER.—At the late Doncaster races, an ostler, had one of the small bones of his leg fractured by a kick, and was making sad lamentations during the time the surgeon was setting it to rights.—"Do not make such a fuss about a trifle," said the medicus, "you will be right in a few days."—"Do not think, Doctor," said to the sufferer, "that I should have uttered one word of complaint if the Queen of Trumps, or any real good thorough bred, had broken both my legs in a playful kick; but to have even a small bone broken by a brute of a jackass is really too bad, and more than any respectful ostler can bear without complaining."

BOXIANA.

I hate the very name of box;
It fills me full of fears;
It minds me of the woes I've felt,
Since I was young in years.

They sent me to a Yorkshire school,
Where I had many knocks;
For there my school mates box'd my ears,
Because I could n't box.

I pack'd my box; I pick'd the locks:
And ran away to sea;
And very soon I learnt to box
The compass merrily.

I came ashore—I call'd a coach,
And mounted on the box;
The coach upset against a post,
And gave me dreadful knocks.

I soon got well; in love I fell,
And married Martha Cox;
To please her will, at last I Box Hill,
I took a country box.

I had a pretty garden there,
All border'd round with box;
But ah, alas! there liv'd next door,
A certain Capt. Knox.

He took my wife to see the play;
They had a private box;
I jealous grew, and from that day,
I hated Captain Knox.

I sold my house—I left my wife;
And went to Lawyer Fox,
Who tempted me to seek redress
All from a jury box.

I went to law, whose greedy maw
Soon emptied my strong box;
I lost my suit, and cash to boot,
All through that crafty Fox,

The name of box, I, therefore dread,
I've had so many shocks;
They'll never end,—for when I'm dead,
They'll nail me in a box.

A GOOD CUSTOMER.—A certain runaway couple were recently married at Gretna Green, and the Smith demanded five guineas for his services. "How is this!" said the bridegroom, "the gentleman you last married assured me that he only gave a guinea." "True," said the Smith, "but he was an Irishman, I have married him six times before, he is a customer—you I may never see again."

A gentleman meeting one of his friends who was insolvent, expressed great concern for his embarrassment. "You are mistaken, my dear Sir," was the reply. "Tis not I, 'tis my creditors who are embarrassed."

FEATS OF INDIAN JUGGLERS.—One of the men, taking a large earthen vessel, with a capacious mouth, filled it with water, and turned it upside down, when all the water flowed out; but the moment it was placed with the mouth upwards it always became full. He then emptied it, allowing any one to inspect it who chose. This being done, he desired that one of the party would fill it; his request was obeyed; still, when he reversed the jar, not a drop flowed—and upon turning it, to our astonishment, it was empty. * * I examined the jar carefully when empty, but detected nothing which could lead to a discovery of the mystery. I was allowed to retain and fill it myself; still, upon taking it up, all was void within, yet the ground about it was perfectly dry, so that how the water had disappeared, and where it had been conveyed, were problems which none of us was able to expound. The vessel employed by the jugglers on this occasion was the common earthenware of the country, very roughly made; and in order to convince us that it had not been especially constructed for the purpose of aiding his clever deception, he permitted it to be broken in our presence; the fragments were then handed round for the inspection of his highness and the party present with him. * * The next thing that engaged our attention, was a feat of dexterity altogether astonishing. A woman, the upper part of whose body was entirely uncovered, presented herself to our notice, and taking a bamboo twenty feet high, placed it upright on a flat stone, and then, without any support, climbed to the top of it with surprising activity. Having done this, she stood upon one leg on the point of the bamboo, balancing it all the while. Round her waist she had a girdle, to which was fixed an iron socket: springing from her upright position on the bamboo, she threw herself horizontally forward with such exact precision, that the top of the pole entered the socket of her iron zone, and in this position she spun herself round with a velocity which made me giddy to look at,—the bamboo all the while appearing as if it were supported by some supernatural agency. She turned her legs backwards, till the heels touched her shoulders, and grasping the ankles in her hands, continued her rotations so rapidly, that the outline of her body was entirely lost to the eye, and looked like a revolving ball. Having performed several other feats equally extraordinary, she slid down the elastic shaft, and raising it in the air balanced it upon her chin, then upon her nose, and finally projected it to a distance from her, without the application of her hands. She was an elderly woman, and by no means prepossessing in her person, which, I conclude was the reason that the Rajah, though he applauded her dexterity, did not give her a proof of his liberality. We, however, threw her a few rupees, with which she appeared satisfied.—The Oriental An.

Extracts from Coleridge's Table Talk.

Ghost stories are absurd. Whenever a real ghost appears—by which I mean some man or woman dressed up to frighten another—if the supernatural character of the apparition has been for a moment believed, the effects on the spectator have always been most terrible—convulsion, idiocy, madness, or even death on the spot. Consider the awful descriptions in the Old Testament of the effects of a spiritual presence on the prophets and seers of the Hebrews; the terror, the exceeding great dread, the utter loss of all animal power. But in our common ghost stories, you always find that the seer, after a most appalling apparition, as you are to believe, is quite well the next day. Perhaps he may have a headache; but that is the outside of the effect produced. Alston, a man of genius, and the best painter yet produced by America, when he was in England, told me an anecdote which confirms what I have been saying. It was, I think, in the University of Cambridge, near Boston, that a certain youth took it into his wise head to endeavour to convert a Tom-Pamish companion of his by appearing as a ghost before him. He accordingly dressed him self up in the usual way, having previously extracted the ball from the pistol which always lay near the head of his friend's bed. Upon first awaking; and seeing the apparition, the youth who was to be frightened, A, very coolly looked his companion, the ghost, in the face, and said, "I know you. This is a very good joke; but you see I am not frightened. Now you may vanish!" The ghost stood still. "Come," said A, "that is enough. I shall get angry. Away!" Still the ghost moved not. "By —," ejaculated A, "if you do not in three minutes go away, I'll shoot you." He waited the time, deliberately levelled the pistol, fired, and, with a scream at immobility of the figure, became convulsed, and afterwards died. The very instant he believed it to be a ghost, his human nature fell before it.

"HIGH LIFE BELOW STAIRS."—A comical comedy was enacted in front of the Park Theatre, one night last week, by two gentlemen amateurs, for their own benefit. It seems, that after dining and wineing at the fashionable hotel in Broadway, they dropped in at Sandy Welsh's for oysters and champagne. They supped, and after paying Welsh a low bill, and his chef de cuisine a high compliment, proceeded to wind their way "back again." It was a miserable night, or rather morning, and the rain fell in torrents. Both gentlemen were in high spirits, particularly one of them, as Pat would say. It being pitch dark, of course the street-lamps were not lighted, that convenience being dispensed with by the Corporation, except on bright moonlights, so that the gentlemen were compelled to make their way, as they best might, across the gutters. It was about 4 o'clock in the morning; the rain fell in drops as big as small potatoes, and more of 'em, and our "ancient and most quiet watchmen" had gone to roost. After fording several large streams (not generally laid down in the map of the city) they commenced the passage of what seemed a young Mississippi. The water was up to their knees, and they were ruminating on the fate of Sam Patch, and the value of their life insurances, when "the midnight clock struck sadly on their ears." They halted to learn the hour, while "the gentleman in blue," (not black) marked each stroke of St. Paul's with an expressive stamp in the water. "One!" said he, and splash went his foot. "Two!" another splash, that wet them still more. "Three!" splash again. "Four!" and now they were as wet as drowned rats. At this instant the City Hall bell commenced tolling the hour, but the gentleman not remarking it, continued on "Five!" and resumed his splash. "Six!" splash again. "Seven!" another "heavy wet." "Eight!" The gentleman began to look wild; either the clock was wrong—this was another dark day—or he had drunk too much wine. Before he could make up his mind on which horn of this dilemma to hang a doubt, the bell of St. Paul's commenced ringing for fire, and he presumed he must have been dreaming. It was only eight in the evening by "Shrewsbury clock," he was sure, and he continued his count, making the mud fly right and left, as he kept time with the rapid strokes on the bell. He counted Nine! Ten! Eleven! Twelve! Thirteen! Fourteen!!! When he came to Fourteen, he gave it up. "Well, I'm blamed!" said he, "if this isn't later than ever I knew it!"—Spirit of the Times.

When I see a young man in health attempting to support his dignity with a cane, I think he has a weak spot somewhere, (say in his head, if you please.)

From the National Intelligencer. "POOR TOM"—A REASONABLE TOPER.

Here's to the maiden of bashful fifteen,
Here's to the w dow of fifty;
Here's to the indolent, slovenly queen,
And here's to the housewife that's thrifty.
Widow or lass—let the toast pass—
I warrant that 'twill prove an excuse for the glass.

Old Song.

"My guide hearers! I am muck'le fash'd to learn that unco mome amang ye are fain to pass the great or part o' yere time in that awfu' practice o' dram-drinking. 'Tis the deil's wark, an' ye mauna wark langer for sic a master. Do not I beg o' ye, keep DRAM-DRAMING it a' day lang. A wee sup, when ye first get up i' the morn'—particularly if its cauld—does na harm; and another jist ye sit down to breakfast—that is if ye wad get thereby an appetite—but ye must not be DRAM-DRAMING it a' the day. Weel, betwixt your breakfast and dinner, I suld not forbid ye a halt gill or so, to stay your stomach; but take na mair then, till ye are jist about to sit down to dinner; when ye may take anither without blame; (ye'd muckle better use a quart o' gude maut liquor wi' your dinner.) After dinner ye may toom anither coggie; forbye, it helps digestion; but, do not keep DRAM-DRAMING it a' day. Now, na mair till supper time, unless ye feel low-spirited; then ye may drink a glass or so between times.—Before supper, sup jist aie glass only—no more. After supper, as ye will have nae ither till morning, ye may tink' twa. This advice I gie ye, for general occasion; on meetings o' mirth, as weddings, an' christenings, an' sic like, I suld not haud ye wi' sae tight a bridle; ye may indulge yersels wi' a few extra drams; but, ance for a', let me beg o' you, dinna keep DRAM-DRAMING it a' day an' ilka day."—Scotch Parson's Sermon on Intemperance.

Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty;
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood.

Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
Frosty, but kindly.

As you like it.

"I wonder how," says Toper Tom,
Some folks drink at all seasons;
I never drink, you know, unless—
Unless I have—my reasons.

"When reason dictates, then I take
A glass—it may be, two;
But never drink for drinking-sake,
As many people do.

"When times are dull, and business bad,
Or when you get a letter,
The news in which has made you sad,
Then, take a glass—'twere better.

"My reason's this: a glass, just then—
(I think you'll see its merits:)
Men can't support their troubles when
They are in such low-spirits.

"Well, business mends! and times grow fair;
A letter comes to tell you
Your uncle's dead—you are his heir—
Some windmill has belied you—

"Why, then I drink. Since Fortune gave
All, for which I besought her,
Shall I so scurvily behave
As toast 'good luck!' in water?

"Charlotte my billet-doux returns,
But don't return my passion;
Shall I go hang, or shoot myself,
After the Werter-fashion?

"Reason says, 'No!' (I take a glass—)
My care she does not merit;
(Another glass!) What! hang myself?
No! now I've too much spirit.

"But, haply, she returns my love,
And keeps my billet-doux:
What in such case, would any man,
Who'd any spirit do?

"As over-grief, so ever joy
Bring fever on, believe me;
Water won't do! some wine, here, boy!
I drink, then—to relieve me.

When a man's sick, a bumper then,
We know will ease his pain;
And then he must drink his own 'good health,'
When getting well again.

"Is my 'Play' by the critic damn'd?
Damn'd by his breath mepetic?
'A bottle!' so! It's out: and now
I can damn every critic.

"Oft I've forsworn the 'generous' glass;
As against the constitution?
Reason! ever in the end
Cries 'pshaw! treat Resolution.'

"So, poor Will's dead! it shakes my nerves
So much!—(you'd scarcely think it!)
Well! Heav'n, if any one deserves,
Does that man!—I must drink."

"A son! well, Fred, I give you joy;
"I'm pleas'd to hear the news!"
"Come! drink," says Fred, "health to the boy!"
"I will:—I can't refuse."

"Give me your hand! good bye! but, stay—
One glass! perhaps the last!"
"What! back again! we thought you dead,
Come, boy, here's to the past!"

"I'm sick—I'm faint—the ghost of years,
Ill-used, abus'd, neglected,
Stand round my bed! I have some fears,
I'm weak; I feel dejected.

"Nurse, nurse! that brandy! more! pour more!
Health, wealth, old age, renown!
My fame has been a tavern score—
A foolscap been my crown."

"Poor Tom," thus reason'd jok'd, and drank!
What more is to be told?
Disease—remorse—in youth he sank—
And now, "poor Tom's a-cold."

*Why not?

† This is simply another mode of expressing Burns's idea, in answer to the question which he put to himself, as to how he had passed his life. He says he had "Been stringing blethers up in rhyme,
For fools to sing."

POLITENESS.—No station, rank, or talents can ever excuse a man for neglecting the civilities due from man to man. When Clement XIV. ascended the Papal Chair, the ambassadors of the several states represented at his court waited on his holiness with their congratulations. As they were introduced, and severally bowed, he also bowed, to return the compliment. On this, the master of the ceremonies told his holiness, that he should not have returned the salute. "Oh, I beg your pardon," said he, "I have not been Pope long enough to forget good manners."

LITERARY PORT FOLIO.

MAHMOUD, 2 vols. Harper and Brothers. This is the title of a new novel, purporting to be an autobiography of a Greek, whose life was principally passed amid the bloody scenes of Egypt and the Morea. It is replete with incidents of an exciting nature—such as battles and deadly personal encounters—and affords enough of the horrible to satisfy the most voracious appetite. The author in his preface, declares that the whole of the narrative is a combination of facts, derived from private sources or from personal observation, and that the events detailed, so far from being improbable, constitute the every day picture of eastern life.

We extract the following account of the death of Mohammed, the chief of the Mamlouks, and the master of Mahmoud.

For some days I had not been indifferent to rumours that were afloat, respecting the attack which had been made by myself and others upon the Syrian hadj. Such affairs were of frequent occurrence, particularly among the Arabs, and no notice was taken of them. It appeared, however, that the enmity of a certain faction, ever on the alert to do me some disservice, now directed all its virulence against me, resolved to make this occurrence the means of my destruction.

We had all sworn among ourselves to keep the affair secret: but one of my companions, dissatisfied with his share of the booty, disclosed the affair to those who were ever ready to seek occasion of animosity against me. It was communicated to Murad Bey, and by him carried to Mohammed.

I heard of it one evening, as I returned from an excursion to Yaffa, from my friend Osman, who came hurriedly to my tent, expressed his fears for my personal safety, and urged me to fly instantly—there was yet time: he even offered to bear me company, but I would not hear of such a step. If taken, both of us would fall a prey to Aboodahab's vengeance. I resolved, however, upon immediate flight, and began to select such articles of value as would be necessary to me hereafter.

While thus engaged, a tchaoosh suddenly entered my tent, announcing that he was commanded to bring me before Mohammed. The tchaoosh was my intimate friend, and I said, "Is it even so?"

"It is even so," he replied; "I fear there is no hope for you."

"How came our chief to know of this?" I demanded.

"I need not say more," he replied, "when I tell you that Murad Bey has just been with him. Your name was frequently mentioned during the conference, and I heard sufficient to convince me that you have little mercy to expect at the hands of the scheick-el belled."

"Are there no means of flight?" I said. "My horse is ready, and you have only to walk away."

"Willingly would I assist you," he replied: "but if you cast your eyes without the tent, you will see several of your old enemies, who followed me hither, carelessly standing by, doubtless expecting such will be your object."

I looked out, and found what he stated to be but too correct. Escape was thus cut off, and my fate appeared inevitable. Summoning my resolution, I turned round to Osman, and cheerfully bade him farewell. He fell on my neck, the tears stood in his eyes, but he was unable to give utterance to the feelings raging in his bosom. I hurried to Mohammed's tent. On my way I encountered several of my most implacable foes, whose darkened countenances betrayed a scornful malice, and a sneering triumph, at the calamity which had befallen me. It was a severe trial of my manhood—my pride, however, sustained me, and I moved forward with that carelessness of demeanour which had marked the days of my labour.

Upon reaching Mohammed's tent, I was immediately taken before him. The first glance which I caught of his eye told me what I had to expect. I had witnessed its expression so frequently on former occasions, that it required no great penetration to convince me it boded me no good. His countenance was flushed, more from the effects of a violent fever, with which he had been seized in the morning, than the vehemence of his wrath. At times he gasped for breath; I thought he trembled, when at intervals he sipped the sherbut which stood beside him, to slake his burning thirst.

"The wise man," at length he said, after a long pause, "neglects not the warnings of his friend; but the fool despises them and perishes. If my clemency could so far forget the dictates of justice as to overlook thy folly, I could not save thee."

"Tis what I expected," I replied, calmly; "warnings I have had—had it not been for my fidelity I might have profited by them."

"Thy fidelity?" he cried, raising his voice, and surveying me with a look of scorn: "where was thy fidelity when the tchibookchee was slain?—where was thy fidelity on a late occasion? What is there in thee, that thou shouldst dare to plan and prosecute enterprises of that nature? Is thy head the fountain of wisdom? thy person the centre of attraction? Who trembles in thy presence?—who dreads thy sway?—Is thy arm all-powerful here? and thy courage so paramount, that it must needs show itself upon a few defenceless pilgrims?"

"The malice of my enemies has triumphed."

"Thy enemies! Hadst thou possessed their courage and sagacity, thou hadst not been reduced to this."

"There was a time," I said, stung at the charge, "when I was thought to surpass them in such qualities."

"In the vanity of thy own estimation," he added with a fearful laugh.

"Ay," I said, inflamed at his words, "and in the opinion of others. But I have been deceived—the gratitude of man is like water cast upon the desert."

"And his insolence like oil to flame," he returned, fiercely. "The wise man warms himself with the brand with which the fool fires the tent."

"And the tyrant," I cried, regardless of what I said, observing his increasing weakness and agitation, "may yet learn to tremble in the presence of the fool."

"By my head, and by my beard!" he exclaimed, gnashing his teeth and gasping for breath, from the violence of the burning fever raging in his veins, while his eyes glowed like coals of fire, "thou shalt die a death of torture: thy body shall be rent asunder by the wild horses of the desert: and thy limbs scattered for the dogs of the camp to prey upon."

"My life is in the hands of Allah!" I ejaculated.

"Though Allah and his hosts surround thee—though the sword of the prophet protect thee," he cried, drawing his dagger with one hand, while he raised the other and clenched it in an excess of impotent fury—"though thou wert in the Kaaba itself, or the harem of the sultan, I would tear thee from their sanctuary, and immolate thee!"

A power mightier than any he ever dreamed of struck him in the midst of his blasphemy. He attempted to rise, but the vehemence of his passions, and his convulsive respiration overpowered his utterance; he fell back on the cushions, powerless and gasping for breath, as if in the agonies of the last desperate struggle. His eyes seemed as if they would have darted from their sockets, glaring round the tent, fixed upon no object. He laughed—but his mirth was the out-breakings of a distempered brain, his words the wild and incoherent exclamations of a madman.

I stood by, contemplating the frightful scene with feelings of awe and amazement, and murmured inwardly, "It, to be the slave of passions like these, Mahmoud, thou has coveted power—if thy presumption, overstepping the boundaries of reason and humanity, has hurried thee into crime—behold now the littleness of authority, and the emptiness of pride!"

Not many minutes had elapsed since I entered the tent, but in that brief period, my own fate and the destinies of a nation were decided. For a day or two Mohammed had suffered under a slight fever, which to-day had increased in violence. Even now, while I stood before him, the fatal disorder, fastening its relentless fangs upon the heart of its victim, corrupted his fluids, and struck him with madness. His outrageous passions heightened the foul distemper, and he sank beneath its violence, as if under the influence of the poisonous wind of the desert, and with a suddenness which no human agency could avert.

A moment I stood gazing upon the frantic bey, who rolled and flung his arms over his head, in all the wildness of delirium, his blistered tongue giving vent to expressions of mingled blasphemy and menace. His shrieks of agony were horrible, heard even by the inhabitants of the town. Restrained by his impetuous disposition from disturbing him in moments like these, his attendants stood without, unconscious of the cause of his outcries, fearful of coming to his aid. At length one or two, more bold than the rest, entered the tent, and were struck with dismay at the frightful picture presented to their view.

"How is this?" they demanded, with glances of fire directed at me.

"Shar Allah!" I exclaimed, pointing at the bloated and delirious figure. "Behold the justice of God! the bey is dying."

They rushed forward to raise him, for he lay wallowing on the floor, but their united strength was insufficient to restrain him. Seeing how matters stood, others now came pouring in, and the tent soon became thronged with his Mamlouks. I was unheeded amid the general uproar: and managed to make my way out without being observed, perplexed and confounded by the scene.

THE HUMOROUS MAGICIAN UNMASKED.—Mr. A. B. Engstrom, of this city, has just published a little volume under this title, professing to give a full explanation of the principal performances of Legeidemain, as exhibited by Monsieur Adrien and other performers, in this country. Some of the explanations are illustrated with drawings, showing the character of the machinery necessary to aid the performer, and the whole of the experiments are very interesting. The publication in fact is a guide book for those who desire to learn magic, and with its assistance, almost any one may exhibit a great number of curious tricks. The annexed experiment, has a beautiful effect when well performed.

To kindle a blaze under Water.—Take a champagne glass—place therein three grains of phosphorus, and three times as much of chlorite of potass, and fill the glass with water. Have also a cup, containing about a tea-spoonful of sulphuric acid. Have also a common tobacco-pipe.

To perform the Experiment.—Place the glass, with the pipe and acid, upon the table. Take the glass and hold it before the audience, stating, at the same time—you perceive that the glass contains nothing but water, which is commonly used to extinguish fire. But I will now produce a fire in the water, which may appear rather unnatural to most persons. Take the pipe and put the end of the stem through the water, against the composition in the glass. Pour into the bowl of the pipe the sulphuric acid, which will instantly ignite the composition, and produce a very curious flame. This is the way to "set the Thames on fire."

AWFUL DISCLOSURES OF MARIA MONK.—This is a work deserving of the severest censure, unless, indeed its records be founded in truth; if so, all will agree with us, that the matter deserves to be investigated.—But is it possible that there can be so much wickedness—so much depravity, abroad in the world? Can it be that men, under the garb of sanctity, will practice the most revolting crimes; and that, too, with the utmost impunity? We would have to draw largely upon our credulity to give it a moment's credence.—And yet, in glancing through the pages of the book in question, we must confess that it wears at least the semblance of truth; for crimes, to which we cannot give a name, are alluded to in the fewest possible words, instead of being depicted in a manner that would tend to deprave the mind, and corrupt the passions, as would probably have been the case, had the writer intended it solely for a pecuniary speculation. But a word or two of Maria Monk, the narrator. It appears that she sought and procured admission into the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal, Canada, where she remained five years as a Novice, and two years as a Black Nun. She tells us that the priests, all of whom, connected with the institution, she has named, are wicked and profligate; that the females who are admitted as nuns, become their slaves in the worst sense of the word—obedient, upon all occasions, to their will; that the fruits of their inlame are instantly strangled and put out of the way; that nuns, for various reasons, are frequently murdered; and that she was an eye-witness to the death of one of them—Saint Francis, so called, by the order—who was smothered between two beds by the priests—five in number—and the Lady Superior, because she would not comply with the iniquitous demands of the Reverend Fathers. These are a few of her confessions.

The book has been proved to be a base forgery, it having been discovered that it is a translation from an old book in the Spanish language—and its author has been disowned from the Methodist connexion, of which he pretended to be a minister.

Since the above was in type, we find the following paragraph, in relation to the "disclosures," in the New York Commercial Advertiser, edited, as every body knows, by Col. Stone, which we think it our duty to give a place in our columns:

"Not believing the disclosures to be true, we have taken no notice of this book, which is yet exciting so much of the public attention. We must, however, put our friend of the Philadelphia Gazette right upon one point. The Gazette says, 'the work is of course known now, to be a translation from some old Spanish narrative.' Such is not the fact. The writer of the book, who took the relation from the lips of the unfortunate young woman herself, is a gentleman of perfect integrity and honor—a man of excellent character and spirit—who, although the tales may have been imposed upon him, would be the last man to impose what he did not honestly believe to be true, upon others. Thus much in justice to an esteemed friend."

THE BRITISH PULPIT.—This is the title of a work just published in this city, by Messrs. Grigg & Elliott, and Desilver, Thomas & Co. It embraces discourses by the most eminent living divines in England, Scotland and Ireland, accompanied with pulpit sketches, scriptural illustrations, and selections on the office, duties and responsibilities of the Christian Ministry.

It is issued under the editorial supervision of the Rev. Mr. Suddards, Rector of Grace Church, and fills an elegant octavo of 500 pages.

In the work there are fifty-six sermons, from the ablest British Divines, most of them now living, and as each discourse is from a different preacher, a great variety of style, manner and subject is furnished. The work is by no means sectarian, the editor having taken great pains to make selections of discourses, from all the prominent sects in England. Prefixed to the title is an engraving, containing likenesses of T. Chalmers, R. Hall, D. Wilson, T. Raffles, and R. Newton.

The volume altogether, is one possessing much interest for the religious reader, and we have not a doubt of its being extensively read.

MR. POWER'S WORK ON AMERICA.—Mr. Power's "Impressions of America," just published by Carey, Lea & Blanchard, of this city, is an interesting and popular work. With the specimens we have seen, we have been greatly pleased, and we append a short extract, no less liberal in its tone, than it is amusing in detail. The extract relates to Mr. Power's unprofitable theatrical trip, in company with Mr. Jefferson, to Alexandria.

My worthy manager had often pressed me to accompany him, on one of our off-nights, to Alexandria, which he assured me boasted a very pretty theatre, and a population, if not generally theatrical, still capable of filling the house for two or three nights, upon an extraordinary occasion. Such he was pleased to consider the present; and although I suggested the probability that most of the play-loving Alexandrians had, most likely, during the late very lovely nights, visited the Washington theatre, Mr. Jefferson, argued there yet existed a sufficient body, of the unsatisfied curious, to repay us for our short trip. * * * In due time, I mounted, and rode down to the city, to make my toilet and receive the Alexandrians. The first I soon effected, and the last I should have rejoiced to have also done; but they would not be received; "the more we waited, the more they would not come." I took possession of the stage, the only portion of the house occupied, where, eyed by half a dozen curious negroes, who were evidently amateurs, and by their good-humoured air, ready to become admirers, I awaited the appearance of the audience. In lieu of these, some half hour after the time of beginning, Mr. Jefferson made his appearance, solus, with an expression half comic, half vexed.

"It's no go, my good friend," said I.

"They're not come yet," said Mr. J.

"Nor are they on the road, Mr. Jefferson."

"They're a long way off, I guess, if they are," said he.

"And won't arrive in time, that's clear. Hadn't you better postpone the business, sine die?"

"We've nothing else left for it, I fear," said Mr. J. taking a last careful survey of the well lighted solitary salie, adding, "We must dismiss."

"That ceremony will be quite superfluous," observed I, "unless as far as we ourselves are concerned, and our sable friends here."

I had observed that two or three little knots occupying the intervals of the side scenes were evidently interested observers of our debate, and grieved and disappointed by the result. I should have liked to put them all into the front, and then have acted to them, could one have insured their not being intruded upon by any stray white man. As it was, Mr. Jefferson begged me to consider myself at perfect liberty.

"It's provoking, too," added my good humored manager, who was quite a philosopher in his vocation, "for it's a pretty theatre, isn't it?"

"It's a very pretty theatre," responded I. And so it was, exceedingly so. It had been built when the place flourished, and the community was prosperous and could afford to be merry. Now, trade having decayed, and money ceased to circulate, the blood has also grown stagnant amongst this once gay people: the fire is out, and the drama's spirit fled.

Mr. Jefferson, however, had a much more summary mode of accounting for our desolate state; for on my suggesting that his bills might have been ill distributed, or his notice insufficient—being rather desirous thus to find a loop hole for my vanity to creep out of—he convinced me that all points of vantage had been most provokingly well cared for.

"What the plague can be the reason they won't come for once, at least, Mr. J? One would be less surprised at their not answering to a second summons."

Jefferson shook his head, in a fashion that expressed more than even Puff designed Lord Burleigh's shake to convey: adding, by way of commentary, "The Bank question, sir! all the Bank question!"

I waited for no more, feeling that this was, indeed, an explanation sufficiently satisfactory; since, for some time, it served to account fully for every possible event, moral or physical—the depression of the markets, the failure of the fruit crop, the non-arrival of the packets, the sinking of stock, and the flooding of the Ohio.

Joining my friends at the hotel—an exceedingly good one, by the way—we were soon once more in saddle; and, lighted by as beautiful a moon as ever silvered the smooth surface of the Potomac, off I dashed with them, for Washington, at a slipping pace, in no way regretting my having visited Alexandria, or my premature return, since my day had been most delightfully passed; and my not having a source of my own, enabled me to assist at one given by a very charming and intelligent person, to which I was bidden, but in consequence of my engagement to Mr. J. had no hopes of attending.

BRIDGEWATER TREATISES.—Another volume of the series of valuable publications under this title, has just been published by Carey, Lea & Blanchard. It is from the pen of the Rev. William Kirby and its design is to illustrate the power, wisdom and goodness of God, as manifested in the creation of animals and in their history, habits and instincts. The work is embellished with numerous engravings, and the elucidation of the text is at once learned, powerful and deeply interesting. We regard these treatises as among the most valuable publications of the day.

WORKS OF HANNAH MORE.—The Harpers have just published a handsome edition of the works of Hannah More, complete in seven volumes. The first volume contains a beautiful engraved likeness of the author, and an appropriate vignette title page, as do all the succeeding ones—being spirited illustrations of her works by eminent artists. Of the subject matter, we need not say a word—our readers are sufficiently enlightened upon this point—we need only commend the work as a specimen of beautiful typography, and neat and substantial binding. Every library should possess it.

PANORAMA OF TRADES AND PROFESSIONS.—Uriah Hunt, of this city, has lately published a work with the above title, embellished with eighty-two engravings. It conveys instructions to almost every trade and profession that can be named—such as the Agriculturist, Hatter, Tailor, Millner, Barber, Merchant, Dentist, Painter, Printer, Mason, Blacksmith, Clergyman, Physician, Attorney at Law, and even the Author. The book cannot fail of being useful.

THE EQUINOCTIAL STORM.

The description of the storm, and the perils of Sir Arthur Wardour and his daughter, in the 'Antiquary,' have been always deemed one of the finest passages in Scott's Novels. In presenting our readers with an engraving, illustrative of the most interesting part of this scene, we cannot do better than quote the particular words to which the picture refers.

It was indeed a dreadful evening. The howling of the storm mingled with the shrieks of the sea-fowl, and sounded like the dirge of the three devoted beings, who, pent between two of the most magnificent, yet most dreadful objects of nature—a raging tide and an insurmountable precipice—toiled along their painful and dangerous path, often lashed by the spray of some giant billow, which threw itself higher on the beach than those which had preceded it. Each minute did their enemy gain ground perceptibly upon them. Still, however, loth to relinquish the last hopes of life, they bent their eyes on the black rock pointed out by Ochiltree. It was yet distinctly visible among the breakers, and continued to be so, until they came to a turn in the precarious path where an intervening projection of rock hid it from their sight. Deprived of the view of the beacon on which they had relied, here then they experienced the double agony of terror and suspense. They struggled forward however; but, when they arrived at the point from which they ought to have seen the crag, it was no longer visible. The signal of safety was lost among a thousand white breakers, which, dashing upon the point of the promontory, rose in prodigious sheets of snowy foam as high as the mast of a first-rate man-of-war, against the dark brow of the precipice.

The countenance of the old man fell. Isabella gave a faint shriek, and, "God have mercy upon us!" which her guide solemnly uttered, was piteously echoed by Sir Arthur—"My child! my child!—to die such a death!"

"My father! my dear father!" his daughter exclaimed, clinging to him, "and you too, who have lost your own life in endeavouring to save ours!"

"That's not worth the counting," said the old man. "I have lived to be weary o' life; and here or yonder at the back o' a dyke, in a wreath o' snaw, or in the wamie o' a wave, what signifies how the auld gabertanzie dies!"

"Good man," said Sir Arthur, "can you think of nothing?—of no help?—I'll make you rich—I'll give you a farm—I'll—"

"Our riches will be soon equal," said the beggar, looking out upon the strife of the waters—"they are sae already; for I hae nae land, and you would give your fair bounds and barony for a square yard of rock that would be dry for twal hours."

While they exchanged these words, they paused up on the highest ledge of rock to which they could attain. Here then they were to await the sure though slow progress of the raging element.

STANZAS.

"Thou wert too like a dream of Heaven,
For earthly love to merit thee."

Another bright flower from earth has been taken

To grace the fair gardens of beauty above;

After blooming below long enough to awaken,

A tender affection, 'twas torn from its love.

Decay was commission'd to bear it to Heaven—

And, breathing upon it his withering kiss,

He blasted its beauty—it droop'd—and one even,

He bore it away to the gardens of bliss!

This fair flower bloom'd by a beautiful river,

On whose banks a fond youth often struck his guitar;

And a sweet little Zephyr essay'd to deliver,

Its notes, nor their feeling nor melody war.

Decay stole along with the Zephyr, and enter'd

The fair flower's heart with those warbles of love,

But it could not corraide them,—for deeper they center'd

The nearer it came to the gardens above.

Ah, loveliest! who could have thought that thy bosom,

All kindness and feeling, so soon would be cold?

Not him who now mourns o'er the crush'd, wither'd blossom,

Lamenting he cannot its beauties unfold.

Fare thee well—fare thee well! tho' my hopes cannot borrow,

A strain to disclose all my anguish and woe—

Deep—deep in my heart there's a fountain of sorrow,

That over remembrance forever must flow!—S. P.

LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL.

LETTER VIII.

Whenever the steam-packet comes in, I speed to the post-office, where, thanks to my stars and my friends, I never fail to find kind letters from England, and then the "Cherub Content" flutters his wings over my heart. How do I continue to like this place? is your first question. Why, wonderfully well, considering all its discomforts. The worst thing is, that the restaurants have got a bad reputation. Do they deserve it? No; on my honour and conscience, I do not believe one word of the calumny; but Algiers is an ill-speaking place, and they say that when you are devouring what is called lamb or mutton, you may be unconsciously eating of a gigot or jackal or haunch of hyena. I repeat to you my sincere faith that this is all falsehood and scandal; but still, though Othello was not a jealous man, he was made miserable by insinuations; and in like manner, when I sit down sharp-set to my plate of mutton, I am haunted with chimerical fears that I may be faring on the lion's provider. God pity the man who has one misgiving thought about either his mutton or his marriage-bed! "Who doubts, yet doubts, suspects, yet strongly loves."

Again, you say, what is the climate of Algiers? From all that I can observe and learn, if we except some spots on the Matidjah and about Bona, it is a healthy climate. The heat was great when I arrived, but I never felt it quite intolerable except on one occasion, and then only for a very short time. In the middle of one night of September, I awoke from sleep, in a breathless and burning heat, though I was conscious that I had neither ate nor drank any thing that ought to have fevered me. I got up and opened the window, that I might respire more freely, but the air that rushed in was like the heat from a baker's oven, and made me fall half insensible on the floor for several minutes. I recovered, however, and was well enough next day to tell the accident to my friends. "Poh," they said, "that was nothing but a visit of the simoom, or wind of the Desert, who had heard of your arrival at Algiers, and thought it his duty to pay his respects to you." "Thank God," I replied, "that he was not a long-winded visitor!"

Well, but with all its faults, I like Algiers. I can easily get out of the dismal city, and outside of the walls everything is beautiful. When I sally forth from the gate of Bab-el-Oued, the bold sea-beach smells so freshly, and sounds so musically, that I little wonder at Homer calling the sea "Divine." The air of autumn nerves my limbs, and the atmosphere is so clear, that I feel as if a veil of gauze had been removed from my eyes since I looked on the scenery of Europe. Every object—every turf and tree is so distinct a mile off, that it seems to me as if I could touch them.—They took like a picture held up to the eyes by the close light of a candle. I can fancy the Father of Nature himself enjoying the beauties of his own creation, and admiring, by the light of the blessed sun,

But your letter challenges me to subjects of more matter-of-fact consideration. Before I can attempt to answer what you ask me about Algiers, I must reduce your desultory questions into distinct heads. Query 1st. Will the French retain this colony? Query 2d. If they do retain it, will they profit by it? Query 3d. How do the natives like the French? Query 4th. Will the advantages likely to be derivable by France, from Algiers, be pernicious to Great Britain? And query 5th. Will the French possession of this part of Africa be a benefit to the general cause of civilization?

I venture on these questions rather as a diffident speculator, than as one hoping to solve them. After all, can you expect me to predict infallibly what the French may do with Algiers, when, at this moment, the French nation itself scarcely knows its own mind upon the subject. But offering my opinion at the lowest rate at which you may value it, I do think that the French will keep Algiers, being pledged thereunto by their national pride. I am led to this opinion by the conversations I have had with their officers, civil and military; and I am certain that I have had more frank (observe, I do not say confidential) intercourse with them than any Englishman who has been here since the conquest. The French mind seems to me to wince at the idea of abandoning the colony, and above all, at the slightest hint of England interfering against their possession of it. If you wish them to retain Algiers, your surest way is to begin to squabble about it. A whimsical circumstance has by chance broken that reserve between the French and myself which our nationality might have otherwise created. They found by chance in Algiers a volume of "Blackwood's Magazine,"* in which I am described as a man eaten up with Gallicism, one who, if a French and English regiment were about to charge each other, would wager in favour of the French. Now this calumny nettled me; and I wished Blackwood at the black devil. I protested indignantly to the first French party I went into—it was when dining at General Voiron's—that I was no Gallician—no renegade. My regard for France, I said, impairs not one jot of my native patriotism. Because I love my mother, is it necessary that I should spit in the face of every other decent old woman that I may meet with? Well, the French took my word for this; but they insisted that I had no Anti-Gallican prejudices—no, none whatsoever. And one good effect has resulted to me from this character—namely, that they have put up with my speaking more plain truths to them than they would have otherwise borne, and that seeing me an undisguised man, they are outspoken with me. I am much mistaken if their national pride will speedily resile from retaining Algiers, although it costs them at this moment about a million and a half sterling a year, for the support of somewhat less than 30,000 soldiers, the expense of the civil government included. The chance of the natives turning them out of the country I reckon at nothing, and even their power of opposing their further invasion I should calculate not to be great, if the French were to employ more cavalry and light artillery instead of mainly depending on their infantry. The infantry man, loaded with arms and equipage, under a climate that alternates deluges of rain with burning heat, and frequently, in a hilly country, is very unfairly tried against Arabian cavalry, who are the best in the world at desultory warfare. To see the mounted Arab sweeping down declivities on which no jockey of England would venture, would make your head spin round, and when he fires and manoeuvres, you would imagine him a piece of his own horse. My astonishment is that the little Frenchman, at one time drenched to the marrow with rain, and at other times dissolved in heat like a boiled onion, has been able to cope as well as he has done with this enemy. But the French will improve in their warfare by experience. At present they have somewhat under 500 Arab cavalry in their pay, but they will increase their number, and in this manner they will have it in their power, if they choose, to conquer the country. Whether they will choose to do so or not, is a different question. Bonaparte would have settled the matter sooner. Instead of groping and pawing about for the partial conquest of a coast five hundred miles in extent, he would have struck up at once to Constantia, into the heart of the regency.—My opinion, then, is, that if the French be true to their feelings of national glory, they are able to retain, and to extend their dominion over Algiers.

* "Blackwood's Magazine" treats me as if it were a playful cat. Upon the whole, exceedingly kind, it often purrs applause beyond my deserts; but anon, it purrs the claws out of the velvet sheath, and gives me a scratch that makes me suck my bleeding finger.

Query 2d. Will her occupation of the colony repay France for her expenses, present and to come? Why, not for a long time; but, I should venture to think, ultimately. The golden prospects from indigo, cotton, sugar, and cochineal, may have been exaggerated; and as to corn, I cannot understand how a country so little irrigated could ever have been a granary to the Romans. That fact is no doubt asserted about ancient Numidia, and you will observe that the said tradition would fall in pat with my purpose, if I were engaged as a special pleader to argue what is, nevertheless, my general opinion, that this colony might be made in the end a most productive colony to France. But the Cereal renown of old Numidia is, I confess, to me a stumbling-block. As it is written in Greek and Latin, I am bound to believe it; but as a matter of comprehension, I give up the problem. North America, I suspect, will, for an indefinite number of years, rear Indian corn and all manner of grain cheaper than it can be cultivated here. But, on this account, I am far from surrendering my main position, that Algiers might be made a richly available colony to France. It is a conquerable country. Its mountains are rich in metals and timber. In its eastern part, towards Oran and Mostaganem, there is fossil or spontaneous salt enough to supply the whole world with that article; and if the vine, the tobacco plant, the olive, and the silk-worm were cherished, the whole universe might sit down with oil to their salads, with silken velvet on their backs, and with cigars and wine at the cost of half nothing.

Query 3d. How do the natives like the French?—To be plain, I don't think they have yet acquired a taste for them. The Jews complain that, since the arrival of the French, there has been "Point de commerce;" and the only Turk whose acquaintance I have made, cuts me short from all conversation about them by exclaiming "Bestia!" To be sure, poor fellow, he owes them no love, for they thumped and misused him shamefully. The Moors are reserved in their conversation. Only on one occasion have I met with a rich, influential individual among them from whom I could elicit a sincere opinion; but as I got it under his own roof, and with no warrant to publish it, I omit his name. I said to him, that I would give much to know his sentiments respecting the French. He eyed me significantly, and replied through the interpreter, "I will answer you with another question. How would you like the French if they had come into England, dug up the bones of your parents and countrymen, and sent off a ship load of them, to be used by the sugar-bakers of France?" Here he alluded to the French having made a highway through the Moorish cemetery at the Bab-el-Oued gate at Algiers; and though for this operation they had the tyrant plea of necessity, I believe they conducted it unfeelingly, and allowed their soldiers to pilfer the marble turbans that adorned the most respected tombs.—As to the ship full of bones and sugar-bakers, I cannot so well vouch for that story.

Before we parted, my entertainer expressed himself very freely about the Jews. He told me, with fierce delight in his countenance, that one satisfaction which the Mussulmans would enjoy, in case of a change would be the punishment of those Hebrew dogs. "They insulted us," he said, "the day after the entry of the French, and the day after their departure we should have our revenge." From all that he told me, I believe that barbarous civil wars would be the result of France suddenly abandoning this conquest, and that the miserable Jews would stand a chance of being generally massacred.

I come to the next question.—Whether Old England will suffer damage by the French possession of Algiers? You ask me how I can tolerate the idea of France continuing in possession of so large a portion of Northern Africa, and of thus beginning to realize Bonaparte's idea of converting the Mediterranean into a great French lake? Let the French, you say, once settle themselves at Algiers, and they will by and by extend themselves right and left to Tunis and Morocco; Gibraltar and Malta will then cease to be ours. But this is all a vision. It requires France, at the present moment, to support 30,000 men, each man, on an average, costing £40 a year, in order to keep hold of a few stations on the African coast. Let her conquests extend to Morocco and Tunis, and with 90,000 men for her African army, she would have a yearly expense of between four and five millions.

Further, you ask my opinion whether it would be worth our while to put in a word against the said possession, as well as to claim for ourselves some portion of the Algerine coast—say Oran? I have given you my opinion that, in the long run, much wealth might accrue from the colony to France; but I am not ashamed to say that it is only a conjectural opinion. However, supposing the country to be ultimately productive to France, (its speedy productiveness is palpably out of the question) is it certain and necessary that the wealth of our neighbours would be ruinous to us? I think not. I suspect that the issue might be quite the contrary, and that the African wealth of France might make her a better customer to our manufacturers. As to our claiming a part of the coast, if we had it, would only involve us in garrison expenses, and be a source of quarrel with France, like those which arose out of the juxtaposition of our colonies and theirs in North America; nay more, the French would not concede an inch of the coast, unless England were to negotiate with her hand on the hilt of her sword; and what Englishman, at this time of day, would suffer his beer to be taxed one farthing in the hogshead for the sake of a war about Algiers? The idea is preposterous.

Next comes the more extensive question.—How far the general cause of human happiness and civilization is likely to be affected by French occupation of Algiers? I address you as one who believes that, if civilization and happiness be not synonymous terms, civilization, at least, diminishes the horrors of human misery. If I thought otherwise, I should not discuss the subject with you.

The moment an Englishman can divest himself of apprehensions, as I think he safely may, that the French can do any harm to England by retaining Algiers, it will be natural, at the first view of the subject, for the liberality of his heart to argue thus:—France is, by much, the more civilized nation, and her dominion ought to insure some chance of civilization, as she has already brought into Algiers the abolition of hideous punishments, and the knowledge of arts and sciences that diminish bigotry and barbarism. Yee, my friend, this position is true; and its truth is some consolation to me. When I go out to the gate of Babazon, and am shown the spot where the Jews used to be burnt alive, and where criminals were precipitated from a high wall, to be caught by hooks halfway down, and detained in tortures for perhaps a week, I bless the event that has put Algiers under any dominion that will exclude such horrors. At the outside of that dreadful gate, as late as 1813, a friend of mine, too authentic an informant, saw a state criminal chained to a post to be starved alive. The sufferer was a florid, stout man, on the first day of his punishment, and he bore the pangs of famine for several days with heroic fortitude; but on the ninth day he was heard screaming for water to quench his thirst, and died with his bones coming through his skin.

Further, in spite of all that I hear and see, as to the difficulty of getting the natives to coalesce with their conquerors, I cannot divest my mind of the idea that the French will ultimately plant here the most important arts and sciences that tend to abate human misery. The Mussulman's bigotry must ultimately retreat before civilization; and God knows there is room enough for improvement in this barbarous land. The native population, though it will sometimes show you heads and forms worthy of a scriptural picture, exhibits incomparably more numerous objects of such wretchedness as you would not meet in an European city: elephantiasis and blindness are common; and disease and poverty may be said to walk the streets. Until the French arrived, there was scarcely an European surgeon or physician in the regency, except some runaway druggists' prentices from Christendom; now there is an established school both of surgery and medicine, under the inspection of talented men. The doctrine of fatalism opposes itself in limine to the very profession of medicine and surgery.—A French officer, who has written an account of the conquest, describes an interesting scene which he witnessed between a young Arab, who was brought in wounded to the French camp, and his aged father, who came to visit him. The leg-bone of the youth had been shattered, but his life might have been saved by amputation of the limb. The old man hung over him in agony, beseeching him not to offend God and Mahomet by submitting to the operation. His son followed the advice, and Mahomet took him to himself in reward of his piety. There are, nevertheless, Moors and Jews who pretend to make both clinical and surgical cures, and women who are called in as sages femmes; but the native doctors know not a title of anatomy, and scarcely the names of their own medicines, many of which are noxious in the cases in which they are prescribed. In surgery they understand not even the use of a lancet. They console the cholic, the stone, and pleurisy, with the application of red-hot iron to the suffering parts. This treatment often elicits shrieks of assurance from the patients that they are perfectly cured, and intreaties that the application may be removed. They bleed and amputate with a razor, and stop hemorrhage with boiling pitch. Dr. Abernethy, in lecturing on the disease of wens, said that he knew not how to cure them, and that perhaps whistling to them was not the worst prescription. In like manner, it is possible that the amulets bestowed on the Algerines by their holy marabouts are amongst the most innocent of their cures.

Enormous mortality and suffering necessarily result from this ignorance of the healing art. For one hideous malady they know no sort of remedy. The blood of the sufferer runs infected in his veins all his life, and make his children also its victims. When the plague used to come here, its ravages exceeded all conception; whole villages and cities have been known to be unpeopled by it; harvests rotted on the ground for want of reapers; and flocks and herds wandered wide without a master. Large encampments of the Arabs might be met with, where the dead lay unburied under their tents. Leweson, who witnessed the plague of Algiers, in 1787, says that, of an evening, the only sounds to be heard were the lamentations at funerals and the howlings of jackals.

I am restrained only by the disagreeableness of the subject, from mentioning other instances of the human misery resulting from ignorance and barbarism in this country; but I assure you I have seen enough to convince me that the retention of the country by France, as a point d'appui for the entrance of European civilization into Africa, is a consummation devoutly to be wished for.

I have already alluded more than once to the faults which the French have committed since their occupation of the colony, including, under the gentle denomination of faults, a few useless murders committed on the natives. With regard to this subject, however, I am deterred from bestowing my prolixity upon you by two considerations. In the first place, the French themselves speak with regret of those occurrences which have sullied their character for humanity: their press has indignantly exposed them; and it is my firm opinion, if France perseveres in retaining Algiers, that she will learn, as we ourselves have certainly learnt in India, to a certain degree, the policy of being just and humane. In the next place, I should feel it my duty, as an Englishman criminalizing the cruelties of the French in northern Africa, to cast a glance at the question whether our own conduct in Caffraria has been perfectly immaculate? In my opinion, the latter country could make out a stronger case against us than Algiers could against the French: so on this subject I shall abstain from drawing up any special indictment against the French, though I leave you to understand in general that their conduct would admit of amelioration.

A prominent trait in the French mismanagement of this colony is their so often changing the Governor-general. The successor to Voiron, who has just arrived, will make the sixth that they have had in five years—Bourmont, Clausel, Berthézie, Duc de Rovigo, Voiron, and D'Erlon. General Voiron, however, is not to leave Algiers immediately; this is to me an agreeable circumstance, as he is a frank, kind-hearted Helvetian, who has shown me much hospitality. It was singular that I should meet under his roof with a translator of my own poems. Calling one day at the General's, I was shown into a room where his secretary Capt. Saphor, was sitting at his papers. He rose to receive me with uncommon cordiality, and expressed a wish to make my acquaintance, saying "I have read your poetry," &c. &c. &c. "Pshaw," I said, "you Frenchmen are always paying compliments; I'll be sworn, now, you never read two lines I ever indited." "But I beg your pardon," he replied, pulling out a drawer and handing me several clean-written sheets. "That is a specimen of what I have already done in the translation of your poems, and I mean to translate them all if my military life will allow me leisure." I read the version, though I cannot say coolly or candidly; my heart, suborned by vanity and gratitude, knocked up my head from being an impartial critic, and my nerves were flustered (to use the title of a comedy ascribed to the late Lord L.—) by the "Unexpected Surprise." Besides, it is only a Frenchman who can judge competently of the French style; but everybody gives Saphor the character of a highly-accomplished man.

A day or two after the new governor's arrival, our consul waited upon him, and took me with him for presentation. Count D'Erlon received us very civilly. Though he has not the hearty manners of his predecessor, he is a gentlemanlike old man. His age is said to be sixty-nine; but he looks much older, owing no doubt to his hard military life. He had an excellent reputation as a soldier; but a more unworn man methinks would better suit the critical state of the colony. The Count is splendidly lodged in a house that belonged to a son of that Dey of Algiers whose death made way for the last one, Hussein Pasha; the chambers present alcoves and recesses, gilt on the ceilings with barbaric gold. His excellency seated the British consul, the vice-consul and myself on a sofa, drew in his chair beside us, and talked in the warmest manner of his partiality for the English.

The source of his affection for our countrymen was his having fought so many bloody battles with them in the Spanish Peninsula. We have a proverb in the North, "that scratching and biting is Scotch folks' wooing;" in like manner it would seem that Count D'Erlon's love for us had been won by being so often brought up to the scratch. "Ah! what brave men," he exclaimed, "are the British soldiers; and how loyal their officers, and what courtesy, nay, brotherly love, subsisted between the combatants!" In short, he could not express the tenderness with which the French and English cut each other's throats during the Peninsular campaigns. "What has become," he said, "of your famous General El? I have had many parleys with that gallant man." "El," I thought to myself, "that is a military fish I never heard of;" but Mr. St. John at once enlightened my mind by saying to the Count, "General Lord Hill is now Commander-in-chief of the British forces."

The new Governor has made his debut to-day by a proclamation to the natives which is worthy of Mawworm, and begins thus:—"In the name of God, elect and merciful! Praise be to God, the Lord of the Universe, who will judge us all at the day of judgment! We hope in his goodness and we repose upon his strength. It is he who rewards the good, and who punishes the wicked; for he knows our most secret thoughts, and nothing is hid from him. At the end of ages he will raise up the dead; for he is all-powerful." After this Count D'Erlon styles himself Khalif of the King of the French, and he indites his proclamation "To all Arabs Great and Small." The Moors of Algiers have been forced to get up a voluntary lète in honour of the new governor; I was present at it when it was celebrated in one of the largest houses of Algiers. The entertainment consisted of coffee and sweetmeats, and dancing in the French style. Of course, the Moors never dance; but they had a concert of their own music, and miserable it was. I was touched with compassion when I heard the discord of their barbarous instruments, that outraged harmony and melody, and seemed to mock even their own humiliation. They seemed to me more pitiable than the Hebrews by the waters of Babylon.

You advise me not to speak my mind too freely among the French. It is good counsel. Decorum enjoins that a stranger, plumped so freshly among them as myself, should be reserved in passing judgment on their colonial policy in a settlement so full of difficulties. I keep this maxim in view; and except by some random words about the Pépinière, I have never found that I have given them offence. I must say also that the leading officers, both civil and military, whose acquaintance I have made, treat me in the most amiable spirit, and there is no courtesy lost between us. On certain sore points respecting their maltreatment of the natives I purposely abstain from all declamation, because I see, by the French press, that the nation at large is sensitive on the subject; and I have the fullest hopes that ameliorated conduct will result from the reflections of the French themselves. At the same time, on any point where I find their minds obtuse I will frankly own to you that I abandon reserve, and speak out to them like a true citizen of the world. Whilst a chance remains that this colony may introduce civilization into Africa, I cannot look down the vista of futurity with indifference, or converse perpetually on so interesting a subject with locked up thoughts. I admire several traits in their penal code; but I cannot forbear telling them that it is still, if possible, more merciless and unmeasured than our own. I have studied in detail, from the most authentic documents, their whole system of galley-slavery, and it is enough to make the flesh creep on your bones. Further, they have not abolished the practice of exposition on the pillory—a mode of punishment which would puzzle the author of evil himself to surpass, in devising means for hardening the shamelessness of guilt, for excluding the possibility of reformation, for torturing penitence to despair, and for degrading at once the sufferer and the spectator. And yet it was but the other day that I heard of a French officer, nominally and in rank a gentleman, having been condemned to be put into the pillory and exhibited in the public square. Do you blame me that, in every company I went into, I spoke freely against the pillorying of an European amidst a rabble of Moors, Kabyles, and Jewish shoe-blacks? The wretched object of this sentence is, I grant you, an adventurer. He obtained, I know not how, in Spain or Portugal, the rank of a lieutenant-colonel; but he is evidently a bad subject, from his having been convicted of scraping silver off five-franc pieces. Very well, and let him be punished condignly; still, however, let justice be tempered with mercy. After standing in the pillory for an hour, he is to be kept a year in solitary confinement, and then sent for ten years to the galleys. The galleys alone, one would think, were punishment enough for any crime short of murder. When the poor devil heard of his presentation to the mob of Algiers being about to be an overture to his other sufferings, he exclaimed, "I might survive all the rest of my punishment, but the pillory will kill me." Unfortunately, he was the husband of an amiable woman, whose family is highly respectable. When the officers of justice led him away to prison, his wife was left alternately swooning and convulsed in her lone lodgings, with scarcely a franc to purchase medicines for restoring her. They conveyed her to the hospital, where she lay for three days moaning and complaining that her heart was bursting and would break: on the third day she died literally of grief.*

The day that I heard of this sentence, I dined by invitation tête-à-tête with M. Lawrence, the Procureur du Roi, and I did not lose that opportunity of arguing against the superfluous, not to say impolitic barbarity, of superseding the pillory to so severe a sentence. I combated his doctrine, that law has a right to inflict the moral torture of disgrace on any peccant individual, to a degree that utterly shuts out the possibility of his future reformation to society. I said, "If you choose to hang a man for scraping silver coins, you give him a brief punishment, the public ignominy of which, whilst it is unavoidable, is perhaps assuaged by its awfulness. Even by going to the galleys, no doubt this miserable man will lose character, and small may be the chance of his ever redeeming it. But why wantonly annihilate the last vestige of such a chance, by driving his soul to despair even before he goes to the galleys?" "Oh! Sir," I said, "in the name of civilization, I appeal to you to apply to the high authorities at home, and to spare us the sight of an European in a pillory of Algiers. Is it thus that you are introducing civilization into Africa?" The Procureur at first looked gravely; but when my remonstrance grew warm, he burst in a loud laugh. "C'est bien drôle," he said, "that a poet should be lecturing the first law-officer of Algiers!" I implored him to consider my very freedom of speech as a mark of my confidence in his humanity, and to forgive my zeal, if it had unintentionally any appearance of officiousness. He replied, "I give you credit for good motives, I will think over this matter."*

* The letter in which I wrote an account of this case to a friend in England is now before me; but it is torn, by the opening of the seal, exactly at the place where I mentioned the particulars of the sentence. I believe I understate it, from fear of going beyond the mark. If I could confide in my memory, I should say that the culprit was condemned three years' to solitary confinement, and twenty years at the galleys. That he was sentenced to at least ten years of galley slavery I could depone to having heard.

Among the French from whom I have experienced civilities here, I have particularly to thank Colonel Maret for his efforts to procure me the best specimens of Algerine poetry. Indifferent, I must own, are the best; but that is not the fault of the gallant Colonel. He mentioned my name to Ben Omar, the ex-Bey of Titeri, who though no longer a prince, is one of the richest and most influential Moors at Algiers, and counts a Dey amongst his nearest ancestors. Colonel Maret brought me next day an invitation to dine with him, which was doubly gratifying to me as a mark of hospitality from a total stranger, and as a means of seeing at least, as much of the domestic manners of the Moors as can be exhibited in a dinner from which the charm of woman's society is shut out. At six o'clock I repaired in company with the Colonel to the town-house of Ben Omar. It is situated in one of the gloomiest alleys of Algiers; but it is nobly furnished within. At the servant's lodge, or floor that enters from the ground, a nephew of our host, a sprightly lad about thirteen, dressed so becomingly that he might have trod the stage, welcomed us both, and shook us by the hand. The negroes in the hall told us that their master was not yet arrived from the country, but might be expected every moment; and in the meantime they requested us to walk upstairs. Colonel Maret, however, who perfectly understood both the Arabic language and Moorish etiquette, told me that it would be thought more polite if we were to wait for his ex-highness's arrival. The tread of his horse very soon announced his coming, and the quadruped preceded Ben Omar in entering the ground-floor, through which he passed into his stable. Our host apologized in French, which he speaks very fairly, for having detained us; he then took a candle and gave another to his chief negro, and by the light of these we marched up stairs to the Salle à manger. It is a room after the Moorish fashion which I have already described, with the difference of having only one upper side room divided from the one below by a curtain of silk, richly embroidered. The walls are hung with an infinity of pistols, guns, scimitars, and yataghans, ornamented with gold, silver, mother-of-pearl, and ivory. The ottomans, too low to be called sofas, are of rich crimson silk, well besmeared with gold. My attention, however, was diverted from contemplating inanimate objects by a living bit of furniture in the room, namely, the younger nephew of our host, a boy about four and a half years old. I never saw puerile beauty to match this indescribable cherub, with his large blue eyes and auburn hair. What is painting, what is statuary, to the living workmanship of nature? The beauty of the little infidel made me faithless to the curiosity which I owed to the scene before me, and I could rivet my eyes on him, whilst the ex-Bey was courteously describing his curious armory, and showing us his Damascus blades, with minute histories of many persons of distinction whom they had the honour of decapitating.

The guests were Colonel Maret, two other Frenchmen, and myself. Our host placed me on an ottoman, and after taking a few whiffs of a long pipe, handed it to me moist from his own lips, as the greatest respect that can be shown a stranger. At last the dinner-table was brought in, or rather a large round tin tray, which was placed on a slight elevation from the floor. In the midst of it was a bowl of exquisite

*That my advice had any influence I scarcely flatter myself. I rather believe that the alteration of this poor man's destiny arose from fortuitous circumstances; but so it was, that his exposition in Algiers never took place.

rice-soup, and each of us having squatted himself cross-legged on a low cushion like so many tailors, we were helped to a plateful of soup a-piece, and we fed ourselves with wooden spoons. The plates were fine English porcelain. Before each of us was placed a long napkin, which our host told me was of Smyrna cloth. Next came a large broiled fish, deliciously flavoured and stuffed with pudding; it was sent round, and every one clutched a portion of it with his fingers and thumb. By my faith, I thought, on tasting this regale, 'or aught that the French can do in civilizing African cookery, they may as well stay at home. I was so pleased with the fish, that I desired to be helped a second time from it; whereupon the ex-Bey with exemplary politeness, grasped a handful of it and laid it on my plate.

Behold, my friend, what it is to move in a high life, and to see the world! Presently we had roasted fowls, flanked by some savoury dishes of vegetables, well soured with oil, and by and by followed couscousou. The pullets were tore asunder by strength of hand, but with ineffable delicacy. Meanwhile my heart was yearning after the rich legumes that were floating in gravy, as golden bright as the clouds of a summer sunset. There was no spoon, and so I poured a part of the vegetables on my plate, and by the aid of a piece of bread, and my spoonless fingers, whiped considerable portions into my mouth. "For shame!" methinks you are already exclaiming: "Is this your high life, to sit pawing your food like a squirrel? Could you not have asked for a spoon?" Well, I did so when the couscousou came in; but in the mean time I was desperately hungry. For the glorious couscousou we of Christendom were allowed spoons, and though our words could not describe its relish, our mouth did it ample justice without uttering a word. Since the days of my boyhood I never ate a heartier dinner.

But pleasures are like poppies spread.
We seize the flower—its bloom is fled;
Or like the snow-falls on the river,
A moment white, then gone for ever.

How limited is all human felicity! In twenty minutes I found that my appetite was playing me false, and that I was tasting the subsequent dishes of the feast rather out of courtesy than inclination. Ben Omar, who was attentive to us all, but particularly to his English guest, pressed me frequently. I asked him if it was a custom in the better society of this country to press the stranger to his food. "Not at all," he said, "but I only recommend our ragouts to you as the pride of our cuisine. You are rather a poor eater," he added, "or you don't like my dinner?" "A poor eater!" I replied, "My excellent host I have that within me which assures my conscience of having done ample justice to your hospitality." All this time, nevertheless, I was conscious of making but a miserable figure as an eater by the side of the other Christian convives. There was Colonel Maret, a bold dragon, six feet some inches high, who might stand for the picture of Sir William Wallace. But there were two skinny Frenchmen who beat even him all to nothing at the board of nourishment. The stomachs of Pharaoh's lean kine seemed to have transmigrated into their bodies, and to have pressed them to the twentieth dish that went round would have been a work of supererogation. The desert was of a piece with the dinner, presenting a vast variety of fruits both fresh and confected. We had now spoons of tortoise-shells, with handles made either entirely of sea-horse tooth, or of ivory with amber tops. The porcelain was very rich, and Ben Omar told me to my surprise that it came, like the dinner plates, all from England. After washing our hands, we had pipes and coffee, with silver-wire wine-cups supporting the English ones.

We sat conversing till ten o'clock. I need not tell you that we had no wine, either at or after dinner; and the want of that comfort, you know, is apt to dispose an English mind to pensiveness after a hearty meal. I thought of Philoctetes in the desert island, when the Chorus laments that the genial wine-cup is never raised to his lips. I regretted in my heart that so perfect a gentleman as Ben Omar should live in a state of Mahometan delusion; and recalling to mind the pious clergymen of Scotland, I acknowledged how justly they had denounced that Arch-imposter Mahomet. Colonel Maret and our host maintained an animated conversation; but I found the same fault with it that the Athenians alledged against one of their dramas, that it had nothing to do with Bacchus. By and by a thought touched and tickled my fancy. Were I to give a hint for a drop of the liquid ruby, and were our host to grant it, what a triumph over the infidels would it be—far beyond that of the Crusaders, who only poured out their blood—if I could make them shed their wine! But by this time I fear my delicacy may again be taking alarm, and soliloquizing thus:—What ask for wine under the roof of a hospitable Mussulman?—oh no; I did not ask, I only hinted, and so distantly, that the hint would not reach. My motive, I also assure you, was not so much the love of wine, as the indulgence of a jocular thought. I turned the conversation to the subject of Arabic literature, not that I cared half a straw at that moment about Arabic literature, but because it gave me an opportunity of asking about some songs in the poetry of the Mussulmans which extol the joys of wine. I also quoted a verse of the Koran, promising wine in golden cups to the best in Paradise. "I never heard of such a text," said Ben Omar; and I rather believe he never had, for I had taken the liberty of coining it on the spot. Mine host I scarcely believe suspected my drift.

Ben Omar had been a wealthy merchant before his appointment by General Clausel to be Bey of Titeri, one of the four grand divisions of the Regency. He has travelled through Italy and France; and at Paris he received the cross of the Legion of Honour, in reward of his services to the French. He is about forty-seven. His conversation, without being brilliant, is sensible; and his manners are so like those of the general gentleman of the world, that you speedily forget his wearing a turban. He told me that in his town and country-house he has an establishment of eighty-four servants, and that he is besides obliged to give hospitable means of bread and chopped mutton, preserved in grease, to about five hundred Moorish rustics, whenever any of them choose to come to town. He spoke to me feelingly of the miseries which Algiers had suffered, under the government of the Turks; and the greatest sufferer, he said, of the Mussulman population was the Dey himself. Even the last and most fortunate of all the Deys, Hussein Pasha, lived but as a prisoner in his own palace at the Kassaba for some twelve years. He durst not sleep nor stir out of it, and he never left it till the French de-throned him.

On the road-side, as you go out by Bab-el-Oued, there are the tombs of six Deys who were all successively elected and beheaded on the same day. "Why did they compete?" I said, "for a throne which was so precarious!" He answered me—"They did not compete. When the Janissaries elected a Turk to wear the caftan, he durst not refuse it. I would rather have been the lowest shop-keeper in Paris than the Dey of Algiers."

In talking about the Turks, I told him an anecdote of one of the most distinguished Algerine Turks who came over to London and waited on the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lord Bathurst, who received him, of course, with due respect. But his Algerine Excellency thought that etiquette required him also to pay his respects the next day to Lord Bathurst's cook. He was shown into a lower saloon, and cookery was brought thither with his apron before him, and his shirt sleeves tucked up. Panic-struck was the lord of the frying-pan, as he gaped at the salaam of his Oriental visitor; and he ran back to his kitchen in a stew of astonishment. "Aye," said Ben Omar, "the simple Turk thought that your manners were like those of Algiers. Here it was necessary for the Dey's cook to be his confidential friend, for a little mistake in his cookery might have affected his Highness's stomach to a degree that might have created the necessity for a new election. Thus the cook was a high dignitary at the Court of Algiers; and for that matter, so was the hangman—a very great officer indeed, scarcely inferior to the Hasnaggee, or Prime Minister." At parting the Moor shook me cordially by the hand, and requested me to come and see him at his country house. "Have you any beech-trees on your estate?" I asked him. "Oh, yes, plenty." "Then you will receive me under one of them." As we were going home, one of the lean Frenchmen enquired what possible curiosity I could have about the beech-trees on the ex-Bey's estate? "My motive," I replied, "was simply to ascertain whether I could with a safe conscience, address him in the words,—

"Tityre, tu parles recubans sub tegmine fagi."

From the Dublin Satirist.
The Earl of Surrey to the Lord of Kildare's Daughter.

"What love is, in this heart of mine,
How oft I've tried to tell?
My tongue hath lost its ready power,
My pen hath lost its spell.
Then vainly can I hope e'en now
To say what I have been,
Or what I am; my heart! my soul's
With thee, my Geraldine!

"Thou art the author of my thoughts,
The prompter of my tongue;
For thee—for thee, my Emerald love,
I tuned my harp and sung.
Fair art thou in thy father's hall,
And o'er his princedom Queen;
Fairer to me—thou reign'st supreme O'er me, my Geraldine.

"In Spain I have proclaim'd thy charms—
In climes far, far away,
And dared all Europe's chivalry
My challenge to gainsay.
The golden curl thou gavest me
Nods o'er my helmet's sheen—
A prouder trope than war can give,
Is thine, my Geraldine.

"My heart is sick with love of thee,
Gem of the sister isle!
But hope is high encompass'd by
The glory of thy smile.
To love thee less were worse than death,
Since life hath rapture been;
To love thee better cannot be,
My heav'n! my Geraldine!"

Clad in a wandering Minstrel's garb
He came beneath her bow'r,
And breath'd his passion in his songs,
At evening's holy hour.
One star its silvery cresset threw
Athwart the glittering scene;
The Minstrel did not sue in vain—
He won his Geraldine.

THE COUSIN OF THE MARRIED, AND THE COUSIN OF THE DEAD.

[From the French.]

There was found, under the Restoration, a man who was surnamed The Cousin of the Married, and who merited the appellation by a course of industry and ingenuity truly singular. He repaired every morning to the office of the Mayor of the twelve districts of Paris, and stationed himself before the little grate, where are endorsed notices of all marriages about to take place. He read attentively the names of the affianced persons, learned their qualities, and informed himself of their fortune. When he obtained all this information, the ingenious Cousin made his choice, always deciding, however, in favor of that marriage which was expected to attract the greatest number of guests, and which promised the most sumptuous dinner. He would then buy an enormous bouquet, put on his fine black coat, a pair of open-work stockings and light pumps, and then take from his bandbox his new hat; so attired he would proceed cautiously among the carriages, with a buoyant step, to the church where the marriage ceremony was to be performed, join the crowd of attendants, and officiously offer to hold the nuptial veil. When the benediction was pronounced, he created himself Master of Ceremonies, leading the way to the carriage, giving his hand to the ladies, carefully lifting their dresses to prevent them from coming in contact with the coach wheels, shutting the coach doors and bidding the drivers proceed to the appointed hotel. For himself he was no less careful, as he always contrived to secure a place for himself in one of the carriages, so as to arrive with the rest of the company. It was then that he was brilliant, and then that his liveliness and gaiety served to beguile, with the company, the tedious hour before dinner. He had for all some remarks to excite laughter—he repeated a pleasant little story, adapted to the time and circumstance of the assembly—he hastened the preparations for the repast—humorously recommended the guests to be patient, and to prepare their appetites for eating, and when all was ready he would announce the fact himself. He was the Major Domo of the house—the man indispensable—the commissary of the feast. Every voice was in his praise—"that gentleman is very amiable"—and if any one indiscreetly inquired his name, it was answered that he was presumed to be the parent or friend of the bride, or a cousin or an intimate friend of the groom.

But it was at the table that his efforts to please were particularly conspicuous. He would post himself in the place of honor—seize the great carving-knife—cut up the meats with admirable promptness and dexterity, and carefully and politely wait upon every guest. He directed the servants, overlooked the courses, and tasted the wines. Then when the desert was brought, he would take from his pocket a piece of pink paper, mysteriously unfold it, and sing from it a stanza in honor of the newly married couple, composed by himself expressly for the occasion. The good fellow knew but one little story and but one stanza, but he served them up every morning in a new edition.

Unfortunately this witty sharper was one day detected in his career of imposition. Seduced by the attraction of great names, he went to the marriage festival of a rich nobleman of the Faubourg St. Germain. He had assisted at the mass—returned in an elegant barouche to the hotel—had glided unobserved into the parlor, and stood waiting for a suitable opportunity to rehearse his amusing little story, and to commence his impromptu remarks, so often before repeated. All at once he became the object of general attention; all at once he found all eyes fixed upon him. The mistress of the feast had counted her plates and her guests, and had ascertained that of the latter there was one too many. She was astonished to find on inquiring the name of the Cousin, that no one knew him, and that no one recognized him as a friend. For the first time the Cousin of the Married lost his self-possession and his assurance. How was he to escape the gaze of the eyes fixed upon him? How was he to answer the questions which might be addressed to him? Presently, a gentleman advances towards him and asks—"By which of the married couple were you invited—on which side are you?"

"On which side?" said the Cousin of the Married, taking his hat, "on the side of the door;" and so saying, he quickly descended the stairs and left the house. Since that day no one has heard tell of him.

But if we have no longer the Cousin of the Married, we have now the Cousin of the Dead, an expression equally as significant as the first.

Ruined by the Revolution of 1793, the Count of V was obliged to accept of a very modest employment. In consequence of a change in the Ministry, the old clerk was compelled to leave his office, with no other resource to sustain life than a miserable income of 400 francs per annum. He was old, and alone in the world. His strength did not permit him to labor, and by constantly dwelling on his poverty, he became melancholy, and subsequently fell dangerously sick. By carefully attending to the advice of a physician, who generously refused to accept the small sum the old man offered to give for his services, he became, in time, somewhat restored. This physician prescribed for his patient, on pain of a relapse, frequent exercise and a daily ride. You may judge of the poor man's embarrassment! How could he ride every day in a carriage, when his little income was scarcely sufficient to procure the essentials of life? The smallest excursions in a cabriolet cost twenty-five sous—one excursion per day would be four hundred and fifty francs per annum, and his whole yearly income amounted to only four hundred. At that time omnibuses were not invented.

He was beginning to despond when the heavens sent him succor. In passing near St. Rock, he observed that the gate of the church was hung in black, and that a long line of vehicles were in waiting to conduct a funeral procession to Père La Chaise. The coachmen were on their seats, and their strong and beautiful horses, covered with the trappings of mourning, were awaiting with impatience, the moment of departure. The advice of the physician recurred with great force to the mind of poor V—a feeling of jealousy glided into his offensive heart. He envied the fortune of those who could thus ride gratis—he envied, for one instant, the happy destiny of the deceased, in being conveyed to his last earthly home, in a splendid hearse, drawn by four magnificent horses. Feeling a curiosity to know the name and history of one upon whom fortune had so lavished her favours, he entered the church and piously knelt down among the mourners. V had on his only black coat, and he was immediately taken for one of the friends of the deceased, and after the ceremonies in the church, was offered a place in one of the funeral carriages. The occasion was too opportune to be neglected, and he gladly jumped into the wished-for carriage.

On the way, a thousand ideas passed through his imagination. He thanked heaven for having furnished him with the means to fulfil, in so economical a manner, the recommendations of his physician. He accompanied the corpse to the grave—saw the coffin laid in the tomb, and on leaving the churchyard, he found the coach in waiting, and the coachman ready to convey him home.

Since that event V has become the willing assistant of all public interments; and what was, at first, only useful as a means of exercise, has become for him a pleasure and a delight. He goes to a funeral as others go to the theatre, to a ball, or to a festival. He

BARNABY PALMS.

'Blackwood's Magazine' has long been famed for the bitter justice of its satires on the follies and vices of the times—a reputation to which it is right fairly entitled.—The last (January) No. contains a tale—"Barnaby Rums, the Man who felt his Way"—(from the pen of the dramatist Jerrold, it is said,) which fully sustains this reputation. The hero is traced through his career of mingled sycophancy, selfishness, and base intrigue, to its appropriate conclusion. The tale is very long—we extract one of Barnaby's earlier but characteristic adventures:

Old Palms was seated in his oaken parlor, steadily employed upon a breakfast, of which beef and Kentish ale, with an incidental drop of white brandy, formed the principal part. Before him sat Barnaby in his trim travelling attire. He looked and spoke the creature of humility. Could he have made the transfer, he would have given his soul to his uncle as freely as he advanced the mustard. The truth is, Barnaby was about to enter the world—he had drawn on his boots for the great pilgrimage of life.—In a few hours he must feel his way through the crowd of London, being destined to the warehouse of Messrs. Noakes and Styles, mercers, City. Hence the reader may imagine that Barnaby was subdued by the approaching event—that he felt some odd twitchings at the heart, as he stared at the old wainscot, with its every worm-hole familiar to him, that a something rose to his throat, as he looked out upon the sea, tumbling and roaring in concert with a January gale—at the sea which had sung his early lullabies—that his heart, like the ocean shell, still responded to the sound. It was reasonable to believe, though we cannot substantiate the fact—that some such emotions rose in the bosom of the pilgrim. Of this, however, we are certain, Barnaby looked with the eyes of a devotee towards a small leathern bag, laying on the table at the right hand of his uncle, and Barnaby continued to gaze at the string securing the neck, until, distracted by the appearance of Patience Mills, who—the more serious portion of the breakfast consumed—entered with a dozen of eggs.

Now Patience had a face as round, and cheeks as red as any pippin, eyes as blue as heaven, and a mouth, as a certain young man on the coast avowed, as sweet as honeycomb. Nevertheless had Patience been some smoke-dried hag, Barnaby had not visited her with looks less charitable. Patience replied to the glance by a giggle, solacing herself, when out of hearing, by muttering, glad he's going. Barnaby looked at his uncle's fingers, then at the bag. Heedless of the hint, old Palms took an egg.

"Come eat, Barnaby eat. Ye'll have a cold ride to London; the north wind's edged like a scythe. What! not take eggs?"

"Doat on 'em, uncle," cried Barnaby, aroused, like Shylock, from 'a dream of money bags.' The fact is, Barnaby had that day determined to take every thing; on that occasion he wished to leave a vivid impression of his meekness and humility. "Quite a weazel at eggs, uncle," continued Barnaby, and he began to chip the shell. Now, it so happened that Barnaby had fallen upon an egg, which, on being opened, emitted conclusive evidence of its antiquity. Old Palms, instantly perceiving the work of time, roared to Barnaby to cast the abomination out of the window. Barnaby, however, determined to give an example of his economy—of his indifference to petty annoyance—sat like a statue, still holding the egg between his thumb and finger—his uncle applying the same instrument to his own nose.

"Out with it Barney!" Barney smiled a remonstrance, and handled his spoon. "Zounds," cried old daily reads the lists of deaths in the city, and these lists are to him a journal, and the only one for which he conceives there is any use. Still more, he has taken lodgings opposite the dwelling of the undertaker, and every morning he crosses the street to converse with the undertaker, and inform himself of the burials of the day. He puts on his blue surcoat or his black dress, according to the rank and fortune of the deceased, the expenses of the funeral, &c., and for all grand ceremonies he wears crape on his arm. V is now generally known by the title of the Cousin of the Dead. For fifteen years he has not missed a single funeral. His views are too liberal to adopt party feelings; he has assisted to inter Bellart and Manuel, Talma and the Bishop of Beauvais, a female follower of St. Simon and the lady Superior of the Convent of Minimes, and he hopes to live to inter many other characters equally distinguished. He once presented to the Chamber of Deputies, a petition for a law interdicting the embalming of infants, by which the number of funeral processions is materially lessened.

The Cousin of the Dead possesses a remarkably expansive sensibility, and an extraordinary quantity of sympathy for the afflictions of others. He feels the grief of a bereaved mother, the despair of a heart-broken widow, the sorrow of a childless father, with the poignancy of truth. Many a legator, in noticing his sorrow at the grave, has taken him for a disinherited relative; many a mother has been gratified to see him shed tears over her favorite son, and many a husband on losing a beloved wife, has been astonished at his grief over her remains. He composes funeral orations for all illustrious persons; the burial place is his life and his world. At times, struck with the appearance of grief depicted on his countenance, the friends of the dead have desired him to be the principal mourner.

One day, during the burial of a personage of considerable importance, the Cousin of the Dead was observed to shed an abundance of tears. One of the mourners approached him and desired that he would make a few appropriate remarks—jeter quelques fleurs sur le cercueil—on the individual whose remains they had just deposited in the cold grave. The procession closed around him as he prepared to speak.

"The tomb," said he, "is again about to enclose the remains of a distinguished citizen." He stopped for a moment, and inquired, in a low voice, the name of the deceased. He was answered, "Augustin Leger."

"Augustin Leger," he resumed, "was a man, grave and austere. His long life was but a continued series of virtuous and benevolent acts. He was entirely devoted to the holy, the legitimate cause of—"

He was a regicide!

"The rights of the sovereign people. His disinterestedness—"

He was a usurer!

"His laudable economy, his aversion to luxury, his unassuming and modest deportment, had gained for him universal esteem. But still more worthy of admiration were his virtues in private life—his patience, his humility, and his devoted and unchangeable attachment to the wife of his bosom, the lady of his choice."

He had been divorced!

"For his children he cherished the most affectionate and tender regard."

He had driven them from his house!

"Virtuous friend! May the earth rest lightly on thy coffin!"—Southern Literary Messenger.

Never pass your opinion on any one's conduct; let every man do as he pleases provided he injures no one but himself.

Palms, almost grinning through his disgust at what he deemed the ignorance or simplicity of his nephew—"Zounds! nephew—why—ha, ha!—you'll never eat it?"

Barnaby, mistaking the humor of the uncle, nodded knowingly.

"You will? I tell you 'tis a musty egg—a bad egg—pah! the egg stinks?"

Barnaby looked as though he believed he had won his uncle's heart for ever, and then complacently made answer, "I don't care for eggs over fresh."

Now, we boldly declare the egg of Barnaby to be a grander subject for the moralist and the romance writer than either the egg of Columbus, the famous rook's egg of the Eastern Princess, the golden egg of Æsop, or the egg of Mother Goose. Reader, pause a moment, and reflect on the prosperity of whole hordes of people, whose success in life is solely attributable to their participating in the taste of Barnaby. Look at his lordship sparkling with honors, and padded with bank paper! know ye to what he owes all this? Oh, doubtless to his high statesman-like qualities—his profound knowledge—his indefatigable industry. Not so, not so; the simple story is, he was wont to confidentially breakfast with the minister, and on such occasions showed that he 'cared not for the eggs over fresh.' But shall we stay at courts and courtiers? No! from a palace to a workshop there is ever some ductile eater—some omnivorous, obsequious Barnaby at breakfast, who has made, or looks to make, a figure in the world by not caring for his eggs 'over fresh.' Many are the ways in which the tale may be told. There is Tom Spangle, a handsome, healthy, six foot animal of two and thirty. He had not a shilling; now, he rides blood, and writes checks. Do you know the secret of the change? Very well; he married the ancient, the yellow widow of an army contractor. Ay, even so; he cared not for his eggs 'over fresh.'

The avowed taste of Barnaby was not lost upon his uncle. The old man looked through the youth with a thinking eye—an eye that seemed to read his moral anatomy, and then uttered a long 'hem!' at the same time stretching his hand to the money bag. Invisible fingers were playing on the heart-strings of Barnaby, whilst from the corner of his eye, he watched his uncle slowly until the strip of knotted leather which 'compressed the god within.' The bag was opened; its glorious contents blazed on the table; and as they rang upon the oak, Barnaby instinctively rose up upon his feet, standing respectfully uncovered in 'the presence.'

"Barnaby," said old Palms, and reverently laid his hand upon the gold, "Barney, my child, you see the little hoard I've set apart for you." The life-blood of Barnaby tingled in his very eye, and his ears rang with music. "You see the few savings and scrapings I have made for the child of my brother. For I feared that you, an innocent, unprotected, unassisted lad, would need the aid which money can alone afford. Barnaby, I trembled for the softness of your heart, the simplicity of your nature." Here Barnaby felt almost in peril of tears. "Yes, Barnaby, these were my weakest anxieties, my foolish fears." Saying which, the old man began to return the guineas to the bag. During the operation not a word was spoken. Barnaby scarcely ventured to breathe, stood with his head bent upon his breast, and one eye bent upon the table, silent and subdued. The tinkling of the gold—the voice of Barnaby's fortune, was alone audible, and, as note followed note, the young expectant became possessed as though he listened to the angelic trumpets. The bag being filled, Palms proceeded to tie its mouth, talking as he leisurely tied: "Barnaby, I find my fears were the fears of ignorance. You need not such a sum as this; you are already rich in strength, in wisdom."

"I, uncle?" cried Barnaby, sensitively shrinking from the compliment, and at the same time—struck by the manner of Palms—breaking into a profuse sweat. "I strong? I wise? Oh, uncle!"

"Come, Barnaby, why so modest? I say, strength and wisdom, as the world goes, are yours. Here we've a hundred guineas in this little bag, what then? to a lad of your wit they are little worth. You'll never miss 'em. Now here, and Palms slid the coin along the table, here are five guineas."

"Five, uncle!"

"Five.—The reward of your skill—of the skill you have shown this morning."

"Five guineas? skill? uncle?"

"Never doubt it, Barnaby, take up the money, and never mistrust that head of thine; for well I know, that the fellow who, in this working world, cares not for eggs 'over fresh,' will in the end, flourish as well though he began with five guineas, as with five thousand."

"The tone and manner of old Palms forbade any reply on the part of his nephew, who, nevertheless received the eulogy with a sulkiness worthy of the great cynic. Indeed, had Barnaby pocketed five snow-balls, he could not have mounted the borrowed horse, ready saddled to convey him to London, with more reluctant leg, with grimmer countenance. No wonder, Barnaby thought he had securely felt his way; now Barnaby had lost ninety-five guineas."

MRS. HEMANS AT WAVERTREE.

From the London Ethnaum.

The house which Mrs. Hemans occupied was too small to deserve the name; the third of a cluster of row close to a dusty road,—and yet too townish in appearance and situation to be called a cottage. It was set in a small court, and within was gloomy and comfortless; its parlours being little larger than closets; and yet she threw something of her own spirit round her, even in so unpromising an abode,—and with her books, and her harp, and the flowers which sometimes half filled her little rooms, they presently assumed a habitable, almost an elegant appearance. Sometimes, indeed, the scene was varied, by odd presents, literary and others. I remember once paying her a visit, when a persevering writer, personally unknown to her, had sent her a hundred sonnets, printed on separate slips of paper, for inspection and approval; these had not yet been consigned to the "chaos drawer," as she used to call it, from which many a precious piece of folly and flattery might have been disinterred for the amusement of the public; and as the day was windy, and the window chanced to be open, this century of choice things, was flying hither and thither, much to our amusement—a miniature snow storm, chased by her boys with as much glee as if they had been a butterfly hunting. Scarcely had she settled herself at Wavertree, than she was besieged by visitors, to a number positively bewildering; a more heterogeneous company cannot be imagined. Many came merely to stare at the strange poetress,—others to pay proper morning calls, and these were surprised that she was not ready with an answer, when the talk was of housekeeping and like matters. Others, and these were the worst, brought in their hands small cargoes of cut-and-dry compliment, and as she used to declare, had primed themselves for their visit, by getting up a certain number of her poems. Small satisfaction had they in their visits; they found a lady, neither short nor tall; though far from middle age, no longer youthful nor beautiful in her appearance, (her hair, however, of the true auburn tinge, was as silken, and as profuse and curling as it

THE DOOR LATCH.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A MARRIED MAN.

"Go back and shut that door!" roared I, in a voice of thunder.

"How can you, my dear," said Julia, with a supplicating glance, "speak so very loud, when I have just told you that my head is bursting with pain."

"Because," said I, "I can bear it no longer. It is now ten years since we moved into this room, and ten times every day have I been compelled to get up and shut that door after one and another. I have talked, and talked, but it is all of no use; the door still stands wide open, and I cannot bear it—No! and I won't bear it any longer—I'll sell the house before I endure it another week."

Her tiny white hand was pressed against her throbbing forehead, as I finished the sentence with a glance at her undissembled sternness, and the mild look of patient suffering and imploring submission with which she returned my angry frown—it cut me to the heart! I could read my own death warrant at this very hour with less pain than I felt at that moment, as she raised her blue eyes, glistening with suppressed tears, and with all the innocence and affection of an expiring saint, begged me, in the silent eloquence of nature, to spare her whom I had promised to "cherish and to love."

"I have never seen you troubled," said she (uncomplaining spirit! there was no emphasis—no! not the least, on the word troubled!) "I have never seen you troubled at any thing except that door—and gladly would I remedy it, but you know I cannot. Were a very little filed from the inside of the catch, it would shut without difficulty—I should never think of it," said she, after a pause, "on my account, but it causes you so much vexation."

It was true as she had said, that I felt more anger in consequence of that unfortunate door, than all the other untoward events which I had experienced from the time of my marriage. A heavy loss—a sore disappointment—a great calamity, I could endure with composure. The trial required philosophy for its support, and the exercise of philosophy was a gratification to give. But a doorlatch! what occasion could that give for philosophy? None; and therefore I felt it gall me to the quick! It was, as I observed, so easy to shut it with a little care—such a little thing, if only attended to. "True!" whispered Philosophy in my ear, "but such a 'little thing' to get angry about! such a 'little thing' to make you miserable for an hour every day! for shame, Mr. Plowman!" To tell the truth, I began to feel a little ashamed when I recollected how much unhappiness it had caused not only myself, but through me, my dearer wife.

"I declare, my dear," said I, "that if that doorlatch had only been filed ten years ago, it would have saved each of us one year of pain before this time!"

Thomas had brought in a file before my speech was finished, and in a few moments the door shut as easily and firm as ever door did. I swung it a few times on the hinges, with an air of triumph, and I verily believe that the work of that single moment conferred more happiness on Julia, as well as myself, than all his blood-bought triumphs ever yielded to the conqueror.

"The root of bitterness," said I, "is removed at last, and I can only wonder at my own stupidity in not thinking of the simple remedy before—but heaven forgive me! I had entirely forgotten your headache; the sound of that file must have been torture to you."

She smiled sweetly, as she leaned her head on my shoulder, declaring—although her forehead burnt, and the blood was raging through her veins—that it was had ever been;) with manners quiet and refined, a little reserved and uncommunicative, one too, who lent no ear to the news of the day—

Who gave the ball, and paid the last visit.

The ladies, however, when they went away, had to tell: "that her room was in a sad litter with books and papers, and that she wore a veil on her head like no one else." Nor did the gentlemen make much way by their Della Cruzcan admiration; in fact, the stock of compliment, once being exhausted, there remained nothing to be said on either side: though there were none more frankly delighted, or more keenly sensible of the genuine pleasure she gave by her writings than Mrs. Hemans. Her works were a part of herself, herself of them; and those who enjoyed and understood the one, enjoyed and understood the other, and made their way at once to her heart. I must not forget to allude to what Charles Lamb calls the "album persecution" which she was called upon to endure. People not only brought their own books, but those of "my sister and my sister's child," all anxious to have something written on purpose for themselves. One gentleman, a total stranger to her, beset her before (as the housewives say) "she was fairly settled," with a huge virgin folio splendidly bound: which he had bought on purpose "that she might open it with one of her exquisite poems." On the whole, she bore her honours meekly, and for a while, in the natural kindness of her heart, gave way to the current, wishing to oblige every one. Sometimes, however, her sense of the whimsical would break out; sometimes it was provoked by the thorough-going and coarse perseverance of the intrusions, against which it was difficult to guard. What could be done with persons who called thrice in one morning, and refused to take their final departure till they were told "when Mrs. Hemans would be at home?" It was on one of these occasions, that she commissioned a friend of hers, in a lively note, to procure her "a dragon to be kept in her court-yard." At another time (and that I well remember was a flagrant case,) her vexation worked itself off in a no less cheerful manner:—

"They had an album with them, absolutely an album! You had scarcely left me to my fate—oh! how you laughed the moment you were set free!—when the little woman with the inquisitorial eyes, informed me that the tall woman with the superior understanding—Heaven save the mark!—was ambitious of possessing my autograph—and out 'leaped in lightning forth'—the album. A most evangelical and edifying book it is truly, so I, out of pure spleen, mean to insert in it something as strongly savouring of the Pagan miscellany as I dare. Oh! the 'pleasure of fame!' Oh! the little girl in the top of the elm tree again! Your much enduring F. H."

In the course of one of my excursions in the Navigator Islands, my confidence was put to a severe test, as I observed, while wandering amongst the trees, far from the reach of any assistance, several natives approaching, armed with spears, poised, as if in the act of throwing, and they immediately began exercising their skill, by seeing whose weapon could approach the nearest to me without striking me. During the several minutes that they were occupied with this alarming experiment, I remained perfectly still, and affected to be amused at the whole proceeding. On being afterwards asked, through the medium of an interpreter, whether I thought it was their intention to kill me, I answered no, that never having injured them, I did not suppose they would intentionally harm me. This reply seemed to give great satisfaction, and the whole party pressed their noses against me, laughed heartily, in token of approbation.—Nightingale's Oceanic Sketches.

"quite cured, since the door shut so easily!" Uncomplaining, devoted, self-sacrificing treasure of my heart! How could I do less than clasp her to my bosom, and swear to cherish her with tenfold care, and pray—while I kissed away the tear from her eye—that my own cruel thoughtlessness might never fill its place with another.

Such pleasure was too rare and valuable to be interrupted at the moment of its birth; so I took my arm chair from the corner, and sitting down at the side of Julia, who, while she held my hand, looked me in the face with very much of that expression of innocent delight, which so rarely survives childhood. I pursued my cogitations somewhat in the following order:—"Life is made up of moments. Our happiness or unhappiness, during any of these moments, depends almost invariably upon the merest trifles. If these momentary trifles are in the scale of happiness, life is happy. Take care, then, of trifles, and great events will take care of themselves. (Somewhere here I began to talk loud.) I lost a grandfather—an amiable, excellent, and most affectionate grandfather—and my grief was great. Nevertheless, I do believe that if the hard-bottomed chair [N. B. It was of white,] in which I have sat for the last eight—yes! nine years—if that chair had but been well covered with a good soft sheepskin, that sheepskin, purchased at the cost of ninepence, would have saved me from a greater grief than the death of my grandfather!"

"It is a mortifying reflection," said Julia, interrupting my soliloquy, "and one which, at first thought, would seem to speak little for your heart—yet a true one, perhaps; and yet not more true with you than many others."

"And still," said I, "I am without the sheep skin. Why? Because the pain endured in a single moment is so trifling, that if we do not take the trouble to add all the moments together, and look at the pain in the aggregate, one would hardly turn his hand upside down to be freed from it."

"But why not purchase the sheep skin now that you have added the moments together?" said she.

"After all my reflection, I should never have thought of that but for you. But a sheepskin! It will never do! A green velvet cushion may answer instead; and as the old one in your rocking chair seems to be somewhat worn, I must even buy another for you."

"Oh! green velvet, by all means!" said she. "It will correspond so well with the carpet and the new hearth rug which you promised me a month since. That was to have green for its border, you know."

I could not withstand the hint, and brought in the rug with the cushions that evening—and, to one who has ever seen my wife, I need not say that the smile that lit up her face and beamed from her eye, was worth the price of a thousand.

Extract from Washington Irving's Abbotsford.

WASHINGTON IRVING'S FIRST BREAKFAST WITH SCOTT.—On the following morning, after an early breakfast, I set off in a post chaise for the Abbey. On the way thither I stopped at the gate of Abbotsford, and sent the postilion to the house with my written introduction and my card, on which I had written that I was on my way to the ruins of Melrose Abbey, and wished to know whether it would be agreeable to Mr. Scott (he had not yet been made a baronet,) to receive a visit from me in the course of the morning.

In a little while the 'lord of the castle' himself made his appearance. I knew him at once by the description I had read and heard, and the likeness that had been published of him. He was tall, and of a large, powerful frame. His dress was simple, and almost rustic. An old green shooting coat, with a dog whistle at the button hole, brown linen pantaloons, stout shoes that tied at the ankles, and a white hat that had evidently seen service. He came limping up the gravel walk, aiding himself by a stout walking staff, but moved rapidly and with vigor. By his side jogged along a large iron grey stag hound of a most grave demeanour, who took no part in the clamour of the canine rabble, but seemed to consider himself bound, for the dignity of the house, to give a courteous reception.

Before Scott had reached the gate he called out in a hearty tone, welcoming me to Abbotsford, and asking news of Campbell. Arrived at the door of the chaise, he grasped me warmly by the hand. "Come, drive down, drive down to the house," said he, "you're just in time for breakfast, and afterwards ye shall see all the wonders of the Abbey."

I would have excused myself, on the plea of having already made my breakfast. "Hout man," cried he, "a ride in the morning in the keen air of the Scotch hills is warrant enough for a second breakfast."

I was accordingly whirled to the portal of the cottage, and in a few moments found myself seated at the breakfast table. There was no one present but the family, which consisted of Mrs. Scott, her eldest daughter, Sophia, then a fine girl about seventeen, Miss Ann Scott, two or three years younger, Walter, a well grown stripling, and Charles, a lively boy eleven or twelve years of age. I soon found myself quite at home, and my heart in a glow with the cordial welcome I experienced. I had thought to make a mere morning visit, but found I was not to be let off so lightly. "You must not think our neighborhood to be read in a morning, like a newspaper," said Scott. "It takes several days of study for an observant traveller that has a relish for auld world trumpery. After breakfast you shall take your visit to Melrose Abbey; I shall not be able to accompany you, as I have some household affairs to attend to, but I will put you in charge of my son Charles, who is very learned in all things touching the old ruin and the neighborhood it stands in, and he and my friend John Bower will tell you the whole truth about it, with a good deal more that you are not called upon to believe—unless you be a true and nothing doubting antiquary. When you come back I'll take you out on a ramble about the neighborhood. Tomorrow we will take a look at the Yarrow, and the next day we will drive over to Dryburgh Abbey, which is a fine old ruin, well worth your seeing"—in a word, before Scott had got through with his plan, I found myself committed for a visit of several days, and it seemed as if a little realm of romance was suddenly opened before me.

A certain member of Parliament, having heard many speeches in the House, to the great applause of the speakers, grew ambitious of rising to rival glory by his oratory, and accordingly watched for a favorable opportunity to open. At length an occasion presented itself. It was on a motion being made in the house for enforcing the execution of some statute; on which public spirited motion, the orator in embryo rose solemnly up, and after giving three loud hems, spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker, have we laws, or have we not laws? If we have laws, and they are not observed, to what end were these laws made?" So saying, he sat himself down, his chest heaving high with conscious eloquence, when another member rose up, and delivered his thoughts in those words: "Mr. Speaker, did the honorable gentleman who spoke last, speak to the purpose, or not speak to the purpose? If he did not speak to the purpose, to what purpose did he speak?"

LESBIA;

OR THE DRUNKEN HUSBAND.

BY THE MILFORD BARD.

Oh! that men should put an enemy into
Their mouths, to steal away their brains.

Shakspeare.

The fortunes of women, says a celebrated writer, are very precarious; and it is true. Many a lovely woman, happy in her father's house, and blessed with every thing that wealth could purchase, or affection bestow, has looked forward to the future day of courtship and marriage with delight, and promised herself years of happiness unshadowed by a cloud. But alas in how many instances are those brilliant prospects blasted, and the grave, how often has it closed over the young and lovely. How many a thoughtless girl has plunged into matrimony without duly considering the step she was about to make, and without having bestowed a thought upon, or made any enquiries concerning the character of the man, to whom perhaps she was about to offer herself a victim. Much horror is expressed concerning the suttee of Hindostan, or the custom of burning the widow alive upon the funeral pyre of her dead husband; but alas, how many wives die broken-hearted during the lives of their husbands! Men of the worst habits are always shrewd enough to conceal their evil courses when addressing a lady, and it requires the most consummate art to detect them at such a time, so studied is their pretended virtue, and so cunning are their devices.

Alexander Vernon was a rich merchant of New York, who had acquired wealth by the importation of French goods, and had retired in his old age to enjoy the fruits of his industry. He had but one child, a daughter, beautiful, gentle, and generous, and the idol of her aged father and mother. Expense had not been spared in her education, and she had received every accomplishment that is taught in female seminaries in America. She was of small stature, but faultless in her form, her complexion fair and florid, the blood mantling like a hectic on her cheek, and her large dark eyes sparkling like diamonds. The pulses of many hearts were quickened when gazing upon her angelic face, or pressing her small white hand.—She possessed, as the floridity of her temperament would indicate, a lively disposition, and she had often been heard to express the happiness she enjoyed in her father's house. As would be readily supposed, she had many admirers, and among some of the most talented, wealthy, and handsome young men in New York. It is hard to account for the unexpected choices which many ladies make from the number of their lovers, and it was thus with Miss Vernon. She fixed her heart upon Lieutenant Roland, an officer in the navy, a handsome and polished young man, but one whose character was at variance with his noble appearance. He had killed his man in a duel, and was said to indulge occasionally in gaming. His general character was that of a wild young man. He was also poor, and paid his devotion to Miss Vernon, for the double object of obtaining a lovely woman, and an independent fortune. In her presence, and in that of her parents, he was a rigid moralist, ever deprecating on the evil propensities of human nature, and the horrors arising from the indulgence of bad passions. The aged parents, who were religious, mistook him for a Socrates or Seneca, and encouraged by their kindness, his attentions to their daughter.—Miss Vernon was of a singular disposition, and often expressed her desire to reform a rake. She seemed a little disappointed in the thought that she would not have an opportunity to do so, if she gave her hand to Roland.

It was one evening in May that Roland knocked at the door, and was ushered into a splendid parlour, the floor of which was covered with the richest Turkey carpet, and the walls painted in the most lovely landscapes. Miss Vernon was reclining on a sumptuous ottoman, her hair luxuriantly falling round a neck, white as alabaster, and smooth as marble. For a moment Roland imagined himself in a romantic woodland, so complete had the painter sketched the perspective, and that the charming Miss Vernon was the goddess of the scene. The moon shone through the window in the end, and just shed light sufficient to render the illusion perfect.

Roland advanced, took her small hand, and falling upon one knee, poured into her bosom the warm protestations of his own.

"It is vain," he cried after a pause of impassioned eloquence, "I cannot live without you. In you are bound up the brightest hopes of my life, you are the charm of my existence, and without you the world is a wilderness and life a blank. Oh, yes, in my affection for you I have embarked all my hopes of happiness, and if I am wrecked I am lost forever.—My beautiful Lesbia, if you are mine, I am happy; if not, life will be no longer a blessing."

Lesbia lisened to him with her eyes fixed upon the floor, and when he ceased, plainly told him that her heart and hand were his. In the meantime when she was looking forward to brighter bliss, a cloud darkened the horizon, and a storm threatened to wreck the barque freighted with her hopes of happiness. The parents of Lesbia had learned the true character of Roland, and determined on snatching their only child from the arms of a wild young libertine. Miss Vernon admired his spirit of wild adventure, so true is it that young women in general love bad men in preference to good ones. That is, they admire the wild and romantic, rather than the sober and sedate. The reason is obvious to every one who will spend a moment in reflection. Thus the lovely Lesbia adored Roland and prided herself on the opportunity to reform a rake. Alas what a fatal mistake has it been to many a lovely woman. The parents of Lesbia remonstrated with her, but in vain. They threatened to disinherit her if she persisted in her determination, but she disregarded equally their entreaties and their threats, and they resorted to coercive measures. The weeping Lesbia, lovelier in her tears, was confined to her chamber and not suffered to see the object and idol of her heart. Despair seized upon her, and like Calypso, she was inconsolable. But opportunity offered, and she bribed a servant to convey a letter to Roland, to which she soon received an answer, couched in the strongest terms of affection. Thus a stratagem was devised to cheat her fond devoted parents, and to leave forever the home of her childhood, and the scene of many a blissful year.

It was a charming day, in the latter part of summer, that Lesbia sat near a window in her chamber, amusing herself with a favorite bird, which had been given to her long before by a young man who had bowed at the shrine of her beauty, and had been rejected.—That night she was to fly to the arms of Roland; and as the hours of the evening slowly passed away, she mused upon the step she was about to take, and addressed herself to the bird, in the language of farewell.

The clock struck eleven; and twelve was the hour of Roland's appearance. The silver crescent of the moon was sinking in the west. The favorite robin was sitting upon her fair hand, and scarcely had she breathed the words—"My poor Charley, who will feed and caress thee when I am gone," when the poor bird drooped its head, and fell dead on the table. A tear was still lingering on her cheek, when the well known voice of Roland pierced her ear. The sad omen before her almost changed her resolution, for she was a little superstitious; and who of us are not? Roland ascended the ladder, and entered the room, where he no sooner found that she was wavering, than he fell upon his knee, and implored her either to consummate her first determination, or put an end to a life that was no longer desirable. His protestations of undying devotion were renewed; and he declared that it was in her power to make him what she pleased, good or bad, happy, or miserable.

Lesbia first pitied him, then loved, because she pitied, and then again resolved to fly. It is thus that women love bad men, for if a woman suffers herself to pity the misfortunes or foibles of a man, she identifies her own feelings with his; and ere she is aware of it, her sympathies have ripened into love.

In a few minutes, Lesbia had gathered together her clothes and jewels, and had fled forever from the roof of her fond parents, whose hearts were devoted to her happiness. I never knew a happy marriage which had been consummated against the expressed will of the parents. Lesbia wept when she thought that her parents were wrapped in slumber, unconscious of the act of her disobedience. Ere the sun gilded the lofty spires of New York with his rays, the indissoluble knot was tied, which united them in the holy bonds of wedlock. The morning came; and a servant knocked at the door of Lesbia's chamber, but no voice answered. The door was locked, and alarm pervaded the whole family. They feared to enter, least they should find her stretched upon the bed of death. The room, however, was at length forcibly entered, and to their inexpressible astonishment and mortification, they found that the idol of their hearts, and only child, was gone. The weeping mother wrung her hands in agony; and the father enraged, fled from the house in pursuit. At a well known boarding house, he found his lost daughter in the arms of her husband. "How dare you villain," exclaimed the angry father, "steal into my house at midnight, and entice from her happy home, the only child of my bosom, the prop and pride of my declining years?"

Roland hung his head, and said not a word, for guilt is neither loquacious nor resentful.

"Forgive us, my father," exclaimed Lesbia, falling at his feet, "and never again, while life remains—" "Never!" cried the father with increased rage, "you have blasted the hopes and happiness of your dearest friends; and like the serpent, you have stung the hearts of those who gave you life, and nurtured you from the cradle, you have fled from your once happy home, with a man whose habits and propensities will bring you to poverty and suffering, and him to ruin and disgrace. Mark me, that child can never be happy, who brings her parent's grey hairs in sorrow to the grave."

"Oh keener than a serpent's tooth it is,
To have a thankless child," exclaimed the old man, as he burst into tears, and left the house.

"He will, he must forgive us," cried the lovely Lesbia, weeping upon the neck of her husband.

"I care not a curse," muttered Roland, in a low tone, unheard by Lesbia, "so I get his fortune."

Roland, though young in years, was well acquainted with the world, and had studied human nature, as well from observation as from books; and he now sedulously watched his conduct, and walked straightly; for he knew it would please him whose purse he was desirous of opening. The old man, who had been closely scanning his conduct for a year or more, fancied that he had been mistaken in Roland's character, and frankly offered to establish him in business. He readily agreed; and left the navy, regretted by all the officers, for he was considered a brave man. But Lesbia was not so much mistaken, for she knew him to be a regular drinker of spirits, and had often remonstrated against it, but his invariable reply was—

"Do you suppose I am such a slave to it, as to suffer it ever to gain the mastery? No, I am a man of too much resolution; and I would suffer death, sooner than it should triumph over me. My father drank for forty years, and was never drunk."

In a short time Roland was established in a whole sale store in Broadway, in the very house in which Lesbia's father had acquired a fortune. It was a good stand; and with the influence of his married connections, he soon had an extensive business, and bade fair to reap a rich harvest. He now had a new motive for being frugal, for Lesbia had presented him a daughter. But Roland had attached himself to a curse, which has ruined many a noble young man; I mean bad company. He mingled with associates who were ever prating of honor, and yet addicted to the worst of practices. With them he spent many of his evenings, and they flattered him and enticed him to drink, for the purpose of winning his money, which they knew he had plenty of.

It was a cold night in January, and the spirits moaned mournfully round the turrets of the lofty building. Lesbia was sitting by the cradle of her infant, wondering what business could have delayed so long the coming of her husband, her heart's idol. Vague fears crossed her mind; and memory wandered back to the dead bird, which expired in her hand, on the night of her elopement. Her fancy was busy in fashioning that omen, when she heard a thundering knock at the street door, which rung in repeated echoes through the dark silent halls. She opened her chamber door, and flew down the stairway, her heart pulsating, and her temples throbbing with an indefinite fear. She had no sooner opened the street door, than she beheld the object of her heart's first devoted love, in the arms of two men, his clothes torn and stained with blood. A sickness came over her, and the recollection of the dying bird again flashed upon her mind. The two men declared that he had been knocked down in the street and robbed, and that they had found and conveyed him home. Lesbia even hoped that this had been the case, as the less of two evils, but when laid on the bed, she discovered that he had been drinking; and that circumstance was the key to all the rest. All night he was delirious, and raved about the game he had been playing, swearing he had been cheated out of a thousand dollars. A little before day, he awoke, feverish and sick; his tongue parched, his mouth dry and and his eyes blood shot.

"Oh! how horrible I feel," he exclaimed, "I am suffering both mental and bodily anguish. Villains they must have been who knocked me down, and robbed me in the street last night."

The gentle Lesbia, hearing him thus attempt to cover his fault with falsehood, could bear up against her feelings no longer; and she threw her arms round his neck, and burst into tears. Seeing that she knew all, the ungrateful man felt irritated, and all men are irritable when recovering from a fit of drunkenness, and he repulsed her. It was the first act of unkindness, and she thought of the dead bird, as an omen that she had left the home of her happiness, for a life of misery. She knelt down by the bed on which lay her husband, and prayed fervently that his mad career, but just begun, might be stayed; and that the grace of God might win him to virtue. But Lesbia believed had never thought of religion; and how could she expect her prayers would be heard, when she had counted in girlhood, the possession of a wild and dissipated rake, merely through the vanity of reclaiming him. Lesbia had now the first idea of her error.

Roland was heartily ashamed of his conduct, yet would not suffer her to mention the subject. All day he was moody and morose; yet by chance she discovered that he had really lost a thousand dollars, and a gold lever watch, worth one hundred and fifty. But so devoted was this beautiful and unhappy woman, that she concealed his error, and never mentioned it, even to her parents or bosom friends. Through the day, Roland drank occasionally, as was his custom; and particularly now, as he said; to relieve the awful feelings occasioned by the last night's debauch. Towards night, he began to recover, and sat down with Lesbia to the supper table.

"I think I never will gamble again," he said, pressing his high, intellectual forehead with his hand, "or drink too much. I never believed that I would thus have been led away."

"I am rejoiced to hear you express yourself so frankly," returned the smiling wife, glad that he had introduced the subject. "But I fully believe there is no safety except in total abstinence. There is no man who intends to be a drunkard when he begins to drink; but so fascinating is its influence and effect, that the votary is led on by imperceptible degrees till he wakes as from a dream, to the horrors of his situation. You have the brightest prospects before you: the prospects of wealth, honor, and a happy old age. You have a wife who loves you with an undivided heart; yet a course of conduct like that of last night, would soon send her to the grave with a broken heart. And your child, your darling child, that lies beside you in the cradle, with your likeness stamped upon its innocent countenance, and wholly unconscious of its father's errors, what is to become of it, if you yield to the charmed influence of the social glass, and mingle with gamblers, in preference to the society of your wife, who you know is your true friend, and to whom in courtship you promised undying devotedness and love. How often did you declare, that I had charms to win you to virtue; and that I had it in my power to make you what I pleased. Ah, Roland, have those poor charms which won your heart, so soon faded? Have I so soon ceased to be your better genius, as you once declared me to be?"

"Oh! Lesbia you are too severe," exclaimed the conscience stricken Roland, melting into tears; "you stab me to the heart. Spare me, and I promise you to drink no more."

"In that promise," returned the sensible and lovely Lesbia, "is contained all others, for drinking is necessary to, and leads to all other vices. Many of the fashionable follies of the day, would go down, were it not for the bottle: it is the master vice of all other vices; and in the language of the justly celebrated Dr. Rush, it is a devil to the soul, the wife's woe, and children's sorrow."

Lesbia arose and embraced her husband, rejoicing that he had pledged himself to total abstinence, for she knew that that was the only way to destroy the habit, the only way to kill the Hydra, and to cleanse the Augean stable. Her good sense taught her, that to drink moderately was to fan the coals, and keep the flame alive, and that total abstinence was the only mode of destroying the desire and the habit. For, if a man desires to cease from the practice of swearing, he must do so at once, and entirely; for if he indulges in it occasionally, he will, infallibly, soon become as great a swearer as ever. If a man desire to rid himself of the habit of gambling, he must not indulge in it occasionally; for if he do, he will, infallibly, soon become as great a gambler as ever. Indeed it is the way to make an incorrigible gambler, swearer or drunkard, because resolution becomes weaker at every failure.

Several weeks passed away, and the gentle Lesbia enjoyed uninterrupted happiness. She congratulated herself that she had indeed accomplished what she had so long desired to accomplish. She rejoiced that her husband had extricated himself from the clutches of a demon, that Hercules had slain the Lernean serpent, and strangled Anteus. But alas! how oftentimes vain are human hopes; how transitory human bliss. Roland began again occasionally to remain late at night from home, and to rise before his usual time in the morning. Again Lesbia's fears were renewed, and again she recalled the omen of the dead bird. She looked at a large cage, containing a canary bird, which hung against the wall, and sighed. The bird, which had been singing, stopped, and seemed to look wistfully at her. It may have been fancy, for we are most superstitious when most distressed. Though Lesbia had enjoyed happiness, at the prospect of her husband's restoration, yet it was not unalloyed; for though her father had established him in business, he had not forgiven her, and had never entered her house. She was now doubly wretched; for she could plainly see, she imagined, an alteration in the looks of Roland, and believed that he rose early, that he might go unseen to the tavern.

"Oh! horrible," cried he, one morning, "is a life of dissipation! I am the most miserable wretch living."

"Ah! Roland," exclaimed his forbearing and despairing wife, you promised that you would drink no more. Why did you not continue to regard your pledge, as you did for some weeks?"

"Oh! God," he exclaimed, while he trembled from head to foot, "I have not only broke my solemn word, but I have imposed upon the best of wives. When I promised you, I did cease to drink distilled spirits, but drank beer. After a time, I tasted wine, and becoming excited by it, and being in the presence of some old friends, I took a glass of brandy. From that hour I have been a wretched man. From the bar I went to the gaming table; and shall I tell you the truth?" exclaimed the infatuated man, shouting at the top of his voice, while on his countenance, despair and remorse were depicted; "I am a beggar! I am a ruined man; for I have gambled away every dollar I am worth in the world. This house alone remains of all I possessed. Hell itself, is too good for such a wretch as I."

The unhappy Lesbia heard not his last words, for she had fainted and fallen on the floor. Roland rushed from the house to a grog shop, and there drank, to drown the horrors of his conscience. No sooner did he recover to feel the acute stings of remorse, than he again gulped down the liquid poison, and forgot, in insensibility, his own wretchedness, and the misery of her whom he had enticed from a happy home, and whose parents who now look upon her as an outcast, and an alien from their hearts.

The news was soon spread abroad, that Roland was a ruined man, and his step-father went to the store to examine into his affairs. Nearly every thing had been carried to the different auction rooms, and sold to supply the means of indulging in drinking and gaming. Roland was in debt some thousands, for goods bought of a house in Pearl street. The partners came upon him with the threat of a prison; and he now awoke to his wretched situation. To a man thus addicted to the vices of drinking and gambling, a prison is doubly terrific, for there, within its gloomy walls, they cannot be indulged. He went home on Tuesday, in an agony, to his no less agonized wife. She had not seen him since the Friday before, and his very looks alarmed her, and she involuntarily shrunk from him, as from a loathsome and polluted being. His face was bloated like a bladder filled with wind; his eyes red and swollen, and his whole appearance wild and haggard. The fond, confiding Lesbia, could scarcely recognize in him the once gay and gallant officer, the once noble and talented Roland, who in earlier days had won her heart's fond devotion, and bade her feel the luxury of love's first dream. She could scarcely persuade herself, that he once bowed down at the shrine of her youthful beauty, the acknowledged and favored votary, ere care had set a seal upon her brow, and ere sorrow had withered up the freshness of her heart. It is to be lamented, that men of the most generous hearts, and that men of the finest and most brilliant talents, are generally most inclined to the vice and habit of drinking. How many exalted intellects have been blasted; how many generous hearts have been blighted by that greatest curse that man ever entailed upon himself.

Lesbia, however, still clung to him, with that undying devotion, for which woman has been celebrated in every age and country. She clung to him as the vine still clings to the lofty oak, which has been rent and riven by the lightning of Heaven, willing to bind up his shattered frame, and shield him from the keen blasts of adversity, and the scorn of a cold, unfeeling world. All night he tossed upon his pillow, like a bark stranded upon a rock, and dreamt of fortunes won and lost; of tears, remorse and suicide. The spectre of injured innocence, heart-broken, and despairing beneath a parent's curse, stood before him in his distempered sleep; her hair dishevelled with grief, and her eyes streaming with tears. Again he fancied himself a convict in prison, chained to a flinty floor, and dying like Tantalus with thirst, while the brimming cup continually eluded his grasp; and again he saw his unhappy wife and child in rags, begging through the streets a scanty subsistence—he saw her at her father's door, pleading for admission to that once happy home, from which he had enticed her—he saw her imploring, with streaming eyes, a morsel for her famishing child, and oh! God, he saw her rudely repulsed from the presence of those parents, who once idolized with a devotion due only to perfection; and he awoke, struggling with emotions too painful to be endured. He arose in the morning, sick even to death, and trembling from head to foot, as with the palsy.—A vague fear of sudden death pervaded his mind, and a wild expression alone gave animation to his dead and blood-shot eye-balls. He started with fear from the sudden climpse of a shadow, or from hearing an unusual sound, and his diseased imagination transformed the common appearance of things into spectral shapes, and unearthly features. He was suffering some of the horrors of mania a potu. He could scarcely take time to clothe himself, ere he tore himself from the arms of his wife, disregarded her entreaties to stay, and fled to those shops where ruin is sold to thousands of infatuated beings. The effect of liquor had destroyed his appetite, and he ate nothing during whole days, nay weeks at a time. He next went to the house to which he was indebted, and sold the building in which he lived, for half the value, for the sake of a few hundreds which were his, over the amount he owed. With this in his pocket, he shunned the home where mourned the lovely young bride, whose heart he won and made wretched, and took up his abode with a wretched female, who cherished him, only that she might rob him of the last dollar he possessed. Here he drank and gambled, while Lesbia was actually suffering for the necessities of life, yet keeping from the world a knowledge of her hopeless condition, and the base abandonment of her husband. She, however, discovered his retreat, and at night went and implored him to return. The guilty wretch who harbored him, drove her from the house, and weeping she returned to the cradle of her poor fatherless child. As she sat meditating upon her miserable condition, she cast her eye up at the cage, and saw the poor canary bird lying upon its back quivering in death. She arose, took it in her hand, and attempted to feed it with the last bread she possessed, but it was in vain, for in a few minutes it expired, the victim of hunger. In the midst of her sorrows it had been forgotten.

The next day came, and Lesbia was under the necessity of pawning a gold ring, given to her by Roland at the time of her marriage. She thus obtained bread, which lasted some days. In the meantime all that was in the house was seized for Roland's debts, not leaving her even the cradle in which slumbered her infant. Thus was she reduced to the last verge of human endurance. What a change had three short years made in her condition! Then she enjoyed every luxury and happiness in her father's house; now she was abandoned by a drunken wretch, who had promised, in marriage, to love and protect her; she was suffering all the privations of poverty, with a sick child, without bread, without wood, without sufficient clothing in an inclement season, and without money to buy. The news spread through the neighborhood, that a lady who had seen better days, was suffering for the common necessities of life. One morning a gentleman and lady, richly attired, entered and enquired if they could be of service to her in her distress. At the first glance she recognized in the gentleman a former suitor, who, three or four years before, solicited her hand and had been rejected. But long suffering and hardship had so altered the once beautiful Lesbia, that Mr. Smith did not recognize in her, the angelic being at whose feet he had once bowed down, and for whose smiles and favor he would have given worlds. She was now dressed in a coarse calico gown, which in the eyes of Smith, but ill suited the symmetrical form which he had so often seen arrayed in the richest products of India's looms. In a modest manner, Lesbia made herself known, and in tears related the sad tale of all her own miseries, sedulously avoiding the errors of her unhappy husband, who was at that moment bestowing his affections upon a polluted and miserable creature. Mr. Smith, when he had conversed awhile, arose, silently pressed her hand, and departed with his wife, who had once been the associate of Lesbia at a boarding school up the Hudson. Her mind now reverted to those scenes, and the happy hours she had spent with Caroline Bowers, now the wife of Smith, and while memory rambled through the sunny spots of the past, the tears of regret stole down her pale cheeks, and a deep sigh broke from her bosom. She could not bear the retrospection, and rising to look for food for her child, her eyes fell upon a five dollar note, which Mr. Smith had laid upon the table as he left the room.

"Heaven bless that generous man!" exclaimed she, falling upon her knees, and lifting her dark eyes, streaming with tears to Heaven, "my child we shall not starve yet."

"Thus did this once favored, and now unfortunate woman, eke out a miserable existence, dependant upon the hand of charity for support. Her parents lived far from her in another part of the city, and never visited her. Oh ye who were born in the lap of luxury; ye who dwell in pomp and pride, ye know not the agonies which poverty brings to those whom fortune has forsaken. Of all poverty, that is the worst which has sprung from former abundance and luxury; of all conditions, it is the most painful and humiliating."

It was about a month after this, that Lesbia was sitting at night with her child, hovering over a few coals, when a knock was heard at the door. Supposing it to be some charitable individual, she arose and opened it, when, to her astonishment, Roland staggered into the room, in search of plunder, his money having all been squandered. Seeing that all the furniture had been removed, he enquired in a stern tone where it was. The heart of Lesbia was full; her affection for Roland was not changed, and as she rushed forward to throw her arms round his neck, he struck her a blow that felled her to the floor. The child screamed and seeing blood flow profusely, and hearing Lesbia say, in a mournful voice—"Oh! Roland, you have killed me," he fled back to the wretched hovel at the Five Points from whence he came. It was past midnight when Lesbia came to her senses. She was lying upon the cold floor, the blood clotted over her face and form, and the child lying upon its bleeding mother's bosom. She arose and after cleansing herself from her own gore, she spread her scanty bed and retired, not to rest, but to weep and sigh over the recollection of her wrongs, and the errors of her misguided and miserable husband.

The next week, the owner of the house ordered her to leave it within ten days, as it had been rented. Lesbia, though a woman of firm mind, now turned pale, and a sickness came over her, for she had no friends. Whither could she fly? Where apply for succor? The last of the ten days arrived, and it was a cold snowy day in February, the wind blowing a hurricane from the northeast. On such a day, she found herself half naked in the streets, with her shivering child in her arms, and with an old pair of shoes that leaked like a riddle. She wandered up and down the streets, without knowing whither to go, while her tears froze as they fell. Oh, who can imagine the sorrows that filled the heart of that amiable and unfortunate woman! Her agony was heightened by the recollection that she had married against the will of her parents, and had been warned of her fate.

The day was far spent, when cold and hunger, she bent her steps towards her father's house, that once happy home, in which she had spent her childhood and the bright morning of her existence. That pride which had hitherto supported her, gave way when she heard the piercing cries of her child for food. The last rays of daylight were gradually sinking in night, when covered with snow, and shivering, she set her foot upon the marble steps of her father's large and luxurious mansion. A cheerful fire was burning in the parlour, and throwing its bright rays against the painted walls, which she could see from without. She feebly knocked at the door, and her grey haired father appeared and accosted her.

"Who are you, my good woman, and what do you want here at such an hour?"

"Oh! my dear father, have you so soon forgotten your once loved daughter, and —"

"Yes," replied the stern old man, "I forget those who forget their duty to their parents."

"Oh give me and my poor child the meanest apartment in the —"

The old man slammed the door ere he heard the last sentence, and left her to reflect in the darkening streets upon her forlorn and wretched situation. Her tears flowed in torrents, and pressing her hungry and shivering child to her bosom, she wandered up a dark alley, where, worn out with fatigue, she sunk down in the snow, while drowsiness gathered thickly over the senses of her child. About ten minutes after, an aged black woman was seen standing over her, weeping bitterly, for she recognized in Lesbia, the child whom she had nursed in other years. After long exertion, she roused the drowsy sufferer, took her child in her arms, and led the way to her master's house, declaring that she should be fed, whether she was admitted into her father's house or not. When they arrived, the generous nurse entered the parlour, told the piteous tale of the perishing daughter, and then, in tears, pleaded with nature's eloquence, for mercy. The aged mother melted into tears, and flew to the kitchen to embrace once more her erring and long lost daughter. So much had suffering altered the appearance of Lesbia, that her mother could scarcely recognize in her, the once gay and beautiful girl. They embraced each other, while tears flowed plentifully, and many a heartfelt sigh escaped their bosoms.

"Give me food for my perishing child, Oh! my mother," exclaimed Lesbia, forgetting her own hunger, "she has not tasted food since yester night."

Food was brought, hunger was appeased, and they were placed in a downy bed, from which Lesbia did not arise till the end of six weeks. A raging fever seized her, and in her delirium, she talked of her sufferings and wrongs, which she had so long hid from the world. Many tears flowed, even at the feverish recital of her sufferings and sorrows, hid from the world.

In the mean time, Roland had drunk to such excess, that he had brought on mania a potu, and was suffering all the horrors of hell. When he laid down, he imagined that devils were grinning in his face, and his ears rung with their execrations. Demons were continually dragging the bed clothes off him. The common objects in the room, were spectres; and every sound, his distempered imagination transformed to words of hideous import. Loathsome vermin were crawling upon him, and he fancied that he was to be put to death with more than Indian tortures. When he fell in a doze, horrible visions presented themselves; he fancied himself dead, and found himself in the dark domains of Hell. He awoke trembling with agony only to undergo the same again when he fell asleep. In the day, his path was beset with the most hideous creatures, that with wide extended jaws menaced his approach. If the miseries of the damned are greater, great must they be indeed.

In this situation, the officers of the Alms house ordered him taken. The wretched Roland conceived the horrific idea, that he had murdered his wife; and that the officers of mercy who were after him, were the ministers of justice. Their very words of pity, he transformed into execrations and condemnation. He believed that they were about to convey him to prison, and endeavored with all his strength to escape.

He was taken to the Alm house, searched and placed in a cell, which he believed to be a dungeon in Bridewell. Here he suffered all the terrors of the reality, and perhaps, more than the guilty criminal, inasmuch as his fancy was unnaturally excited. The inmates of other cells, he imagined to be criminals, like himself condemned to die, and he believed that three days were all that he had to live, overlooking entirely the circumstances that he had not been tried. He counted every moment as it passed, and so great was his dread of death, that cold drops of sweat would start from his brow, and his face become livid and pale. Oh, if there is one young man who has just entered the path of dissipation, let him stay for a moment his mad career, and consider the horrid sufferings that are in store for him. Let him not think that the awful terrors I have described, are but the creatures of fancy, they are real, and the dissipated man whose eye falls upon these pages, will confess and recognize the truth of their portraiture. Roland could not lie down, but he was surrounded by demons or devils of the most uncouth appearance, that taunted him with the certainty of his approaching fate, and threatened him with the tortures he should endure after death, when his unhappy spirit should be doomed to the gloomy abodes of Pluto. At another moment Satan would wind him up in an inextricable labyrinth, while the wretched captive was struggling for breath, and struggling to be free. In such horrors as these, Roland passed some of the long winter nights, and endured sufferings too great to be conceived.

It was as he fancied, on the night before his execution was to take place, that the bleeding spirit of his murdered wife stood before him; one of her eyes hanging from her head, and her skull so much fractured that the brain was escaping from the wound. A wild agony seized him, and he fancied she had come to conduct his spirit down to the abodes of wretchedness and despair. When this frenzy had partly passed from the busy brain of the maniac, he could hear the sounds of the hammer and axe, used in the building of the gallows on which he was to be hung next day. He could hear the voices of the builders, and the horrid speculations of the bystanders, who were quarrelling about the possession of the body after the death. His dread of death was now unutterable, and he trembled from head to foot like an aspen. Never, certainly, was the reality more terrific.

At length the morning came, and the keeper entered his cell to shave him. Roland immediately conceived that he was the jailor, and that he had come to shave him preparatory to the execution. This dreadful idea took full possession of his mind, and he trembled to such a degree that he could scarcely be shaved. He now fancied that the jailor spoke, and bade him prepare for death, saying that a vast multitude had assembled to witness the awful spectacle. Roland fancied that he could hear the shouts of the multitude, calling on his name with imprecations. The keeper had marked an extraordinary wildness in his eye, and turned round for a moment to adjust some small matter, when Roland, unseen, seized the razor, and at one stroke, cut his throat almost from one ear to the other. The torrent of blood gushed upon the keeper; he turned suddenly round, and beheld Roland falling backwards, his eyes wildly fixed upon vacancy, and his countenance distorted with the emotions of fear and despair. The keeper fled in the apothecary's room, where, luckily, he found the attending physician and one or two students, who immediately repaired to the cell of the bleeding maniac. The floor was covered with his blood, and he had fainted. Upon examination, it was found that he had cut one of the jugulars, and had just touched the carotid artery.—The bleeding and severed vessel was taken up, after some difficulty, and the insensible Roland was placed in a bed, where he fluctuated between life and death for some days. At length, after much suffering, he began to recover, and enquired for Lesbia, whom he supposed he had murdered, and who had indeed suffered every thing but death. She was happy, however, to hear that he was recovering, and with woman's confiding fondness, was ready to trust him once more.

In four or five weeks Roland nearly recovered, and was discharged from the Alms house. Lesbia was sitting in her father's parlour, watching her child play on the sofa, when the door opened, and Roland entered. Lesbia sprang from her seat and rushed into his arms, and wept for joy upon his bosom.

"Oh! Lesbia, my much injured yet forgiving wife, I am a changed, an altered man," exclaimed Roland, after my first embrace. "Never again shall you weep over my follies, or despise my conduct. You have suffered; in future you shall rejoice."

Every one present wept for joy as he continued.—"No, I am resolved in future, not only to abstain from dissipated liquors, but from every thing that contains alcohol, for the weaker liquors invariably lead to the stronger."

Roland the next week signed a list of names devoted to temperance, and he has ever since religiously kept his promise. Lesbia and her husband still reside in New York. His business is not as prosperous as it once was, though he has amply improved the capital given him a second time by his father-in-law. In total abstinence, he has found that safety and happiness to all around him has been the result. Three blooming children are growing up in their smiles, and will inherit an honorable name from their father, who once bade fair to go down in infamy to an untimely tomb. Bless is that dissipated man who believes and adheres to TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

SOMETHING THAT ACTUALLY HAPPENED.

There is no mania so general among the readers of fiction, as the mania for incident—incident of all kinds. The dialogue may be brilliant, the descriptions beautiful, the characters original, the sentiments noble and well expressed—no matter—your book must have a duel in it, a "sudden death," a "found drowned," a "dreadful murder," or a "mysterious disappearance."

We record the following "incident," in the hope that such as may be going to dine—ravenously hungry—upon a "three vol. post oct." will not find their appetite impaired by a "relish" that owes its existence to real life.

"What a place for a gentleman to live in!" said Henry Evanshaw, a victim of the Greek-and-Latin-incompetency system, as he sat in his back attic, which "served him for parlor, and kitchen, and all," one dreary afternoon in September; and in "melancholic mood and accents low" he began taking an inventory of the properties which constituted his "furnished lodgings," and consisted of very little more than pens, ink, paper—six treatises, eight epics, and nine novels!

Henry had again resigned himself to the gloom of contemplative retrospection, when the accents of his landlady broke upon his ear—not "like Houri's hymn," but in a tone the very reverse of that kind of voice which has been pronounced to be "a most excellent thing in woman"—intimating that the "postman" had been again with the letter from Brighton, and had again "refused to leave it," save for prompt payment. This was from his father, to whom he had written two days previously for another "last supply."

In the evening Mr. Evanshaw was passing a neighbouring coffee house to which he sometimes resorted, and longing to be possessed of such a sum as would justify him in entering, when he was accosted by its proprietor—"I think, sir, your name is Evanshaw?"

"It is," said Henry; and tailors and bailiffs alternated before his eyes.

"I have a parcel for you, sir, left this afternoon," and in two minutes the packet was placed on the table at which Henry had now seated himself, and the poor scholar was left monarch, pro tem, of all he surveyed.

A flush of hope crimsoned his hungered cheeks, as he broke the seals of the packet; it was but momentary, and the sight that instantly followed bespoke the man whom experience had taught to expect disappointment, but whose sanguine temperament bade him hope the best.

The packet contained a letter, and a hundred pound Bank of England note! The former had neither signature nor date, nor was the address of the writer mentioned; farther, the handwriting was perfectly unknown to him. The contents were as follows:—

"Mr. Henry Evanshaw is informed that if he will go this night to 11 — street, Cavendish square, he will find apartments fitted up for his reception, and the people of the house ready to pay him every attention. Mr. H. E. is further informed that, if he will call to-morrow at Messrs. Drummond's, he may, on stating his name, and the above address, receive the sum of £250; a third such may be had by him, on personal application, every quarter. Enclosed is a hundred pound note."

A Royal salute, a discharge of artillery, would convey but a faint idea of the echoing rat-tat-tat, which astonished the intellects of the inhabitants of — street, Cavendish square, as the clock struck ten, on the night of the day when our incident commenced. The lion's head, had it been a real one, would have ached until the following Christmas.

"Mr. Evanshaw, I presume?" said the landlady; "pray, walk up stairs, sir. The gentleman in blue told me to be prepared to receive you at about ten: we have just finished. The gentleman in blue, I'm sorry to say, s.r., left about three minutes ago."

These last observations of the landlady were just concluded, as the parties entered the drawing-room. The effect this produced on our hero as he entered, was very similar to that which the palace of the three sisters had upon the fisherman in the Arabian Nights. Astonishment is said to be the result of ignorance: all marvelling, therefore, must be excused in a man who for the last eight years had been doomed to the bare walls and sterile interior of a poet's attic.

The room he entered was a noble one. The finest Turkey carpet hushed the treading of the delighted feet, rich crimson velvet curtains helped to inclose the warmth imparted by the cheerful fire, and the imagination partook of their fervid glowing—of their gorgeousness. A mirror, which reached the ceiling, was hung over the white marble mantel-piece; the walls were plentifully adorned with a few of the choicest pictures of the old masters, with the exception of that opposite the fire-place, which was totally covered by a mahogany set of book-shelves. And

"Round the lamp of fretted gold Bloom'd flowers in urns of china's mould."

The other room contained all the appurtenances of an elegant sleeping apartment.

But one thing surprised him more than all this. The books, the papers, the beloved inkstand, the gilt of a dear friend, and all that he could have cared for in the abject poverty from which he had just been rescued, were there! less than three hours before, they had lain scattered about the forlorn attic in — lane! He had thus nothing to regret—every thing that could contribute to his well-being, mental and physical: misery seemed to have been changed into happiness, as suddenly and unaccountably as Harlequin changes a beefsteak into a beautiful goddess.

Verily, it, as Bishop Berkeley contends, our life is but a dream, what a supper must many of us have eaten before we first went to bed! What a very improper quantity of superfluities we must have indulged in, that such not-to-be-accounted-for and contradictory things takes place; that misery and happiness come and go—now one and now the other; that now we are beloved, now hated—now weeping, now laughing; in short, how very good an argument it is in support of the Bishop's theory, that our life is so very like the dreams that we have on our beds of down or flimsy couches—equally paradoxical, absurd and useless!

Weeks passed away, during which Henry heard nothing of the "gentleman in blue," whom he had suspected to be a relation of the "gentleman in black." He nevertheless had done little else than enjoy himself in the company of his delightful old authors—friends, who had been his only ones in need, and to whom he now felt increased gratitude, as well as respect and affection.

There are few pleasanter places than a public exhibition-room—the realm of colour, delight, and refined enjoyment. About a theatre, we know not why, there is an inherent appearance of dissipation; the effort to get at pleasure strikes us more than the pleasure itself; everybody laughs, but apparently only because others do; and, furthermore, the fatigues of the day have left the revellers weary and listless. But a morning exhibition—with the sun pouring in through the windows, the sleep-freshened faces, the sociable mingling of the enjoyers, the moving to and fro, the approving hum, in short, the animation that is really partaken of by every one—is a remnant of the golden time; a place apart, sacred to innocence and knowledge—a temple fit to adorn the purity of a poetical paradise. Mr. Evanshaw agreed with us, and, after he had been there some two or three hours, found that he had not yet done one room.

He was now struck by a particularly fine picture of Edward Landseer's, and sat down on a bench to enjoy it at his leisure. He had not been long seated thus, when a gentleman, who had, unperceived by him, placed himself by his side on the bench, observed to him that he thought the picture he was looking at was the finest in the room. The stranger was a man of proportions the very smallest, though delicately moulded; and his deportment had that character which is implied, though not expressed, by the word gentlemanly—a mixture of elegance, modesty, and self-consciousness. His features were handsome, but chiefly remarkable for sweetness of expression and that patient quietude which is the result of either past suffering or habits of study. His dress, by the way, was blue.

"I am happy, sir, in being able to agree with you," said Evanshaw. That picture of Landseer's has, to me, more genius about it than any other I have seen,—more truth. The artist has a power greater than any other, of expressing what he feels; and it is this power to express, and not to feel only, which constitutes the fine painter, as well as the fine poet and musician. But there are many other very beautiful pictures."

"There are, indeed," replied the stranger: "You will forgive me if I am mistaken in judging from your last observations, that you are disinclined to make comparisons."

"I did not mean so by what I then said. I simply wished to cultivate a feeling of gratitude for any thing of the beautiful that an artist gives us, however little that beauty may be. I will not forget, in my admiration of Landseer's genius, the feeling and truth of that little landscape yonder. A dewdrop is lovely, though the smile of my mistress is more so; and certain troubles, Sir, have made my heart bound forward with the deepest gratitude to the mind that can bring a smile from my heart, or for an instant unnerve the frown that suffering has placed upon my brow."

"I cordially sympathize with you in that feeling," returned the stranger; "that theory has been my comfort through life—has enabled me to encounter poverty with a light heart."

"What would become of love," asked our hero, "if that theory was not the true one? What would become of association? That one finest thing which our experience had taught us, and that one only, would then be beloved by us, and the whole wisdom of 'natural piety' be done away with. In fact, it is impossible for humanity to feel otherwise, seeing that it is a creation whose happiness is half-generated by memory—by the past, however sad or various."

Some time passed, and the two gentlemen seemed disinclined to drop a conversation in which their own separate views and opinions discovered themselves to be so agreeably in unison. The lateness of the hour, however—it was nearly four o'clock—obliged Evanshaw to think of returning home, and he intimated as much to his companion, who, with an un-English cordiality, yet with the truest and most differential politeness, proposed that they should dine together at his own house. This arrangement Evanshaw gladly consented to; and, arm in arm, as though they had been friends who had "grown up inseparably together," they descended the staircase, mounted our hero's cab, and in ten minutes were seated at their ease in the stranger's drawing-room, in Hanover street.

The dinner was over, and for some reason or other, Henry was happier than he had felt for many years.—With a man who was evidently not only a scholar, but one also of refined taste and profound reading, he felt, for the first time these eight years, in his element; and as he turned over the pages of his friend's parchment-covered Theocritus or Homer, pages browned by the breath of antiquity, the flush of sympathy suffused his face, and he could have taken him by the hand with all the glowing cordiality of an old and fond associate.

"Were you ever in Italy, sir?" said the stranger host, after some conversation on other matters.

"Yes, some ten years ago."

"You travelled over the Alps, of course?"

"Yes, I did," said Evanshaw. "The Alps are dear mountains to me. Their grandeur, scenery, their memories, I can appreciate to the full; but it is extraordinary how a little bit of the heart, how a feeling, a particle of love, takes precedence with me of all that is merely mental. I saved a man's life on the Alps, and my gratitude to Heaven for giving me the opportunity of doing so makes me daily happy; for daily I give vent to it ere the labours of the day are entered upon."

"Did you ever meet, in Italy, with an Englishman of the name of Barrow?"

"Barrow! 'Twas his name; the name of him I preserved. Is he living?"

"He is."

"Do you know him?"

"Strange to say, though I have seen him every morning for many years, I do not know him. I mean in the profound acceptance of the word. If I did know him, I should have mastered one of the greatest metaphysical difficulties in the world."

"You speak in riddles. Can I see him?"

"That is for you to say. I should think you might, for he sits close to you at this instant." And with these words the stranger bared his wrist, and discovered to his friend the scar made by a wolf's teeth.

The friends were now in each other's arms.

"Domestic calamities, of all sorts, have altered me, my dear Evanshaw," said Barrow, after a time. "But good philosophy has enabled you to carry cheerful and unimpaired looks, despite your long poverty. Is every thing arranged as you like it in — street?"

"How is it possible you could know my lodgings?"

"Simply, because I—I am the gentleman in blue."

There was too good an understanding between the friends—the faith of each in the other's nobility of nature, set all entreaties on the part of the one, and all refusals to be obliged on that of the other, quite out of the question. They felt, as it were, with the same heart.

Many years have passed away, during which period the two friends have not been once separated. They took up their abode together the day after their meeting at the exhibition: have both married since; and, with their respective children, still have one roof covering them—are, while we are writing, in the very best health, (we drank tea with them last night) and as young at heart, and as full of hopefulness and kind doctrines as they were twenty years ago. H. H.

Since the days that are past are gone for ever, and those that are to come may not come to thee, it behooveth thee, O man! to employ the present time, without regretting the loss of that which is past, or too much depending on that which is to come.

Never be forward to teach or inform others, without being invited to do it: no man, though he be ignorant, likes to be thought so.

THE COUNTERFEITER'S DAUGHTER.

In the year 1814, our regiment, after having distinguished itself in the Peninsular campaigns, and having suffered severely in the sortie from Bayonne,—which, as the news of the treaty of Paris arrived immediately after, was the closing scene of the war,—set sail from Bordeaux, to gain new laurels in America. I had just been promoted to the grade of Captain, having served as Lieutenant for ten years, and received a wound in my knee, the effects of which I shall carry to my grave. Part of the expedition was destined for the Chesapeake, but a large detachment was despatched to the Canadas, comprising our corps. Being somewhat of an invalid upon our arrival, I was not detailed for active service, but remained during the short period that elapsed before the peace of 1815, first in garrison at Quebec, and latterly at Trois Rivières, where my health became re-established.

As the spring of 1815 opened, I used to take my fowling piece, a real Joe Manton, and a pointer named Ponto, given me by a brother officer who died upon the field of battle at Salamanca, and thus accounted, would ramble about for miles in the vicinity of the town, stopping occasionally to rest in the houses of the habitans, as the French settlers in the Stigories are termed, and lancing myself among the peasantry of the France I had so recently quitted; though pines and hemlocks were but an indifferent substitute for the olive and vine. It was an excursion to the Rivière du Loup, a tributary to the St. Lawrence, in order to view some falls which had been represented by an old habitant as highly picturesque, that the following incident befel me:

I had chosen for a guide one of a tribe of Indians called Abenquis, who knew the exact situation of the falls, and set out from Trois Rivières early on a clear June morning. We viewed successively the falls of the Gabel, La Frays, and Chevenegon, which last some consider nearly equal to Niagara itself in grandeur, and passed the night in a retired hut in the Seignory of Machiche. The next morning we pursued our journey leisurely, and at noon arrived near the desired spot. The Indian, as if satisfied of having performed his task as guide, pointed listlessly in the direction of the falls, and seated himself on a stump, seemingly unconscious of the attractions of the scene; but I, though much fatigued, forgot all my toil in the animating prospect, and rushed forward to view the object of my search. My haste was near proving fatal. The sods of the bank loosened by the melted snow, and undermined by the spring freshet, gave way, and had I not caught a branch of a projecting birch, I should have been dashed to pieces upon the rocks in the bed of the river, an hundred feet below. The branch, however, sustained me, though sunk far below the level of the bank; and bracing my feet against a projecting stone, I called loudly upon my guide. But no Indian appeared. "The noise of the waterfall may drown my voice," thought I, and I hallooed yet louder than before. Still no appearance of help.

"God of heaven!" I ejaculated,—as I remained swinging in mid air, grasping a weak and pliant branch, and dreading to make any effort to rise through fear of breaking my only support,—"he has fallen asleep!" As the possibility flashed through my mind, a cold sweat crept over me, and I felt my remaining strength deserting me. The frail branch seemed about giving away in my hands, and my senses became painfully acute. I fancied I could hear the bits of gravel dropping from the bank under my feet, and the tree slowly uprooting beneath my weight. And then I thought on my sins and my past life, and in mental agony exclaimed, "If I survive this,—if a Providence interferes to rescue me,—I will be a changed man." Then I thought of the futility of a death-bed repentance, and shrieked again wildly for succor.

A soft voice struck my ear: I looked up, and, merciful Heavens! beheld the face of a girl, anxiously bending over the bank. She was attired in the common dress of the habitans—and saying, "Ah mon Dieu! c'est un homme!" she disappeared in an instant.

I now had a ray of hope, though exhausted nature threatened to fall at every moment. However, in a few minutes, which my anxiety made ages, she returned with an elderly man, and my recreant guide. The stranger had a rope, which he contrived to throw about me, and bracing my feet against the bank, I was slowly drawn up. On reaching the top, I faintly.

When I recovered I found myself on a bed, in a large room, which, from the smoky rafters over head, seemed the kitchen of a cottage. My wounded leg felt as if again broken, and a high fever was stealing over me. At the bedside sat the girl whom I had seen on the bank. I endeavored to address her, but she motioned me to be quiet, putting her finger to her lips, with an expressive gesture. The old man, who appeared to be her father, came in, and eyed me with a singular look, which struck me even in the midst of my pain, and which I have often since recalled to mind. After uttering some unintelligible words, he went to a cupboard, took out a pipe, which he filled, and then sat down in a corner of the huge fire place, where he was soon enveloped in a cloud of smoke. The girl, whom the old man called Marie, rose from my bedside, and began to arrange the apartment, preparatory to supper. As I looked at the old Frenchman in the corner, my fever grew more violent, and I began to feel a singular expansion of the head. Then I thought his pipe a cannon, and the smoke, that of a battery: and I cried out to cheer the combatants, and finally lost all recollection in a wild delirium.

How long this lasted I know not. My first sensation was a feeling of utter feebleness. I opened my eyes, and saw nothing but the lured light of some of the embers, over which several persons appeared to be conversing, for the darkness prevented me from distinguishing forms. A voice which I recognised as that of the father of Marie, began in French:

"If he goes back, our place, with all its advantages, will be discovered, and then we can never be secure. Perhaps he has seen nothing, but we cannot trust to that—and if he suspects anything, we are blown at once."

"It's all the fault of Marie," said another voice; "had she left him dangling where she found him, we should have been saved all this. A plague on all soft-hearted folks, I say!"

"Pierrot! Pierrot!" said a voice, which I took to be that of Marie, beware how you provoke me with your taunts. Your life is in my hands, and you know it. If you would be safe a day, beware how you exasperate me! We have had crime enough without adding murder to the list. Besides, he is delirious, and we need apprehend nothing."

"Remember how Le Noir was seized: had he shot the officer, he would have escaped."

"Le Noir was a fool, and went to Montreal against father's express direction; he deserved to suffer; besides, it was for murder."

"Marie is right," added the father, "though I am uneasy at his stay. Leave him to her, and she will contrive to get him away, as she brought him here, without his knowing it. So we may consider this matter as finished." With this I heard a stir of persons rising to depart, and half a dozen forms flitted before the embers, and left the house,—their steps being audible at some distance from the cottage. Marie raked up the coals, and retired to rest.

All was still in the apartment, save the melancholy chirping of the crickets in the hearth; but sleep had been effectually chased away from me, and I remained in a state of disturbed wakefulness all the night. Marie entered in the morning, singing gaily some old French refrain; but gathering from the altered expression of my face, that I had recovered my senses, she suddenly stopped and on my attempting to speak, she checked me with a gesture, and whispered: "Be silent as you would live!" I nodded assent.

Marie and her father were the only persons who for many days subsequent, and indeed till my entire recovery, were seen by me, though I thought I could distinguish the sound of footsteps, and suppressed conversation overheard. At length I made ready to depart.

"Ma chère Marie," said I to her on the eve of my departure, "how can I reward you for your care of a lone and helpless man? Tell me what present I shall bestow on you or what request fulfil. Name it, if any there be."

She looked at me inquiringly, then replied, "can I trust you?"

"I am a British officer, and my word has never been doubted," answered I with energy.

She ran into an adjoining room, and returned, bringing a small clasped bible. "Swear upon this," cried she, "never to reveal to mortal, the existence of this dwelling, or what you have seen within its walls." "I swear," replied I, pressing the sacred volume to my lips. "Next," said she, "I must insist on you submitting to be blindfolded. No harm shall betide you, but you must yield."

I complied, and was bandaged across the eyes by her own hands. This done, she took my hand and led me for about ten minutes, when we came to a halt, and the bandage was removed. I was in open space near the river side, and close by was a man on horseback, holding another horse by the bridle.

"Adieu, Monsieur," exclaimed she, as I mounted—"adieu! and do not in your prayers forget poor Marie."

I bent in my saddle as though wishing to speak to her; she approached, and I stole a kiss. She started back with a mingled blush and laugh. My guide set spurs to his horse, and I followed his example. Turning round to look for Marie, she had disappeared.

The Canadas were slowly recovering from the effects of the American war, and the energy of the executive was constantly put in requisition to correct the moral tone of a people deteriorated by frequent opportunities of rapine and pillage. Among other evils, the crime of counterfeiting had increased to an alarming extent, and so bold had those engaged in it become, that it was not uncommon to meet Canadians, and refugee Americans, boasting publicly of the success of their attempts to cheat the community. One flagrant instance of villainy occurred in the town of Trois Rivières. Three were concerned, of whom one was apprehended and taken before the authorities of the place.

The criminal obstinately refused to give any account of his accomplices, till frightened by the ruse of setting up a gallows, accompanied by a threat of instant execution, he confessed himself one of a gang of counterfeiters, and offered, if secured a pardon, to discover the haunt. The chief, he said, was named Jacques Dessaul, and he described his character and ferocity in such a manner that it was deemed advisable to detail a military party for his apprehension.

Being fond of adventure, I solicited and obtained the command; and early on the following morning we set out for our destination, having first placed the prisoner in front, with his hands pinioned behind him, and giving orders in his hearing to shoot him if he attempted to escape. As we advanced rapidly into the interior, the scene became more and more familiar, till at last I recognized the identical spot where my life had been endangered, and the guide declared that we were near the dwelling of Jacques. I halted the men behind a thick clump of underwood, and crept forward to reconnoitre. A few steps brought me to the open space where I had taken leave of Marie, and I could doubt no longer that her father's house was the rendezvous and workshop of the counterfeiters.

The truth just flashed through my mind when I heard the sound of footsteps, and had hardly time to crouch behind a hemlock stump, before Marie herself, driving a cow, and singing merrily, crossed the opening and entered a narrow path among the bushes. I marked the direction she took, and returned to my men.

It was now dusk, and the night hawks began to whirl in mazy circles over our heads, while the whip-poor-wills, with their almost human cry, filled every thicket. We remained stationary till we thought, from the lateness of the hour, the inmates had retired to rest, and then with noiseless steps followed our guide. He conducted us along the path taken by Marie, and in a few minutes brought us in front of a low stone cottage of one story, with gables, so completely embosomed among trees and shrubbery as to be hardly visible, even when pointed out, and entirely unperceivable by the casual observer. We surrounded it silently, and then listened to detect any movement of those within. One of the men declared he heard the sound like a press, and creeping close to the wall, I put my ear against it in order to ascertain. A slight jar as of something moving upon rollers, convinced me that they were engaged in striking off bills, and I rapped loudly at the door. The noise ceased instantly, and all was still as death.

Again I knocked and demanded admission. I heard a sound as of persons conversing within, and then a voice, which I knew as that of Jacques Dessault, cried out, 'Qui va là?' (1)

'Open the door!' was my reply, 'or I shall force it!'

'I know his voice,' said Marie—'open it, father.'

And the old man cautiously opened the door, just sufficiently to allow him to peep out, when it was violently pushed by a rush of the soldiers, throwing Jacques upon the floor with the recoil.

He rose like a tiger, and drawing a pistol, fired at me. The shot would have proved fatal, had not Marie, crying, 'Ne tirez pas!—Ne tirez pas!' (2) struck the barrel upward with her arm.

'Meurs, traîtresse! c'est toi qui nous as perdus!' (3) shouted the infuriated father, discharging a second pistol at his daughter.

She murmured 'Mon Pere!' and fell prostrate on the floor. I rushed to her aid, and placed her upon the well known bed. She cast on me a look that spoke volumes of reproaches, and expired.

The father was instantly pinioned hand and foot, and remained a passive spectator of the search made for counterfeit money, of which we found a great quantity, with the plates and press for its fabrication. The latter we destroyed, and most of the former, preserving a few specimens only, to serve as proofs.

During this operation, old Jacques remained perfectly passive, without showing the least visible sign of emotion. But when, in pursuance of our arrangements for passing the night, the guide was brought in, he comprehended at a glance the means used to entrap him and the innocence of his daughter.

'Grand Dieu! je suis l'assassin de ma fille!' (4) shrieked he, in a tone of agony which, even now curdles my blood. 'Permettez-moi la toucher!—Let me but touch her! Let a father embrace his daughter!'

- (1) 'What goes there?'
(2) 'Do not fire!—Do not fire!'
(3) 'Die, traitress!—it is thou who has ruined us!'
(4) 'Great God!—I am the murderer of my daughter!'

Having satisfied myself that no arms were concealed on his person, I directed the men to unbind him. As soon as unopposed, he flung himself upon the bed, crying in a tone of anguish which brought tears from all around, 'Parlez-moi! ma fille! ma Marie! parlez! c'est ton pere qui t'appelle!' (5)

But Marie was beyond the sound of any human voice.

The old man sank into a chair at the bed side, and as the sentinels on the watch asserted, kept his eyes fixed on the corpse in a steady glare, without so much as moving his eye lids perceptibly, during the whole night. The rest is soon told. We buried her at dawn near the cottage wall, and returned with our prisoner to Trois Rivières. From thence he was sent up the river to be tried at Montreal, but while passing a rapid, though secured hand and foot, he contrived on a sudden lurch of the vessel, to throw himself overboard. The current was violent, and he was never seen afterwards.

'For myself,' concluded the Major, 'though years have intervened, my first care on my arrival here, has been to order a plain white marble slab to place on the grave of the counterfeiters' daughter. Perhaps you will accompany me to the spot. It bears for its inscription, 'MARIE.'

On the Death of Mrs. Hemans.

Ah songstress of the thrilling strain,
Hemans! for us thy lay no more,
Shall tell of sorrow or of pain;
Or sing of joy: no, never more.

High-hearted! is that lowly tomb—
Thy last lone dwelling? But the sound
Of eve's low sighing breeze and gloom,
Pleasant and sad are felt around.

Italica mourn! Hemans lies cold—
Who now shall sing of thy bright sky?
And who thy beauties yet untold
Portray to fancy's glowing eye!

Jonah weep! Of thy high deeds,
And matchless valour and bright fame,
The song that others far exceeds,
Records no more: nor speaks thy name—

And Spain! of thy fair sunny plains,
And clustering vines, and sparkling rills,
And towers, and palaces, and fanes;
No sweet voice to the listner sings.

Hushed is the lyre: its silvery tone
Comes melting on the ear no more:
Wreath it with cypress! she is gone
Who sweetly touch'd its chords of yore.

Round her blest tomb let violets blue,
And evening primrose sweets exhale—
And jouquill! spread thy golden hue—
Lift there thy pure head, snow drop pale!

You who in life she loved so well,
Come! deck her grave and brightly blow!
And to the passing stranger tell
Felicity sleeps this mound below!

If while on earth thy song was sweet,
Thrice sweet is now its sound in heaven:
Thee, sister of the skies we greet!
To heavens high Lord thy praise be given.

MILITARY ANECDOTES.

THE WIFE OF THE REGIMENT.—While the troops of the light division, as already noticed, were strutting about with the consciousness of surpassing excellence, menacing and insulting a foe for which their persons, knapsacks, and all, would barely have sufficed for a luncheon, a dish of mortification was served up for those of our corps, by the hands of their better half, which was not easy of digestion. To speak of the wife of a regiment is so very unusual as to imply that she must have been some very great personage, and, without depriving her of the advantage of such a magnificent idea, I shall only say that she was the only wife they had got, for they landed at Lisbon with eleven hundred men, and only one woman. By what particular virtues she had attained such a dignified position among them, I never clearly made out, farther than that she had arrived at years of discretion, was what is commonly called a useful woman, and had seen some service. She was the wife of a sturdy German, who pined in the art of shoemaking, whenever his duties in the field permitted him to resort to that species of amusement—so that it appeared that she had beauty enough to captivate a cobbler, she had money enough to command the services of a jackass, and finally she proved she had wit enough to sell us all, which she did the first favorable opportunity, for after plying for some months at the tail of her donkey, at the tail of the regiment, and fishing in all the loose dollars which were floating about in gentlemen's pockets, (by those winning ways which ladies know so well how to use, when such favorable opportunities offer) she finally bolted off to the enemy, bag and baggage, carrying away old Coleman's all and awl. It was one of those French leave-takings which man is heir to, but we eventually got over it, under the deep obligation all the time for the sympathy manifested by our friends of the 43d and 52d.

DARING AND BRAVERY OF THE BRITISH SOLDIER.—Nothing shows the daring and inherent bravery of the British soldier so much as in the calling of a body of volunteers for any desperate service. In other armies, as Napier justly remarks, the humblest helmet may catch a beam of glory; but in ours, while the subaltern commanding, the forlorn hope may look for death or a company, and the field officer commanding the stormers an additional step by brevet, to the other officers and soldiers who volunteer on that desperate service no hope is held out, no reward given; and yet there were as many applicants for a place in the ranks as if it led to the highest honours and rewards. At the storming of Badajos and St. Sebastian, I happened to be the adjutant of the regiment, and had the selection of the volunteers on those occasions, and I remember that there was as much anxiety expressed, and as much interest made by all ranks to be appointed to the post of honour, as it had been since our situations, in place of death warrants which I had at my disposal. For the storming of St. Sebastian, the numbers from our battalion were limited to twenty-five; and in selecting the best characters out of those who offered themselves, I rejected an Irishman of the name of Burke, who, although he had been on the forlorn hope both at Ciudad and Badajos, and was a man of desperate bravery, I knew to be one of those wild and untameable animals that, the moment the place was carried, would run into every species of excess.

The party had been named two days before they had been called for, and Burke besieged my tent night and day, assuring me all the while that unless he was suffered to be of the party, the place would not be taken! I was forced at last to yield, after receiving an application in his behalf from the officer who was to command the party; and he was one of the very few of that gallant little band who returned to tell the story. Nor was that voracious appetite for fire-eating confined to the private soldier, for it extended alike to all ranks. On the occasion just alluded to, our quota, as already stated, was limited to a subaltern's command of twenty-five men; and as the post of honour was claimed by the senior lieutenant (Percival) it in a manner shut the mouths of all the juniors; yet were there some whose mouths would not be shut, one in particular (lieutenant H.) who had already seen enough of fighting to satisfy the mind of any reasonable man, for he had stormed and bled at Ciudad Rodrigo, and he had stormed at Badajos, not to mention his having had his share in many, and not nameless battles which had taken place in the interim; yet nothing would satisfy him but that he must draw his sword in that also. Our colonel was too heroic a soul himself to check a feeling of that sort in those under him, and he very readily obtained the permission to be a volunteer along with the party. Having settled his temporal affairs, namely, willing away his pelisse, jacket, two pair of trousers, and sundry nether garments, and however trifling these bequests may appear to a military youth of the present day, who happens to be reconnoitering a merchant tailor's settlement in St. James's-street, yet let me tell him that, at the time I speak of, they were valued as highly as if they had been hundreds a year in reversion. The prejudice against will making by soldiers on service is so strong, that had H. been a rich man in place of a poor one, he must have died on the spot for doing what was accounted infinitely more desperate than storming a breach; but his poverty seemed to have been his salvation, for he was only half killed, a ball entered under his eye, passed down the roof of his mouth, through the palate, entered again at his collar-bone, and was cut out at the shoulder-blade. He never again returned to his regiment, but I saw him some years after, in his native country, Ireland, in an active situation, and excepting that he had gotten an ugly mark on his countenance, and his former manly voice had dwindled into a less commanding one, he seemed as well as ever I saw him.

TALES OF THE CAMP.—The early part of their evenings was generally spent in witticisms and tales; and, in conclusion, by way of a lullaby, some long-winded fellow commenced one of those everlasting ditties in which soldiers and sailors delight so much; they are all to the same tune, and the subject (if one may judge by the tenor of the first ninety-eight verses,) was battle, murder, or sudden death; but I never yet survived, until the catastrophe, although I have often, to attain that end, stretched my waking capacities to the utmost. I have sometimes heard a fresh arrival from England endeavour to astonish their unpolished ears with 'the white blossomed sloe,' or some such refined melody, but was invariably coughed down as instantaneously as if it had been the sole voice of a conservative amidst a select meeting of radicals.—The wit and the humor of the rascals were amusing beyond any thing, and to see them the next morning drawn up as mute as mice, and as stiff as lamp-posts, it was a regular puzzle to discover on which post the light had shone during the bye-gone night, knowing, as we did, that there were at least a hundred original pages for Joe Miller, encased within the head-pieces then before us. Their stories, too, were quite unique: one (an Englishman) began by detailing the unfortunate termination of his last matrimonial speculation. He had got a pass one day to go from Thorncliffe to Falkstone, and on the way he fell in with one of the finest young women 'as ever he seed! my eye, as we say in Spain, if she was not a wapper, with a pair of cheeks like cherries, and shanks as clean as his ramrod, she was bounding over the downs like a young colt, and faith, if she would not have been with her heels clean over my head if I had n't caught her up and demanded a parley. O Jem, man, but she was a nice creature! and all at once got so fond of me too, that there was no use waiting; and so we settled it all that self-same night, and the next morning we were regularly spliced, and I carries her home to a hut which Corporal Smith and I hired behind the barracks, for eighteen pence a week. Well! I'll be blessed if I wasn't as happy as a shilling a day and my wife could make me for two whole days; but the next morning, just before parade, while Nancy was toasting a piece of tommy for our breakfast, who should darken our door but the carcass of a great sea marine, who begun blinking his goggle eyes like an owl in a gooseberry bush, as if he didn't see nothing outside of them; when all at once Nancy turned, and, my eye, what a squall she set up as she threw the toast in the fire, and upset my tinful of crowdy, while she twisted her arms round his neck like a vice, and began kissing him at no rate, he all the time blubbering like a bottle-nose in a shoal, about flesh of his flesh, and bones of his bones, and all the like o' that. Well! says I to myself, says I, this is very queer any how, and then I eyes the chap a bit, and then says I to him (for I began to feel somehow at seeing my wife kissed all round before my face without saying by your leave), an says I to him, (rather angrily,) look ye, Mr. Marine, if you don't take your ugly mouth farther off from my wife, I'll just punch it with the butt end of my rifle! thunder and oons, you great sea lobster that you are, don't you see that I married her only two days ago, just as she stands, bones and all, and you to come at this time o' day to claim a part in her! [There had been no impropriety on the part of the lady, for she had good reason to believe that the marine was at the bottom of the sea. An amicable arrangement was therefore entered into by the two claimants. But as brevity formed no part of the narrator's creed, the author curtails the conclusion, and gives it in his own words, thus.]—The explanation over, a long silence ensued, each afraid to pop the question, which must be pop'd, of whose wife was Nancy; and, when, at last, it did come out, it was more easily asked than answered, for, notwithstanding all that had passed, they continued both to be deeply enamoured of their mutual wife, and she of both, nor could a voluntary resignation be extracted from either of them, so that they were eventually obliged to trust the winning or the losing of that greatest of all earthly blessings (a beloved wife) to the undignified decision of the toss of a halfpenny. The marine won, and carried off the prize, while the rifleman declared that he had never yet forgiven himself for being cheated out of his half, for he feels convinced, that the marine had come there prepared with a halfpenny that had two tails.

A SURRENDER AT DISCRETION.—At the storming of the heights of Bera, on the 8th of October, 1813, colonel, now sir John Colbourne, who commanded our second brigade, addressed his men before leading them up to the enemy's redoubt with, "Now my lads, we'll just charge up to the edge of the ditch, and if we can't get in we'll stand there and fire in their faces." They charged accordingly, the enemy fled from the works, and in following them up the mountain, sir John, in rounding a hill, accompanied only by his brigade major and a few riflemen, found that he had headed a retreating body of about 300 of the French, and whispering to his brigade major to get as many men together as he could, he, without hesitation, rode boldly up to the enemy's commander, and demanded his sword. The Frenchman surrendered it with the usual grace of his countrymen, requesting that the other would bear witness that he had conducted himself like a good and valiant soldier! Sir John answered the appeal with an approving nod; for it was no time to refuse bearing witness to the valour of 300 men, while they were in the act of surrendering to half a dozen.—Random Shots.

A LEGEND.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Upon a rock that high and sheer
Rose from the mountain's breast,
A weary hunter of the deer
Had sat him down to rest,
And bared, to the soft summer air,
His hot red brow and sweaty hair.

All dim in haze the mountains lay,
With dimmer vales between,
And rivers glimmered on their way
By forests, faintly seen;
While ever rose a murmuring sound
From brooks below and bees around.

He listened, till he seemed to hear
A voice so soft and low,
That weather in the mind or ear,
The listener scarce might know;
With such a tone, so sweet and mild,
The watching mother lulls her child.

"Thou weary huntsman," thus it said,
"Thou faint with toil and heat!
The pleasant land of rest is spread
Before thy very feet,
And those whom thou would gladly see
Are waiting there to welcome thee."

He looked, and 'twixt the earth and sky,
Amidst the moonlit haze,
A shadowy region met his eye,
And grew beneath his gaze;
As if the vapours of the air
Had gathered into shapes so fair.

Groves freshened as he looked, and flowers
Showed bright on rocky bank,
And mountains welled beneath the bowers,
Where deer and pheasant drank,
He saw the glittering stream; he heard
The rustling bough, and twittering bird.

And friends—the dead—in boyhood dear,
There lived, and walked again;
And there was one who many a year
Within her grave had lain,
A fair young girl, the region's pride—
His heart was breaking when she died.

Bounding, as was her wont, she came
Right towards his resting-place,
And stretched her hand, and called his name,
With sweet and smiling face.
Forward, with fixed and eager eyes,
The hunter leaned, in act to rise.

Forward he leaned, and headlong down
Plunged from that craggy wall;
He saw the rocks, steep, stern and brown,
An instant, in his fall—
A fearful instant, and no more—
The dream and life at once were o'er.

Curious Taste.—There is a man living at Versailles, Vt. who eats no meat but fried snails. He was formerly very thin and meagre—now he weighs two hundred pounds, and sleeps twenty hours a day. He has a wife and fifteen children—the oldest but fourteen years of age. What a prodigy!

A DREAM OF SONGS.

BY MISS LESLIE.

Letter from Ariella Shadow to Ombrelina Vapour.

MY DEAR FRIEND—

Last evening on my return from Melania Medley's musical party, I could not but meditate on the fate that so generally attends even the most meritorious compositions of the sons of song: honoured for a while with a short-lived popularity; and then allowed to float down the stream of time, unnoticed and forgotten—or only remembered as things too entirely passed to be played or sung; and, indeed too old-fashioned to be even mentioned in presence of "care polite."

Falling asleep with these ideas in my head, they suggested a dream, in which I imagined myself visited by impersonations of almost innumerable songs; many of which had been "pretty fellows in their day," but have now given place to others whose chief characteristic is that of having no character at all.

The following outline may give you, my dear Ombrelina, a slight idea of my vision, making due allowance for the confusion, incoherence, and absurdity that are always found in those pictures that imagination, when loosened from the control of reason, presents to the mind's eye of the slumberer.

I thought myself mistress of a handsome and spacious mansion in a fine romantic country, whose hills and woodlands sloped down towards the ocean; and I seemed to be duly prepared for the reception of a numerous party of visitors, whom I recognised intuitively, as soon as I saw them, for the heroes and heroines of certain well-known songs.

The earliest of my guests were some old and valued friends, descendants of the "Scots who hae wi' Wallace bled." They murmured so strongly that I could scarcely help exclaiming "Hurrah for the bonnets of blue!" I felt particularly honoured by the presence of that gallant chieftain, "Kinloch of Kinloch," who for the express purpose of making me a visit, had relinquished, for a time, his shooting excursions "O'er the moor among the heather;" had turned his back on "Thy blue waves, O Carleton," given up his musings on the "Banks and Braes of Bonnie Doon;" and bade, for awhile, "Adieu! a heart warm fond a lien!" to "The Birks of Aberfeldy."

Next arrived that ancient laird, "Logie o' Buchan"—and then "Auld Robin Gray," came tottering along, supported by his pensive daughter Alice, and by "Duncan Gray," his laughter-loving son, well known among the lasses as a "Braw Wooer." The "gray family" took their seat at "The Ingie Side," where old "John Anderson" had already established himself in one of the arm chairs, and the other was taken by the venerable Robin. Logie o' Buchan joined them; but his habits being somewhat peculiar, it was not till they talked of "Auld Lang Syne," that he was induced to mingle in the conversation—yet, the ice once broken, he was as merry in his reminiscences as either of his companions.

Robin Gray reminded the laird of Buchan of his elopement with that extreme blonde, the "Lassie wi' the lint white locks," who when only "Within a mile of Edinburgh," gave him the slip, and ran off with "Jockey to the Fair." The laird retorted by laughing at Robin for having been one of the six and thirty suitors of that remarkably ugly heiress "Tibbie Fowler o' the Glen."—John Anderson was made to recollect his having been jilted by the beautiful but coquettish "Kathrine Ogie," who afterwards became "Roy's wife of Aldivalloch."

These old stories were at first very amusing to the hearers, but they continued so long, and with so many episodes, that we at length discovered that "We were a' addin'." Finally, they were checked by the arrival of mundry damsels, following that very deceiver "Robin Adair," himself a verification of the indisputable fact that "The love is warm awhile, soon it grows cold."

Robin Adair, whose thoughts, after all, seem to have run chiefly on balls and plays, the had been spoiled by a visit to France) had first made love to, and deserted that "Bewildered Maid," the unfortunate "Highland Mary." Next he paid his devoirs to "Jessie the flower o' Dumbane," when he met her one morning as she was "Coming thro' the rye." And he had lately entered into a flirtation with "Dunbarton's Bonnie Bell"—a young lady whose literary tastes had recently procured for her the new and unique title of "The Blue Bell of Scotland."—But it was whispered in society that she had nearly frightened him away, by asking him that puzzling question "Why does azure deck the sky?"

Yet, however Robin Adair might be a favourite with the ladies, who often tapped him with their fans, saying "Fly away, pretty moth," he did not seem to be held in equal esteem by his manly compatriots—On his presuming to clap "Young Lochinvar" on the shoulder, and accost him as "Friend of my soul," that high-spirited chieftain immediately proceeded to "Draw the Sword of Scotland," with the intention of chastising his familiarity. But "Swift as the flash" Robin eluded the blow, and danced out of the room, singing "I'd be a Butterfly."

At the desire of several of the ladies, I accompanied them into the veranda to look at the prospect of the beautiful surrounding country, and our attention was soon arrested by notes of distant music.

"What airy sounds," was our unanimous exclamation, and presently we heard the tramp of horses, and beheld a numerous company descending by its circuitous path, the hill that rose in front of the house. As "I saw them on their winding way," I had no difficulty in recognizing each individual of the troop.

Foremost came "The Baron of Mowbray," mounted on his "Arab Steed," and accompanied by a "Captive Knight," whom he had rescued from a Saracen prison, and I soon discovered that "It was Dunois, the young and brave." Dunois was followed by his accomplished but wilful page "The Minstrel Boy," who having broken his harp in a fit of spite, was obliged to use an inferior substitute, and to strike "The Light Guitar," which he retained as "The Legacy" of a "Gallant Troubadour," who had fallen beside him in battle.

Behind the minstrel, strode a "Happy Tawny Moor," performing powerfully on a "Tartar Drum." "The Young Son of Chivalry," brought with him a fair damsel whom it was easy to distinguish as "Araby's Daughter," though "Rich and rare were the gems she wore,"—she had aided in his escape, and had testified her readiness to "Fly to the desert," with the brave Dunois; to glide with him "Thro' icy vallies" amid the wilds of Siberia; or to accompany him even across "The sea! the sea! the open sea!"—So desirous was she of becoming "The Soldier's Bride," that she would gladly have given all her pearls and diamonds in exchange for "The Plain Gold Ring."

The strangers from Palestine were followed by a motley group, whose homes were to be found in every part of the world. Looking as if he had just issued from "The Vale of Oveen," and wrapping around him a damp overcoat, thread bare wherever it was whole, came an "Exile of Erin," who proved to be the famous serenading free boater "Ned of the Hills." Near him was his fellow outlaw, "Allen-a-Dale," who being something of an exquisite, looked with hauteur on "The Way worn Traveler." A "Bavarian Broom Girl" was endeavouring to persuade Mynheer Van Clam to waltz with her down the hill: but finding it impossible to induce in him a rotary motion, and that his steps never could be made circular, she gave him up for a "Merry Swiss Boy," who whirled round with her to her heart's content. Next came "The Maid of Loch," ambling on her poney. I did not think much of her. She was followed by "The Maltese Boatmen," chanting their Barcarole. Then there was that ill-used but persevering lover, "Tommy Tompkins," patiently enduring the bitter taunts, and side-long glances of the disdainful "Polly Hopkins."

But it would be too tedious, were I to particularize all the members of this assemblage. I must confess that there were some among them whose company I could well have dispensed with, particularly "The Galley Slave," and "The Beggar Girl." I looked in vain for my sensible and excellent friend "The Pilot," whom I was afterwards informed by "A Smart Young Midshipman," had gone to the assistance of an endangered vessel, whose "Minute Gun at Sea," he had heard the night before.

Again the sound of distant music floated on the air. "Far, far o'er hill and dell," I at first thought that "The Campbells were coming," none of that noble and warlike clan having accompanied "The Sons of the Clyde," that had already arrived. But as the sounds approached, they were easily distinguished as the charming and exhilarating notes of "The Hunter's Chorus," that splendid triumph of musical genius which alone would have been sufficient to entitle the composer of Der Freyschutz to his tomb in Westminster Abbey. We soon saw the bold yagers of the Hartz forest descending the path that led round the hall, their rifles in their hands, their oak-sprigs in their hats, and looking as much at home as if they were still in their "Father Land."

I welcomed the whole company into the house, though well aware that among them all, there was "Nobody coming to marry me," and the evening was passed in much hilarity. "Away with melancholy," was the general feeling. A toast was suggested in compliment to their hostess, but unwilling that they should "Drink to me only," I proposed "A health to all good lasses"—and it went round with enthusiasm.

After supper (at which "Jim Crow" was chief waiter, till his antics obliged me to dismiss him from the room) music and dancing continued till a late hour. At length "I knew by the smoke," that the lamps were about to expire, and recollecting that "At Morning's Dawn the Hunters rise," and that our German friends were in need of repose, I was not sorry when the party from Scotland broke up the company by taking leave with "Gude night and joy be wi' you a'." And in a short time, "All the blue bonnets were over the border."

Hitherto, whenever "I've wander'd in dreams," it has generally been my unlucky fate to lose all distinct recollection of them by the time "The Morn' unbars the Gates of Light." This once, I think it safest to entrust to your care this little memorandum of my singular vision.—And should you lose it, and I forget it, we have still the consolation that "Tis but Fancy's Sketch."

ARIELLA.

LITERARY GLADIATORSHIP.

We observe in the last New Yorker, two translations of "De Lamartine's dying poet." The one by H. W. Herbert, redolent with fine poetry, but eclipsed by the delicious breathings of Mrs. Ellet's lyre. For instance, hear the lady poet:

'Tis thus at night the wild harp, far and faint,
Blending with wailing streams its airy plaint,
Pours to the wind spontaneous melodies:
The charmed traveller says his steps to hear,
And thrilled with wonder, marvels whence so near
The sounds celestial rise.

Thus as follows, we have the gentleman's translation:

So the wild wind-harp, through the midnight sky,
Its wailings mingled with the river's sigh,
Makes mournful Music at the gal's command,
While nightly wanderers, with delighted ear,
Drink the sweet sound, and marvel whence they hear
Those spirit warblings of no mortal hand.

Again the accomplished poetess:

Give to the winds, the flame, the ocean's roar,
These strings which to my soul respond no more.
The harp of angels soon these hands shall sweep!
Soon, thrilled like them with an immortal fire,
Seraphic hosts, perchance, my ardent lyre
In ecstasy shall sleep.

The same verse, as translated by Herbert:

Break—scatter to the winds and waves, my lyre,
Soon to be voiceless to poetic fire.
Ere long my touch o'er sera h strings shall play:
When steeped in rapturous ecstasy divine
Angelic hosts shall dwell on notes of mine,
And Heaven itself confess the minstrel's sway.

Respect a good man that he may respect you; and be civil to an ill man that he may not affront you.

THE OLD MAID;

OR TOO PERFECT FOR ANYBODY.

L'homme propose, mais Dieu dispose.

I happened, the other night, to make one of a gay company, where the above quoted aphorism—true in all the events of life, but held by the French, to be specially so in matters appertaining to matrimony—was proposed to the young people as a Proverbe Français for their performance—and, in default of histrionic capabilities, illustrated by sundry tales, among which, from several, worthy all commemoration, I select the following, as no less authentic than remarkable in its exemplification of my motto.

"Perfection is Insipid in this naughty world of ours."

Mr. and Mrs. Ellersby were a clever couple, as suitably matched in temper, intellect, and circumstances as their neighbours—and living in what town the deponent saith not. They enjoyed health, good repute, and an easy fortune—moved in the first circles (by which is understood some score of persons, notorious for silly airs of affected superiority—and finding their false and extravagant pretensions generally and most humbly submitted to)—and, in short, would have been as happy as their state seemed prosperous, save for one source of care and coil; but that one—they—the best judges of where the shoes pinched—averred to be like Aaron's rod sufficient to swallow up all other troubles, were they ever so numerous. The poor lady and gentleman were universally pined—and esteemed themselves as tried beyond the visitations of Job; for, gentle reader, of whose sympathy, in these days of desperate vestals and hard-hearted célibataires, our overwhelmed pair may be sure they had for off-prints, not one single boy, and nine daughters! The paces brought upon Egypt by Moses or Jacob's twelve godless sons, who kept the patriarch in continual hot water—were not to be put in parallel with this numerical edition of the muses: even the fifty damsels of King Darius must have been far preferable, since the Argive princesses found their cousin-husbands readily provided for them. Never, before or since, were luckless parents cursed with so sore a curse; for the Ellersbys dwelt in a place, swarming like a slave-market with old maids and marriageable young ladies of all ages, sizes, and hues, from the gipsy-like brunette with her "cheek of ruddy bronze" to the pink-eyed and pearl-colored albiness, and the parboiled veterans, whose

"May of life
Had fallen into the sear, the yellow leaf"— and their complexions into a symptomatic "green and yellow melancholy." There were just beaux enough to decimate the belles, had the gallant spirit moved them so to do; but, in such a state of things, it was pleasanter to coquet than to conjugate—and scarce and saucy had become the watch-word among the highly praised male animals. Amid a population so constituted, what was to be done with three times the ordinary number of girls to chaperon and cater for? The furious father stamped and swore—the afflicted mother sighed and scolded, as bad after bad of female bac appeared; but, as one by one, they put forth their infant leaves—and seemed opening into bloom, if not beauty, matters began to mend a little. The fates, vexed, perhaps, at seeing the sex they dignify, so undervalued, used their shears pretty freely—and saved a world of trouble, parental and filial, by clipping the thread of four supernumerary lives. The eldest of the remaining brood—indeed of the original most odious number—gave promise almost from the dawn of existence, of such "a goodly day," as prevented the parents, who, like Dr. Ashe, found themselves "smothered with petticoats," from being so unreasonable as to desire to amend her gender. In all enchanting endowments, this rare child outdid any princess ever gifted by a congress of benevolent fairies; a d Childe Harold's laithie—alias Lady Charlotte Harlequin—must have been a fair fool for her. Beautiful as a Hourii, and gentle as Aikin depicts Pity in his charming allegory, she took to all sciences and accomplishments, with an appetite that seemed like the love Hamlet refers to in his mother, "to grow by what it fed on." Nothing was too difficult or delicate—too sublime or too trivial for her comprehension and acquirement; and in her, might be said to centre all the hopes and affections—the pride and enjoyment of both father and mother. The junior "pests," who had thrust their superfluous selves into a world, chock-full of their betters, were all put aside and pretermitted for the incomparable Gloriana, who, now grown to womanhood, walked in the pride of her pure and peerless presence among her young associates, like "the maiden of the moon," through the firmament, paling with their chaste and silvery sheen, the envious and emulous stars around her path. Grateful as the stately ship upon the seas—as learned as Mme. Dacier—and hardly less captivating, when she choose it than Cleopatra—her beauty was of that perfect and spirited cast characteristic of the angelic order, rather than the voluptuous loveliness that allures in woman.

"An eye of most transparent light"— lips, around which, as they parted, showing pearls and dimples, played a series of smiles as glorious as the waving of a seraph's glittering wing—a brow, wherein high intellect, and calm, clear chastity seemed serenely clasped—and a shape, that might have served Raphael as a study—impressed the beholder with such tender and breathless awe as if he gazed upon something ethereal. Thus fair—and fancy-free, did Gloriana Ellersby, at the age of eighteen,—(for among her other choice attributes she possessed not the precocity of our present dynasty of baby-belles)—enter the world amid volleys (if the expression be allowable) of applause, and the most liberal predictions as to her splendid and prosperous career; by which last epithet, was meant among the match-makers and beau-catchers, that she should not fail to immortalize herself by a superlative marriage, ere she had been out a full season.

But the year passed away unfruitful of this anticipated event; and there was now, not only Miss Ellersby—the wonderful Miss Ellersby—but Miss Matilda Ellersby on the tapis. The lady mother of this troublesome progeny, had imitated Queen Charlotte in her teeming terms; so there was but fifteen months difference betwixt these, her eldest children. The last named, barely passable in person—and inanimate in mind, appeared in "the celestial presence" of Gloriana, as the dull, dim lamp, burning in a noisome sepulchre, contrasted with the mellow and moon light rays, streaming through alabaster, over an atmosphere, redolent of music and perfumes. Her peculiar style, if the term may be applied to an appearance so totally uninteresting, is best designated as the sedate; and yet, behind this demure mask of quietness and monotony,—there lurked a depth of cunning—an intuitive dexterity in "the arts of wilful woman, laboring for her purpose," that was more than an offset against the refined but artificial dignity of her surpassing elder. The latter, was not, as may be well imagined, without a host of adorers; but the cortège, at first so many and so eager—soon dwindled down like Lear's knights under Goneril's retrenchment. The very fame of Miss Ellersby—her exquisite but unearthly beauty, of a sort, however, rather to inspire admiration than to excite desire—the indifference and dignity, marking her general manner,—and, above all the bug-bear of her vast erudition, checked and cowed the men. True she was lovely—most lovely—all the prejudice in the world could not gainsay that,—but then she was learned: and a learned lady, in polite society, finds herself much in the predicament of a learned pig. She is held to have enjoyed the privileges and perquisites of her own sex, without acquiring a right to the immunities monopolized by the other; she is shunned as a woman to be stared at and approached as a monster—one of the anthropophagi for example,—might be, when going through the motions of civilized usage for the amusement of a marvelling audience. However plain and unaffected in her discourse, she must still expect to be stigmatized as pedantic; however well versed in the theory and practice of domestic economy, she must still submit to be branded as unpardonably ignorant of all it behooves a being destined for the part of a house-wife, to understand—and have the hue, and cry raised after her, as a trespasser on that tree of knowledge, whose unseemly fruit she is forbidden to taste. Howe'er much her studies may have done for her—and if properly conducted, they will invariably have that effect—in strengthening her mind, regulating her temper, and teaching her the relative duties of her sex,—it is assumed as a self-evident truth that they must have had exactly the opposite tendency; and while she, the intelligent, the high-principled, the correct, is scoffed at as odd, unfeminine, pestilential—or to sum up all in one emphatic condemnation—learned: to be weak, vain, and light-minded, and upheld by word and action, the safe maxim that "ignorance is bliss" and innocence too, is preferred and lauded as the proper tone of the female character; 'tis true the lords of the creation profess a great respect for cultivated women, which they affect to testify by allowing their charges to attempt all the higher sciences, embraced in the present range of female education; but this is solely from the idea of a necessary compliance with the fashion—and that it can do them no harm to dabble in what is so far above their comprehension. Such an inference could not be drawn from Miss Ellersby's progress in encyclopedic lore; the ripest scholars, sitting in judgment on her merits, pronounced them astonishing, not merely in a comparative but an actual sense: nor did they scruple to affirm that, had her lot been cast in Italy, she might have disputed with the Rovellas and the Bettinas of that classic land, their chairs of eloquence and philosophy.

Still these high-flown attainments, as much as they might contribute to her renown, and make her a public gazing stock, acted as repellents rather than absorbents of the tender passion; and while eulogized by sages, and wondered at by terror-struck belles and dandies, the gloriotte of the day, could number fewer declared votaries than many inferior idols. This paucity of suitors was a good deal owing to the demeanour of our fair prodigy, which was, in general, more polished than pleasing. With the most fastidious reserve of mind, which, in its eagerness to avoid the imputation of forwardness, was apt to produce the contrary extreme, and render her, if not still, for that was impossible with her innate elegance, at least cold; she cherished a devout belief in the omnipotence of her own attractions and ability to fascinate when and where she pleased. This persuasion tended to increase her natural carelessness of the arts of conciliation; and then she had not the least turn in the world for flirting—was too proud to seem gratified by that flattery always more or less agreeable to the softer sex—and more likely to be revolted by the impertinence of this, than, and the other person daring to comment upon and compliment her than propitiated by the intensity and humility of their involuntary admiration. Even when she chose to put forth all her powers and dazzle by excess of light, this acknowledged piece of perfection, sometimes found her pains taken only to be disappointed or foiled. One or two among the élite of ton, on whom she deigned to cast her bewitching eyes, withdrew from the supernal sphere enlightened by her graces and glory, to toy with, and be caught in the toils of the weak and the trifling; for how could they have hopes of her, who lived only for books—and fancied a mere look the height of encouragement?—And more than once, after the most splendid exhibition of herself, she had the mortification to overhear the oracles of the age—the American Porsons and Jeffreys, the chief advocates for a parity of intellectual accomplishments in woman—conclude her panegyric with the remark that "the young lady was, certainly, a most surprising creature—a racoon, a credit to her sex and country; but they questioned if, after all, she knew the component parts of a pudding—or how to cut out and make a shirt." This essential part of education, the staid Miss Matilda took due care to assert her exclusive claim to—a claim however more plausible than just—and made out to establish herself in the best odour as a plain but amiable girl—no deist, as your learned ladies too often were—but thoroughly pious—an excellent manager—and far better qualified to perform the duties of a wife than her nonpareil of a sister. Fortune, too, took it into her head to befriend the second Miss Ellersby, who had been so overlooked by nature. In about twelve months after her début, she inherited a handsome legacy from the rich maiden aunt, whom she was named after; and on the credit of the immense sum that a little excusable exaggeration converted it into—and her previous pattern character, was sought and won by a high-born, though not well by Englishman, holding a high diplomatic rank.—and who, at the same time, that he wanted a household drudge to eke out his slender income by her contrivance—and found the fortune of his American choice the most convenient of wind falls,—privately resolved never to pollute the aristocratic circle of his grand connexions, by her introduction among them.

Despite the lofty understanding, and kind impulses of the resplendent Gloriana, she was still so far from woman as to feel a pang of jealousy at this achievement of the ignoble Matilda. Here had she—the inferior—almost the underling—whom nobody deemed worthy so much as to lift her eyes from the ground, beside her admirable elder—already naturalized—gained herself one of the first places in the front rank of society; while she—the ornament of the fashionable, the boast of the literary world, with the reputation of having disordered as many lovers as there are days in the year, still wrote herself spinster. Not that Glory—the endearing diminutive given her by her proud parents—was in any hurry to lay aside the maiden style; that she could do triumphantly at any hour—and it was yet early in the day, for she was scarce in her twenty-first year. She was only lost in the depths of amazement at an event so unlooked for and unnatural—such a transposition of the order and fitness of things, as it appeared to herself and every person else except the bride, who enjoyed her triumph as might have been expected. As the Hon. Mrs. Walsingham, she reigned over those who had hardly been conscious of her existence, while Matilda Ellersby, and even Gloriana were doubly defied when led forward by her august ally. She continued to have constant accessions of admirers; but they came and departed like shadows, inasmuch as no substantial good resulted from their traces of ecstatic gazing and their talking in the air; so at least thought and said the doating papa and mamma in their anxiety to see the whole world at the feet of their dainty darling, who just of the other mind, sickening of Pembaras de richesses, desired only one proposal—and that not from a peerless as herself, since she considered that self, like the fabulous phoenix, without a counterpart in creation—but from some dignitary able to enthronize her on the pinnacle of exclusive grandeur. Meanwhile those who presumed to offer themselves to her, were sped in a most summary manner—and not rapidly succeeded by others, who could only stand off, and look and languish and pine for the excellent beauty, whom they wanted courage to address. Some broke their hearts in secret for her, while a few thinking as soon “to wed a bright, particular star,” as her, so much too perfect for them,—shunned a presence well nigh as fatal in its effects as that of the Princess Rezia. One, for a while all ardent and (in his own conceit at least) the most distinguished of the list—soon cooled down to zero, under the disheartening influence of that conversation, which, though as far as possible from ostentation, of course, bore the impress of wit and a literary taste. How could Mr. Lewis Latimer, as dense as a London fog in November—and founding his claims to pre-eminence in the beau-monde, on a starched collar, that Brummel need not have been ashamed of,—feel at ease, with a lady, however radiant and smiling, who talked like a book, and was ready, if not to snap him up at every blunder; and he made as many as any Irishman—to turn him into all sorts of ridicule the moment his back was turned. So after hovering a month or two around this charming, but fearful “Tourandote” without finding himself at all familiarized with her majesty—and tired, as he said, of having to mind his p’s and q’s every time he opened his mouth, off he went, and took to wife the very character he sought to escape—a half-bred vixen of an actress, puffed up with a smattering of learning, and showing him to his cost, how the “shallow draught had intoxicated her brain,” as soon as he was safely noosed, and she at liberty to let loose her tongue upon the dolt of a dandy, whom, however invaluable as a husband, she despised as a man.

His first flume—so eagerly eschewed, because she had drunk deep of the Perian spring—was scarce aware of her gain or loss of this rich simpleton. She was now courted by one whose fortune, talents, and commanding position in high life, invested him with a Sultan’s right to choose at pleasure—and hardly do more than signify that choice by a sign. He was middle-aged and a foreigner—though not of the same nation with her attaché brother-in-law, the honorable Joseph Walsingham, and as far before that important person in all intrinsic and aggrandizing circumstances, as Gloriana was superior to her sister, Matilda. All the ladies round about had been ready to pull caps for the prize that they understood to be coming within their reach; but the general prophecy, which assigned this great man to the supreme Miss Ellersby, was triumphantly verified by his immediate assumption of her chains. Here was an opportunity presented of a parti comme il y en a peu; and, though Gloriana’s heart was untouched by the mental excellencies and sumptuous expenditures of her matron lover, she received, with great complaisance, the devoirs of him, whom even her parents, matchless as they esteemed their minion, approved of as an eligible husband for her. The treaty of alliance which pending between two such illustrious personages—crossed the undivided attention of the town—proceeded as smoothly as possible; the titled German—if not impassioned, was earnest and unremitting in his assiduousities, which were most graciously smothered upon by their bright object, proud of the homage of not merely a souvent, but a nobleman; and the happy denouement of the august affair was at hand, when the merest trifle in the world sundered them as far as Indus and the poles.

“Such dire effects from little causes spring!”

The lavish and learned Baron prided himself on being the first chess-players of the age; he had beaten every antagonist worthy his encounter in Europe and this country, and was deemed as invincible as Maelzel’s automaton on its first production before the public. For days and nights, it was said, he would hang over the board forgetful of food or rest as Archimedes immersed in his sublime calculations—playing both sets of men with the most scrupulous exactitude and impartiality—and often unable, so equally were the parties matched, to bring the game to a close. While thus engaged, the summons to judgment might have sounded, unheard or misheard by him, who was as insensible to all sublimity interruptions as Budé himself. Once, as the rumour ran, he was called in great haste to the bed-side of a dying sister, who had in something of import to communicate; but all absorbed in the interest of the contest, which he was bent on winning by a state-mate in his opinion the perfection of the game, as equivalent to a masterly retreat—he stayed, regardless of imploring messages to play it out, and then hastening to receive the confidence of his relative, found her dead. More than once he had been shrewdly suspected of sacrificing an appointment with his divine mistress, to his mono-mania, for which he was willing to give up every body and every thing else; and the issue of their engagement, as it actually was, soon left him at liberty to devote himself wholly and solely to this favourite pastime. The all accomplished Glory was likewise famed as an adept at Palamides’ invention; at all events, she relished a trial of skill,—and happening so to express herself before her inamorato at a large party, one evening, was instantly challenged by him, intent upon being her conqueror at this as well as the game of love in progress between them. Down they sat, the centre of a watchful circle, whose attention, however, was principally on the symptoms of irritation necessarily co-existent to their contest—and were soon absorbed heart and soul, in the scientific management of the battle-array before them. Perhaps the wily God, who delights in confounding wise heads, might be at the bottom of his bewilderment; perhaps he fell into the common, but dangerous mistake of undervaluing his adversary; but certain it is that the gentleman, who was once or twice guilty of gazing on the face opposite to him, when his eyes ought to have been on the board, never played so ill; while Miss Ellersby, as little liable to amatory sensations as if she had been matched against her grand father, proceeded with all the coolness and calculation of Philidor,—and, bad politician as she was, achieved the victory no little to her own surprise, who had neither contemplated nor cared for such a conclusion. Napoleon’s face upon the lost field of Waterloo, as described by his Flemish guide, fell short of the consternation depicted on that of our noble disciple of Vida; he was thunderstruck—dumb founded; or if capable of an audible ejaculation, it would, doubtless, have been, “Ichabod! Ichabod! the glory has departed from me!” His time had passed away—his superiority was at an end—the wretch torn from his brow! He had, at last, been beaten at chess—and beaten by a woman! Gloriana, who had risen from the table after dealing the coup de grace, remained quiet unconscious of the stupendous blow, inflicted by her hand; for ere the Baron accented her again, he had rallied himself and his powers of speech, which, however, were only taxed to say good night, when they found themselves brought together for a few minutes by the rush of the crowd. The losing party, anxious to keep up appearances—tried to throw into his smile, its usual expression of bland fondness—but could only make out to “grin horrible a ghastly grin,” and so hideous was the contortion, which assimilated his countenance to that of a patient exhausted by the cramps of the cholera, that his beautiful lady-love inquired with a due degree of interest whether he felt unwell. Seizing upon the idea, he complained of illness from eating ice—and hurried off to the lodgings, occupied by himself and smile during his sojourn at —, and which he had fitted up with true German magnificence.

Yet when arrived there, far from his vexed soul were all thoughts of rest, which had been effectually murdered in him; so that:

“In the calmest and the stillest night,
With all appliances and means to boot,”

he would have invoked “nature’s soft nurse” as vainly as Henry IV.’s soliloquy. Dismissing his valet with astounding abruptness,—all night he sat up, deliberating upon the steps to be taken after such foul, public dishonour; for had it chanced in private, his manhood could better have borne it, though galling enough even then:—But in the face of the whole world! amid hosts of tittering misses and their smiling satellites, of malicious downers, inimical, because disappointed mammas, and stately signors all assembled, as it seemed to his disordered mind, only to witness and exult in his overthrow,—the dart was not only fatal but evoked to add agony to annihilation. His first thought was of suicide, the natural refuge of a countryman of Werter’s; and the thing itself conceived and approved, it only remained to select the mode of execution. Long did the desperate foreigner halt betwixt the merits of prussic acid and a pistol—of hanging and drowning. The two latter were promptly rejected as almost the exclusive practice of female felodese; besides a rope was not conveniently to be had at that late hour—neither was it exactly the season for taking to water: the shock of immersion—the horror of the cold plunge, it became a free-thinker and a courtier to shrink from, greatly more than from death or the dread of something after that mortal consummation. The poison, to be sure, lay quite handy; (for like all great philosophers our learned wight was addicted to cruel experiments upon cats and dogs;) but then it was rash to take it without Chabert’s antidote (as yet undiscovered) in case of repentance. He next bethought him of running away—and all his late tragic fancies were at an end. How came he to overlook this most obvious and easiest of expedients? which was only to order horses and be off, leaving his right-hand man, the trusty Socrate—the very model of a gentleman’s gentleman—to adjust matters and follow him; and this would be a proper punishment for the insolent baggage, whose presumption and strange good-fortune—for, of skill, she, of course, possessed not a particle—had thus disgraced and shaken a gentleman and a nobleman. It was decided; he would start at dawn, and leave her to be confounded in turn by his check-mate to her connubial hopes; and in solitude and darkness—for even the glare of candle-light seemed a reproach to his shame—the lover so outraged by the trivial success of his intended, awaited the hour of departure.—It came, however, only to find him in a high fever, and so much indisposed, (he was subject to violent attacks of the gout) by the ill effects of such a night upon one of his regular and luxurious habits,—that, instead of getting into his carriage, he was right glad to be undressed and helped into bed.

“With the morning, cool reflection came.”

and the first intolerable smart of ignominy and mortification over, he had full leisure for a calmer retrospect. In the course of his eternal meditations—as sombre as those of Hervey among the tombs—on one subject, it occurred to him that the best way of effacing the stigma of the late disastrous affair, was to hush it up altogether—and make it appear as if his defeat was a matter of choice—a delicate compliment to the fair lady, which would look probable enough, their relative position being considered.—Perhaps this idea was a little assisted by some kindly visions of the culprit herself in all the light of her superlative loveliness, which would intrude, and move him in her behalf. Miss Ellersby really liked Baron Zerndorf well enough to be sorry for his apparent state of suffering; and this slight feeling had given softness to her soft voice, and an earnestness to her eyes during their hurried leave taking as new, as at any other time, they would have been acceptable to the object so highly-honored. As it was, the image of the bright offender, every charm heightened by her anxious looks and tone, now doubly vivid upon recollection—went a great way towards assuaging his wrath, and disposing him to hope the best for his credit from a reconciliation instead of a flight: so all things considered, our vanquished and vindictive chess-player thought it best to forgive and try to forget.

But he had undertaken too much for him in every sense. Of a sensibility neither deep nor lively, his selfish pride of character predominated greatly over the softer affections: these were alienated, and that done by a presence, operating as the perpetual memento of his degradation. Hence, when restored to health, and schooled to placibility, he found himself again with her, who in becoming his conqueror, had ceased virtually to be his mistress, the bitter remembrances and feelings rife within him, rose into full sway, and tintured the whole tenor of his manner towards her. It was no longer submissive yet exulting complaisance of an approving lover—but a sort of sultry proneness to find fault, the result of a latent grudge—a determination to depreciate all that she said or did—and that with a sneer, the most assiduous and insulting of all the innumerable modes, where by disapprobation can be testified. The semblance of cordiality could not long mark an intercourse, when the sentiments itself existed only on one side,—and there but for a short time: for Miss Ellersby little disposed to brook a slighting word or look from the first Emperor in Christendom had he professed himself her lover, neither overlooked nor pardoned the behaviour, which, without being absolutely disrespectful continually bordered upon it. Accordingly after more than one interview, conducted in this discordant spirit, she put the finishing stroke to the discomfiture of her illustrious fiancé by wishing him every happiness independent of her, who claimed a woman’s privilege to change her mind, and decline the connexions, no reason assigned therefor. Nothing could exceed the indignation of our noble philosopher, unless it was his astonishment, at this catastrophe, which he no more dreamed of than of his unexpected defeat at chess. Though his own excess of unmanly spleen, had drawn this dismissal upon him, it yet appeared to him the most unjustifiable thing in the world—and one, which he could by no means acquiesce in silently, as upon the former startling occasion. The haughty beauty, who had said her say, listened with the most provoking non chalance, while he went on to speak his mind, with more freedom than politeness, on what he called her unprincipled conduct; for, though most sorry at the bottom of his heart, to be absolved from a contract, which, since their luckless encounter with kings, castles, and pawns, had pressed upon him like a galling yoke, his sense of the effort so irreverently put upon an European and a baron, prompted him to take what revenge he could in the way of cutting language. For him—a member of every learned and royal society in existence—ennobled by seven descents and counting sixteen quarterings—the grandson of a Count of the Empire—and related by a left-hand marriage, to the Elector himself—for him to be first despoiled of his just renown, foiled at the game, which had been his study for thirty years, and the source of a succession of triumphs—and then broken off with by a little Yankee plebeian, whose ancestors, if she could reckon any beyond her father, were shopkeepers or mechanics to a dead certainty; all the blood of the Teutonic knights boiled to avenge the wrong, and to head the most sublime of crusades—one in defence and preservation of the rights of the privileged orders. It was the case of Dido and Aeneas reversed: the forsaken gallant pouring forth his torrent of invective as fluently and fiercely as German phlegm could manage to do,—and the faithless fair, answering never a word, but smiling, bowing, and attitudinizing as if in acceptance of the most honored vows. For Gloriana, cut to the quick by the inexplicable rudeness of her suitor, and never once connecting it with her own mal à-propos disregard of his pretensions to infallibility at chess—since in that case she might have stooped to soothe the masculine pride, that is known to abhor losing a game to a lady—and all her visions of rule and splendour put to sudden and final flight,—rejoiced to see how the offender could be made to smart under her scorn, and exerted the cool carelessness in which she was so perfectly at home, to aggravate the matter a thousand fold. When Baron Otho von Mansfeldt Von Zerndorf at last stunted in his speech, Miss Ellersby offered him, in the finest strain of irony imaginable, her congratulations on his delivery from an enthrallment so degrading, even though it were wrought through her most hearty rejection of him; she wound up with every wish for the future elevation of his course—and more temper and better luck the next time he ventured on a trial of skill, —for some unguarded expression, dropped in his wordy perturbations, betrayed the rankling of that sore. And thus ended our heroine's first engagement; an engagement so brilliant in its promises—so surprising to all her acquaintances in its termination,—the cause of which continued an inscrutable mystery, and a great impeachment to Gloriana's sanity: for none could conceive how any woman in her right mind came to put by an alliance, the next of kin to one with royalty. But the answer was speedily forthcoming and laid all the blame on her bookishness. It was always just so, they said, with your learned women who were mere babes in the affairs of real-life, and as blind as bats to their own nearest interests. But in vain, the curious wondered and pushed their inquiries as far as they dared, in vain Mr. and Mrs. Ellersby, who had begun to consider themselves the parents of a noble as well as of a prodigy, railed and regretted; the mischief was done—the tie severed, and the German grandee gone, never to return.

By this time there was a third sister formally out—and far more disposed than Mrs. Walsingham had ever been to set herself up for a share of that admiration, which among the Ellersbys, the eldest was held to possess a patent right for. Felicia was a smart, pretty girl with a good deal of that flippancy, which some rigid censors affirm the young men, with all their prate about modesty—to be so much more and sooner taken by. She laughed, romped, and danced reels, while the divine creature, likely to prove too perfect for anything or anybody, and who, like the "Queen of Love, by her graceful gait was known," rarely displayed her "poetry of motion" even in the courtly caudition and majestic minuet de la cour, sung comic songs, while the finest voice in the world,

"Untwisting all the strings that tie
The hidden soul of harmony"— thrilled forth Scotch melodies and Italian bravuras to the most exquisite of harp-accompaniments,—and mimicked in half Dutch, the Irish brogue and hirsute English,—while her blue helle of a sister talked away in French and all other fashionable tongues with an ease and intermixture like the Egyptian Queen entertaining the ambassadors of seven nations without an interpreter. Thus while Glory, the misjudging Gory—chilled, not admiration by love, by a display throwing all around to an immeasurable distance from her and irritated that vanity, the ruling principle of action in either sex,—the apparently giddy Felicia, paying court to this primary and ever active impulse, as Rouchefoucault makes it—became universally popular among the men, as the drollest girl in the world—the prattling little trifler a-going. The upshot of it all was, that while the surpassing elder was gazed at as "A proud star

Too far

For them to feel its warming flame,"— another lively junior, "that near the beaux smiling came," again took precedence of her lured away Frank Goldsborough, a lieutenant in the navy, handsome, sentimental, and full of the most exalted notions of female perfection, who worshipping Gloriana Ellersby, as far above him, she shone down (to copy his quotation) like

"A winged messenger of heaven,
Unto the white, upturned, wondering eyes
Of mortals that fall back to gaze on her,"— stumbled as it were into an entanglement with the merry sprite, whom he was wont to resort to for consolation under his goddess's cruelty,—and was wedded to the infinite satisfaction of her friends, for Mr. Goldsborough was a rising young officer, no less than to her own unfeigned amazement and delight.

Our heroine felt less sure about this second marriage than the first, inasmuch as the lieutenant's lady was a greater favourite than Matilda had ever been. She still moved in her own atmosphere of attraction,—the sustrous halo around her brow beaming brilliant as ever.—Hitherto she had turned off her lovers with as little ceremony as the mistress of a family does her domestics; but that time was past. The tide was now about to turn, and that bon-on as cold as they deemed it to be, to be animated by the passion which she had so often and so fruitlessly inspired. The person towards whom she was becoming prepossessed was perhaps the last man in the world that one would have supposed calculated to move the refined mind of the regal Gloriana to any other emotion than that of contempt. Ugly in feature, halting in his gait, and of a habitual profanity in language, making the hearer tremble,—Frederick Watson had the redeeming points of wit at will—the most insinuating manners in the world when he chose to be at the pains of putting them on—which, by the way, was seldom enough,—and a dare-devil spirit that would have qualified him to be king of the Mohocks. Like Yorick, "he was a fellow of infinite jest—of most excellent fancy"—whose "gibes, gambols, songs, and flashes of wit, were wont to set the table in a roar," and whose voice, moreover, "as musical as Apollo's lyre," could soften down most charmingly when a love-tale was to be whispered into a fair maiden's ear. These qualities made him quite a pet among the ladies, who, in this instance, as in many others, proved that Pope knew well enough what he was rhyming about when he produced that spiteful line

"Every woman is at heart a rake."

Even the super-refined, the haughty, the ethereal Gloriana, before whom so many had bent in worldless ecstasies as before an angel, seemed not exempt from the debasing strain, since Watson, whom she saw in such general favour with the highest and fairest in the place, could please the taste of one, who might have been judged as too delicate so much as to cast her eyes down upon him. It was as if Ariel—the "dainty Ariel" had been smitten with a fancy for the brute, Caliban.

On his part the reckless Frederick was struck down—annihilated by the splendour of the apparition so perfect in speech and semblance. At first he found himself, like the rest of her many and mute idolaters timid and silent, he had passed through the care of Trophonius, the transition from mirthful to melancholy, could not have been more sudden and complete. But this was a mood not likely to last, his bold and saucy spirit, though subdued, was far from extinct; so he speedily rallied himself, and true to his motto that "faint heart never won fair lady," went on after his old way, though with infinitely more circumspection and restraint. For the first time in his life, he was congratulated on keeping a decent tongue in his head; yet though addressing himself with the utmost vigilance and varied power to propitiate the nice master piece of creation, who

"Rayed down
Her smiles sweet beaming" on the wild genius, beginning to be so reclaimed, he still rattled on, though in a more reverent strain, with all others; thereby offering an indirect, but most flattering tribute to her ascendancy over him. His audacity, in that impulse often does, and was crowned beyond his warmest hopes. He, the lame—the uncouth—the profane—to win acceptance from the most beautiful of women—to melt the divinity hitherto so insensible to all the vows and incense heaped on her marble shrine!—he to realize that charming fancy expressed in the stanza—

"A maiden heart give me,
That locked and sacred lay,
Tho' tried by many a key,
That ne'er could find the way,
Till I by gentler art,
Touch'd the long-hidden spring,
And found that maiden-heart,
In beauty glittering—

Amidst its herbage buried like a flower
Or like a bird that sings deep in its leafy bower!"

no wonder he felt as much surprised and elated as doubtful of himself and his happiness as the wily duke of Gloucester after his successful courtship of the lady Anne.

Perhaps the coy charmer, here so strangely propitious, liked the wilful, wayward Fred—le diable boiteux, as he was well enough nick-named—upon the principle, which makes the sexes seek their contraries: be that however, as it may, he was evidently graced with her regard in an unprecedented degree. This fact so monstrous and incredible, excited general wonder, and at first struck Mr. and Mrs. Ellersby, who had believed their unrivaled child far above the fantasies of passion—proof against the infectious infirmity of love—utterly aghast. They soon set their faces against the matter—and sent the enterprising and obnoxious wooer to Coventry. For their paragon, destined to be the partner of a Secretary at the least—to be fooling away her time and compromising her immaculate dignity with one who had so little claim to simple civility,—they were out of all patience at the bare idea: nor could their friends blame them, the circumstances of the case, and the candidate for Gloriana's favour considered. He was amiable in his temper and ardent in his affections—came of a good family—and had some property and a growing reputation in his profession, which was the law; but what were these paltry recommendations to parents, when the question was of their precious jewel, whom they would have thought cheaply sold at the price of

"A world from'd

Of one entire and perfect chrysolite."

"This dissolute, deformed, fun-loving pettifogger," as the worthy couple somewhat unjustly, characterized him in the heat of their distemperature—"a match for their daughter!"—as Glory was always emphatically styled: good luck! good luck!—they would much sooner have seen her dead at their feet than have agreed to such an exchange of a pearl of countless price for a handful of base copper coins. Fred, was at once forbidden the house and Miss Ellersby charged by every holy and moving exhortation, to forbear all future intercourse with him.—She promised; for to the tears of a mother—the heart-breaking petitions of a father—both so devoted, so tenderly indulgent in all but this, where her conscience whispered they were in the right—the placed sweetness of her nature could refuse nothing.

Besides the exclamation suitable here was

"Oh! spite too high to be enthralled so low!"

and Gloriana blushed in secret for an attachment, which, ardent and involuntary as it was, she could not but acknowledge to be a manifest and unnatural falling off from her high estate. It had stolen on her imperceptibly; so that she "was took ere she was ware;" but the calm reflection, of which she was still capable, convinced her that she could assign no worthy reason for a preference so fraught with unpleasant consequences—so perilous to her future peace. Unlike those susceptible and refractory breasts, whose love is born of opposition, and destroyed by a consent, hers could own the claims of fond parents, the duty of obedience and self-claims as paramount over a more selfish, though intense affection.—Loving Frederick Watson as tenderly and truly as ever woman loved, and content as she would have been to have dedicated herself in penury and retirement to his happiness, she still felt that she had no right to break those hearts, trusting so securely in her, for the sake of one, a stranger whose regard, as yet untried, was idle and ephemeral in comparison with that so existent with her life, and lavishing on her the sum total of its future expectations. She firmly believed that no good could attend a union in opposition to the express will of her natural and devoted guardian; and so thinking, in vain the almost frantic Watson sought to move her to clandestine measures. She had pledged herself solemnly to her father and mother for the contrary—and still kept her word; though such was the gentle constancy of her nature, that her lover, though abjured, was in no danger of being speedily forgotten: and it was long indeed ere she could bring herself to endure a look or word of admiration from another.

At length the ceaseless and pathetic remonstrances of her parents, like the dropping of water upon marble, wore away her steady though quiet fidelity to the remembrance of her first and only love. One of her suitors—a fine, romantic-looking figure of a man, with the dark paleness, haughty brow, and immense mustachios of a corsair-chief—who, though rejected over and over again, persisted in offering himself, his frowns, slaves, and numberless estates—backed by the purest and highest blood in the union, and the intercessions of the nearest relatives on both sides—to her acceptance, seemed about to reap the reward of his perseverance. Miss Ellersby, now about five and twenty, and disposed to carry out her doctrine of passive obedience—or rather to escape that most cruel and systematic of persecutions, carried on out of excess of regard and the best motives, which, every day, and all day long din into her ears of the loathing victim with every variety of appeal, the merits of a particular person no less than of yielding to the prayers of those, to whom she was bound by every sacred and natural obligation,—consented to "commence a bride;" and the most splendid preparations—such would have gone far in reconciling any woman to compliance—went forward for the important occasion. And now was verified still more strikingly than in Gloriana's previous celibacy, the truism chosen for the head-piece of this version of indubitable facts. Man had appointed,—but God saw fit to disappoint, ten days before that fixed upon for the celebration of the ceremony, the bride-groom was called where there is "neither marrying or giving in marriage." The merest accident in the world, the slight cut of a finger by the slipping of a pen-knife, occasioned his death from lock jaw; and the woman, ordained to be, in spite of charms or circumstances, an Old Maid, was thus a second time freed from an engagement on the point of completion. Though greatly shocked, she was, by no means, inconsolable under the dispensation; and in truth, had she been of a mercenary turn there was substantial consolation to be found in the large bequest by which her unfortunate lover attested his undying attachment. For the prescribed time, she was left to her sorrow and her sables, undisturbed by the voice of love; though not without the annoyance of a vast deal of sympathy and condolence from "the dear five hundred friends," whose regard was mightily increased by her recent acquisition of fortune.

While Gloriana secluded herself from society by reason of her late loss, the two youngest of the five Misses Ellersby, had a fine opportunity of starring it in absence of the sun, whose refulgent beams dimmed all lesser luminaries. Abby, the next after Mrs. Goldsborough—fair but dreadfully freckled—with a turn up nose, a sly yet sneering leer, giving a cast any thing but becoming to her light grey eyes—and a person as puffy and awkward as her manner was petulant—had neither address nor amiability to compensate for the want of attraction in her exterior. But then she had ample stock of that "mother sense," one ounce of which is said to be worth a pound of wit—was profoundly artful, and could wheedle, mine, and countermine, with any political hypocrite in the land. Virginia, the last of the sisterhood—was eminently lovely as a profusion of fine flaxen ringlets, a skin whose snowy softness, suffused with the vermeil tints of the morning's first blush, seemed absolutely to melt away under the touch, and a regularity of features diminutive in their delicacy, yet irradiated by a pair of dove-like eyes and a smile of seraphic sweetness, may be supposed to make her. She was gay without pertness—meek, though high spirited, and looking up with the humblest yet fondest deference and admiration to her eldest sister, whose pet and play-thing she had ever been, and who now studied every opportunity to bring her forward among her own and most elevated set. But all Glory's plans for the matrimonial preferment of the charming cadette, were thwarted by the underhand interference of Miss Abby, who, uncourted herself, had pre-determined that that affected minx, as she styled Virginia, should not forestall her at the altar. Meanwhile Miss Ellersby unsuspecting of these mal-practices, exhausted herself in wonderment at the abrupt or unsatisfactory termination of so many promising flirtation—and fretted a great deal more at the ill-luck of her protégée than she had ever done at the untoward circumstances, detaining herself in a state of "single blessedness." At length the impatient Virginia, whose fairy-like delicacy of figure and complexion, could ill stand the wear and tear of late hours and a life of dissipation, beginning to get alarmed at her faded though still fair aspect—caught at a proposal made her, during Abby's absence from home, and became Mrs. Judge Dade, in despair of ever being titled by any one else.—Her husband, thus hastily accepted, was a sedate man of five and forty,—not remarkable for good looks, and stern in his temper and manners; the very antipodes, in short, of the young and soft-looking creature, who had given herself to his arms—and to whom he was very tenderly, though not very obviously attached. The match, too, was highly agreeable to all the family; for Elias Dade—besides his juridical dignity, was possessed of both talent and property.

And now the bright Gloriana, whose manifold perfections had stood so in her way, had seen the third wedding among her younger sisters, while she herself continued single. Nevertheless she was not only resigned but rejoiced that Virginia had been able to dispose of herself to so much advantage—as well as to the furious mortification of her immediate predecessor in the order of consequence, Miss Abby, well deserving the commemoration of a sketch similar to that by Byron, beginning

"Born, in a kitchen, in a garret bred," and who had never been solicited by other protestations save those of a conceited pedagogue, employed to give the young ladies lessons in elocution,—burned with ire and envy at the bridal priority of Virginia; and since she had been unable to prevent that consummation so devoutly abhorred,—she vowed with a vow of bitter and binding force to keep a better look out on the operations of Gloriana, now out of mourning, and mixing in all companies. At though unconscious of her sister's ill designs against her change of condition, a knowledge of them would have given their object but little uneasiness, since disappointed in her only partiality—and greatly shocked by the sudden demise of the man, whom as her future companion, she was striving—and that not altogether without success—to esteem—may love, (to say nothing of the first death blow to her ambitious projects in the rupture with Baron Zerndorf,) she began to feel greatly averse from any farther experience in affairs of the heart or hand. Besides her inclination for books and study, always the chief bent of her nature, had been, of late, so much indulged in, that she could not resolve to break away from its delights for those of another, and how much more uncertain kind. Hence, though surrounded by smiles more pressing than ever—for if disposed to angle, she could now bait her hook with gold, our heroine's extreme coldness of manner, added to the invidious misrepresentations of the malicious Abby—kept them effectually at bay; and though one or two broke through the barrier erected around her by her own distance and the detraction of another—only to have their pretensions die a violent death, she contrived mostly to screen herself from amorous importunity.

She had now lost her mother,—and her surviving parent was so wrapt up in this, his idol—so utterly dependent on her presence for comfort under his bereavement as to grow daily more reconciled to the allotment, which, though so utterly at variance with "All that her early fortune promised once,"

she seemed to have chosen, or rather to have had inflicted upon her. All his anxiety was to be disencumbered of his other single daughter, in which Gloriana heartily concurred; for though not apt to cherish unfriendly feelings towards any one, much more a sister, she could not help thinking Abby a most ungenial inmate. But in process of time, the young lady accomplished to remove herself—and that by a first-rate settlement; being nothing less than the capture of the rich Mr. Lewis Latimer—now a widower,—and who, having made some demonstrations towards a renewal of his dangle after "the superb Miss Ellersby," by which epithet he always characterized her,—was taken in by the ugliest and subtlest of schemers,—and found himself ere he knew where he was, hampered with a second and most undesirable wife.

The insolence of Abby's exultation over Glory—"poor, dear Glory!" (as she affected to term her,) compelled, for the fourth time, to dance in her stocking-feet—or, at least, furnished with the occasion to do so—is inescapable. But in her joy at being rid of one so unamiable and so burdensome to her charity, the person thus pitied and triumphed over, would willingly have paid the penalty, had it been exacted; and as the carriage bearing the new married couple swept from the door, she sat herself down with a sense of full security to the performance of her filial duties, and the enjoyment of "An elegant sufficiency—content,

Retirement—constant quiet, friendship, books—
Ease and alternate labour, useful life,
Progressive virtue, and approving Heaven."

Here we take leave of her, whose history has shown her to be "too perfect for any body;" and here is she likely to remain; for though she has still as many vows addressed to her as any image of the Virgin, as holy and as cold,—there is every reason to believe—so, at least the close of the narrative, which I repeat, here, that Gloriana Ellersby will die, as she has, of late, lived, an OLD MAID.

USEFUL BUT DISAGREEABLE HINTS.

For the Beginning of a New Year.

There is much good sense in the adage, "frequent reckonings make good neighbors." Settlements, however, are often postponed, because there is some trifling disagreements between the parties; and to look over accounts is a dry undertaking. And to this our too common propensity to put off till to-morrow, and too grossness of feeling, regarding the high obligations of justice, and we find the root from whence spring many bitter quarrels and law suits. Wherefore, gentle reader, here the voice of experience.

Fix on the First day of January every year, as a date beyond which no controversy of yours shall remain unsettled, so far as in you lies.

If your books are back, take care to have them "posted up" at that period.

If you find any person's account open which has been paid, balance it.

Where the balance is against you, saddle your horse and go directly off and pay it—in money if you have it—if not give your note.

Take special care when your good easy neighbor, confiding in your honesty, has let his claim lie more than six years not to permit that plea of rescals, out-lawed, to induce you first to doubt whether it is due, and finally to offer to settle it if he will throw in a trifle. Pray why did you not pay him before, when his witnesses were living and the facts fresh? Such claims ought to be paid with interest, and that without delay lest you die, and your executor refuse to pay.

When the balance is in your favor, don't by any means neglect a settlement of such a claim. 'Tis true, your neighbor may have said "he would take no advantage;" but he may die, or forget, or find on examining your bill that 'it is larger than he expected,' and he may think that you have omitted some credit. You do not meet him on even ground.

Is there any matter that lies unadjusted between you and any one of doubtful honesty? I beg of you to see well to that. Such a man, especially if poor, will have the heavy claim against your estate, in the event of your decease, get a discharge from him, and call it even, though he may owe you a trifle. A release from such a person is as good as bank stock.

Finally, let not the light of any new year's morning rise upon you until you shall have remitted, "postage paid," all you owe to proprietors of newspapers. Those are honorary claims. Should the press stop for want of funds, the land will soon grow dark.

For the Saturday Evening Post. TO EMELINE.

Midst all the dear, and valued ones who claim
A kind remembrance in thy youthful breast
Respected friend, I fain would have my name,
By memory's hand inscribed among the rest—
And when in future years, though far away
And many kindly whispered words of praise,
Or when the untiring powers of memory,
Love to recall the scenes of by gone days—
Deign to bestow a passing thought on me,
However bless'd may be thy happy lot,
And if thou art clouded in adversity;
Midst thoughts of dearer friends, forget me not.

HOOD'S COMIC ANNUAL, FOR 1836.

The Proud Spinster.

Our next and final extract must be made from one of the "Sketches on the Road." The principal figure is a proud spinster, old pedigree, and poverty, and anti-pedestrianism; indeed, it is told of her, that she had declared "speaking of certain humble obsequies, that she would rather live for ever than have a walking funeral!" Fancy the dilemma of such a lady, on occasion of her one horse choosing to expire, whilst in the act of ministering to her "air and exercise!"

A recent American author has described as an essential attribute of high birth and breeding in England, a certain sort of quakerly composure, in all possible sudden emergencies, such as an alarm of the house on fire, or a man falling into a fire by one's side;—in fact the same kind of self-command which Pope praises in a lady who is "mistress of herself, though China fall." In this particular Miss Norman's conduct justified her pretensions. She was mistress of herself, though her horse fell. She did not start—exclaim—put her head out of the window, or even let down the front glass; she only adjusted herself more exactly in the middle of the seat, drew herself bolt upright, and fixed her eyes on the back of the coach-box. In this posture Humphrey found her.

"If you please, Ma'am, Planty-ginit be dead. The lady acquiesced with the smallest nod ever made.

"I've took off the collar, and the butt out, and got out out o' harness entirely; but he be as unamiable as his own shoes;" and the informant looked earnestly at the lady to observe the effect of the communication. But she never moved a muscle; and honest Humphrey was just shutting the coach door, to go and finish the laying-out of the corpse, when he was recalled.

"Humphrey!"

"What's your pleasure, Ma'am?"

"Remember, another time—"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"When a horse of mine is deceased—"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"Touch your hat."

A respectable gig-man (to borrow a word from Mr. Carlyle) offers to extricate her from her present difficulties; but she listens to him in haughty silence—a stage coach risks the loss of its time to succour her; but she refuses to condescend its publicity—'Fride, however, goeth before a fall.

The stage rattled away at an indignant gallop; and we were left once more to our own resources. By way of passing the time, I thrice repeated my offers to the unfortunate old maiden, and endured as many rebuffs. I was contemplating a fourth trial, when a signal was made from the carriage-window, and Humphrey, hat in hand, opened the door.

"Procure me a post chaise."

"A po-shay!" echoed Humphrey, but, like an Irish echo, with some variation from his original—"Lord help ye, Ma'am, there be can't such a thing to be had ten miles round—no, not for love nor money. Why, bless ye, it be election time, and there be can't coach, cart, nor dog-barrow, but what be gone to it!"

"No matter," said the mistress, drawing herself up with an air of lofty resignation. "I revoke my order; for it is far, very far, from the kind of riding that I prefer.—And Humphrey—"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"Another time—"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"Remember once for all—"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"I do not choose to be blest, or the Lord to help me."

Another pause in our proceedings, during which a company of ragged boys, who had been blackberrying, came up, and planted themselves, with every symptom of vulgar curiosity, around the carriage. Miss Norman had now no single glass through which she could look without encountering a group of low life faces staring at her with all their might. Neither could she help hearing some such shocking ill bred remarks as, "Vy don't the frizzled-rigged old Guy get into the german's drag?" Still the pride of the Normans sustained her. She seemed to draw a sort of supplementary neck out of her bosom, and sat more rigidly erect than ever, occasionally favouring the circle, like a mad bull at bay, with a most awful threatening look, accompanied ever by the same five words:

"I CHOOSE to be alone."

"It is easy to say choose, but more difficult to have one's choice. The blackberry boys chose to remain; and in reply to each conge, only proved by a general grin how very much teeth are set off to advantage by purple mouths."

We must skip over a few more expedients proposed and rejected, to close our notice with the close of this melancholy history:—

"Hope revived at the sound of wheels; and up came a tax cart, carrying four insides, namely, two well-grown porkers, Master Bardell, the pig-butcher, and his foreman, Samuel Slark, or, as he was more commonly called, Sam the Sticker. They were both a trifle the worse for liquor; if such a phrase might honestly be applied to men who were only a little more courageous, more generous, and civil and obliging to the fair sex, than their wont when perfectly sober. The Sticker, especially—in his most temperate moments a perfect sky blue-bodied, red faced, bowing and smirking pattern of politeness to females, was now, under the influence of good ale, a very Sir Calidore, ready to comfort and succour distressed damsels, to fight for them, live or die for them, with as much of the chivalrous spirit as remains in our times." They inquired, and I explained in a few words the lady's dilemma, taking care to forewarn them, by relating the issue of my own attempts in her behalf.

"Mayhap you warnt half purlite or pressing enough," observed Sam, with a side wink at his master. "It an't a bit of a scrape, and a civil word, as will get a strange lady up into a strange german's gig. It wants warmth-like, and making on her feel at home. Only let me alone with her, for a persuader, and I'll have her up in our cart—my master's that is to say—afore you can see whether she has feet or hooofs."

"In a moment the speaker was at the carriage-door, stroking down his sleek forelocks, bowing, and using his utmost eloquence, even to the repeating most of his arguments twice over. She would be perfectly safe, he told her, sitting up between him and his master, and quite pleasant, for the pigs would keep themselves to themselves at the back of the cart, and as for the horse, he was nothing but a good one, equal to twelve mules an hour—with much more to the same purpose. It was quite unnecessary for Miss Norman to say she had never ridden in a cart with two pigs and two butchers, and she did not say it. She merely turned her head away from the man, to be addressed by the master, at the other window, the glass of which she had just let down for a little air. "A taxed cart, Madam," he said, "mayn't be exactly the vehicle accustomed to, and so forth; but thereby, considering respective ranks of life, why, the more honour done to your humbles, which, as I said afore, will take every care, and observe the respectful; likewise the distancing the two hogs. Whereby, everything considered, namely, necessity and so forth, I will make so bold as hope, Madam, excuse more pressing, and the like, and dropping ceremony for the time being, you will embrace us at once, as you shall be most heartily welcome to, and be considered, by our humbles, as a favour besides."

"The sudden drawing up of the window, so violently as to shiver the glass, showed sufficiently in what light Miss Norman viewed Master Bardell's behaviour. It was an unlucky smash, for it afforded what the tradesman would have called 'an advantageous opening,' for pouring in a fresh stream of eloquence; and the Sticker, who shewly estimated the convenience of the breach, came round the back of the carriage, and as junior counsel followed on the same side. But he took nothing by the motion. The lady was invincible, or, as the discomfited pair mutually agreed, 'as hard for to be convinced into a cart, as anything on four legs.' The blackberry boys had departed, the evening began to close in, and no Humphrey made his appearance. The butcher's horse was on the fret, and his swine grumbled at the delay. The master and man fell into consultation, and favoured no afterwards with the result, the Sticker being the orator. It was a man's duty, he said, to look after women, pretty or ugly, young or old; it was what we all come into the world to do, namely, to make ourselves comfortable and agreeable to the fair sex. As for himself, purtecting females was his nature, and he should never lie easy again, if so be he left the lady on the road; and providing a female wouldn't be purtected with her own free will, she ought to be forced to, like any other 'live beast unsensible of its own good.' Them was his sentiments, and his master followed 'em up. They knowed Miss Norman, name and fame, and was both well-known respectable men in their lines, and I might ax about for their characters.—Whereby, supposing I approved, they'd have her, right and tight, in their cart, afore she felt herself respectfully off her legs.

"Such were the arguments and the plan of the bull-headed pair. I attempted to reason with them, but my consent had clearly been only asked as a compliment.—The lady herself hastened the catastrophe. Whether she had overheard the debate, or the amount of long pent up emotion became too overwhelming for its barriers, I know not, but Pride gave away to Nature, and a short hysteric scream proceeded from the carriage. Miss Norman was in fits! We contrived to get her seated on the step of the vehicle, where the butchers supported her, fanning her with their hats, whilst I ran off to a little pool near at hand for some cold water. It was the errand only of some four or five minutes, but when I returned, the lady, only half conscious, had been caught up, and there she sat, in the cart, right and tight, between the two butchers, instead of the two Salvages, or Griffins, or whatever they were, her hereditary supporters. They were already on the move. I jumped into my own gig, and put my horse to his speed; but I had lost my start, and when I came up with them, they were already galloping into Waterford. Unfortunately her residence was at the further end of the town, and thither I saw her conveyed, struggling in the bright blue, and somewhat greasy, arms of Sam the Sticker, screaming in concert with the two swine, and answered by the shouts of the whole rabblement of the place, who knew Miss Norman quite as well, by sight, as her own carriage!"

ANECDOTE.—Mr. Taggart was an old fashioned clergyman, very plain and sincere in his manners.—Being on his way to Washington, one winter, he encountered at a public house two young democrats, who were very noisy in their professions of republicanism, and attracted the attention of the whole company by their violent denunciation of federals and are istocrats. At dinner, however, they were very pre-emptory in their calls upon the servants, and very fastidious about their food. The moment they came in contact with their inferiors, their manners were haughty and unbending; but the talk about the democratic in politics was still kept up. One of them pushed a bottle towards Mr. Taggart, and asked him to take wine. The old gentleman politely accepted the invitation, provided they would allow him to give them a toast. This was gladly assented to, and the company suspended the play of knives and forks to listen to the sentiment. The Doctor bowed to the young men and gave them—"A little more REPUBLICANISM, and a little less TALK ABOUT IT.—Greenfield Mercury.

Faults of the head are punished in this world—those of the heart in another; but as most of our vices are compound so is also their punishment.

Want of prudence is too frequently the want of virtue; nor is there on earth a more powerful advocate of vice than poverty.

Desire the women to take all you have, and the men to give you nothing, and both will be sure to grant all you ask of them.

Modesty is not only an ornament, but also a guard to virtue. It is a kind of quick and delicate feeling into the soul, which makes her shrink and withdraw herself from every thing that has danger in it. It is such an exquisite sensibility, as warns her to shun the first appearance of every thing which is hurtful.

No man is content with his own condition, though it be best; nor dissatisfied with his wit though it be the worst.

Sketches of the Western Bar.—No. VIII.

Gen. Samuel Blackburn, of Bath County, Va.

In journeying westwardly from Staunton, Va., towards the Warm Springs, in Bath county, after a ride of about thirty miles, through a country generally wild and uncultivated, but occasionally picturesque and beautiful, the attention of the traveller is arrested by a handsome country seat, in full view of the stage road, and distant on the left hand, probably two hundred yards, from it. The mansion is of brick, and in much better taste than most of the dwelling houses in that section of Virginia, and the numerous out-houses and negro cabins which surround it, indicate the wealth of the proprietor. The situation is one of peculiar beauty—just on the brow of a verdant knoll which swells up gently from the extensive meadows which are spread out at its base, and the whole scene, with its dewy meadows, noble groves, and meandering streams, now glancing in the sun-beams like a silver thread, and now concealed by the luxuriant wild growth that fringe its banks, when viewed by the weary traveller who is whirled along in a crowded stage-coach, suffocated with heat and dust, seems almost like an oasis in a desert. This seat is called "The Wilderness," and was the residence of the late General Samuel Blackburn—a man whose name is well known throughout Virginia, not less for the richness of his intellectual endowments, than for the eccentricity of his character.

Gen. Blackburn was a native of Frederick county, Virginia; and as his parents were in humble circumstances, he had many difficulties to encounter in procuring an elementary education. By perseverance and industry, however, he overcame them to some extent, and made considerable proficiency in the study of the classics, and of such branches of science as were generally taught about the period of the revolution. His studies were, however, soon interrupted by a summons to the "tented field." The call was promptly obeyed, and he was among the first to fire a gun at Guilford, and among the last to leave the battle ground. He was probably an actor in some other scenes of our revolutionary history, but the writer of this hasty sketch, is not sufficiently informed, to speak with certainty on the subject.

After the restoration of peace, and the establishment of our national independence, Samuel Blackburn resumed his studies, and in order to procure the means of support while engaged in them, he took charge of a school, and performed, at the same time, the double duty of student and instructor. At one period he contemplated the study of divinity, and with that view commenced a preparatory course of reading, but he subsequently changed his purpose, and adopted the profession of the law, which at that day, was regarded, in Virginia, as the high-road to wealth and fame. Shortly after he obtained his license, he intermarried with Anne Matthews, a sister of the present Judge Matthews of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, and daughter of the late Gen. George Matthews of Georgia.

For many years Gen. Blackburn was a resident of Staunton, where he acquired great distinction in his profession, and mingled actively in the political contests of the day. Subsequently he removed to "The Wilderness," where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred in March, 1835.

In many respects, Gen. Blackburn, was one of the most remarkable men of his day. Nature seemed to have marked him out for an orator of the highest grade, and if his application had equalled his capacity, he would have fulfilled, what appeared to be his destiny. But, unfortunately, satisfied with the triumph which his natural abilities enabled him to achieve, he never devoted himself assiduously to the more abstruse studies of his profession. He was endowed by nature with a rich and fertile imagination, an easy and graceful elocution, a strong and quick perception; and wherever these faculties were called into requisition he was always fortunate in his efforts, but when engaged in the more grave and arduous conflicts of the mind, his deficiencies in legal knowledge were often perceptible. As an advocate he possessed at times, the most unbounded control over the feelings and passions of his auditory—alternately melting them to tears, and convulsing them with laughter.—His perceptions of all subjects differed from those of other men, and even the most common place events were oftentimes invested by his fancy with a garb so unique and grotesque, as to defy the gravity of Nestor himself—and then the transition was almost instantaneous, to the most soul-subduing pathos. But if there was any department in which he was pre-eminently distinguished, it was in sarcasm and invective. His powers in this respect were scarcely inferior to those of John Randolph himself. Even to this day, many of the older citizens of those counties in which he practised law, in his palmy days, can repeat whole passages of his speeches, abounding in the most withering sarcasm: generally, however, his satire was not continued through a series of sentences. He usually concentrated his bitterness in the narrowest compass possible, and winged his shaft with such dexterity, that it had sunk into the heart of his victim, and was rankling there before he had heard even the twang of the bow from which it was sent. As a necessary consequence of his fame in this respect, he was retained in every suit involving character, in all the neighboring counties; and it rarely happened that the opposite party would not sooner compromise the matter in dispute, than incur his terrible denunciation.

His person and address were also well calculated to give effect to his speeches. His figure was noble and commanding—his action graceful in the extreme—and his countenance more like a lion's than any other man's that ever lived. He possessed a command over the muscles of his face that was truly astonishing, and gave a variety to its expression which could not be surpassed.

In consequence of his intention in early life to adopt the clerical profession he had made himself intimately acquainted with the scriptures, and his speeches were frequently adorned with the most beautiful and touching illustrations drawn from that source. Many of these are treasured up in the memory of his contemporaries, but the writer will not venture to detail any of them here.

Gen. Blackburn was also peculiarly happy at times, in seizing upon a particular crisis in the progress of his cause, or in the feelings of his audience, and using it with the most electrical effect. An example of this kind was related to the writer by a late distinguished citizen of Virginia, who had it from an eye witness, and although the writer is sensible that no pen, however graphic, much less his, could do justice to a scene which depended for its effect so much upon the manner and character of the orator, and the context of circumstances, he will, nevertheless, hazard its insertion. It occurred in the Virginia House of Delegates, of which Gen. Blackburn was then a member from the county of Bath. During the discussion of an important measure which was pending before the House, a member whose sentiments were opposed to those of Gen. Blackburn, took occasion to express his views of the subject very much at large—dwelling upon the great fundamental principles of democracy—lauding the sovereign people to the skies—and concluding his declamatory harangue with the true quotation "Vox Populi, Vox Dei!" The speech was not without its effect, and Gen. B. observing it, rose with an air of dignity and solemnity peculiar to himself and well befitting his silver locks, and repeated in a slow and distinct tone, the words "Vox Populi, Vox Dei!"—after an emphatic pause, elevating his voice, he continued, "Yes Mr. Speaker—Vox Populi—Vox Dei!"—and so said the Jews, when the Saviour of the world hung groaning on the cross—Vox Populi—Vox Dei!" and immediately sat down. The effect was magical—the House was electrified—these few words produced a result which the most laboured effort of reason could never have accomplished.

Upon another occasion he dealt a left-handed blow to a member of the Virginia Legislature, which is so characteristic of his peculiar sarcastic humour that the writer cannot forbear narrating it. The Legislature had been in session probably two months and but little business had been despatched. Instead of attending to the local interests of the State and returning to their homes, the members deemed it incumbent on them (and it is to be feared that there is still room for amendment in this particular) to instruct the General Government as to their duties. Under these circumstances a proposition was introduced that the House should meet at an earlier hour. Considerable opposition was made to the motion, and many members joined in the discussion. Amongst others, a member from one of the western counties, who, although he had been a delegate for many years, had never opened his mouth in the House, except to say "aye," or "no," was impelled by his anxiety to get home, to address the House in favour of its adoption. He adverted to the backwardness of the business, reproached members with neglect of duty—stated that they had been in session for two months and had done nothing, and concluded by asking in a very pompous manner, the question "What shall I tell my constituents when I return home?" when he had taken his seat, Gen. Blackburn—with a corrugation of his brows which cannot be described—one of them arching half way up his forehead, and the other lowering over the eye like a thunder cloud,—rose from his seat, and fixing his gaze steadily on the member, responded to his enquiring in the most scornful tone, "Tell them you made that speech!"

Instances of this kind might be multiplied, but these are sufficient to afford some idea of the peculiarities of the subject of this sketch.

As a private individual, Gen. Blackburn possessed many noble traits of character. He was steadfast in his attachments, and decided in his antipathies. His hospitable mansion was always open to receive the visits of his acquaintances, and no one failed to receive a hearty welcome at his plentiful board. By his last will he emancipated all his slaves, forty-six in number, upon condition that they would emigrate to Liberia, furnishing them the means of doing so; forty two of the number are probably at this moment traversing the wide ocean in fulfilment of the condition which is to entitle them to their precious liberty.

THE RIGHTEOUS.

It is rare to find in the same compass more exquisitely polished versification, and more real piety, than are contained in the following stanzas.

Pilgrim is thy journey dear?

Are its lights extinct forever?

Still suppress the rising fear—

God forsakes the righteous never?

Storms may gather o'er thy path,

All the ties of life may sever—

Still, amid the fearful sea,

God forsakes the righteous never.

Pain may rack thy wasting frame,

Health desert the couch forever,

Faith still burns with deathless flame,

God forsakes the righteous never!

LACONICS.—No. VI.

A few short sentences of Advice.

Never divulge a thing confided to you.
 Let nothing ruffle your temper.
 Never neglect small matters and expenses.
 Keep your own secrets.
 Deceive him who attempts to deceive you.
 Be prudent and circumspect in all you say and do.
 Beware of being duped—the world is full of knaves.
 Let all your actions be manly.
 In every thing be cool, determined, and vigorous.
 All comparisons are odious and should be avoided.
 He scatters enjoyment who can enjoy much.
 Make no one your confidant.
 Consult with feeling, and act with vigour.
 Never interfere in other people's concerns.
 Never put implicit faith in a man who has once deceived you.
 To the poor owe nothing.
 Of the rich ask nothing.
 Neither flatter nor censure the vain.
 Never believe the flatterer.
 To the blabber, speak not.
 To the silent, open yourself with caution.
 Attempt not to curb a madman or to make a fool wise.
 Think of what you are doing.
 Man may live content in any situation.
 Observe the three grand properties—time, place and persons.
 Say little—but say that little well.
 Never disgrace yourself in order to do honor to any one living.
 Whatever you undertake—persevere in it—but consider well before you do undertake a thing.
 Be always punctual to your engagements.
 Be industrious and frugal and you will be rich.
 Let nothing throw you off your guard.
 Be cautious and reserved with people you do not know.
 Never give your opinion if it be likely to be contrary to that of any one present.
 Contradiction is telling a man you are wiser than he is—which can hardly be very flattering.
 Wine heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. If often turns the good natured man into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.
 Drunkenness insensibly weakens the understanding and impairs the memory.
 It does not require one half the trouble to check our passions that it does to gratify them.
 Health is the one thing needful: therefore no pains, expense, self denial, or restraint which we submit to for the sake of it, is too much. Whether it require us to relinquish lucrative situations, to abstain from favorite indulgencies, to control intemperate passions, or undergo tedious regimens; whatever difficulties it lays us under, a man who pursues his happiness rationally and resolutely will be content to submit to.
 Irregularities have no limits, one excess draws on another, the most easy therefore, as well as the most excellent way of being virtuous is to be so entirely.
 The criminal commerce of the sexes corrupts and depraves the mind and moral character more than any single species of vice whatsoever.
 The most agreeable way of flattering a man is asking him for information—in such cases you must appear to be ignorant, although you may be much better acquainted with the subject than he.

'Tis wisdom in a doubtful case, rather to take another man's judgment than one's own.

When the Egyptian was asked what he carried so secretly under his cloak, he gravely answered "his bid under my cloak that thou mightest not know what it is."

Certainly if a man will keep but of even hand, his ordinary expenses ought to be but to the half of his receipts, and if he think to wax rich, but to the third part.

As our domestics have an equal right with the rest of mankind to human happiness, we are by this rule forbidden.

1. To enjoin them unnecessary labor or confinement from the mere love and wantonness of domination.

2. To insult them by harsh, scornful or opprobrious language.

3. To refuse them any harmless pleasures, and by the same principle are also forbidden causeless or immoderate anger, habitual peevishness, and groundless suspicion.

Avoid entertaining suspicion—and however just cause you may have of suspecting a man of dishonesty or unfair dealing, let not your suspicion be expressed or discovered:—condemn no one on mere suspicion—but rather seem to consider all men incapable of dishonesty or cheating.

When you feel yourself unfit for society, avoid it entirely; take a walk or a canter on horseback; exercise and a communion with nature are the best and easiest cures for an uneasy mind, bilious irritability, and nervousness.

Always be doing something; never seem to have nothing to do.

To live peaceably in the world, and to avoid ruts, satire, or familiarity, you can hardly be too cautious or too reserved in your conduct—'tis better to use too much, than too little ceremony and apparent respect—do this courteously.

Praise everything and everybody, right or wrong, and you will please more than by telling the truth like an honest man.

If you dislike people, shun their society, but do not express your dislike, or utter complaints against them.

All that a man has to do in a place where he is a stranger, is to bridle his tongue and his temper, cultivate good feelings and kind affections, and meet every advance of his neighbour with courtesy, cordiality and cheerfulness.

In any society, where a difference of opinion arises on matters of little or no consequence, it is wise to give in, although you may have incontestable proofs to support the correctness of your opinion—this flatters the other's vanity and cannot injure yourself.

If I thought my very cap knew my secrets, I would throw it into the fire.

If you cannot keep your own secret, how can you hope or expect that others will do it for you!

Love, though the sweetener of life, cannot constitute its business. In whatever relation we may stand to society, we are bound to the performance of certain active duties, inconsistent with a life of contemplative indulgence. The world is our creditor, and a hard one, for it will relax nothing of its claims; a life devoted to love, though one of the staple fictions of poets and romance writers, is incompatible both with the natural character of man, and his social relations.—Our bodies and our minds are alike framed for action, and he who could merge all his duties, in the indulgence even of the purest passion, would, in so doing, prove himself to be an object not of love, but of contempt.

Capitol of Virginia, at Richmond.

Ruins about the Taj Mahal, Agra.

CAPITOL OF RICHMOND, AT VIRGINIA.

The first permanent settlement in Virginia, dates in 1606. It had been visited by the English before that period, but the attempts for a colony failed. Newport was built on James River at that period, about forty miles from the sea. But Captain John Smith, who was there a little later, may justly be considered the principal man in effecting a settlement. There is no very large city in Virginia, as in most of the other states. Richmond, the seat of government, is the largest, with a population of 16,000. Norfolk, the largest commercial town, has about 10,000 inhabitants; and is situated near the mouth of James river. Richmond is at the head of the tide water, on the same river. It rises gradually from the river, and has a fine appearance. Two bridges cross the river at Richmond.—“Most of the houses are brick and many are elegant.—The public buildings are a court house, a state prison, an almshouse, a museum, eight churches, and the Capitol. This is considered an elegant structure.—It stands on the highest ground in the city, and the prospect from it is extensive and interesting.” Richmond is about one hundred and twenty miles from Washington city, and one hundred and fifty from the mouth of the river. It is a place of considerable business. There are falls in the river, not far above Richmond; but a canal has been made round them and a boat navigation is thus secured for two hundred and twenty miles. This adds much to the trade and prosperity of the city. There are good schools in Richmond, and convenient houses of worship belonging to different sects. The constitution of Virginia has lately been revised and altered; but the changes are not very material. The interior of the state is filling up with inhabitants; and the population west of the Blue Ridge is even now the greatest. Virginia has been rich in great men; among the most distinguished were General Washington, Patrick Henry, Arthur Lee, Richard H. Lee, George Wyeth, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, and John Marshall.

RUINS ABOUT THE TAJ MAHAL, AGRA.

This engraving gives a view of Taj Mahal, as it is seen from the banks of the Jumna. The arched gateway that appears in the drawing, is the way into an enclosed, though large space of ground, that lies before the great entrance and front wall of the Taj Mahal. The top of this kind of triumphal archway, with its row of small cupolas, may be distinguished in the engraving. The high conical-shaped dome in the distance stands on the centre of the building itself; the minarets and the side mosques of the Taj are likewise seen.

No one that ever lived lies enshrined in such splendour, as Shah Jehan and his wife Mumtāz Zama, whose remains are deposited in this gorgeous sepulchre. The Taj Mahal is very justly celebrated as the finest, and by far the most beautiful, of all the monuments of Hindostan; its design is at once elegant and grand; its dimensions are great, and its proportions admirable; the materials of which it is constructed are costly in their kind, and superior in their quality; its exterior and interior ornaments and embellishments are elaborate and rich; and whether it is viewed as a complete and exquisitely finished work of a graceful and noble style of architecture, or taken and examined separately in all its various and minutely wrought parts, it exhibits a structure that surpasses, we might safely assert, any thing of the kind that continues on the face of the earth, at this day, to arrest the attention, and demand the admiration, of those who travel into distant lands.

“The modern district of Agra joins the Delhi division a short distance north of Kosee, and extends along the banks of the Jumna to its junction with the Chumbul. On the west it is bounded by the pergunnahs of Deeg, the Bhurtpore territories, and the pergunnahs of Dholpore, Barree, and Rajakera. That portion situated between the Chumbul and the Jumna is a table-land, elevated above the beds of both rivers about sixty feet, and composed of a light soil. In many parts, during the dry season, the tanks, streams, and rivulets are without water, which, for agriculture and domestic purposes, is procured from wells. Cultivation, in this province, when compared with its condition in the Company's old provinces, has made but little progress. The waste lands are very extensive, and a portion of them might, without injustice, be set aside for the maintenance of watchmen, or for any other public measure.”

Of the native inhabitants of the province of Agra, the following account has been given in the Indian Gazetteer:—“The natives are in general a handsome robust race of men, and consist in a mixture of the Hindoos and Mahomedans, few of the Seiks having come so far south. A considerable number of the cultivators to the west of the Jumna are Jauts, and the country of the Macherry Rajah contains many Mewatties, long noted for their thievish propensities. The Hindoo religion is still predominant, although the country has been (until recently) permanently subject to Mahomedan princes since the thirteenth century. Pagodas are numerous, and mosques rare, while the Rajpoot and Braminical races prevail among the peasantry. The woods and jungles are full of peacocks, another symptom of Hindooism; and most of the names are followed by the affix of Singh, which ought to be peculiar to the Rajpoots of noble descent; but the Jauts assume it without ceremony, and so do the Seiks likewise, who, being apostates from the Braminical faith, have still less claim to such a distinction. The language of common intercourse is the Hindostanee; but the Persian is used for public and official documents, and is also spoken in conversation by the higher classes of Mahomedans. The Brui dialect is spoken around the city of Agra, and extends to the Vindhya mountains. In the words of the Lord's prayer, in this language, twenty eight correspond with those occurring in the Bengalese and Hindostanee specimens, besides two or three Sanscrit words of frequent recurrence in the Bengalese. The ancient language of Kanoje, the capital of Upper Hindostan, at the period of the first Mahomedan invasion, is thought by Mr. Colebrooke to form the basis of the modern Hindostanee.”

This capital does not appear to have struck Bishop Heber as possessing superiority in architectural remains over other places in India, by any means so much as it did the writer of these notes; and the difference was more apparent on revisiting Agra, after seeing Delhi and other places. There is a peculiar brilliancy about Agra, that no one acquainted with Eastern scenery can well conceive; and which no one, who has seen it, can easily forget. Yet there are animated descriptions of what he saw at Agra, to be found in Bishop Heber's Journal, as the following account of some of the buildings and halls, in the interior of the fort, will amply show. “The fort is very large and ancient, surrounded with high walls and towers, of red stone, which command some noble views of the city, its neighbourhood, and the windings of the Jumna. The principal sights, however, which it contains, are the Motee Masjid, (Pearl Mosque,) a beautiful building, of white marble, carved with exquisite simplicity and elegance.” So beautifully laid are the stones in this mosque, that it looks as if it had been cut out of a solid block of marble.”

“The palace built by Akbar, in a great degree of the same material, and containing some noble rooms, is now sadly disfigured and destroyed by neglect, and by being used as warehouses, armories, offices, and lodging-rooms for the garrison. The hall, now used as the "Dewanny Aum," or public court of justice, is a splendid edifice, supported by pillars and arches of white marble, as large, and more nobly simple, than that of Delhi. The ornaments, carving, and mosaic of the smaller apartments, in which was formerly the Zennana, are equal or superior to any thing which is described as found in the Alhambra. The view from these rooms is very fine; at the same time, there are some adapted for the hot winds, from which light is carefully excluded. This suite is lined with small mirrors, in fantastic frames; a cascade of water, also surrounded with mirrors, has been made to gush from a recess at the upper end, and marble channels, beautifully inlaid with cornelians, agates, and jasper, convey the stream to every side of the apartment." This is a fine description of a rich and magnificent palace.

THE HOLY WARS.

No wars have occurred more novel and interesting in their character, or which have exerted a greater influence on the moral and political aspect of society, than those usually denominated the crusade or holy wars. In taking a historical retrospect of the time which elapsed from their commencement to their completion, we are surprised at the influence which artful and aspiring men (especially when clothed in the holy and reverential garb of religion) are capable of exerting over the human mind, as well as at the length to which superstitious enthusiasm leads its votaries.—The crusades were the most extravagant enterprises which ever occupied the attention of mankind, still history records no instance of perseverance or devotion, even in more worthy causes, which in any way compares with these wars. The project which had been before devised was renewed by Peter the hermit. Naturally ambitious and artful, he devoted for years all the energies of a highly gifted mind to raise himself to power and affluence, and engrave his name in imperishable letters on the temple of fame. He finally hit upon the expedient of uniting the powers of Europe against the Saracens, who then occupied the holy land. With these intents he started for Rome. On his arrival he found the Pope at peace, and all the vast resources of his empire unemployed. He attained admission to the papal palace, and although the Pope listened with interest to his project, he was not wholly convinced of its feasibility. He repeated his visit, and knowing that the success of his measure and his own hopes of future aggrandisement, depended much on that effort, he brought into play all the energies of a highly gifted mind, backed with uncommon eloquence, and a thorough knowledge of the human heart, and the springs of action, and he touched those springs with such a masterly hand, that the opposition of the Pope fell before him. The command immediately went forth and all the followers of the cross were warned to prepare for the dreadful shock. Preaching heralds overran Europe, calling upon every one in consideration of the rewards of heaven and a free forgiveness of all past offences, to engage in the holy enterprise of taking Jerusalem from the hands of the infidels, and against all who refused their assistance, denouncing the endless wrath of deity. Influenced by these considerations enforced by all the fascinating charms of eloquence, it is easy to imagine the effect that would be produced on a people buried in superstitious ignorance, and instructed from childhood to esteem the decree of the Pope, as the prototype of that which should be pronounced against them immediately after death. The millions of Europe united under the banner of the cross. Kings, dukes, and nobles placed the vast resources of their dominions at his command, while all classes of society pressed on with enthusiastic zeal in that which appeared to their disordered fancies, a holy and glorious undertaking. The poverty stricken mother, warned by the spreading flame, buckled onto her son the only support and solace of her declining years, his scanty armour, bidding him with a mother's parting blessing to conquer or die in the contest. The grey headed father equipped his numerous offspring, and sent them forth as a blood offering to propitiate the favour of a holy God. In a few months the whole power of Christendom was arrayed, while the banner of the cross destined soon to be drenched in blood, reigned triumphantly over Europe. But numerous obstacles opposed their advance. In their wild zeal they had pressed forward without a supply for the army, trusting to the miraculous interposition of Providence for subsistence, and when this was withheld, they plundered and destroyed the defenceless villages through which they passed, until the inhabitants armed in self defence, and skulked about destroying all who came within their reach.

Thus of this immense army, but few reached Palestine; and those who did, were only reserved to become the prey of the merciless Turks, who repulsed them with tremendous havoc. But still the aspiring priesthood were not content to give up the project as hopeless—new levies were constantly made over from the best families of Europe, who only reached Palestine to fall before the fierce barbarians. Such are some of the disasters which befell crusaders during the two centuries in which the concentrated powers of Christendom were arrayed against infidels; a war in which millions sacrificed their lives as a blood offering to the moloch of ambition. During this period business was at a stand, and a general system of bankruptcy and ruin prevailed over the land. The honest gains of the industrious poor were wrested from them to fill the coffers of the avaricious priesthood and aristocracy. Such is but a faint picture of Europe at the close of these wars. But although their efforts for the moment were disastrous in the extreme, still they were destined to be the instruments for producing that moral and political reform, which during the last century has progressed throughout the world.—For centuries before the crusades, mankind were held in superstitious ignorance, into which no ray of moral or scientific light penetrated. Learning in none of its forms was diffused. All knowledge was confined to the great city of Constantinople—the only one which had withstood the encroachments of the barbarians during the dark ages. As they passed through this city, in their course, they brought back with them some knowledge of the arts and sciences, which in the course of a few years spread over Europe. Men of original and powerful minds excited to action, rolled on the wheels of the reformation, which already has dispelled the murky clouds of despotism, and superstition, and opened to the admiring gaze of man the true dignity of human nature. Thus by means of one of the most destructive wars which ever deluged the world in blood, will be brought the regeneration of mankind—already the sun of liberty has enlightened a large portion with his cheering beams. The dark clouds of priestcraft and ignorance have melted away like morning mist where first the blushing day appears cheerily over the mountain tops in smiling beauty, and the signs of the times seem to indicate that the day is not far distant when the banner of political and religious freedom shall wave triumphantly over the world. "JUNO."

Happiness is a wise man's fortune, but there can be none without virtue.

From the Knickerbocker for February.
OLLAPODIANA.

There is a pensive, melancholy feeling which overpowers the heart of a resident in a city, when he goes at twilight, from the scene of his business and his cares to the fireside of home. As he passes along the crowded thoroughfare, jostled by the hundreds that meet him—as he looks forward through the uncertain atmosphere, to forms and dwellings dimly described, by twinkling lamps in the distance, and sees damp walls and streets receding from his footstep,—he falls into a train of musing. How many deeds does the night bring on! How many an unsuspected and impatient eye watches the golden sun go down into the glowing bosom of the West; how many hearts beat high with suspense or disquiet, while the wan twilight deepens into evening, and the stars, one by one, glittering like diamonds through the infinite air, 'set their watch in the sky!' The affianced bride waits for her lover, counting the footsteps that fall upon the pavement, and taxing the discipline of her ready ear with the task of decision whether they be his or no; the church-goer longs for the bell, whose voice proclaims the hallowed hour of prayer, and 'fingers in fond solicitude for the moment when the chapel-ward step shall be taken. In unnumbered bosoms are kindled in the emotions of praise—and they are pure and holy. Nothing can exceed the beauties of a truly calm and chastened affection. It is alike lovely, when bestowed on God or man. The relinquishment of self—the trusting dependence on the great Power of Nature—the fond aspirations for better enjoyments—these are the true solace and hope of mortality.

For one I am a deep lover of the 'poetry of heaven.' Delicate and perfect indeed is the 'glitterance of the stars.' I love to watch their birth in the depths of the evening firmament; and to see the moon walking in their midst—the Queen of the Evening, whose blue pathway glitters with the fadeless jewelry of the universe. Some of these glorious spheres spring with their ho-y lustre upon the sight with the quickness of thought, blessing the eye with their sweet radiance, and almost haunting the ear with that music which seems to echo from that dim period of the past, when the morning stars sang together. When I behold them devotional feelings possess my heart; and I go back on the wings of memory to the far away scenes of my boyhood. I think again, as I did then, that all created things make melody to their God, and, singing as once I sung, I say:

Ask of the ocean-waves that burst
In music on the strand—
Whose murmurings load the breeze
That fans the Summer land;
Why is their harmony abroad—
Their cadence in the sky,
That glitters with the smile of God
In mystery on high?
Question the cataract's boiling tide,
Down stooping from above—
Why its proud billows, far and wide
In stormy thunders move?
It is that in their hollow voice
A tone of praise is given,
Which bids the fainting heart rejoice,
And trust the might of Heaven.
And ask the tribes whose matin song
Melts on the dewy air,
Why, like a stream that steals along,
Flow forth their praises there?
Why, when the veil of Eve comes down,
With all its stary hours,
The night-bird's melancholy lay
Rings from her solemn bowers?

It is some might of love within,
Some impulse from on high,
That bids their matin-song begin—
Or fills the evening sky
With gentle echoes all its own—
With sounds, that on the ear
Fall like the voice of kindred gone,
Cut off in Youth's career!

Ask of the gales that sweep abroad,
When Sunset's fiery wall
Is crowned with many a painted cloud—
A gorgeous corona—
Ask why their wings are trembling then
O'er Nature's sounding lyre,
While the fair accidental hills
Are bathed in golden fire?

Oh! shall the wide world raise the song
Of Peace, and Joy, and Love,
And shall man's heart not bid his tongue
In voiceful praises move?
Shall the old forest and the wave,
When summon'd by the breeze,
Yield a sweet flow of solemn praise,
And man have less than these?

No one, I fancy, can regard the wonderful mechanism of the heavens, or the revolutions of this goodly frame the earth, without emotion. I at least cannot. When I behold the moon, coursing her sweet and mysterious way through the azure vault of evening, or the sun, mounting from his golden tabernacle of morning clouds, to smile from the zenith upon a beautiful world, I am filled with wonder and admiration. The coming on of Spring—the advent and departure of the Summer—are to me scenes and themes of amazing thought. Then, how solemnly does Autumn come on; rustling his fallow leaf, and shaking his withered spray, in token that Winter is near!—telling the heart, as Wordsworth does the eye, that 'Summer ebbs; each day that follows,
Is a reflux from on high,
Tending to the darksome hollows,
Where the frosts of Winter lie.'

I value every season as it affords me subjects for reflection. New-Year's day is fruitful of thought. Standing upon the threshold of cycle, we look forward with questioning eyes into the unknown future, wondering what it may bring to us of weal or wo. Merciful is the cloud that hangs over that untrodden way—grateful the uncertainty which begets its uninvestigated span. Methinks it adds a fresher glow to that social communion wherewith we greet the opening year; that it gives to love a holiness, to friendship a charm. I would that the time-honoured custom of Gotham might be extended through the Atlantic cities; that friends might be gathered together around each other's fireside at the morning of the year, there to renew the sweet feelings and generous sympathies of life.

It is the renewal of precious and holy feelings, that makes the new year in New-York so delightful. The citizens bid a truce to care; and the generous principle of friendship comes fully into play. To tell the truth, the custom begins to radiate from the commercial metropolis, and its delights, 'like flower-seeds by the far winds sown,' are already springing up in other towns. I had a taste of them at the commencement of this present year, in the Rectangular City; enough to convince me that the mode is germinating freely, and will soon abundantly fructify. It fell on the day, that I had some dozen friends to visit; and the employment was truly a New York affair, altogether. One hospitable household, well known for the kindness of its members, and the regal bounty of its domestic appointments, conducted the matter in veritable Gotham style. On a table which groaned—if mahogany can groan—with its burden, were placed all sorts of rich edibles and copious excellences of great variety, in the way of potato. Many were the pleasant-tasted things that reminded me, through the interpretation of the palate, that I might consider myself in New York; and as for the nonce, 'I drained huge draughts of Rhenish down,' I can assure the reader that the American London was 'in my flowing cups freshly remembered.' Great, however, is the stability of my brain and so it was, that I escaped without injury; though I do religiously believe that should 'some persons' imbibe thus much of things spiritual and substantial, their footsteps would indicate a knowledge of the curvilinear zig-zag.

It is right wholesome to me, to perceive the effect of the new year on an old bachelor. His forehead wears less wrinkles then, and that part to which phrenologists assign the organ of benevolence, seemeth to bulge as it were, with a preternatural expansion. He becometh frisky; 'takes much to imbibe'—and thinks seriously of changing his condition. I never knew but one that the new year could not re-vivify, and he was a biped whom long years of 'scoondrelzing' had indurated, in the region of the heart, to perfect ossification. The sarcophagus of a mummy, or the flesh of patriarchal turkey—the cock of his peculiar walk of life—could not be harder. I met him, 'the first of last January was a year,' as they say in Brotherly Love. 'Well Tompkins,' said I, 'your bosom friend Jones has been swept away within the past year, into the vortex of matrimony.' 'Yes,' said he, with some such grin as Satan may have shed upon Ithuriel in Paradise—'yes, Tom has gone, and I am glad of it. I don't know why I should be, though; for he never did me any injury!' He sported this remark for a new year's original—yet, like his wig, I believe it was not natural, but borrowed for the occasion.

It is diverting in the extreme, to observe the pompous grandiloquence in the advertisements of the amusements furnishing public, about Christmas and New Year. Sublimity glares from the theatrical hand-bill, and the menagerie affiche. Curiosities, then, have a 'most magnanimous value.' I remember not long ago, that I desired a lovely lady, a French Countess, to accompany me to a Zoological Institute, to behold an American Eagle. I was pleased at the expressed wish which led me to make the invitation, and proud of the prospect of showing a living emblem of our country's insignia to one who felt an interest in the subject. The bills of the institute set forth, that 'the grand Columbia's Eagle was the monarch of its tribe, measuring an unprecedented length from the tip of one wing to the other, in full plumage, and vigor.' The countess had never seen but one eagle, in the Jardin des Plantes at Paris, and that was a small one and ungracious; so that her anticipations of novelty were as great as mine. We went, and with interesting expectancy, asked of the president of the institute, who was engaged in the noble pursuit of feeding a sick baboon with little slips of cold pork, to discover to us 'Columbia's eagle.' He marshalled us to the other end of the institute, past the cages of lions, bears, libbards, and other animals,—among which was a singular quadruped, with six legs—to the cage of the eagle. 'There,' he exclaimed, with professional monotony—'there is the proud bird of our country, that was caught in the West, and has been thought to have killed many animals in his life-time. He was five hours and twenty three minutes in being put into the cage, so strong was his wings. Look at him clus. He'll bear inspection. Jist observe the keen irish of his eye.'

An involuntary and hearty laugh from us both, followed the sight, and the announcement. It was a dismal looking bird, about the size of a goodly owl, with a crest-fallen aspect, the feathers of the tail and wings dwindled to a few ragged quills; and the shivering lowl, standing on one leg, looked with a vacant, sceptical eyes at his visitors.—Nothing could be so perfectly burlesque, and we enjoyed it deeply and long. I shall never be deceived by show bills again.

ARRORS OF HOLIDAYS. To the young and the light-hearted, they are what they seem. To those who have passed the purple and flowery boundaries of minority—that 'infancy' of law—they are forbidden gardens of pleasure, whose fruitage is only for the eye. To the adult, it is a season of preparation for the payment of bills—or Williams, as they should be more classically denominated—that fall due on or about the first of the year. These absorb his soul. The mercer, the botlier, the manufacturer of those glossy receptacles which environ, the chamber of the soul, all such send in their accumulated Williams, until the sight thereof astounds the receiver.—Forthwith he sets about defraying the same; and great is his satisfaction when he says eureka! of their end. I have a 'cotemporary,' if he be yet alive, sojourning in foreign lands—N. Pantagruel Wilkins by name—who was once visited, about Christmas, by the senior of the firm of 'Wright, Wright and Wiggins, mercers, drapers, and fabricators of good habits.' The elder of the house—a fat and burly biped, with a turnip countenance, and nose of extraordinary redness—bore to Wilkins his bill. Wilkins was oblivious.

'Can you tell me, my dear Sir, where you have ever seen me before?'

'Certainly—yes, Sir—I can. You are a customer of ours, at — street, No. 27. Here's your bill.'

'Ah—so it is: Wright, you are right. But, my dear Sir, there is one trifling circumstance connected with this bill which makes it a little awkward. I have not the wherewithal to settle it. This is the only obstacle in the way, at present. I do not quote often,—but you will allow me, on this occasion, to observe, in the language of the cockney to Mathews' cub-driver—'I can't not got no money whatsomsoever; on the contrary, it is quite the rewarer.' Besides my friend I have a plan from which I never depart, in the cancelling of my leger-liabilities. I pay my blank-book demands alphabetically. Your firm is Wright, Wright and Wiggins. The plan strikes you, I see, visibly; and its propriety is as clear, seemingly, to you, as the light on a lily, in the spring-time, or the glow on the red side of a bursted peach, in October. The divine thought touches you nearly, and you acquiesce, evidently. Adios, my friend: as soon as I reach your name in my payments, some ten months hence, I will advise you promptly. I say this, with a difficult nerve; but I trust you twig me decidedly. I mean as I say. Good morning—good morning.

READER, since I last communed with thee, the despot sickness has held me in subjection. I have had dull days, and weary nights,—but my books have been companions, and I have had, beside, friends and newspapers. I mention this, thing partly to excuse my brevity, and lack of variety, and also as a prelude to this piece of advice:—Lend not thy umbrella, nor suffer it to be stolen from thee. In this wise, did I procure my indisposition. The night was dark, the rains descended—the floods came, and beat against me—the umbrella was loaned—it has never come home. Heaven forgive the borrower! There are some who do not even borrow this in-rainy-weather-much-to-be-desired-and-requisite article. They steal it, without compunction. I lately heard a man of God, at a Wesleyan conventicle, deliver the following speech from the al-

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

NAPOLEON AND LOUIS PHILIPPE.—The following comparison between the present despot of France and Napoleon Bonaparte, is, we understand, generally circulated throughout the dominions of Le Roi Citoyen.

Napoleon, in order to reign, deposed no one; Louis Philippe dethroned Henry V.

Napoleon ruled fifteen years with twelve ministers; Louis Philippe has tried upwards of fifty during a reign of five.

Under Napoleon, Europe was really in a state of agitation, and France comparatively tranquil; under Louis Philippe, Europe is comparatively tranquil, and France positively distracted.

Napoleon declared war against kings, but never made it against royalty; Louis Philippe wages war against royalty, but does not declare it against kings.

Napoleon used his generals only in a time of war; Louis Philippe calls his generals into action in a time of peace.

Both republicans and legitimists surrounded the throne of Napoleon; the same parties now conspire against that of Louis Philippe.

Napoleon, a single Corsican, is already enrolled in the family of the Casars; Louis Philippe, descended from the blood of the Bourbons, cannot find a woman who will wed the heir to his crown.

Napoleon required only a budget of eight hundred millions, and four hundred thousand soldiers, to make him respected by all the world; four hundred thousand soldiers, and a budget of twelve hundred millions are not sufficient to make Louis Philippe respected by the French.

MUSIC.—Billings, the celebrated composer of music, boasted, that there was no point in the science that he did not fully understand. A Boston wag, knowing his unbounded vanity, addressed a note to him, requesting an interview with him at the Lamb Tavern on a particular day, stating that he had a question in music to propose to him, which, no other man in Boston could answer.

Billings met the gentleman promptly, and with much self complacency remarked, that he had devoted his life to music, and believed that there was no question on the science which he could not at once answer, and asked what the difficulty was, 'The question,' said the inquirer, 'is one which effects the whole world, and has never been settled.' 'Let me hear it,' exclaimed Billings. 'Well it is this—when a man snores in his sleep, through at least two octaves, and so loud as to be heard throughout the whole house, do you consider these sounds vocal or instrumental music?'

JOHNSON ON THE DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE.—'How false,' said he, 'is all this, to say that 'in ancient times learning was not a disgrace to a peer, as it is now!' In ancient times a peer was as ignorant as any one else. He would have been angry to have it thought he could write his name. Men in ancient times dared to stand forth with a degree of ignorance with which nobody would now dare to stand forth. I am always angry when I hear ancient times praised at the expense of modern times. There is now a great deal more learning in the world than there was formerly; for it is universally diffused. You have, perhaps, no man who knows as much Greek and Latin as Bentley; no man who knows as much mathematics as Newton; but you have many more men who know Greek and Latin, and who know mathematics.—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

tar: 'I would ad'nonce to the cod'ngregation, that, probably by mistake, there was left at this house of prayer, this morning, a small cotton umbrella, much damaged by time and tear of an exceeding-ly pale blue color, in the place whereof was taken a very large black silk umbrella, new, and of great beauty. I say, my brethren, it was probably by mistake, that of these articles, the one was taken and the other left; though it is a very improper mistake, and should be discountenanced, if possible. Blunders of this sort, brethren and sisters, are getting a leetle too common!'

LINES

Written in a Church yard by a school boy, since deceased.

'It is good for us to be here; if thou wilt, let us make three Tabernacles, one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.'—Matt. xvii.

Me thinks, it is good to be here:

If thou wilt, let us build—but for whom?

Nor Elias nor Moses appear,

But the shadows of eve that encompass the gloom;

The abode of the dead, and the place of the tomb.

Shall we build to ambition? ah, no!

Affrighted he shrinketh away;

For see they would pin him below

In a small narrow cave, and begirt with cold clay,

To the meanest of reptiles, a peer and a prey.

To beauty? ah no! she forgets

The charms which she wielded before—

Nor knows the foul worm, that he treads

The skin which but yesterday fools could adore,

For the smoothness it held, or the tint which it wore.

Shall we build to the purple of pride—

The trappings which dizen the proud?

Alas! they are all laid aside—

And here's neither dress nor adornment allow'd,

But the long winding sheet, and the fringe of the shroud!

To riches? alas! 'tis in vain—

Who hid in their turns have been hid—

The treasures are squander'd again—

But here in the grave are all metals forbid,

But the tinsel! that shone on the dark coffin lid.

To the pleasures which mirth can afford,

To the revel, the laugh and the jeer?

Ah! here is a plentiful board!

But the guests are all mute at their pitiful cheer,

And none but the worm is a reveller here.

Shall we build to affection and love?

Ah no! they have wither'd and died,

Or fled with the spirits above—

Friends, brothers and sisters, are laid side by side,

Yet none have saluted, and none have replied.

Unto sorrow? the dead cannot grieve,

Not a sob, not a sigh meets mine ear,

Which compassion itself could relieve!

Ah! sweetly they slumber, nor hope, love, nor fear,

Peace, peace, is the watch word, the only one here.

Unto death? to whom monarchs must bow?

Ah no! for his empire is known,

And here then are trophies enow,

Beneath the cold dead! and around the dark stone,

Are the signs of a sceptre that none may disown.

Then the first unto hope we will build;

And look for the sleepers around us to rise!

The second to faith, which ensures it fulfill'd—

And the third to the lamb of the great sacrifice,

Who bequeath'd us them both, when he rose to the skies.

THE WAGONER.

I've often thought if I were asked Whose lot I envied most—
What one I thought most lightly tasked
Of man's unnumber'd host—
I'd say, I'd be a mountain boy,
And drive a noble team, Wo, hoy!
Wo, hoy! I'd cry,
And lightly fly
Into my saddle seat;
My rein I'd slack—
My whip I'd crack—
What music is so sweet?

Six blacks I'd drive, of ample chest,
All carrying high the head;
All harness'd tight, and gaily drest
In winkers tipp'd with red—
Oh yes, I'd be a mountain boy,
And such a team I'd drive, Wo, hoy!
Wo, hoy! I'd cry,
The hint should fly—
Wo, hoy! you Dobbin! Ball!
Their feet should ring
And I would sing,
I'd sing my fal de rol.

My bells would tingle, tingle ling,
Beneath each bear-skin cap,
And as I saw them swing and swing,
I'd be the merriest chap—
Yes, then I'd be a mountain boy
And drive a jingling team Wo, hoy!
Wo, hoy! I'd cry—
My words would fly,
Each horse would prick his ear;
With tighten'd chain
My lumbering wain
Would move in its career.

The golden sparks, you'd see them spring
Beneath my horse's tread;
Each tail I'd braid it up with string
Of blue, or flaunting red;
So does, you know, the mountain boy
Who drives a dashing team, Wo, hoy!
Wo, hoy! I'd cry—
Each horse's eye
With fire would seem to burn;
With lifted head
And nostril spread
They'd seem the earth to spurn.

They'd champ the bit, and fling the foam,
As on they dragged my load;
And I would think of distant home,
And whistle upon the road—
Oh would I were a mountain boy—
I'd drive a six horse team, Wo, hoy!
Wo, hoy! I'd cry—
Now by yon sky,
I'd sooner drive those steeds
Than win renown,
Or wear a crown
Won by victorious deeds.

For crowns oft press the languid head,
And health the wearer shuns,
And victory, trampling on the dead,
May do for Goths and Huns—
Seek them who will, they have no joys
For mountain lads, and Wagon-boys.

"Black stockings of all colors," were lately advertised in a country newspaper.

MONUMENTAL TRUTH.—In a village churchyard, a few miles from town, there is a superb monument, which, after narrating the name, merits, and death of the "poor inhabitant below," rather oddly adds the armorial motto, which is "volens volens,"—will he, will he.

This is "the patent age of new inventions," truly. A new kind of horseshoe has, it is said, been invented by a veterinary surgeon, of Taunton, Somersetshire, which is said to succeed most completely, having been tried by an extensive coach proprietor, previously to the inventor taking out his patent. They are produced by a machine with steam power to the number of 3,000 an hour, and can be sold at 2d. each—one-fourth of the usual cost.

THE TEAR.

Sweet tribute of the parting hour,
Twin-sister of the word—farewell;
Thy honied nectar has a pow'r
Beyond what human tongues can tell.

HOPE.

Hope is a bright, a sempiternal star,
Shining serene in love's extensive sphere;
By whose soft light the traveller from afar
Sees what he wishes, and forgets to fear.

STRONG PARENTAL AFFECTION.—A weaver of St. Denis, named Vatel, having a son, to whom he was most affectionately attached, became distressed at the apprehension of the youth's being drawn for the army, as he was unable to pay the money for a substitute. He consulted a lawyer as to the means of getting his son exempted. Among the causes of exemption enumerated by the counsel, he mentioned the eldest sons of widows. Satisfied with this information, M. Vatel returned home and hung himself, leaving a note declaring that his only motive was to save his son from the conscription.

Association of Ideas.—Bishop Stillington tells us a story of a clergyman who was eagerly engaged in a fox chase, when the fox took to earth, on which he cried out, "Gentleman, I must leave you. This puts me in mind that I have a corpse to bury at four o'clock this evening; and I fear that I shall be an hour too late.

MATHEMATICAL TOAST.—The following toast, it is said, was drank at an association of School Masters. The sentiments which are embodied in it, are well worthy the attentive consideration of every American lady:

The fair daughters of Columbia: May they add virtue to beauty, subtract envy from friendship, multiply amiable accomplishments by sweetness of temper, divide time by sociality and economy, and reduce scandal to its lowest denomination by a modest christian deportment.

A COMPARISON.—"Jack," said a gay young fellow to his companion, "what can possibly induce those two old snuff-taking dowagers to be here to-night at the ball? I am sure they will not add in the least to the brilliancy of the scene." "Pardon me," replied the other, gravely, "for not agreeing with you, but for my part I really think that where there are so many lights of beauty, there may be some occasion for a pair of snuffers."

When the Irish peasants go over to work at the harvest, the general salutation between them and their acquaintances when they land is, "Ah! Paddy I am glad to see you on the other side of the water."

The Drunken Sow and her Poor Pigs.—A woman who drank deep at the wine cup, as well as the brandy bottle, was the mother of a lovely little girl about ten years of age, who often wept in secret at her mother's degradation. One day observing the grocer, where her mother used to get her supplies, empty a quantity of cherries into the street that had been in a barrel of rum, and a sow with a brood of pigs, eagerly devouring them, till she could neither stand nor walk, and her pigs running and squealling in alarm, the little girl cried, "Mother, mother, come to the window;—Why, what's there my dear?" "O mother, see, see the sow, how my heart bleeds for those poor pigs." "And why do you feel so much for the pigs?" "Because to think how ashamed they must be to have a drunken mother." The rebuke was effectual; the mother thus far has ceased to drink.

FULL MEASURE.—A Quaker alighting from the Bristol coach, on entering the Inn, called for some beer, and observing the pint deficient in quantity, thus addressed the landlord: "Pray, friend, how many bottles of beer dost thou draw in a month?" "Ten, Sir," replied Boniface. "And thou would like to draw eleven?" rejoined Ebenezer. "Certainly," exclaimed the smiling landlord. "Then I will tell thee how, friend," added the Quaker—"Fill the measure."

A Singular Dream Verified.—While the plague was at its height at Alexandria, a Mahometan merchant dreamed that eleven persons would die of the plague in his house! When he awoke he remembered the dream; and there being exactly eleven persons in his house, himself included, he became very uneasy. His alarm increased, when on the following day the wife, two female slaves, and three children died; but he became quite certain that his death was at hand, when, on the fourth, his two remaining children, a woman servant, and an old man servant sunk into the grave. He accordingly made his preparations to pass into eternity—related his dream to some of his friends, and begged them to make inquiry every morning, and, in case he should be dead, to have him buried with the usual solemnities. A cunning thief, who had heard the circumstance, took advantage of the merchant's fright to open his door in the night, and when the terrified man called out, "Who's there?" to answer, "I am the angel of Death," in order, while the merchant concealed himself underneath the bed clothes and was quite beside himself, to pack up what effects he found in the house and carry them away.—Unluckily for him he was seized with the plague and died on the stairs. The merchant, however, did not venture for many hours to put his head from under the bed clothes, till at length his friends came, heard from him what had happened, found the effects, recognized the thief, discovered the truth, and confirmed the strange accomplishment of the dream.

HAPPY DAYS.—A paper was found after the death of Abderam III., one of the Moorish Kings of Spain, who died at Cordova in 961, after a reign of 50 years, with these words written by himself—"Fifty years have passed since I was Caliph. I have enjoyed riches, honors, and pleasures; heaven has showered upon me all the gifts that man could desire. In this long space of apparent felicity I have kept an account of how many happy days I have passed—their number is fourteen. Consider then, mortals, what is grandeur, what is the world, and what is life.

PICNICS.

My note is in the Bank, and I,
Must let it be protested;
'Tis one o'clock—and I shall die—
Ye gods! how I'm molested.

Here John! what said Miss Neverpay,
Did you the bill present her?
Yes:—and she said—"another day
Would quite as well content her."

She did! Well, what said Mister Spry,
About his note and entry?
Why Sir—he said—"Tis all i' my eye,
Till money comes more plenty."

Out—out upon the man—I pray
That heaven would send him reason,
And me—the means my debts to pay
In any decent season.

Here, Sam, go up to Mister Flocks,
And try to borrow fifty,
And tell him, I am in the stocks!
But soon shall be quite thrifty.

My note is in the Bank, and I
Must let it be protested;
Deo favente—I will try
No more to be molested.

AN INVITATION.

Look in to-morrow evening, do, dear B.
We'll have a little reason after tea.

THE RESPONSE.

What do I hear? you've lost your wits this season;
What! reason after tea—why, that is treason!

"What is the matter, uncle Jerry?" said Mr. —, as old Jeremiah R—, was passing by, growling most ferociously. "Matter," said the old man, stopping short—"why, here, I've been lugging water all the morning, for Dr. C—'s wife to wash with, and what d'ye s'pose I got for it?" "Why I suppose about ninepence," answered Mr. —. "Ninepence be —! she told me the Doctor would pull a tooth for me some time!"—Bangor Mechanic.

CHINESE ANECDOTE.—When Youen-kong lived in his native province, a rebellion suddenly burst forth, which filled all the country with confusion. In his precipitate flight he lost his only son, and when he reached a distant asylum, he resolved to take a wife of the second rank, in order to procure an heir. It so happened that a man of the country offered his wife for sale, and Youen-kong purchased her for thirty ounces of silver. Scarcely had she reached his house when she burst into a passion of tears and refused to be comforted. He tenderly asked her the cause of her grief. 'We were reduced to extreme misery,' she replied, 'and were on the point of perishing with hunger. Seeing that my husband meditated self destruction, I offered to allow myself to be sold to procure him sustenance. I am thinking of the kindness he showed me, and on the mutual attachment by which we were united. In one morning the happiness of both has disappeared; he is left in solitude, and I am forced to become the slave of another man. Such, sir, is the cause of the tears you see me shed.' Youen-kong was touched with compassion; he conducted her back to her husband, and not only refused to take back the price, but presented them with an hundred ounces of gold to procure the necessities of life. The reunited pair accepted his gift with tears. They resolved to seek out some young lady fit to become his wife. When they reached the town, they found some merchants who had a boy to sell. 'Since we have not been able to find a girl,' said they, 'let us purchase this youth and present him to our benefactor.' They asked the merchants what price they demanded? It was answered, 'An ounce of silver for every year the boy is old.' As he was twelve years of age, they instantly bought him for twelve ounces of silver, and conducted him to Youen-kong. The benefactor received the boy, and on examining his features attentively, discovered that he was his long lost child. The father and son flew into each other's arms, and the happiness of the rest of their lives more than atoned for their previous sufferings.—Chinese Code of Morals.

Letter from an Oxford Student to his Mamma.
Brazen-Nose Coll. 1832.

Dear Mamma. Your anger to soften;
At last I sit down to indite;
'Tis clear I am wrong very often,
'Since 'tis true I so seldom do write!

But now I'll be silent no longer,
Pro and con all my deeds I'll disclose.
All the pro's in my verse I'll make stronger,
And hide all my con's in my pro's.

You told me on coming to college
To dip into books and excel;
Why the tradesmen themselves must acknowledge
I've dipt into books pretty well.

The advice you took pleasure in giving
To direct me is sure to succeed,
And I think you'll confess I am living
With very great credit indeed.

I wait on the Reverend Doctors,
Whose friendship you told me to seek,
And as for the two learned proctors,
They've called for me twice in a week.

Indeed we've got intimate lately,
And I seldom can pass down the street
But their kindness surprises me greatly,
For they stop me whenever we meet.

My classics, with all their old stories,
I now very closely pursue,

And ne'er read the "Remedia Amoris"
Without thinking dear mother, of you.

Of Virgil I've more than a smatter,
And Horace I've nearly by heart,
But though I am'd for his smartness and satire,
He's not quite so easy as Smart.

English bards I admire every little,
And doat upon practical lore,
And, though yet I have studied but Little,
I hope to be master of Moore.

You'll see from the nonsense I've written,
That my Devils are none of the Blues,
That I'm playful and gay as a kitten,
And nearly as fond of the Muse.

Bright puns (oh how fondly you'll bear 'em)
I scatter, while logic I cram,
For Euclid and puns asinorum,
We leave to the Johnians of Cam.

My pony, in spite of my chidings,
Is as skittish and shy as he can be,
Not Yorkshire, with all her three ridings,
Is half such a shier as he.

I wish he was stronger and larger,
For in truth I must certainly own
He is far the most moderate charger,
In this land of high chargers I've known.

My doubts of profession are vanish'd,
I'll tell you the cause when we meet,
Church, Army, and Bar I have banish'd
And now only look to the Fleet.

Come down then, when summer is gilding
Our gardens, our trees, and our founts,
I'll give you accounts of each building—
How you'll wonder at all my accounts.

Come down when the soft winds are sighing,
Come down—Oh! you shall and you must,
Come down when the dust clouds are flying,
Dear mamma! come down with the dust.

The following beautiful extract is taken from the "Tales of a Physician," a work recently published in the country:

"There is scarcely a profession in which the sympathies of its professors are more painfully excited than that of the medical practitioner.—How often is he called to the bed of hopeless sickness; and that too, in a family, the members of which are drawn together by the closest bonds of love! How painful is it to meet the inquiring gaze of attached friends, and weeping relatives, directed towards him in quest of that consolation, that assurance of safety which he has not to give! And how melancholy is it to behold the last ray of hope which had lingered upon the face of affection, giving place to the dark cloud of despair!

And when all is over—when the bitterness of death hath passed from the dead to the living, from the departed to the bereaved—hark to that shriek of agony, that convulsive sob, that bitter groan, wrung from the heart's core, which bespeaks the utter prostration of the spirit beneath the blow!

There, cold in the embrace of death, lies the honored husband of a heart broken wife—her first her only love? Or it may be, the young wife of a distracted husband—the bride of a year, the mother of an hour—and by her perhaps, the blighted fruit of their love; the bud by the blossom—and both are withered!"

Those men who have seen most of the world, have generally most honor and least vanity.

LITERARY PORT FOLIO.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—The Harpers of New York, have just published a large octavo volume of 400 pages, entitled "A Narrative of Events connected with the Rise and Progress of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Virginia," added to which is an appendix, containing the journals of the various Episcopal Conventions held in Virginia.

This will prove a work of great interest to members of the Episcopal Church, as well as to the christian community generally. The author is the Rev. F. L. Hawks, Rector of St. Thomas's Church, New York. The annexed dedication is prefixed to the work.

To the Right Rev. William White, D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, and Senior Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

Right Reverend and Dear Sir:

If it were in my power to consult my brethren of the clergy, I am sure that all would name you as the individual to whom a work, concerning any part of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country, should most properly be inscribed. To this consideration of propriety, allow me to add, that I, at least, find another in the ready kindness and advice with which you have furthered my purposes, and encouraged my efforts in the prosecution of this work.

I beg leave, therefore, to offer it as the humble tribute of affectionate respect justly due to the one who for more than half a century has watched the progress of the church in America; and who to the piety which becomes a prelate adds the learning of a scholar, and the courtesy of a gentleman.

With affectionate veneration,
I am, sir, your grateful friend and servant,
THE AUTHOR.

MELLEN'S POEM.

THE PASSIONS, is the title of a poem pronounced some time ago at the Odeon, Boston, by Grenville Mellen, Esq. on occasion of the anniversary of the birth of Spurzheim.

We regard this effort of our author's muse, as one that will greatly enhance his reputation. Indeed, Mr. Mellen deserves to rank with the first of American poets. There is a grace and beauty in his style, which are worthy of the highest commendation. He does not indulge in that mysticism and bombast, which so generally characterize the poetry of the day. He is essentially the child of nature, weaving only those flowers into the garland of poesy, which delight by their exquisite fragrance and beauty.

Mr. Mellen, in addition to his fugitive poetry—which, by-the-by, is among the best the country has produced—published a volume a year or two ago entitled "The Martyr's Triumph; Buried Valley; and other Poems," which we remember to have perused with a high degree of satisfaction. The "Ruins of Balbec," especially, is a spirited and soul-stirring poem, fraught with all that wildness and sublimity which accord so finely with the subject. We cannot refrain from making the following brief, though beautiful, extract:

I entered the old walls; the heathen Gods
Lay smitten to the ground—and every niche
Stared on the havoc which they could not save.
Above, the storms had roared and revelled on,
And yet the glorious work had warred with them,
And laugh'd at time when he went thundering by Upon his cloudy pinions.

"The Passions," however, we are inclined to think, is Mr. Mellen's best production. It may not partake of the same energy and pathos which mark some of his previous efforts, but it displays more simplicity and classic beauty; and you feel, in its perusal, that the poetic standard has been refined and elevated. We quote the following stanzas for the gratification of our readers. The subject is a trite one, but Mr. Mellen has invested it with new charms.

Both were devoted. She was beautiful—
And the rich blood that cours'd her cheek and brow,
Each radiant as the flower she stoop'd to cull,
Mantled, as she gave back the whisper'd vow,
With a new glory. She had found a home!
An altar-place, where, dedicate, she bow'd,
In virgin loveliness—no pictur'd dome,
No palace, with its pillow deck'd and proud,
Could promise the chaste slumber of that breast,
Where her young head was laid in confidence and rest.

He lov'd her with a perfect love. His eye
Grew lustreless, yet restless, when she went,
And when she came, in beauty's panoply,
And blest him with her presence; it was bent
With that deep light upon her, which alone,
And but for once, will kindle at the shrine
Of Passion, that no other hope will own,
Save this which marks its worship just divine!
She was his idol—and his service there
Was new devotedness—and promises—and prayer.

In conclusion, we have only to say of Mr. Mellen, in the language of a cotemporary, "Let him couple his genius with some epic, worthy to resist the waste of centuries, and preserving the sensibility and pure moral taste, which has characterized all his poetry, do justice to his country and to himself."

A VOLUME OF POETRY.—Benjamin Lundy, the philanthropist, has issued proposals for the publication in this city, of the poetical works of ELIZABETH MARGARET CHANDLER, with a memoir of her life and character, written by himself. It speaking of this lady, in the introductory portion of his prospectus, he says, "Although the amiable and highly gifted author is not extensively known by name, yet some of her writings have been widely circulated, and greatly admired. She wrote, occasionally, for some of the popular periodicals of the day, in Philadelphia and elsewhere. During a period of more than eight years, she contributed largely and regularly to the pages of the "Genius of Universal Emancipation." She also acted as the principal editor of the Female Department of that work, (and was the author of nearly all the original matter in that department,) upwards of four years, previous to its temporary suspension in 1834. But, owing to her retiring modesty—her particular aversion to public notoriety, she very seldom permitted her name to accompany the articles which she sent to the Press. Thus, while a great number of readers even of the most refined taste in the circles of philanthropy and literature, were delighted and edified by the excellent productions of her pen, her exemplary character was little known beyond the pale of her family connexion and private acquaintance."

We might add, that this lady has frequently contributed to the poetical department of the Saturday Evening Post, over the signature of "Emily;" and that her effusions have been, generally, very much admired.

Mr. Lundy has made a selection from the choicest of her poetical works, which, with an interesting memoir of her life, will shortly be published in a handsome volume of about 200 pages, 18 mo. Price 62½ cents per copy: orders for the work, free of postage, are to be forwarded to Lemuel Howell, 400 Coates street, Philadelphia.

POWER'S IMPRESSIONS.—Carey, Lea & Blanchard have already published a second edition of this work, the first having been exhausted within 24 hours after it was issued. The press of this country appear to be unanimous in its praise, and even in England the liberal feelings of the author are highly commended. The annexed notice of the "Impressions," is from the London Literary Gazette. "The sketchy and lively manner in which these volumes are written, though extremely agreeable to the general reader, will not so extensively recommend them to favor, as the right spirit and tone which pervade their every page. Well received and hospitably entertained in the United States, Mr. Power has not repaid that kindness with ingratitude; and neither has he made a servile and sycophantic return of flattery. His sentiments are those of an independent man; his statements are those of an impartial observer. Yet there runs throughout his whole work, a feeling of friendliness which ought ever to be cultivated between England and America—between nations speaking the same language, related by the nearest ties of descent, and enjoying (though under different forms of government) the same glorious principles and privileges of liberty. This is the style in which the English traveller ought to write of his transatlantic brethren; the style in which the natives of that vast continent ought to write of us, when their welcome visits (and we believe always warm receptions) are over. It is to be regretted that any other should ever have pervaded; and we trust that the examples of an Irving on the one side, and that now so laudably set by Mr. Power on the other, will not be lost on those who may succeed them."

We append an extract giving a highly graphic and interesting sketch of a scene on our coast.

THE PILOT BOAT.

Dec. 9th.—I engaged a pilot boat to run down the coast south as far as Savannah, which, although some hundred miles out of my line, I had set down as a place to be seen. My Charleston managers, two worthy industrious souls, hearing of my route, begged of me to permit them to take the pilot boat off my hands for the transport of their company, on condition that I would halt in Savannah for three or four representations. To this I was readily moved by their strongly-expressed desire, and gave up my little schooner, becoming a passenger where I had looked to reign sole proprietor; the whole thing was arranged in the course of the day. The wind continued steadily about north east, and the freight, composed of the paraphernalia, was shipped and stowed; the company assembled; and, after sundry holdings-on for some music book forgotten in the orchestra, or some actor left at his lodging, we, in about one hour after the time fixed by the pilot for the latest minute of tide, slipped the hawsers of the smart little Washington, and fell off into the stream of ebb.

When we got on the bar, it was almost low water; the schooner drew eight feet, and we had just nine feet sounding over the bank; we cleared all, however, after a minute of some anxiety, owing to there being a heavy northerly swell setting in, which appeared each moment to increase.

Once over the bar, we got nearly before the wind with a straggling breeze, and went along right merrily. Our representative of all the Juliets and Julias had a pretty voice; the Kemble of the company, a fine, tall, good-tempered fellow, sang duets and trios well enough for a tragedian; a chorus was easily mustered out of the remaining members of the corps who continued fit for duty; and we roused old ocean with "When the wind blows," until he became too obstreperous in his emulation, and fairly drowned our melody.

The wind did blow, at last, in such a sort as to disperse our chorus; the schooner was about forty tons measurement, sharp as a wedge below, and not over three feet and a half between decks, the cabin was about the same square measurement, with two little berths, into which we stowed the ladies, the managers and the principals occupying the remaining space; in the hold, over the ballast, the rest of the company stowed themselves away.

To penetrate either of these close quarters I found utterly impossible: all were ill save the stout tragedian; comedy, farce, and opera, ballet and band, the manager, his subjects and his proprietors, were alike disorganized and overwhelmed. I resolved, therefore, on keeping the deck as I best could, by the help of a stout dread-naught, a pocket full of cigars, and a mild infusion of old cognac, provided for me by a considerate friend.

Within two hours, the wind had gradually increased until it blew a gale; the foresail was taken in, the mainsail close reefed, and the saucy boat flew along before it like a gull, the following seas just kissing the edge of her taffrail, as she slipped away before them.

Our pilot, the owner of the craft, was a careful and steady old Bristol man, but somewhat nervous and timid; his regular crew consisted of two fine white boys, apprentices, and a couple of stout slaves; we had, in addition, taken on board an old apprentice of the pilot's who as we started had volunteered to accompany his once master. This was a droll subject, a regular long-sided dare-devil of a South Carolinian; he was full three sheets in the wind when we sailed, and managed to keep the steam up by the contributions liberally proffered during our short season of festivity.

As the gale freshened, the fellow showed out; when a sail was to be handed or a reef taken in, he was a crew in himself; one of the coolest and smartest fellows I ever met, but somewhat profane in his humour, and rather hard upon the nerves of the chief; few of his sayings will bear repetition; but the exaggeration of his figures of speech, the wild fantastic spirit of reckless humour by which he was governed, I shall not lose sight of; during the night I supplied him with cigars, and with his oddness wore away the time. One little bit of dialogue will describe this wild man of the water better than any words of mine. We had already taken in two reefs when the pilot gave directions—"Stand by to lower away the peak."

"Ay, ay," sang out his aide, as he sprang nimbly to the foot of the mast; adding, "but what the devil are you going to do now, stranger?"

"Bear a hand!" cried the senior, "take in another reef!"

"What! you're afeard little Wash-the-water goes through it too fast, are you, old man?"

"To be sure; I don't want to get off the bar before daylight."

"Don't you? Why then you must tie her fast to a stump, my friend; for if you let her go ahead, she'll make the light long afore you can see your way across the bar, between the white water."

"The wind between now and then may slack a little," urged the senior, looking back over the seas now rolling very high, as though he wished the time was come.

"Well, that's a curious kind o' guess you've made, any way, old stranger," laughed his tormenter, clapping his foot against the companion, and taking the pull of a giant on the reef-tackle as he spoke. "If you ever know'd where to look for the fog ind of a north-easter at this time o' year, it's more nor you ever larnd me to do, and that I do say wasn't down your honest duty by me. I'd lay a pistreen this breeze would last the Washy, to the south'ard o' the Tortugas, and well you know it too."

"Well, suppose it would, I can't help it—what would you do, Matthew? It blows like thunder; I can't tell how fast she's going,—I don't want to overshoot the light, and then have to thrash back through such a smother of a sea."

"Well, now I see what you are at; and it's all right, I guess," observed Matthew, with affected deference of tone. "I know the varmint's pretty slick, but I never should ha' thought of her crawling over money miles in four hours;"—it was at this time about midnight. "You ask me what I'd do; why now I'll tell you, if I was you, I'd say, Mat. here take the stick,—it wouldn't be the first time,—and I'd crawl out o' that hole and shake myself; and then I'd ask this gentleman for a cigar and a mouthful of liquor, and then I'd clap a bit o' the square mainsail on her, and lift the sloppy little slut out of it a yard or two; that's what I'd do, and now what have you to say again it, ha?"

"You have a square mainsail in the craft, I suppose?" here, inquired I, by way of taking Matthew off the old man a little.

"Why, I don't know; may be the old man has had it cut up to make trousers; but there used to be one when I was in her, an such an omni-po-tent teater—it had a hoist to heaven, it sheeted home to home, outspread the eternal universe, and would ha' dragged a frigate seventeen knots through a sea o' treacle, by the living jingo! Why, I've seen it afore now raise the leetle hooker clean out o' water, and tail off, with her hanging on, like the boat of a balloon."

With the least possible sail, we continued to slip along at a snapping rate, and long before daylight made the light at the entrance of the Savannah river; had our pilots known this bar as familiarly as they did that of Charleston, we might have run in; as it was, we hove-to in a very heavy sea for upwards of two hours, and the Washington behaved, under these circumstances, to admiration! she lay-to like a sea bird, now floating buoyant upon the foamy crest of the great seas, then sliding down their sides into the trough where they would threaten to enclose her.

The senior pilot never quitted the little square hole sunk over the run, wherein he stood to steer, although sometimes, when she rolled to windward and made a dip, the green seas would make a rush over her quarter, and sweep the deck a foot deep; luckily there was nothing to hold the water; but, for fourteen hours, the old man's hand never left the tiller.

Soon after daylight we once more filled-away, and brought the little jewel of a boat snugly by-the-wind, hauling in for the bar, although not without some ugly doubts; for Matthew and the old man could not agree, and the sea all along in-shore looked plaguy white and ugly as we neared the low land; however, in we flew, having breakers on either hand, over-near to be pleasant, and, in a few minutes, entering the river close by the wreck of a large brig, were in comparative security.

Our counsel was even now divided about the true channel, until one of the boys who had made a couple of trading trips up to the city, took it upon his own responsibility to read the buoys and landmarks as far as he knew them.—Keeping the lead constantly going, we quietly jogged up the river with a stiff breeze; the country bleak and bare, a region of half-redeemed swamp and lagoon; being in smooth water, our party all turned out; stores were rummaged, and a good breakfast provided upon the deck of the boat so recently swept by the green seas: the past was forgotten, the sun shone out, and again the glee and the merry song floated through the air of morning.

Matthew had by this time become quite sober, and took his spell at the helm; admitting, evidently to his senior's satisfaction, that it certainly was a real nullifier of a breeze, enough to blow the leetle Washy into pieces."

About six miles off the city, we got at last set fast; when growing impatient of such confinement, I requested the captain to set me on shore. The thing was voted impracticable; but I decided to make the attempt, and was accordingly rowed to the right bank of the river, when I took to the swamp, hungry and savage enough to have eaten any alligator fool-hardy enough to assail me. After a hard scramble together with two or three plunges, waist deep, I escaped suffocation, and gained one of the banks dividing and draining these vast fields: following this, unimpeded by other difficulty, I reached, after half an hour's march, the high land; and, attracted by the sounds of merriment, mounted the first bluff, where I found a large barn occupied by a couple of score laughing, noisy negroes, employed thrashing out the crop; from one of these I received directions how to reach Savannah, whose spires were clearly to be seen.

At the end of about five miles, I found myself an exceeding dirty gentleman entering upon the long well-shaded mall which protects the river front of the city. I was, by this, tolerable tired of my walk; for the light sandy soil was ankle deep, and the sun broiling. After passing one block or range of counting houses, I gladly read on the first of the next range the name of a friend from whom I felt certain of welcome.

A capital dinner, and a glass of the finest Madeira in the States, made light of past labor; and during the evening I was glad to learn that the Washington had arrived with her freight all safe and well. My friend Matthew now informed me that he had given the boys in the boat directions to wait for me half an hour, which they did, fully anticipating that I should never clear the cane break and swamp lying between the river and fields; and, in sooth, it required some perseverance.

AMERICAN LADIES' MAGAZINE.—The February number of this periodical, edited by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, has just appeared. It contains a number of well-written and interesting articles, principally, it not exclusively, from the pens of accomplished females. That on the Druids evidences much industry and research, and will well repay a careful perusal, and the two next, "The Pickletons," and "The Massacre of Wyoming," from the pen of a young lady of Troy, N. Y. are excellent. Miss O. should, by all means, cultivate her talent for writing. The number contains several other compositions of merit, which we have not space to notice more particularly. We extract, however, a poetical article, with which we are particularly well pleased, from the pen of Mrs. Locke.

WINTER.

An Extract from an unpublished Poem.

[BY MRS. JANE E. LOCKE.]

I love the Winter, and I love to hold Communion high with nature in her might;
For, to my heart, her's is a language bold,
Casting o'er my sick soul a line of light;
Tenching with higher gift than man the way.
O'er earth's empoisoned soil, where sighs are not,
Where tears are not, and friends no farewells say,
Nor broken vows nor sickening memories blot
The bright realities of that long day,
Nor fear her shadow casts to tempt our souls away.
Nature has love, has music, in her speech,
How furious soe'er she play her part;
'Tis with a master's tone her varyings teach,
And with a master's hand she moves the heart;—
Ay, there were those who loved her voice with me;
Companions of my way, and teachers, too;
Inspirers of my song, my minstrelsy;

Their pride, their hope; its notes their joy to woo,
Though feeble, weak its numbers, and its varyings few.

But where are these my kindred, my youth's stay?

Departed, passed, all passed to join the dead;

One in her infancy led on the way,

Fearless;—I knew her not, so early sped

She from my pathway, all unstained by earth;

One, too, in youth, and one in manhood's pride;

Brothers, who cheered and cherished me from birth;

And one sister in love, matron she died;—

Yet sad their memory in my heart will e'er abide.

And one with hoary head and weary feet,

Has parted from me, full of years and toil;

Sudden, tho' safe, we trust he passed, to meet,

In that far better land, death's earliest spoil,

The firstlings of the flock—his children there;

Fresh sealed the grave o'er him, and fresh my woe;

Sad rite, scarce finished, scarce, with solemn care,

Hoping and trusting, yet my tears fast flow,

For him, my father, guide, protector, here below.

How thought he this kind friend that last we miss,

"Long years it tries the thrilling frame to bear?"

Then dry my tears—his heritage is bliss,

And he has entered on possession there.

Still, still, rude Winter, may'st thou hold thy reign,—

My heart has sympathy with thy hoarse blasts,

Thy barrenness and desolation: yet, again,

My soul in cheerful hope her vision casts,

When nature's verdure, as her own, forever lasts.

Bright world of kindred and familiar ones,—

Of glorious men long passed from earth's array,—

Of Seers,—of Prophets,—and of gifted tones,—

Why shrink our souls along thy rugged way?

Why pull we in the path, and backward turn,

Moved oft by vain desires and longings vain?

While quenchless there thy vestal altars burn,

Nor pure affection chills, nor bears a stain,

Gift up thy strength, my soul,—thou'lt meet past loves again.

OBSERVATIONS ON HEALTH.

(From a book recently published in London, on Dietetics and Domestic Economy.)

GRAY HAIR.—The sedentary, the studious, the debilitated, and the sickly, are, with very few exceptions, those who are earliest visited with gray hairs. The agricultural labourer, the seaman—all whose employment consists of, or involves exercise in the open air, and whose diet is as necessarily simple, are those whose hairs latest afford signs that the last process has commenced, that the fluids have begun to be absorbed, the textures to dry up and become withered. All whose employment renders much sitting necessary, and little or no exercise possible; all who study much; all who, from whatever cause, have local determinations of blood, particularly if toward the head, are the persons most liable to carry gray hairs. It is well known that mental emotions, violent passions, have in a single night made the hair gray. Instances of this are numerous. They are in the same way to be understood and explained. They are owing to the increased determination of blood, stimulating the absorbents into preternatural activity, and causing them to take up the colouring matter of the hair. It will indeed be fortunate, if a desire to prevent the youthful luxuriance of her hair, should induce any fair votary of fashion and civilization to forego late hours and heated rooms, and try whether it is not better, and productive of more happiness, as well as calculated to produce this end, to exercise her limbs, and inhale the fresh and untainted breath of the morning hours. It will indeed be fortunate, if this, or any thing else, induce any fair victim of civilization, to steal from her labours one single hour, as an offering to her health.

THE BED ROOM.—The bed room ought not to be heated, but, on the contrary, to be kept as cool as is consistent with the feelings and the health, and means ought always to be taken to secure a constant change of air in it. For these purposes, either the door ought to be left partially open, or the windows opened a little at the top. No fire ought to be allowed, unless under very particular circumstances, if the room is not unusually large; and even then the fire ought to be a small one. The curtains of the bed ought to be of as light a texture, and they should be as little drawn as possible; the floor only in part carpeted; and there ought to be only necessary chairs, tables, &c. Furniture, to a remarkable degree, prevents free ventilation, and all woollens, as carpets, absorb the moisture, whether from breath or in damp weather, and so render the air less pure and more relaxing. A light ought not to be allowed in a bed-room, if it can be avoided; if it is necessary, let it be put in the fireplace. Gas ought never to be burned in a bed room. Of the importance and value of gas, it is not for me to speak here. I am not about to decry it as a street light, or as a shop, or warehouse, or passage light; but as a mode of lighting dwelling houses, and especially bed rooms, I do think that it cannot be sufficiently decried. In itself a poison, carburetted hydrogen, or coal gas, cannot be burned in any hitherto contrived way, without allowing some portion to escape unconsumed, and this diffusing itself is, it is true, diluted, but still it is noxious; and I have repeatedly known it to produce—indeed I have repeatedly experienced, its bad effects. Even in the theatre and the ball-room, many persons must have felt the headache, and giddiness, and sense of faintness, which the unconsumed gas produces. The effect which breathing it, night after night, during sleep, produces, is more insidious, but is, at all events, not less considerable. Until gas is rendered still purer than it yet is, and until a burner can be found which will enable every particle to be consumed, it should be banished from the bed room, the sitting room, and, unless there is free ventilation, even from the public room of the theatre. A bed room ought not to be on the ground floor, but rather on the first or the second. Yet it is well that it should not be in the upper story of the house, at least if the house is much exposed to the sun's rays, and the upper rooms are heated by them. For the same reason, it is generally well that the bed room should not be on the sunny side of the house.

THIN SHOES.—Thin shoes, as articles of female dress I am sufficient of a Goth to wish to see disused; and I would replace them with shoes having a moderate thickness of sole, with a thin layer of cork or felt, placed within the shoe, and over the sole. Cork is a very bad conductor of heat, and is therefore to be preferred; if it is not to be had, or is not liked, felt may be substituted for it. I think thin shoes ought not to be used, unless for the purpose of dancing, and then they ought only to be worn while dancing. The invalid or dyspeptic ought assuredly never wear thin shoes. And, as to the common practice of changing thin shoes for warm boots, it is a practice which I know to be replete with danger, and therefore to be rash and almost culpable. There is another custom, or habit, or usage, in the dress of my fair countrywomen, which must be noticed here; it is that of covering the head with a cap, in the morning, and leaving it uncovered in the afternoon or evening. It is indefeasible, useless, absurd, and dangerous.

THE MECHANIC.—With no inheritance but health, with no riches but industry, and with no ambition but virtue, is the sole king among men, and the only man among kings.

are they diminished in size.

PHILADELPHIA.---MAY.

[1836.]

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATE.

Fig. 1. A pink satin robe, finished by a blond lace flowers, at the top of which is a tulle ruche, looped up at intervals with pink satin rosettes; corsage a la gabielle, sabot short sleeves, quite flat upon the shoulders, and covered with longer ones of blond, just reaching the elbow; girdle of pink and black brocaded satin ribbon, tied in a rosette and long ends, two similar bows on each sleeve; a small Andalusian hat of pink satin extremely evase, two pink and white feathers droop gracefully over the crown. Necklace and ear rings of mosaics and gold, white kid gloves, black satin slippers.

Fig. 2. An open robe of jonquil satin, the skirt rounded off in front, and gathered into very full equal plaits, displays a white satin petticoat, plain in front and plaited very full on each side, pointed corsage and white gauze seigne plaits, looped down with a twisted satin ribbon, ending in a small rosette at the point of the waist; triple sabot sleeves, lined with white satin and moderately full; on each shoulder, and in the centre of the bosom, bouquets of the crimson china rose, similar ones down the open fronts of the robe. The hair is dressed in long soft ringlets at each side and gathered into bows behind, wreaths of pearl twined amongst them, one row being fixed behind, and brought like a collar round the throat; diadem of roses in front, white kid gloves, trimmed at the top with white roses; white satin shoes.

LATEST FASHIONS.

Blond lace which has been so long the mode for trimming the interior of hats and bonnets, is at length discarded, or partially so. The newest style of trimming being of tulle bouillons, sometimes with, but as often without flowers underneath the tulle. A row of broad blond laid flat over the forehead, is sometimes adopted as a finish to a trimming of this kind.

Bonnets.—It is expected that velvet bonnets will not retain their vogue this season as long as usual. The bonnets now making up are principally of satin. There has never been a season in which there are so many of rose color; drawn ones of this color still continue the mode.

Sleeves.—Short tight sleeves are expected soon to be very general in evening dress, but as yet no attempt has been made to alter the form of long sleeves. Neither are they diminished in size.

19, 1836.

Lady's Dress.—White satin petticoat, made very short, and trimmed en tunique, with bands of dark green velvet. The robe open in front, and considerably shorter than the petticoat, of gold-colored satin. The body of the robe is made excessively long in the waist, and with a deep peak before and behind. A bouillon of crimson satin trims the bottom of it, and is ornamented by a bow and long ends of crimson ribbon before. The body is tight to the shape, high behind, but round and open on the bosom. It is trimmed with a lappel of crimson satin. A single band of velvet encircles the skirt. Short tight sleeves, terminated by full bouillons of white satin. White lace chemisettes. The hair is curled in full clusters of curls on the neck. Gold colored satin hat, a large turned up brim, trimmed underneath with a bow of crimson ribbon on one side. A single long white and rose feather adorns the crown.

LINES.

Author of Beauty, Spirit of Power,
Thou who didst will that the rose should be,
Here is the place, and, this is the hour
To seek thy presence, and bow to thee.
Bright is the world with the sun's first rays;
Cool is the dew on the soft green sod;
The Rose tree blooms while the birds sing praise,
And earth gives glory to Nature's God.

Under this beautiful work of thine,
The flow'ry boughs that are bending o'er
The glistening turl, to thy will divine,
I kneel, and its Maker and mine adore!
Thou art around us. Thy robe of light
Touches the gracefully waving tree,
Turning to jewels the tears of night,
And making the buds unfold to thee.

Thy name is marked in delicate lines,
On flower and leaf that deck the stem;
Thy care is seen and thy wisdom shines
In even the thorn that is guarding them.
Now while the rose that has burst her cup,
Opens her heart and freely throws
To me her odors, I offer up
Thanks to the being who made the rose.

THE ALIBI; AN ASSIZE ANECDOTE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS."

A country town in Ireland during the assizes, is a scene of "most admired disorder." It would seem as if the personified presence of Justice, in the figure of the two ermined and white-wigged individuals, who sit in their court, was the virtual license for every breach of the law: while the gyrations of the sheriff (and the satellites who revolve in his orbit) in hopes of catching a culprit or two, resemble very much the merry-go-round of a dog coursing his own tail.

Justice is (really) lame as well as blind among us. She has not the least chance in the game of hide-and-seek, at which she is constantly playing with crime, in my "unhappy," "mis-governed," and otherwise over-epitheted country.

In the very teeth of the judges, and in the very precincts of the court, the most flagrant outrages may, or at least used to be, seen. Murder was sometimes, riots, robberies, assaults and battery, and every minor offence in the calendar were, at all times rife, on those half-yearly Saturnalia of idleness, litigiousness, and debauchery.

About half a century ago, when there was no armed police, and a very scanty provision of public conveyances from town to town,—when five-sixths of the population laboured under the yoke of political degradation,—when a judge cracked jokes on the bench and made puns on the prisoner he was condemning to death—when deeds, commonly called "of night," were as frequently done in open day, the state of things was no doubt much worse than it is even now; and it was as far back as between forty and fifty years ago, that a circumstance very much in unison with such social disorganization took place, and which I am now about to narrate.

About noon on a fine day in July, in the year 1791, the chief town of a southern county of Ireland was just beginning to warm into the various excitements which are self-generated by the beer-and-whiskey heats of the assize season. The judges had gone in solemn state to the court-house, attended by the high sheriff with his white wand, the sub with his horse-whip, the mounted constables halberds in hand, and scarfs over shoulder, and the bailiffs on foot with staves and sticks of varieties of head-breaking capability. The two cracked trumpets of the volunteer cavalry corps had sounded their discordant fanfarre, and some almost as unharmonious shouts from the mob, gave the final salute to their "reverences the joodges," and "his honour" Squire Flaherty the sheriff, a fine man and a rare jintleman, long life and good luck to him, hurra!"

The solemn business of pleading and prosecuting, the battle for life and death, tricks of chicanery, over-reaching, and false swearing, were soon in full play within the courts; while the whiskey shops and tap-rooms had already begun to reap the early harvest of intemperance.

The host of "The Flaherty Arms" was up to his eyes in business, serving customers at the bar, superintending the dinner-dressing in the kitchen, running up stairs after the chambermaid, and down stairs after the cook, seeing that the ostler "whipped down" the horses, that the waiter "rubbed up" the spoons, knives and forks, and glasses; that "the boy" was cleaning the boots; "the girl" plucking the poultry; thus duly keeping himself in practice for his own supereminent vocation of plucking the customers. In the midst of this bustle—but I cannot vouch for the landlord's particular locality at the moment, whether kitchen, pantry, or scullery, he was attracted by a loud ringing at the outer bell, and vociferous bawls for the ostler, passed through a straggling crowd of servants and retainers, in his various titles of "Tim!" "Carney!" "Tim Carney!!"—and by such soft inducements as "why thin, bad luck to you Tim, why don't ye run to the bell?" "To the devil wid you Carney, can't you come when they're are callin' you?" "Tim Carney, you brute, why do you keep the jintleman and his sarvint and the other basties waitin'?"

"Pray, thin, mister Timothy Carney," at last said the landlord, seeking in his own person the dilatory functionary in the darkest recess of the stables, "by what manes do you daar to keep the qwallity stannin' in the street while you are snorin' under the the man-ger? It's a nate pattrern of an ostler you are, is'nt it? Why, thin, the curse o' Cromwell on you, Tim Carney, this blessed day, but it's a broth of a boy you are, an' mighty fit for an ostler at the head inn of a county town in the 'sazes! Bad scratch to ye, Tim, an' the likes o' ye for a lazy, limpin', ould, good-for-nothin' thief o' the world!"

To all this abuse, and the loud shouts of laughter which accompanied it from all the "by's" and girls, old and young, who lounged in the yard and under the gateway, old Tim only muttered, as he hobbled along, his opinion that some one out of all those who took such pains to call him might themselves have taken hold of the horses and led them into the stable. To the justness of this opinion my readers will no doubt give their assent. But the division of idleness is a too well established principle of political economy in Ireland to run any risk of being violated, by any one individual doing any thing that is 'nt "his place."

"Why thin, my gracious! Dinnis Murphy," exclaimed mine host, reproachfully but pathetically, as he encountered the waiter with an arm full of plates and dishes, and flirting with the kitchen maid in the passage, "could'nt you have thrun down thim crockery, and helped the jintleman to get off his horse, while he was waitin' in the street for that draamin', ould hop-an'-go-constant of an ostler of ours?"

"Indeed, Mister Mulligan, I don't think that's the business of a head waiter entirely. Any how it's not my place."

"An' you, you sthree-lavally, that stands there grin-gin' and laughin' wid your coarse arms a-kinbo, could'nt you have caught hold of the bridle an' led a customer into the house?"

"The Lord save us, how cross you are this mornin' mister Mulligan! By my fecks, it wasn't to hould horses that I hired myself to your service—an' I'd have you to know that it is'nt my place."

"Go 'long, thin, and feed the pigs, you imp'rent hussey!"

"Oh, that's another thing entirely—I'm never above my business," replied the bare-legged slattern; striding off to her elegant occupation.

The landlord found no greater satisfaction from the boot-boy, or the cow-boy, or the cook, in arguing and disputing with whom he lost a good quarter of an hour of his own and their time, while the gentleman in the tile-floored and sand-covered parlour was waiting with great patience, first for the waiter and then for the host, who were respectfully roared after and hallowed for, in modifications of the same kind of summonses as were addressed elsewhere to the ostler.

When Mr. Mulligan at last bowed himself into the parlour, he was not a little struck with respect, and somewhat with admiration, at the presence of his new customer. He was a fine-looking young man, that is to say, of about thirty, tall and well-built, his athletic shape shown to great advantage by the skin-tight leather breeches reaching half-way down the calves of his legs, where they were met by a pair of brown-top-ped-boots, and they were joined at the waistband by a double-breasted and broad-flapped scarlet kerseymere waistcoat; a blue coat with broad fancy-gilt buttons, a profuse white muslin cravat, and a frilled and ruffled shirt completing his costume, the whole style of which showing that he could not have ridden more than a very few miles that morning, and that he had taken his journey very easy indeed. The powder, to be sure, was a good deal shaken out of his hair and scattered over the low collar and wide lappels of his coat; but this added to the careless grace of his whole appearance.

"I am your honour's most humble sarvint to command, and will be proud to resave your honour's orders"—for dinner, would have added Mr. Mulligan, in his usual style of anticipating the wishes of his customers; but there was a military air and a sternness of brow about the stranger which repelled a too great familiarity.

"Pray sit down, Mr. Mulligan," said the latter, with a most relaxing smile, which at once put the landlord much more at his ease; but he only just sat on the edge of the mahogany-painted deal-bottomed chair, holding it at each side as if he was as much afraid of falling forward as he seemed to be of reclining backwards.

"I want to ask you a few questions," continued the stranger, "about the road to Ballymagarry."

"Is it to Ballymagarry, your honour? I suppose, thin, Sir, you're going to dine and sleep with his lordship the Marquis?" said poor Mr. Mulligan, rather annoyed at the prospect of losing his customer so soon. "Don't be in a hurry, my good landlord; I may ride over to see his Lordship to-morrow or next day, perhaps; but for this day and night, at any rate, I promise to be your guest."

"And proud I'll be of the honour of entertaining such a jintleman, an' its the first of thratement that's to be had at the 'Flaherty Arms,' Sir, for a man and baste. An' what 'ud your honour choose to be after orderin' for dinner, Sir? An' for supper in the evenin'?" or by way of snack now, Sir? we have ivery thing quite convaniant, your honour."

"That'll do," said the stranger to the groom, who now came in, in a fine lace-coloured livery, and was busily placing saddle-bags, riding cloak, and two brace of pistols on a side table; "but stay, Robert, for fear of accidents, you had better shake the powder out of the pans and draw the bullets, as we shall remain in this comfortable inn for a day or two."

"Thin, perhaps, Kurnel, I had better ride across the country, and warn the Marquess that you're not coming to-day?" said the groom, awkwardly saluting his master like an undrilled recruit.

"No, his lordship does not quite expect me to-day; but if necessary, you can provide me a messenger, Mr. Mulligan?"

"Is it a messenger, your Honour? By my soul—savin' your Honour's presence—an' it's myself that can do that same; for I'll back my b'y, Mat Quinlan, to trot from here to Ballymagarry Park and back again, before your honour's sarvint that's here to the fore could well find his way to the cross roads at the foot of Kil-goblin mountain."

"Why that would greatly depend on the horse Mat Quinlan was mounted on," said the stranger, smiling; "but never mind, we can talk of that by-and-bye."

"The horse! what horse, Kurnel, is it you talking about; why it's on his own two legs, an' the feet that's tangin' to them, that my b'y Mat goes his messages; an' it's thrue enough for me."

"Well, well, no more about that now," said the stranger sharply, and his original expression of countenance returned.

"Yis, your honour—no, your honour!" exclaimed the host, rising from his seat abruptly, confused by his customer's look; and his eyes were in the meantime fixed on the groom, who coolly extracted three bullets each from the two brace of pistols, and placed the dozen missiles on the mantel-piece.

"Upon my word, Kurnel, an' it's well provided your honour was, Sir, in case you met any bad company on the road; but there is'nt much fear o' that in 'size time," said Mulligan sneakingly, being quite browbeat by the stranger's military frown.

"I don't know that, landlord; I've known daring fellows take the very presence of the judges as the time for their exploits, and I am sure I rode through as ill-looking a set of fellows coming up to your house as ever intested the highways."

"Indeed, Kurnel, its thrue enough for your honour, we have plenty of bad ones an' to spare in town this fine day, an' that's the rason that I think the road so safe."

"The assizes have brought all the country together it seems?"

"Why, yis, indeed, your honour, there's a great throng o' the quality as well plenty o' backguards to the fore. An' it's the greatest luck in the world that I've a decent bed to spare for your honour, an' that's only becase of Squire Flaherty Cavin, afther the ball to-night, to go home and sleep at Castle Flaherty, an' it's very proud I am intirely to have the bed for—"

"How far off is Castle Flaherty?"

"Just five short miles, Kurnel."

"In what direction?"

"Oh, straight on to the say side, your honour—every one knows Castle Flaherty. An' what 'ud your honour be orderin' for dinner, Sir?" was the winding up the landlord's speech, for he heard anxious calls for him throughout the house, and the waiter was beckoning him outside the window.

"Whatever you like, landlord; whatever you can spare from your numerous guests."

"Oh, by Jemini, there's lashing, your honour, for every one; for the Gran' Jury, and the Joodges, an' the Counsellors, an' the whole kit o' them,—an' all sorts for your honour into the bargain. Comin', Comin'! I beg your honour's pardon; but there's no tellin' you the confusion of the house at 'size time whin I'm not every where—"

"To make confusion worse confounded?"

"Just so, indeed, Sir, it's thrue enough for you, Kurnel," exclaimed the unconscious landlord, sliding away towards the door, until the stranger waved his hand in token of permission that he should retire. When he was gone the traveller talked a short time with his servant, and having soon dismissed the latter, and then examined all the framed daubings which disfigured the walls, and read carefully all the effusions in prose and verse cut on the window panes, he betook himself to the repose of an arm chair, and the refuge of thought.

Scarcely had he sat, when a gentle tap at the door announced an intruder.

"Come in!" cried the traveller, in a voice loud enough to have manœuvred a battalion, and he instinctively clapped his hand on one of the pistols on the table beside him (forgetting that the balls were extracted and the priming out) as though he expected an inroad from the rough company he had observed in the street. It was only Mr. Mulligan, who reappeared, and who said, in his most submissively coaxing tone.

"I was just thinkin', your honour, that in regard of a snack, just a damper as a body might say, that there's a fine round o' beef, or a fillet o' vale, or a could turkey, or a slice o' ham, or some rashers and eggs, or any little thing o' that kind quite at your service, Kurnel, in the larder; an' in the mane time I made bould to bring your honour a little recreation in the way of a book or two, for I'm sure you must be lonesome, Sir."

"You are very obliging, Mr. Mulligan; send in the whole stock of your larder if you like it—"

"An' a bottle of Madary, may be, your honour? It's of the right sort, Sir—or Tinareet, or sherry, Kurnel, or a thrifle of cherry brandy, by the way of a relish?"

"Bring a bin full of what you please, Mr. Mulligan; and let me see those books—what they are?"

"Why, Sir, they're jist a few books for the 'size jentleman, the counsellors, and the gran' jurors, and the likes; there's the Justice's Vaddy-makem, an' the last Turnpike Act, and the Newgate Calendar, an' the last new Life of Captain Quilty the high-way-man, with his pictur in front."

"A nice collection, indeed! Faugh! don't show me that," exclaimed the traveller, giving a kick to the Newgate Calendar. "Nor that stupid stuff," added he, tossing the law-books upside down. "Let me look at this Life of Captain Quilty, there may be some fun in that."

"Is it fun, your honour? By Gorra, thin it's quare fun that's in it, for its nawthin' but murthers, an' rapes, an' robberies from first to last; and its well for you, Kurnel, that you didn't meet him on the road this blessed mornin'; or well for him, may be, for by my sowl, I think thin bull-dogs, with the three bullets a-piece in 'em, might make even Quilty look crooked."

"He's a fierce fellow, if this is like him, landlord." "Och, thin, sure enough it's him it is, Kurnel,—at laste all the world says so; an' it's wicked enough he is; an' by the same token, there's one of his min to be tried for a robbery and murder to-day; and the devil's cure to him, and the likes of him, says I. But I'll go an' order the snack, your honour, and maybe then you'd go out an' take a taste o' the frish air an' get an appetite for dinner."

"What is there to be seen in this town of your's Mulligan?" said the stranger, flinging aside the book. "One can't read before dinner in the dog days."

"What is there to be seen in it, Sir? Why there's plinty. There's the call' with five legs, an' the horned cock, an' the two-headed dwarf in a bottle of whiskey, all for tuppence apiece, your honour; an' there's the rope dancin' in the Market-square by-an bye, and the tumblin'—"

"Well that's quite sufficient, Mulligan. I'll go out and look about me a little."

"Maybe your honour'd like to strolle into the coort-house and listen to the thrivals? I'm tould by the joodge's cryer that there's some lively business comin' on; three min for marthur wid spades and pitchforks, an' a woman for pisonin', an' two girls for stranglin' their children, to say nothin' of manslaughter and burnin' and housebreakin' and the likes."

"You make out a tempting list, landlord, but those lively horrors have no pleasure for me. Yet, let me see, I think I should be inclined to look in at the court, if I thought there was any chance of getting a decent place."

"Is it a place, Kurnel? Och, thin it's that you shall have, one beside the very joodges on the binch. It's rare that so fine-dressed an' generous a jentleman as yourself axes a sate there,—barrin' the gran' jury, an' the marquess, an' the other noblemen or jentlemen of the county; and far it be from me to say a word in disparagement of sich generous customers as they are iv'ry one o' them."

"And how can you get me this seat, landland?"

"Nawthin' aiser, Kurnel; I'll jist send a bit of a note to the clerk o' the crown, that sits under the joodge, on the tip o' the cryer's white wand—"

"A rather uneasy seat," said the stranger with a smile.

"Not at all, your honour; it's wide an' comfortable, but it hasn't a stuffed cushion on it like the joodge's binch, that's God's truth."

"Well, and what'll you say in your 'bit of a note'?"

"Why, jist that your honour, Kurnel O'Carroll, of the Royal Irish Dragoons, an' long life to them! is on your way to the Marquess's at Ballymagarry-park an' was steppin' in promiskis into the Coort-house—"

"So my servant has told you my name, I see. Incautious rascal!" (muttered the stranger aside.)

"To be sure he did, your honour, an' a fine name it is, an' a fine man it is that's the owner of it, that's yourself, Kurnel jew'l, so it is," said Mr. Mulligan, waxing gayer and more familiar every minute, and paying no attention to his guest's dissatisfied looks, nor to the ill-tempered exclamation.

But the "Kurnel" cut short his compliments, by telling him to send in "the snack;" and accordingly a most overwhelming display of viands soon appeared, over which the traveller long lingered without eating much. It appeared as if he felt as little appetite for the encounter of all the labours of sight-seeing so profusely recommended by the landlord. But after two or three hours had been in one way or another gone through, the traveller, and well he might, in very weariness, determined on a lounge. He therefore once more summoned his host, who produced his "bit of a note," ready written; and under his guidance the stranger was soon in the market-place, his broad-leaved hat carelessly placed on one side of his head, and his large knotted stick carried with a rokish flourish in his hand. Mr. Mulligan bowed and scraped at every question of his guest, who seemed amazingly inquisitive regarding every building, whether public or private, and appeared to take particular interest in the various squabbles that arose among the strangling and half-drunken vagabonds who reeled about the town in all directions. But none of the shows enumerated by Mulligan, nor the attraction of the court-house itself, could draw him from those out o'-door observations, until his servant, who seemed also to have been killing his hour in the same manner, was seen walking briskly towards the inn and as he passed by his master he saluted him in his usual awkward way, but he attracted no notice from the Colonel.

"Now, Mr. Mulligan, let us go to the court-house," said the latter at length; and they were soon accordingly at the building.

The moment the handsome and flashy-looking stranger entered the criminal court, he attracted considerable attention. The "bit of a note" duly passed over to the clerk of the crown, on the tip of the cryer's wand, was handed up to the Judge, who, immediately on perusing it, gave orders to have Colonel O'Carroll conducted to the bench, on which, close beside his Lordship, he was soon seated, fulfilling Mr. Mulligan's prophecy to the letter, and to the no small gratification of the latter, the value of whose patronage was thus proved in a very eminent manner; and who, having seen his protégé snug cheek-by-jowl with the judge, hurried off to the Post-office, at the Colonel's request, to inquire for letters which he expected, somewhat impatiently, by the mail, which passed through the town about that hour.

There was a kind of interregnum in the court at this moment, the jury having just retired to consider the verdict in the case of a highwayman (the one alluded to by Mulligan), who had been tried for the robbery and murder, committed about six months before, on the body of an unfortunate traveller. The trial had been very short. The circumstantial evidence was of a nature to leave no doubt as to the guilt of the accused on the minds of any one in court. He had made no defence, except most solemn protestations of innocence, and positive assertions that if he had money enough to pay the expenses of bringing witnesses from a considerable distance, he could have clearly proved that he was not in Ireland at the time the offence was committed. But this produced no effect in his favour. The judge's charge was (as usual with his Lordship, who was called familiarly "the hanging judge") all against the prisoner. He was moreover an ill-looking fellow; an example was called for; and to be accused of belonging to the band of the notorious Quilty was enough to hang any one in those days. His fate was therefore considered as quite decided, and the clerk of the crown was busily employed (not to lose time during the retirement of the jury) in reading over—some new indictment, and the judge was conversing merrily with the fox-hunting—or clerical—or both fox-hunting and clerical—magistrates who occupied the bench beside him.

His lordship was a bluff, boisterous-looking, red-faced man. He wore a shooting-jacket under his robes, and he had the reputation of considering the prisoners who had the misfortune to be tried before him as subjects of sport rather than in any more serious aspect.

After a few minutes the jury entered, and the foreman announced a verdict of "Guilty."

"To be sure! to be sure!" exclaimed the judge, searching beside him for his black cap. "No twelve honest men could suffer such a scoundrel to escape. Thank you, gentlemen of the jury, thank you. Bring up the prisoner Gahagan for judgment."

And accordingly the culprit was led up by the gaoler, and placed at the front of the dock, where he stood with a most dejected air, his head leaning against his hands, and his eyes cast down.

"So! Go on, Mr. Clerk of the crown. Let's see, what's the fellow's Christian name? Where are my notes?" said his Lordship, fumbling among his papers, while the official Register beneath him turned over his. But he thought it better to cut the matter short, by applying to the prisoner himself.

"Hollos, Gahagan, my fine fellow! what's your Christian name?"

"I wint by two names in the family, my Lord," replied the culprit, in a melancholy tone. "My mother christened me Terence; but my father always insisted on calling me Pat."

"Your father was a fool, Gahagan; he should have honoured your mother. By calling you Terence pretty often, he would soon have had your name pat, and then both had been satisfied; but it's no matter now. Go on, Mr. Clerk of the Crown, and quick, if you please; there is a good deal of business to be done yet."

"What have you to say, Terence Gahagan, why sentence of death should not be pronounced against you?" hurriedly asked the Clerk of the Crown,—the prisoner not quite relishing or understanding the joke which had set every one else laughing.

"Why, that I don't deserve it, Sir; an', that I'm kilt and murdered intifely by false swearin'; an' that I'm as innocent as the child unborn," replied the prisoner, with a disconsolate tone and downcast looks.

"Pooh, pooh!—nonsense, nonsense!" exclaimed the Judge, adjusting his black cap on his head, and puffing out his red cheeks. "That's the old story with every hardened offender." And then, proceeding in the most expeditious technicality of the case, he was beginning to pronounce sentence of death, when the prisoner suddenly lifting his eyes towards the bench, they rested on the face of Colonel O'Carroll, who seemed already tired of the proceedings, and was reading over, for the second or the third time, a couple of letters handed to him by Mulligan some minutes before.

"Oh, Jasus! is it possible?" exclaimed the culprit, and he instantly fell back in a kind of fit. Considerable bustle was excited by the incident. The Judge, however, went on with the formula of sentence-passing, until stopped by the sheriff, who whispered to him that the prisoner was insensible. It became absolutely necessary—for decency, if not for justice's sake—to pause awhile; and as soon as the gaoler announced that the culprit had recovered sufficiently to hear the rest of the sentence, he was again placed at the bar, the compassion of the audience overcoming, in a great degree, the general repugnance to the criminal. Even the Judge was forced to a semblance of humane consideration for the unfortunate sufferer, and he asked him what was the cause of his sudden emotion, and the exclamation he had uttered.

"Oh, my Lord!" replied he, "my life is saved! There's thin in Coort, and convanient to your Lordship's honour, that can prove my allybee."

Every look was fixed on the bench. None of the three or four gentlemen who sat there, including Colonel O'Carroll, seemed to understand the prisoner's remark as applying to them.

"Oh, it's thrue for me, your Lordship! That handsome jentleman in the red wescut, on your Lordship's right-hand, knows me well enough, an' 'll swear to my innocence."

The Colonel, on being thus absolutely appealed to, looked intently on the prisoner for some seconds; and then, in answer to the Judge's question as to whether he knew anything of him, replied that he was sorry, for the poor wretch's sake, to be obliged to declare that he had not the least recollection of having ever seen him before.

"I thought as much;—a common trick, Colonel, to excite compassion, and stave off the sentence of the law. These rascals impose on my good-nature sometimes; but it won't do now. No, no, Mr. Gahagan, you shall not escape the vengeance of the offended laws."

"Oh, my lord! it's as thrue as that your honour has a wig on your head that the jentleman knows me, if he'll but give himself time to consider. He can save me by one word."

Again the Colonel protested that he did not know the man, and again the too-long baffled Judge was resuming the awful sentence: and then again did the poor prisoner, bursting into tears, protest that the strange gentleman could save his life, though he might have forgotten his face; but he was quite sure of bringing it to recollection, if he might be allowed to ask him three questions. The interest and curiosity of all present were now strongly excited: the Judge waxed impatient for the result, but could not refuse his consent to let a drowning man catch at a straw; and the Colonel declared himself ready, and indeed anxious, to reply to the poor devil's questions.

"Why, thin, let me ax your honour if you did not land at Dover from France, jist six months ago las Saturday fortnight?"

"Upon my word," said the Colonel smiling, "I cannot, at a moment's notice, remember the day so exactly specified; but I certainly did land at Dover from Calais in the early part of last January."

"In troth, it's thrue for your honour, you did so. And don't you remember the man in the sailor's jacket that carried your honour's two trunks in a wheelbarrow from the beach to the head in, and lifted your honour clane through the surf on the shingles?"

"I really do not remember the face of any particular porter on the occasion," was the disheartened reply.

"Ah, thin, sure an' it is't possible that you forget, Sir, this wound in my head, which I showed your honour that same day, and tould you all about the action wid the Frinch privateer, in which I got the same." And as the prisoner earnestly spoke he took off his wig, and displayed a deep scar high upon his forehead.

"Good God!" exclaimed Colonel O'Carroll; "I do indeed perfectly remember the circumstance, and the very remarkable wound; and I have every reason to believe this to be the very man, though his face had escaped my memory, altered as it was by the wig. But I can put the time of this transaction quite beyond doubt, for I have a memorandum of the day I crossed over from Calais in my pocket-book."

Upon examining the pocket-book with the Judge, and even he became melted with compassion, and almost rejoiced with all the other witnesses of this almost miraculous escape from an ignominious death, the date of the Colonel's landing was found noted with various other memorandums, and it was found to be exactly the same with that laid in the indictment for the double offence for which Terence Gahagan had been tried.

The impulse of astonishment and delight at this providential discovery was irresistible. The Judge gave permission to the Jury to re-consider their verdict. The Colonel was put in the witness-box, and he clearly testified on his oath to the facts he had already admitted. The verdict of "Not Guilty" was hailed with joy; a subscription for the lucky prisoner was immediately made; a handsome sum was thus put in his pocket; and he was set at liberty, and left the Court amidst the noisy acclamations of the crowd.

Colonel O'Carroll, the happy instrument of this result, was congratulated by all the gentlemen present as having, under Providence, been the means of saving the life of an innocent fellow-creature. He was invited to dine with the Grand Jury, pressed to go to a ball in the evening, and loaded with civilities; but, as though he were overpowered by this excess of notoriety, he declined all the attentions thus heaped on him, declaring that the letters he had just before received made it absolutely necessary that he should proceed forthwith to Ballymagarry Park, to dine with his friend the Marquis. The Judge, the Sheriff, and the other gentlemen saw him depart with regret; but consoled themselves with the certainty of meeting him at the Marquis's the next day, at a grand entertainment to be given to their Lordships the Judges and the first people of the country.

Colonel O'Carroll settled his bill at Mr. Mulligan's both for what he had consumed and what he had ordered, but did not wait to enjoy; and he soon rode out of town, followed by his servant, but finding it difficult to make his way through the drunken, rioting, and fighting rabblement.

The same night Squire Flaherty, the High Sheriff, was stopped in his carriage, about a mile from his own house, returning from the the assize ball, and robbed of his watch and a large sum in money and bank-notes. But as he was thoroughly rifled, a party of mounted constables came up to the spot, a rather dilatory escort to the magistrate, and between them and the three highwaymen who perpetrated the robbery a severe scuffle ensued. The latter, after a desperate resistance, were overpowered, all of them and several of the constables being badly wounded; one of the highwaymen died of loss of blood on the way back to the county town. On examining the faces of the other two, and stripping them of their disguises, they were recognized to be the sédisant Colonel O'Carroll and the acquitted prisoner, Terence Gahagan; and the former was the next day fully proved to be no other than the famous and terrible Captain Quilty, who was put into the dock with his hardened associate, and his sentence was joyfully pronounced from the very bench he had so lately sat upon, by the very Judge he had so successfully mystified; and he suffered the extreme penalty of the law with all the daring and swaggering hardihood to be expected from his character.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the whole getting-up of the alibi was a preconcerted plan, through the management of some accomplice admitted to see the prisoner (under pretence of relationship, or some other as plausible) before his trial; and that the Colonel—or the Captain, more correctly speaking—had waited to make his appearance in Court for a signal agreed on with the fellow who acted the part of his servant (the man afterwards killed by the constables) as to the moment at which his false testimony might be most likely to excite the compassion of the Judge and the Jury.

THE WYANDOT'S STORY.

BY C. F. HOFFMAN.

"The mouth of the white man," began the Wyandot, "speaks loud words; the tongue of Chagha shall only utter truth. The Great Spirit, who looks into the bottom of the hearts of men, shall witness that Chagha does not add one to the number of his wrongs. Forty summers have now passed, since Wintehah was head man among the Wyandots; he was a great chief—wise at the council fire—terrible in battle; yet was Wintehah mild and gentle to his friends, and in his wigwam, peace ever dwelt. Thehetti, the young Swan, was the fairest among the daughters of the Iroquois; and when, after she had borne him three sons, a daughter was added, the chief of the Wyandots could ask nothing more from the Great Spirit—he was happy.

They lived on the borders of The Beautiful River; the woods gave bear, and deer, to the rifle of Wintehah, and the maize grew tall, and fresh, under the care of Thehetti. The Wyandots had buried the hatchet, and exchanged the wampum of peace, with the Miamis. The Delawares had made themselves women, had taken the hoe and laid down the rifle. Then a messenger came from the great father, the Sagemash king. The Chemocomauns had risen against their father, and he wished his red children to join with his warrior, and bring the young ones to reason.

The Wyandots opened their ears to the words of their great father; they dug up the hatchet, and it was soon made red with the blood of the Longknives. Many scalps were taken to the warriors of our great father on the lakes, and blankets, and medals, and powder, were plenty in the wigwams of the Wyandots. At last came some, who would have filled the ears of Wintehah with tales that his great father, the king, had buried the hatchet, and made peace with the Longknives—but the chief shut his ears to such tales.

"My great father," said he, "would not do this, without first telling his red children, that we might all smoke the calumet of peace together."

Yet it was so. The great king had been beaten by his children, and he made peace, forgetting the Wyandots, who had taken up the hatchet in his cause.

Then came a warrior from the Longknives; he spoke of peace. Wintehah opened his ears. "The great west," said the "mocomaun," "is open to the Wyandots; let then, their white brethren, the Americans, have one little spot on the borders of the Beautiful River, and the hatchet shall be buried so deep in the ground, that no man shall hereafter be able to find it."

The words of peace were ever sweet to the ears of Wintehah—he gave the white man much land—more than he asked—"Only," said he, "let this spot be reserved to Wintehah and his old men; the young warriors will go to hunt the deer, far, far towards the great lakes." It was so.

Wintehah remained at his wigwam, by the Beautiful River—and the maize still sprang up, fresh and green in the fields of Thehetti. There the children of Wintehah grew up, and the soul of the Wyandot rejoiced in the thought that his sons would be first among the warriors of his nation. Outsie, the Bending Flower, was fair as her mother, and when she decked her hair with wreaths of bright flowers, and looked with her smiling eyes in the face of her father, the heart of the great chief was soft, and war and hunting grounds were forgotten in the beauty of his child.

Higachee, the first son of Wintehah, was now a strong youth—his father said to him, "take this rifle—the great king, Sagemash, gave it to Wintehah many summers ago—take it, and be brave. Tomorrow, I go to hunt the deer at the Licks, you shall go with me—a good hunter is, in the eyes of the Great Spirit, next to a brave warrior."

At the dawn of day, the Wyandot and his son left the wigwam. Thehetti feared nothing—there was peace with the Miamis, the Delawares were women, and the Longknives had buried the hatchet in a forgotten place. Three days had passed—the fourth had been named by Wintehah, for his return; yet he came not. Another—and another day—still the wigwam of Thehetti was void, and grief was in her heart. The tenth sun was sinking in the west, when a poor wounded boy crept towards the wigwam—one broken arm hung motionless by his side; his cheeks were hollow, and his eyes looked dim, and his back—on his back was the mark of the lash. Yes! the lash had cut deep in the flesh of the son of Wintehah—for it was Higachee. Outsie tore her hair, and wept aloud at the sight of her brother. The Young Swan looked not on her child, her thoughts were with her absent husband—"Where is he?" she cried—"where is the Great Chief?"

Higachee spoke not—his spirit was dead; he glared round the wigwam with a dull stony eye, and fell to the ground. He was not a great chief—he was only a boy, and shame—the lash—the white man's whip, had made his heart soft. We raised him from the floor; Outsie brought milk to drink, and fresh water to bathe his skin. The boy recovered and the Young Swan again screamed in his ear—"Where is your father? Dog! where is the Great Chief?"

"Dead! dead! dead!"

Yes, Wintehah was dead, slain by the white man's rifle, and his son was scored and lashed, like the white man's dog! 'Twas long before the boy could tell the death of his father, and when he did, we thought lying words came from his lips—yet they were true. Wintehah and his son had journeyed one day towards the Licks, night came on, and the warrior spread his buffalo robe on the ground, took out his parched corn and dried venison, they ate—and then the father and the child slept, side by side, in peace. At the first dawn of morning the warrior roused his son—"Up! Higachee! up! To-day we must reach the Licks."

As he spoke, Higachee heard the sound of a rifle, and the body of Wintehah fell at the feet of his child—a ball had pierced his heart.

Before Higachee could move, or speak, or think, for he was but a boy, two white men sprang from the thicket—one seized and bound the boy, while the other stripped the body of Wintehah.

"See!" said he, putting his finger into the hole in his breast—"Did I not hit him prettily—right over the heart?"

"True, John; but why did you fire at all. It is peace now, and this red skin is, as I told you, the head man among the Wyandots."

"Who cares for the Wyandots? Not I—but, to tell the truth, I fired because I could not help it. The savage stood so fair, and his bare bosom made such a good mark, that I could not, for my life, help trying my rifle on him."

"Well John, that's a sort of reason; but what are we to do with the boy? If we take him to the settlement, he will be sure to tell of this fine prank, and then what will the general say to you?"

"What are we to do with him?" said the Longknife—"I'll soon show you,—he raised his toma-hawk, and would have slain Higachee, but his companion hindered him; they determined to leave the boy in a hut, in the woods, while they went into the settlement. They did so: they bound his legs, and arms, and left him, helpless, on the floor.

Thrice the sun rose and set, and yet the white men came not to their prisoner; he lay, without food or drink. On the fourth day they came.

"How now, Indian!" said the hunter as he loosed the ropes—"Why do you not get up?"

The poor boy could only point to his mouth, and groan out, "Water, water."

The other hunter came in—"Why, John, the poor boy is dying with thirst—here! here! drink, boy!"—and he gave him water.

"But how is this John—did you not come here yesterday, and day before, as you promised?"

"Why, to tell the truth, no, the day before I could not come—and yesterday, as I was coming, I roused a deer, and he led me to the other side of the settlement, and I could not lose the deer, for the sake of an Indian; besides, I thought the boy would do very well for a day or so longer—and you see he has, only a little thirsty—but he will get over it. See! he recovers already. Sit up, and take some more corn."

Higachee tried to rise, but he could not.

"Damn you!" said the white man, "why don't you get up, get up I say," and he struck the boy a heavy blow with the breach of his rifle.

"For shame John," said his companion; "I declare, you have broken the boy's arm! Here, take this, my poor boy, and lie down. He gave Higachee some parched corn, placed water within his reach, and binding his leg with a chain, to which they fixed a padlock, they left the hut. Next day Higachee was stronger, and he resolved to escape. With a wrench he tore the staple from the post, and gathered up his chain—he could not get the links from his leg—he left the hut. But the white man was near, Higachee ran; in his haste he dropped the chain—it caught in a log—he fell. The white man regained his prisoner. "I'll teach you to run off," said he; and he tripped the blanket from this back—the lash followed—the lash tore the flesh of Higachee.

When the white man was weary of his labor, he fastened the chain in a firmer place, and left the boy—to die, for as he went, he swore on oath that he never would return.

Higachee was the son of a great chief; he would not lie down and die like a dog. All day he labored at the chain, and when night drew near, the strong link was worn through—he escaped, and returned to the wigwam of Thehetti.

Such was the story of the death of Wintehah; he had been killed because his bare bosom was a good mark for the white man's rifle. The warriors, who had remained with him on the reservation, met in council on the death of the Great Chief. The young men wished to dig up the hatchet, but the old men would not.

"We are few," said they, "and the Longknives are like the leaves on the trees. We have made peace with them; we have buried the hatchet in a forgotten place. We will go to the lodge of our white brother; we will tell him that the bad men have done this; he will seek them out, and give them to us—thus shall the death of Wintehah be avenged."

These words pleased the council. They sent to the house of the white warrior, Sukach-gook. He promised fair, and in three days a runner came to the wigwam with good news from the White Chief. The men who had done the great wrong were caught, and should be kept in prison many, many days. "The sun shall not shine on them," said he, "the fresh wind shall not cool them—neither shall they walk through the woods any more. Their souls shall be sick in the walls of their prison."

Theheti was comforted. The spirit of the warrior should not wander unavenged. In the meantime Higachee wasted away; his food did not nourish him, nor his drink refresh him. The wise men said an evil spirit had possession of him, and the medicine man was sent for, to drive him out.

He came—he looked on Higachee. "No evil spirit has possessed him," said the medicine man; "'tis the lash of the white man has poisoned his blood—he will die."

It was so. The young chief wasted away—he died. Theheti and her children made no lament over Higachee, he could never be a great chief. The Wyandots would have scorned to take for leader, a whipped dog of the Long-knives. It was best he should die.

We wrapped him in the dead clothes of a chief; but the old men would not have a hatchet, nor flints, nor bow and arrows, buried with him—"Higachee," said they, "was not a warrior;" Outesie took a withered branch from the oak that overhung the cabin of Wintehet, and cast into the grave of his son.

Two days had passed away, when, as Outesie returned from placing the ripe papaw, and fresh water, near the grave of Higachee, she met the hunter—he was free. Our white father had promised to keep him, many moons in prison—one had not yet passed, and he walked the forest, free as the wild deer. Theheti went to our white father, to tell him of the escape of the prisoner, but the face of our white father was turned from his children, and his words had fallen to the ground.

"I have pardoned him," said the white chief. "Let the death of Wintehet be forgotten."

Theheti returned to her wigwam; her soul was dark—Wintehet was dead—Higachee was dead—and the white man who had drank their blood was free.—Theheti called her son Mecami—he had not yet seen sixteen summers; yet he was strong, and active, as became the son of Wintehet. "Mecami," said Theheti, "take the rifle of Wintehet—go, bring the scalp of the Long-knife." Mecami went—and ere two days, the rifle of Wintehet rang out on the hills, and returned with the scalp of the white man. "Now," said Theheti, "let the soul of Wintehet rejoice, as he snuffs up the blood of his enemy."

Next day came a messenger from the white chief—"who," said he, "has slain one of my men?"

"'Tis I," said Mecami—"tis the son of Wintehet, has slain the enemy of his father."

"You must go the white chief—he has words to speak to you."

Theheti would have persuaded her son not to go; but the old men said go. He went—and I, Charcha, went with him. We came to the white men—they seized Mecami, and cast him into prison. "Fear not, Mecami," said I—"tis only four days, and you will be free, as he was."

The fourth day came—I went to the white chief—"Father," said I, "the son of Wintehet has passed four days in prison—the slayer of my father did no more. Let Mecami go free."

"No," said he—"Mecami is a murderer—he must be tried; to-morrow he shall be brought before the wise men of my camp."

At the dawn of day I returned to the house of the white chief. He sat in his high place to judge Mecami. Twelve men were sworn on the Holy Book of the Christians, to slay the son of Wintehet.

"Did you, Mecami, slay our scout, John Harris?"

"I did."

The twelve men talked together, and soon one of them rose up, and said, "Guilty." Mecami was carried back to his prison.

I went to the great white chief—"How many days," said I, "must Mecami remain in prison?"

"One, said he; to-morrow he shall be made free."

I hurried to the wigwam of Theheti—"Rejoice, Young Swan! to-morrow Mecami will return, our white father has said it."

The soul of Theheti laughed in her breast: "We will go," said she, "at the dawn of day, and bring home my brave; he is the son of a warrior; he will be a great chief, Wintehet will live in his son."

Next day, Theheti, Outesie, and Charcha, all made haste to the lodge of the white man. As we drew near, Outesie cried out, "What is that which dangles from the sycamore; beside the white man's dwelling?" It was the body of Mecami! The white man had choked him, he had hung up the son of Wintehet, as the Wyandot does the skunk or the opossum. Mecami was dead.

Theheti returned to her wigwam. She never gave the death scream for her child; but when the sun sunk behind the western hills, she sought the banks of The Beautiful River, plunged in, and her spirit rejoined the spirit of Wintehet. Next day, Outesie was with me, but the Young Swan was gone. What could I do; I was a boy; and Outesie, the Bouding Flower, was a young girl; fourteen summers measured her age, and fifteen mine. I went to the old men of my tribe.

"Fathers," said I, "Wintehet is dead; the white man's lash cut the heart of Higachee; they choked Mecami; and now, Theheti, the Young Swan—my mother—is gone!"

The old men were grieved. At length Ountega spoke, "What can we do? Our warriors are dead; only old men and squaws remain on the reservation; and now it is too small even for them. Son of Wintehet! turn your face to the great lakes; there dwells Tallassie; his father was the brother of Wintehet. With Tallassie you can live; Outesie will be safe, and Charcha will be a great chief."

The words of Ountega were wise in my ears. I returned to the wigwam of Wintehet, and the next day Charcha and Outesie left the graves of their fathers, to seek a home beside the distant lakes, in the wigwam of Tallassie. On the third day, we stopped at noon by the waters of the Yellow River. The clouds had passed from our hearts. "We shall yet be happy," said Outesie, "in the wigwam of the Wyandot of the lakes."

As she spoke, I heard the sound of the rifle—I tried to seize mine, but my right arm would not move—a bullet had broken the bone. I looked around—the white men were upon us—"Fly! fly, Outesie!" and plunged into the thicket. Outesie followed, but the white men were swift on her track, and I soon heard her scream, as they caught her. I hid myself in the hollow of a sycamore; they sought long for me, but their eyes were dim. At length they ceased the search, and prepared to continue their hunt. I followed on their trail. I had no rifle, and could not raise the tomahawk—yet I followed, in the hope that Outesie might escape, and then I should be near.—Three days they wandered through the woods, Outesie still near them.

She never complained—never wept. I saw her bring water for the white man's drink—and when he struck her with his ramrod, to hurry her steps, the daughter of the great chief uttered no scream of pain, though the hard blows raised large welts on her tender breast. The fourth morning they remained long in their camp; they held a talk. I crept through the tall brushwood, and hid close to the seat of the white men. There were three.

"What shall we do with her?"—said one pointing to Outesie, who stood a little way off.

THE PLAGUE IN FLORENCE.

BY E. L. BULWER.

"Oh, shoot her—she is only a trouble to us—shoot her by all means."

"True," replied the other, "I suppose we may as well. Will you do it, Tom?"

"Oh, I don't care if I do. Here, you squaw, stand up, will you?" Outesie, at first, heard not the words.

"Stand up, and turn towards me," said the hunter.

The Bending Flower turned her face towards him. She saw him raise the rifle. She saw his eye, and she knew that death was near. "Oh! white man! Oh, brother!" she cried, "Don't kill! Oh, white man! don't kill!"

As she was pleading thus, the white man took calm, deliberate aim—"Brother!" said the Indian girl—even at the word he fired—and of the children of Wintehet, I alone remained.*

SELECTED. THE BRIDE.

They tell me gentle lady, that they deck thee for a bride,

That the wreath is woven in thy hair, for the bridegroom by thy side,

And I think I hear thy father's sigh, thy mother's calmer tone,

As they give thee to another's arms, their beautiful, their own.

I never saw a bridal but my eyelid hath been wet, For it seemed to me, as though a joyous crowd had met,

To see the saddest sight of all, a young and girlish thing;

Cast aside her maiden gladness, for a name and for a ring.

When I think how often I have seen thee with thy face so calm and mild,

And lovely look and step and air and bearing like a child,

Oh, how mournfully, how mournfully, it comes across my brain

That you never more mayest be that free, and girlish thing again.

I would that as my heart dictates, that such might be my lay,

That my voice should be a voice of mirth, of music, like the May;

But, ah! in vain, within my heart, how frozen are the springs,

The murmur dies upon my lip, the music on the strings.

But a voice is floating round me, and it tells me in my rest,

That sunshine shall illumine thy path, that joy shall be thy guest;

That thy life shall be a summer's day, thy evening shall go down,

Like the evening of the eastern clime, that never knows a frown.

When thy foot is at the altar, when the ring has pressed thy hand,

When those thou lovest, and those that love thee weeping round thee stand,

Oh, may the rhyme which friendship weaves, like a spirit of the air,

Come o'er thee at that moment, for a blessing and a prayer.

* The fate of Outesie is no fiction. The man is now living—or was two years ago—on the Mississippi, who killed an Indian girl under the precise circumstances here mentioned. Nothing has been added—not even the word "brother," which was on her lips, when the white man's rifle-ball pierced her innocent heart.

From Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes.

It was a bright, oppressive, sultry morning, when a solitary horseman was seen winding that unequalled road, from whose height amidst fig trees, vines, and olives, the traveller beholds gradually break upon his gaze the enchanting valley of the Arno, and the spires and domes of Florence. But not with the traveller's customary eye of admiration and delight passed that solitary horseman, and not upon the usual activity, and mirth, and animation of the Tuscan life, broke that noonday sun. All was silent, void, and hushed; and even in the light of heaven there seemed a sicklied and ghastly glare. The cottages by the road side were some shut up and closed, some open, but seemingly inmateless. The plough stood still, the distaff plied not; horse and man had a dreary holiday. There was a darker curse upon the land than the curse of Cain! Now and then a single figure, usually clad in the gloomy robe of a friar, crossed the road, lifting towards the traveller a livid and amazed stare, and then hurried on, and vanished beneath some roof, whence issued a faint and dying moan, which but for the exceeding stillness around could scarcely have pierced the threshold. As the traveller neared the city, the scene became less solitary, yet more dread. There might be seen carts and litters, thick awnings wrapped closely around them, containing those who sought safety in flight, forgetful that the plague was every where! And, as these gloomy vehicles, conducted by horses, gaunt, shadowy skeletons, crawling heavily along, passed by, like hearses of the dead, sometimes a cry burst the silence in which they moved, and the traveller's steed started aside, as some wretch, on whom the disease had broke forth, was dropped from the vehicle by the selfish inhumanity of his comrades, and left to perish by the way. Hard by the gate a wagon paused, and a man with a mask threw out its contents in a green slimy ditch that bordered the road. These were garments and robes of all kinds and value; the brodered mantle of the gallant, the hood and veil of my lady, and the rags of the peasant. While glancing at the labor of the masker, the cavalier beheld a herd of swine, gaunt and half famished, run to the spot in the hopes of food, and the traveller shuddered to think what food they might have anticipated! But ere he reached the gate, those of the animals that had been busiest rooting at the infectious heap, dropped down dead among their fellows.

"Ho, ho," said the masker, and his hollow voice sounded yet more hollow through his vizard—"comest thou here to die stranger! See, thy brave mantle of tripple-pile and golden broderie will not save thee from the gavocciolo.* Ride on, ride on: to-day fit morsel for thy lady's kiss, to-morrow too foul for the rat and worm!"

Replying not to this hideous welcome, Adrian, for it was he, pursued his way. The gates stood wide open: this was the most appalling sign of all, for, at first, the most jealous precaution had been taken against the ingress of strangers. Now all care, all foresight, all vigilance, were vain. And thrice nine wardens had died at that single post and the officers to appoint their successors were dead too. Law and Police, and the Tribunals of Health, and the Boards of Safety, Death had stopped them all! And the Plague killed art itself, social union, the harmony and mechanism of civilization, as if they had been bone and flesh!

So, mute and solitary, went on the lover, in his quest of love, resolved to find and to save his betrothed.

* The tumour that made the fatal symptom.

ed, and guided (that faithful and loyal knight!) through that wilderness of horrors by the blessed hope of that strange passion, noblest of all when noble, basest of all when base! He came into a broad and spacious square, lined with palaces, the usual haunt of the best and most graceful nobility of Italy. The stranger was alone now, and the tramp of his gallant steed sounded ghastly and fearful in his own ears, when, just as he turned the corner of one of the streets that led from it, he saw a woman steal forth with a child in her arms, while another, yet in infancy clung to her robe. She held a large bunch of flowers to her nostrils (the fancied and favorite mode to prevent infection,) and muttered to the children who were moaning with hunger—"Yes, yes, you shall have food! Plenty of food now for the stirring forth. But oh, that stirring forth!"—and she peered about and round, lest any of the disease might be near.—Adrian paused.

"My friend," said he, "can you direct me to the convent of—?"

"Away, man, away!" shrieked the woman.

"Alas!" said Adrian, with a mournful smile, "can you not see that I am not, as yet, one to spread contagion."

But the woman, unheeding him, fled on; when after a few paces, she was arrested by the child that clung to her."

"Mother, mother!" it cried, I am sick—I cannot stir."

The woman halted, tore aside the child's robe, saw under the arm the tumor, and deserting her own flesh, fled with a shriek along the square. The shriek rang long in Adrian's ears, though not aware of the unnatural cause;—the mother feared not for her infant, but for herself. The voice of nature was no more heeded in that charnel city than it is in the tomb itself. Adrian rode on at a brisker pace, and came at length before a stately church; its doors were wide open, and he saw within a company of monks (the church had no other worshippers, and they were masked,) gathered round the altar, and chanting the Miserere Domine—the ministers of God, in a city hitherto boasting the devoutest population in Italy, without a flock.

The young cavalier paused before the door, and waited till the service was done, and the monks descended the steps into the street.

"Holy fathers," said he then, "may I pray your goodness to tell me my nearest way to the convent Santa Maria dei Pazzi?"

"Son," said one of these featureless spectres, for so they seemed in their shroud like robes and uncouth vizards; "Son, pass on your way, and God be with you. Robbers or revellers may now fill the holy cloister you speak of. The abbess is dead; and many a sister sleeps with her. And the nuns have fled from the contagion."

Adrian half fell from his horse, and, as he still remained rooted to the spot, the dark procession swept on, hymning in solemn dirge through the desolate street the monastic chant:

"By the Mother and the Son,
Death endured and mercy won;
Spare us, sinners though we be;
Miserere Domine!"

Recovering from his stupor, Adrian regained the brethren, and as they closed the burthen of their song, again accosted them.

"Holy fathers, dismiss me not thus. Perchance the one I seek may yet be heard of at the convent. Tell me which way to shape my course."

"Disturb us not, son," said the monk, who spoke before. "It is an ill omen for thee to break thus upon the invocation of the ministers of Heaven."

"Pardon, pardon. I will do an ample penance, pay many masses; but I seek a dear friend—the way—the way—"

"To the right, till you gain the first bridge. Beyond the third bridge, on the river side, you will find the convent," said another monk, moved by the earnestness of Adrian.

"Bless you, holy father," faltered forth the cavalier, and spurred his steed in the direction given. The friars heeded him not, but again resumed their mournful dirge. Mingled with the sound of his horse's hoofs on the clattering pavement, came to the rider's ear the imploring line—

"Miserere Domine!"

Impatient, sick at heart, desperate, Adrian flew through the streets at the full speed of his horse. He passed the market place—it was empty as the desert:—the gloomy and barricaded streets, in which the counter cries of Gueff and Ghibeline had so often cheered on the Chivalry and rank of Florence. Now huddled together in vault and pit, lay Gueff and Ghibeline, knightly spurs and beggar's crutch. To that silence the roar even of civil strife would have been a blessing! The first bridge, the river side, the second, the third bridge, all were gained, and Adrian at last reigned his steed before the walls of the convent. He fastened his steed to the porch, in which the door stood ajar, half torn from its hinges, traversed the court, gained the opposite door that admitted to the main building, came to the jealous grating, now no more a barrier from the profane world, and as he there paused a moment to recover breath, and nerve, wild laughter and loud song, interrupted and mixed with oaths, startled his ear. He pushed aside the grated door, entered, and, led by the sounds, came to the refectory. In that meeting place of the severe and mortified maids of heaven, he now beheld gathered round the upper table, used of yore by the abbess, a strange disorderly ruffian herd, who at first glance seemed indeed of all rank, for some wore serge, or even rags, others were tricked out in all the bravery of satin and velvet, plume and mantle. But a second glance sufficed to indicate that the companions were much of the same degree, and that the finery of the more showy was but the spoil rent from unguarded palaces or tenantless bazaars: for under plumed hats, looped with jewels, were grim, unwashed, unshaven faces, over which hung the long locks which the professed brethren of the sharp knife and hirling arm had just begun to assume, serving them often instead of a mask. Amidst these savage revellers were many women, young and middle aged, foul and fair, and Adrian piously shuddered to see amongst the loose robes and uncovered necks of the professional harlots, the saintly habit and beaded rosary of the nuns. Flasks of wine, ample viands, gold and silver vessels, mostly consecrated to holy rites, strewed the board. As the young Roman paused spell-bound at the threshold, the man who acted as president of the revel, a huge swarthy ruffian with a deep scar over his face, which, traversing the whole of the left cheek and upper lip, gave his large features an aspect preternaturally hideous, called out to him—

"Come in, man, come in. What stand you there for, amazed and dumb? We are hospitable revellers, and give all men welcome. Here are wine, food, and women. My Lord Bishop's wine and my Lady Abbess's women!"

"Sing hey, sing ho, for the royal Death, That scatters a host with a single breath; That opens the prison to spoil the palace, And rids honest necks from the hangman's malice, Here's a health to the Plague! Let the mighty ones dread,

"Sing hey, sing ho, for the royal Death, That scatters a host with a single breath; That opens the prison to spoil the palace, And rids honest necks from the hangman's malice, Here's a health to the Plague! Let the mighty ones dread,

The poor never lived till the wealthy were dead. A health to the Plague! may she ever as now Loose the rogue from his chain and the nun from her vow;

To the gaoler a sword, to the captive a key, Hurrah for Earth's Curse—'tis a blessing to me!"

Ere this fearful stave was concluded, Adrian, sensible that in such orgies there was no chance of prosecuting his inquiries, left the desecrated chamber and fled, scarcely drawing breath, so great was the terror that seized him, till he stood once more in the court amidst the hot, sickly, stagnant sunlight, that seemed a fit atmosphere for the scenes on which it fell. He resolved however not to desert the place without making another effort at inquiry; and while he stood without the court, musing and doubtful, he saw a small chapel hard by whose long casement gleamed faintly, and dimmed by the noonday, the light of tapers. He turned towards its porch, entered, and beside the sanctuary a single nun knelt in prayer. In the narrow aisle, upon a long table, (at either end of which burned the tall dismal tapers whose rays had attracted him,) the drapery of several shrouds showed the half distinct outline of human figures hushed in death. Adrian himself, impressed by the sadness and sanctity of the place, and the touching sight of that solitary and unselfish watcher of the dead, knelt down and intensely prayed.

As he rose, somewhat relieved from the burthen at his heart, the nun rose, and started to perceive him.

"Unhappy man!" said she, in a voice which, low, faint and solemn, sounded as a ghost's—"what fatality brings thee hither! Seest thou not thou art in the presence of clay which the Plague hath touched—thou breathest the air which destroys! Hence! and seek throughout all the desolation for one spot where the Dark Visitor hath not come!"

"Holy maiden," answered Adrian, "the danger you hazard does not appal me;—I seek one whose life is dearer to me than my own."

"Thou need'st say no more to tell me that thou art newly come to Florence! Here son forsakes his father, and mother deserts her child. When life is most hopeless, the worms of a day cling to it as if it were the salvation of immortality! But for me alone, death has no horror. Long severed from the world, I have seen my sisterhood perish—the house of God desecrated—its altar overthrown, and I care not to survive the last whom the Pestilence leaves at once unperjured and alive."

The nun paused a few moments, and then, looking earnestly at the heathen countenance and unbroken frame of Adrian, sighed heavily—"Stranger, why fly you not?" she said. "Thou might'st as well search the crowded vaults and rotten corruption of the dead, as search the city for the living."

"Sister, and bride of the blessed Redeemer!" returned the Roman, clasping his hands—"one word, I implore thee. Thou art, methinks, of the sisterhood of von dismantled convent;—tell me, knowest thou if Irene di Gabrini, *—guest of the late Abbess, sister of the fallen Tribune of Rome,—be yet amongst the living?"

"Art thou her brother, then?" said the nun. "Art thou that fallen Son of the Morning?"

"I am her betrothed," replied Adrian, sadly. "Speak!"

"Oh, flesh! flesh! how art thou victor to the last, even amidst the triumphs and in the lazar-house of Corruption!" said the nun. "Vain man! think not of such carnal ties; make thy peace with Heaven, for thy days are surely numbered!"

"Woman!" cried Adrian, impatiently—"talk not

* The family name of Rienzi was Gabrini.

to me of myself, nor rail against ties whose holiness thou canst not know. I ask thee again, as thou thyself hopest for mercy and pardon—is Irene living?"

The nun was awed by the energy of the young lover, and after a moment, which seemed to him an age of agonized suspense, she replied—

"The maiden thou speakest of died not with the general death. In the dispersion of the few remaining, she left the convent—I know not whither; but she had friends in Florence—their names I cannot tell thee."

"Now, bless thee, holy sister! bless thee! How long since she left the convent?"

"Four days have passed since the robber and the harlot have seized the house of Santa Maria," replied the nun, groaning; and there were quick successors to the sisterhood."

"Four days!—and thou canst give me no clew?"

"None—yet stay, young man!—and the nun, approaching, lowered her voice to a hissing whisper—"Ask the Becchini."

Adrian started aside, crossed himself hastily, and quitted the convent without answer. He returned to his horse, and rode back into the silenced heart of the city. Tavern and hotel there were no more; but the palaces of the dead were held in common by the living. He entered one—a spacious and princely mansion. In the stables he found forage still in the manger; but the horses, at that time in the Italian cities a proof of rank as well as of wealth, were gone with the hands that fed them. The high-born knight assumed the office of groom, took off the heavy harness, fastened his steed to the rack, and as the wearied animal, unconscious of the surrounding horrors, fell eagerly on its meal, its young lord turned away, and muttered, "Faithful servant, and sole companion? may the pestilence that spareth neither beast nor man, spare thee! and mayest thou bear me hence with a lighter heart!"

THE STAR OVER THE WATER.

BY MARY ANNE BROWNE.

See that glorious star on high,
Shining o'er the tranquil main;
Which appears a second sky,
Where that star may live again.
Mark it in calm purity
Mirror'd in the glassy sea.
Now behold the evening breeze
O'er the quiet waters sweep;
That bright image in the seas,
Trembles with the trembling deep;
But departs not, for the star
Still is shining from afar.
So the Christian's Heaven appears,
Mirror'd in Life's placid sea;
So it shines through happy years,
In its pure serenity.
For undying hope must be Shadowed from reality.
But if tempests should arise,
With the storm that hope may shake,
Though reflected from the skies,
It can never quite forsake;
And will still, while surges roll,
Tremble, and yet light the soul!

* According to the usual customs of Florence, the dead were borne to their resting place on biers, supported by citizens of equal rank; but a new trade was created by the plague, and the lowest dregs of the populace, bribed by immense payment, discharged the office of transporting the remains of the victims.—These were called Becchini.

We translate the following very interesting sketch from the French, as we find it related in a French newspaper. We do not remember having seen it before in an English dress:—

PROMOTION WITHOUT INTRIGUE.

M. Menneval, under the Consulship of Napoleon, was employed in the office of the Journal de Paris, a Parisian newspaper, of which M. Røderer was one of the proprietors: from this humble situation, by mere accident, he was elevated to one in which he enjoyed the most intimate confidence of the Emperor.

Menneval was a grandson of Palissot, and had obtained a good education; he was courteous and modest, and so timid that he always felt as if he required the assistance of some one to enable him to retain the friendship and esteem of those he served. His office in the Journal de Paris was of small importance and gained him but little remuneration. His business was to prepare items of local news, to record suicides and fires and paragraph broken legs; and writing a fine hand, he was employed in his leisure hours, in directing newspaper packages for the mail.

Louis Bonaparte having been appointed Colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Dragoons, and being in want of a Secretary, one day asked M. Røderer to transfer to him M. Menneval. The request was complied with, and the young man passed several months at the Military School, in transcribing the orders of the day, and in conducting the Colonel's correspondence. About this time Joseph Bonaparte had collected together at Mortfontaine, a large quantity of books, of which he was desirous of forming a library; and meeting one day his brother Louis, he asked him if he knew a young man capable of classifying the books and making a catalogue. Louis mentioned his Secretary, and without further inquiry, and even without knowing his name, Joseph sent M. Menneval to Mortfontaine.

During a fortnight M. Menneval laboured assiduously, but he soon found himself sadly embarrassed. Having no longer his situation in the Journal de Paris, he was no longer in the receipt of its trifling emoluments, and Joseph had dreamed of every thing else but fixing the salary of his young Librarian. He came to his château, on one occasion, and appeared greatly pleased with the progress of the work, but Menneval, although without the means of sustaining himself, wanted the assurance to speak of his poverty. He first borrowed some money from the Journal, and finally taking courage, he dared to write to Joseph to ask him to fix his compensation. Joseph was anxious to atone for his forgetfulness, and M. Menneval was promptly constituted his Secretary and Librarian, with a salary of 3000 francs per annum. Menneval might have remained there all his life; but he was called to a higher destiny.

One day, the First Consul, in speaking with Joseph, expressed a desire to procure a young man, of competent talents and industrious habits, to assist M. Bourienne, who was overloaded with care and business.

"Can you give me any one?" said he to Joseph.

"I do not know: I have at Mortfontaine a young man that I have employed to arrange my library—I have seen him but little, but he appears to possess considerable intelligence. He is very mild, very modest, and writes a beautiful hand."

"What is his name?"

"I have known his name, for he has written to me, but I have altogether forgotten it."

"No matter—he must be sent for."

An officer of the Guards was called; he received orders to take a carriage, go to Mortfontaine, and find a gentleman whose name was not mentioned, but who was pointed out as being employed as Librarian at the château. The officer thought that he was charged with an arrest; he took an escort, proceeded to Mortfontaine, and carried off Menneval, without giving him time to breathe. Without making a word of explanation, he watched him with great care, as a prisoner of state. On returning to Malmaison, the officer rendered an account of his mission. He was told to take the gentleman, and put him in M. Bourienne's office, in which he had scarcely entered before he was put to work. He had not yet breakfasted, when he was taken from his library, and when the dinner hour arrived, no one thought of him. He continued at his work, however, and when almost ready to faint and fall down, for want of sustenance, M. Bourienne perceived the change in his appearance, and asked him if he was not sick.

"No, Sir," replied he, "but I am very hungry."

"How—very hungry?"

"Yes, sir, I had not breakfasted this morning, when I was brought here, and I have not dined."

"And why did you not say so?"

"I could not be so bold."

M. Bourienne hastened to give his young assistant that of which he had need, and afterwards to render an account of what had passed to the First Consul. His modesty and simplicity greatly pleased Bonaparte, who in a short time perceived that M. Menneval possessed many excellent qualities, which only required to be developed to be rendered extensively useful. Bonaparte became more and more attached to him, and when he was compelled to dismiss M. Bourienne from office, M. Menneval was installed as his successor.

LACONICS—No. VII.

The man who stands listening even to a barrel organ, because it repeats "the tones he loved from the lips of his music;" or who follows a common ballad singer, because her song is familiar in its sweetness, or linked with touching words, or hallowed by some other dearest voice: surely that man has a thousand times more "soul for music" than he who raves about execution, chromatic runs, semitones, &c.

If the best man's faults were written on his forehead it would make him pull his hat over his eyes.

Either say nothing of the absent, or speak like a friend.

He that would be well spoken of himself, must not speak ill of others.

A wise man doth that at first, which a fool must do at last.

If you would have a thing kept secret, never tell it to any one; and if you would not have a thing known of you, never do it.

A wise man will not tell such a truth as every one will take for a lie.

Improve by other men's errors, rather than find fault with them.

Trouble not yourself about news, it will soon grow stale and you will hear it.

Forget not in all your plans and operations that there are two worlds.

No thoroughly occupied man was ever yet very miserable.

Nothing appears to me so absurd as placing our happiness in the opinion others entertain of our enjoyment, not in our own sense of them.

The enjoyment of high minds is only to be found in the unbounded vehemence and strong tumult of the feelings; and all gentler emotions are tame and feeble, and unworthy to move the soul that can have the agency of the greater passions.

Original. THE JUDGMENT.

"Vengeance is mine; I will repay," saith the Lord.
Epistle to the Romans chap. xii. verse 19.

There runs a popular saying that "murder will out;" an old, yet not a true one, though honoured with all devout acceptance. In most cases it may be that the guilty person is brought to a reckoning even here: nature animate and inanimate may combine to betray him; he may have borne on his shirt the stain of blood unsuspected and unsuspected,—and after the lapse of years, and when all his apprehensions are lulled, the merest trifle may, contrary to all human probability, lead to his detection: yet though the divine denunciation "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," be in the main, specially and signally verified—there are still many instances of the foulest and most unnatural taking away of human life, forever concealed and undreamed of—or, if surmised, not liable to, or undisturbed by cognizance. Such a criminal like Orestes, pursued by the avenging Furies, is left to a punishment far beyond any appointed by the law; he is given over—not to the ministry of the hangman, but to that of the scourger, conscience, and bears about within him, a sentence of eternal condemnation, which shames the worst sentence of mere mortal justice. Prometheus chained to the rock, with the eagle preying upon his liver, is but a faint type of such a wretch's sufferings.

"Him do the vulture passions tear—
The furies of the mind."

remorse, despair, "fear, frantic fear," the dread of discovery, the constant anxiety of suspense, the inward convulsion—the outward and apparently inexplicable agony—these are a portion and but a small portion of the tortures racking him. He sees the "damned spot" incarnadine his hand,—and in vain cries "out! out!"

"Not all the waters of great Neptune's ocean, Shall wash it clean again."

He sees the spectre of his victim forever beside, and glaring piteously on him; he hears the life-stream of his crime has spilt, cry aloud from the ground against him, and its scent seems still fresh in his nostrils.

"So writeth the mind remorse has riv'n,
Unfit for earth—undoomed for Heav'n,
Darkness above—despair beneath,
Around it flame—within it death:
So do the dark indeed expire,
Or live like scorpion girt by fire."

And truly there is no imagery strong enough (not even that of these lines) to paint the state of one thus living, as it were, his own executioner.

There are other murderers suspected, yet not brought to trial; they live shunned without being openly accused or convicted, and are condemned, if not by a legal tribunal, by the verdict of public opinion; but seldom or never now-a-days, have we proof of the direct inference of Providence, in default of the award of earthly justice. A remarkable case of this latter kind was once related in my hearing, as having happened many years since, in a part of the Virginia Allgany, which shall be nameless. Merely premise that it was among the peculiar people promiscuously called the "Dutch," and the "Scotch Irish," who form so large and so worthy a portion of our mountain population, that God himself was said, and firmly believed, to have visibly visited the violator of the sixth commandment, and the inheritor of "the primal curse."

"I tell the tale as 'twas told to me," without vouching for its authenticity: the narrator was a grey-headed German, of venerable and most prepossessing appearance, who affirmed himself an eye-witness of the retributive catastrophe, herein set down!

Near a small village, or, more properly, hamlet, consisting of a dozen frame and log-houses, a black-smith's shop—no tavern, for every cabin by the road-side professed to be that, and a post-office, now dignified on the list of mail-routes, with a most euphonious and high-sounding appellation, there lived, as far back as the revolutionary time, Adrian Godefroy and his wife Wilhelmina, a plain, elderly couple, "well to pass in the world," according to their humble acknowledgment, and with two children, both boys. For many years had this family lived in peace, plenty and content, such as the Israelites enjoyed when sitting every man under his own vine and fig-tree, amid the blessings of the promised land. They owned a prime tract of two hundred acres, in the highest state of cultivation, besides conducting a dairy, famous even in that region of Goshen, for its product, both cheese and butter, which was carried a distance of near three hundred miles to the Lowland markets, the farmer himself (though reputed to be worth from twenty to thirty thousand dollars) driving his huge "Augusta waggon" (as all vehicles of the kind from an upland county were indiscriminately called) drawn by a team of six powerful bay horses, the harness hung with numerous bells, whose pleasant ginsling, sent a clear sonorous sound on "the liberal air." In this, as well as all occupations of husbandry, he was efficiently assisted by his eldest son, William, a fine youth of twenty, with the frame and bearing of an adolescent Hercules, who could do the best day's work of any man in the settlement, rode like an Arab, outdid Nimrod in hunting (an unusual pastime, by the way, for one of his descent) and in short, ranked among the Dutch—then and there considered almost a distinct nation—as the chief and champion of their sturdy lads. Many and many a time had he and his father, proud of "this boy" as ever the Duke of Ormond was of his matchless Ossory, journeyed down to Richmond with their loads of flour, &c. camping out and at the end of each slow day's travel, cooking their savoury meal of fried bacon and eggs, or broiled venison, ham, and immense cakes of corn meal baked in the ashes, nicely washed and relished with butter prepared for their own special use, the like whereof their best and highest customers never had the hap to taste,—and then sitting up all night summoning up their prospective gains—telling ghost, and other superstitious stories, and catching what snatches of sleep they could beside the enormous fire, fed with knots of light-wood whose red glow, chequering over in long gleams the woods and wastes, might be seen as far as that said to be kindled by the goblin-demon of the Hartz in their Fatherland. If the nights proved wet or tempestuous, they snugly adjusted themselves in the arms of Morpheus, under the Osnaburgs covering of their moveable tabernacle, while the huge dogs a cross of the greyhound and mastiff, such as are used in Germany for chasing the wild-boar, with ears erect and eyes as keen and vigilant as those of Argus, kept watch and ward over the lives and property of their masters, so profoundly enjoying "the honey-cue of heavy slumber." It is not surprising, therefore, that William, the companion of all his toils and way-faring, should be cherished by the old man as the apple of his eye; and exultingly would he walk about the streets of the metropolis, followed by the comely young mountaineer, whose gigantic yet perfect proportions and hardihood of mien, reminded one of a barbarian-gladator, fresh from his Dacian forests, and exhibiting himself to the eyes and admiration of "eternal Rome."

While the hale and happy sire thus companioned with his first-born, Wilhelmina, the neat and indefatigable Wilhelmina was left, if not with her favourite child, for the two were co-equal in her love—with the fondling of her tenderest care, to help her in tendance of the cattle and other household concerns; in which they had the further services of a bouncing Dutch damsel—Dutch that is in looks and language, though Virginian-born, who could hunt up the cows, rub down the horses, plough, reap, wield the hoe and axe, and do all the out-of-doors drudgery, held among us Americans as only befitting a strong labourer. In their manifold offices, agricultural, domestic and lactary, our good dame, and the patient and trusty Ulrica, derived but little furtherance from Mynheer Dominic, as he was often in mockery dubbed. From his birth, this had been an ailing child, who grew up slightly deformed, and offering in person the most complete contrast to his athletic brother; it was a dwarf beside a giant—a pigmy G. Oliver, predominating in intellect over the Bredlinging, whose stature so towered above his: for the same disparity existed in point of mental gifts. William was honest and open as the day—a little slow in his conceptions, and when once impressed with an idea clinging to it with obstinacy as invincible as his strength; the penetration of the ether pierced with the quickness and subtlety of lightning,—and the searching superiority of his intelligence, often operated on the stolidity of his boors among whom he was born and bred, with such force and effect, as a flash of the electric fluid, riving and rendering the gnarled and rugged oaks of his native woods. So strangely were the elements of good and evil mingled in Dominic's character, so wayward was his temper and so wild his ways, that none could tell whether the ultimate tendency of such a nature would be to good or to evil. In sooth he was a rare incarnation of genius—a creature full of all impulses, and lofty aspirations, alien from his state and seeming,—shrewd, poetical, and passionate in his temperament, drinking in draughts of inspiration from the out-pourings of the picturesque and the sublime, amid which he had been cradled and nurtured,—and like Jacques in the forest of Ardenne, forsaking his fellows to love himself in deep and ceaseless meditation "under the melancholy shade of creeping boughs." Had he been permitted like that querulous moralist, to follow the bent of his solitary humour and surrender himself up to the worship of nature in her scenes of mountain-majesty, where admitted as it were, into the presence-chamber, irradiated by the grandeur and glory of the unshrined goddess, her soothing influences wooed him into dreams Elysian,—his fate had probably been a far different one,—and this sketch never penned. But full of a sensibility early agonized by a strong perception of his bodily blemish, and often goaded into madness, by the taunts of those around him, even the little society, that he mixed in, of a sort most uncongenial with his taste, produced pernicious effects on a mind so moody and diseased because of feeling itself out of its own place. Oppressed with yearnings, intense, yet undefined and wandering, which betokened his fitness and eagerness for a higher sphere—a sphere dawning in dim visions, like the sense of a new existence, on its increasing capacities, that mind became like a fine instrument, once capable under a skilful touch, of "discussing most excellent music,"—but now all unstrung and out of tune, from which, instead of its native notes, alternately sublime and soft, and breathing of the sweet South—rude hands struck out only a medley of fierce and most horrible discords. Much of this dissonance of strain arose from the invidious measures which marked a master-spirit in the attempt to coerce it into a mode of life contrary to its natural bias and impatience of control.

From the earliest dawn of reason, the boy had been observed to pore over every piece of old newspaper, or stray leaf of a book, which,

"Like angels' visits, few and far between," sometimes fell in his way. He had been taught to read by a traveller—(none of his own family possessing this superfluous piece of knowledge,) who, detained by illness several weeks, where he stopped only for a night's lodging, (in common with the Dutch practice beyond the Ridge, Godefroy afforded entertainment to man and beast,) was struck by the child's studious turn, which had already led the mother—a woman of uncommon understanding—to predict great things of him. But the father, who, deeming it of no consequence how a puny and peevish brat amused himself, had, at first, humoured the tiny scholar by bringing him, now and then, the present of a "picture-book" from Richmond, began, at length to see the necessity of discouraging this passion for learning, by far means or foul. For in vain, as Dominic gained years and strength, did the old man strive to make him perform his share of the plantation-work. The excuses of a weakly constitution, stunted growth—increased of spinal distortion—and a hundred others similar, so plausibly alleged by one parent—and grumblingly admitted by the other—would do no longer. Dominic, though short of stature, with his head deep-set between his shoulders, as if without the intervention of a neck—and his back warped into a decided hump, grew up broad built and brawny, and of a make, which muscular and disproportioned as that of the Black Dwarf, promised some degree, if not an equal measure, of the same strength. Yet though now full able for the jobs appointed as his task, it was too late to break him in the yoke: for the youngster, in attaining size along with his teens, had, by no means, undergone a correspondent improvement in his active habits. He had been indulged or undisturbed in those sedentary and studious propensities, by far the best and largest part of his nature till thoroughly wedded to them, and determined to debase himself to nothing else. His days and nights had been spent in conning over the volumes few indeed, but precious beyond so many ingots of pure gold, which he had managed to become possessed of; and when he had enriched his memory, with the contents of his scanty library, which was speedily the case, our perverse student was ready to do any and all things, save to make himself useful. He had the passion for music, distinctive of his ancestral nation: a passion, which competed with that for books, and his performance on the double flageolet, brought forth sounds of such touching and delicious melody, "in linked sweetness long drawn out," as might have characterised "the heavenly airs" played by the genius "Vision of Mirza." But chiefly in solitude did Dominic Godefroy enjoy himself, and exercise the manings of a mind naturally framed for other and higher destinies than apparently were to be his. His taste led him not to green pastures and smiling landscape inland with the garniture of gardens and the abodes of men, with smooth streams gliding between enamelled banks and the sunny light falling on fields of golden grain. Far different were the haunts of his habitude, the haven of his rest. Amid the quiet and sombre woods, within whose lofty and verdant vistas one feels as if in the aisles of a pillared temple, instinct with the presence of divinity,—beside the frowning steep, the headlong torrent,—or in the deepest recesses of the eternal mountains, darkening on sylvan magnificence, and peopled by fancy, with the shapes "shadowy as the sisters-weird," he hid him down

"And dream'd uncounted hours,

Tho' he was chid for wand'ring; and the wise,
Shook their white aged heads o'er him, and said
Of such materials wretched men were made,
And such a truant boy would end in woe—
And that the only lesson was a blow,
And then they smote him, and he did not weep,
But cursed them in his heart, and to his haunt,
Returned and wept alone, and dream'd again,
Those visions, which arise without a sleep."

Nor—though in every breath of wind, our visionary heard the whisperings of strange voices—and in every wreath of mountain-mist, recognized, like Ossian's heroes, the dim forms of spirits not "to his bidding bow'd," did his thoughts—the thoughts of a wild and teeming brain—dwell only on the wonders of creation—and the mysterious agencies moulding its elements according to the old country creed,—or on the train of livelier ideas and imagery excited by a stony volume of G. B. S., and the extracts composing such compilations as "Scott's Lessons" and "Enfield's Speaker," which during the absence of the elders of the family, he had bought of a yankee pedlar, at the price of a firkin of prime butter. But in these lonely rambles and hours of intense contemplation, he communed with his own kindling heart—and stirred up a discontented spirit, already repining at his base and bounded lot to wrath and venom in considering and comparing himself with others of his kind. To one of his peculiar organization, both moral and physical, such comparisons were as gall and wormwood—and one of the consequences that envy establishes itself as the master-passion of his soul—envy, like the first murderer's of a brother. William, the likely, the tall, the unconquerable—William, his father's favourite—the admiration of his associates—the boast of the settlement, became the greatest of his sorrows; a source of the bitterest heart-burnings to him, who had begun to arraign nature for her partiality towards an elder brother, in terms as rancorous and revengeful, as those employed by the miscreant Francis Moor, in the tragedy of the "Robbers." These evil emotions once admitted within his breast, there was an end of all peace and virtuous hopes. In the solitude, once Paradise to him, and in a vain struggle

"With demons who impair,

The strength of better thoughts and seek their prey,
In melancholy bosoms, such as were
Of moody texture from their earliest day," he lost his happiness and himself forever.

Not that Dominic the ambitious Dominic much coveted the commendations of clowns, to whom in the pride of his intellect, he felt himself as far superior as the owl to the earth worm; but he panted for distinction—applause, to be the centre of a circle—the sun of a system—a liege-lord surrounded by vassal votaries, intent upon the words of wisdom falling from his lips, and worshipping in him

"The power of thought—the magic of the mind."

He felt himself born to greater things—cut out to figure upon a wider stage, and before a nobler audience; and here he was confined to a small spot of earth, cramped, cramped down in ignominious endurance, amid the ignorance and insolence of sordid and stupid louts, claiming him, him the intelligent, the soaring, the learned—him, whose nature kindred to the great and eminent of the earth, spurned such base affinity! as their mate!! He saw that distinction (paltry enough, it was) within his reach—the plaudits of those composing the sole community likely ever to be known to him, awarded—not to the ethereal effluence of the mind busy without him—but to mere brute force—to the strength of the ox, and not to the wisdom of the serpent. He too, was strong—strong, that is for one so mish-pen and "curtailed of man's fair proportions," but then, wretch that he was! he lacked that outward favour which serves as the chasing upon the gold—the polishing and setting of the stone. His figure we have described elsewhere; his features were no less remarkable in expression, than for their irregularity,—and like a dusky and uncouth landscape, suddenly lit up by a streak of light shooting out of a thunder-cloud, illuminated by the strong rays of a pair of eyes, gleaming, at times, with dark and lurid lustre. Such an exterior, coupled with a demeanour too often ungracious, always uncertain, and never condescending to familiarity, and a tongue whose words were sharp as a two-edged sword—stinging as a flight of winged and venomous arrows, was ill calculated to win the popular suffrage, had such been his aim and ambition. The neighbours, most of them shrunk from intercourse as he approached to manhood, with the keen, waspish, and wild looking creature, whose deformity of person, extraordinary abilities, and, above all, his habits of gloomy abstraction and unsocial wandering, made him well nigh viewed among a race, imbued with the hereditary notions of diablerie, as devoutly believed as any article of their religious creed—as one in league if not with the powers of darkness and their prince, at least with those of the invisible and unhallowed world. Hence with abundance of deferential deprecation, our misanthrope, as he bid fair to be, experienced little encouraging regard at the hands of any one,—and repaid the avoidance of the common crew with a haughty loathing—a bitter and contemptuous sternness, which still more overawed them.

Even the fond affection of his mother—that mother to whose care he owed so much, and who alone appreciated his pre-eminence of mental endowments—he was but too apt to despise; firstly, by reason of his having been so accustomed to hear her derided for what was termed her excessive fondling of himself—and himself stigmatized, by whoever wished to plague him, as "mammy's baby,"—a reproach sure to rouse his ungovernable temper into fury,—and then because she did not cherish him exclusively, but had room in her heart, for two, of which two, our touching male-content, of course, held himself to be the secondary personage. Besides he had always yearned after the love and notice of his father, the honourable head of the house—a man, and as justice of the peace, the greatest man in the district round about; and that father, his whole soul bound up in the perfections of his elder joy—had no love to spare—no notice to waste on the idle, the unprofitable, the hunch back, more resembling an abortion of some hideous monster, than the offspring of humanity, and the brother of the handsomest lad among them all. Here, however the jealous and wayward boy was wrong in both, such an estimate of his own unsightly aspect, and of the paternal tenderness; for while old Godefroy undoubtedly set more store to William than to all the world besides, he was notwithstanding his default as an obedient and industrious child, both proud and fond in a certain sense of his youngest son. He was proud of the talents, which he saw displayed to the wondering of the gaping rustics, who, many of them, not understanding a word of English—listened nevertheless, as attentively to Dominic's recitation of Mar. Antony's Oration over the dead body of Caesar, the tent scene of Brutus and Cassius, and the like, as to the congenial tongue and theme of Germany; Germany the renowned seat of learning and mysticism—the region hallowed by the breath of poetry and music—that distant and romantic land the idol of his filial reverence and longings—the land of his father's and his faith, in whose popular love were so beautifully embodied, the many and thrilling legends of that hoary superstition, part and parcel of the speaker's nature. To be sure his information on all these points was neither deep nor extensive; but marvelous for his opportunities, it sufficed to astonish the credulous auditors ranged around, who, while he sometimes deigned thus to declaim before them, during the long winter nights, would sit spell-bound, their blood curdling and flesh creeping at the tales of terror so fluently told. And as they harkened to his "words of learned length and thundering sound."

"Still the wonder grew,

That one small head could carry all he knew."

The very fact was proof direct of supernatural patronage; for how else could one much younger and no better than themselves—the son of old Adrian Godefroy, who did not pretend to know a letter of the alphabet, come by such unaccountable knowledge?

The hearty sire, unaffected by these surmises, and chuckling that such a prodigy (in more than one sense of the word,) should be his own flesh and blood, moreover delighted in this son's music: for labourer and waggoner, as he might have written himself, had he not been guiltless of ever putting pen to paper, Adrian was like the rest of "Alma's sons," a devotee—and one of some taste too, to the "concord of sweet sounds." True, he often stormed at, and not unfrequently struck his truuant-chap, for orders non-performed and damage incurred thereby; yet, upon the whole, there was no room to find fault with the general kindness of his feelings towards him,—though Dominic, in the pride of his monopolizing temper chose to deem himself nothing, because less than all in all, and looked askant at his brother, "with envious leer malign" as one, who had robbed him of his just portion of a father's regard. And then there was a lass—a fair-skinned lass, whose blue eyes and profuse tresses of paly gold, would have distinguished her even amid the bright-haired damsels of Saxony; and she, too, loved William, the all-perfect William: so at least suspected and said others besides the disgraced youth, who at eighteen was in love, hopelessly, passionately, fiendishly, even as Faust loved Margaret. He loved,—and yet at times he might be said rather to hate; apart from the object of his desperate devotion, he pined in thought and sickened at heart, as if deprived by her absence of the very element of existence; then he was all intense adoration, all overflowing tenderness, as if it were a trifle to lay down his life to save hers, or her happiness; he felt parched to perishing a thirst for her love, as a sinner that repenteth for the living waters from the fountain of divine grace. And yet in the company he so continually and madly honed after. These softer sensations withered under the display of her indifference,—her obvious preference of another—her utter disregard of him, or notice only by a look or word such as she might have bestowed on some fierce and monstrous dog, with whose fangs she sported without fear of them, till startled by a portentous growl. At moments like these, he could have stabbed her to the heart without relenting, or compunction, and would rush out of her presence, and away to his wild haunts, there to gnash his teeth and howl in impotent fury.

And yet William, the happy, envied William, cared not for Love Laurence, pretty as she certainly was—and much as she evidently cared for him. His simple taste had been corrupted by some of the fine ladies, (the fine ladies, that is, of the suburbs and market house) with whom he had come into casual contact during his visits to "Richmond town." As far, therefore, as he, who was no follower of the fair-ex, thought of sweetheart at all, it was on the absent, and not the near, that his reveries ran; but the "old folks," who held matrimony to be the sheet-anchor of respectability and success in life, fancied it high time for him to take a wife, (the worthy couple, ad, themselves, been joined ere so old,) and constantly urged him to that effect. Love, the blooming, modest, maiden, Love, so clearly committed by her artless, yet inadvertent demonstrations in favour of the youth she had played with and liked from childhood upward—was the very person, whom the parents, unsuspecting of the inclination of their youngest son, and incapable of comprehending such a passion, even had they been aware of its existence, especially recommended—and that not without double authority, to the wooing and wedding of the eldest. There were substantial reasons for this selection. Old Clement Laurence, an Englishman by birth, and a recluse by habit, was reckoned the wealthiest of the neighbouring farmers—and had but one child besides this, a daughter married and gone to the far west: so that the innocent agile Love, with eyes as fair as those of Hope—a cheek downy and glowing as the velvet and vermillion peach, and in disposition, looks, and ways, the very moral of a rural lass, such as Shakespeare's charming song, the pastoral par excellence,

"Come, live with me and be my love," must have been addressed to—might be, and was considered sole heiress.

Still in spite of such personal attractions, and the extrinsic, and to the self-seeking Dutch, more magnetic bait of her worldly expectations, backed by that strongest recommendation in behalf of woman to vain man, the assurance that she looks upon him with a lover's eye, and with all sorts of opportunities afforded him for pleading his suit, William, his head full of hunting, wrestling matches, and city belles, continued refractory; all the effect produced by time, place, and persuasion, was that out of habitual obedience to the parental mandate, he went rather offener to see this flower of country-girls. Meanwhile his brother, like one of the Gnomes represented in his own national fables, as keeping guard over the virgin treasure in the bosom of the earth, seemed resolved that if he could not succeed with the fair mountain-maid, no one else should be the better for her charms. William, though nothing could be more void of object than his visits there, found himself invariably dogged and forestalled at Laurence's cabin by his pertinacious junior, who watched every look and motion, glaring on him like a demon out of those keen and restless optics of his, and hung upon their steps at home and abroad, with the instinct and perseverance of a blood-hound. On these occasions, he would open the battery of his caustic humour on this involuntary rival, and completely overwhelm him with the force and fecundity of his sarcastic vein—even though by so doing he provoked farther manifestations of that partiality, the mere belief in which, eat into his soul like fire. William so belittled and overborne before the rustic beauty whom, as yet, he neither desired nor disdained, but simply wished well to as an old acquaintance, and play-mate, soon began, notwithstanding the zealous way in which Love espoused his cause, to disrelish the company in which he was always subjected to indignity; and though the best natured person in the world, his ire could not fail to kindle at the torrent of invective and ridicule, which Dominic poured out in malicious exultation against him, whose wishes and designs were of a sort so little deserving such revenge. The railer indulged himself with impunity, since nothing could tempt our village Alcides to strike or hurt one so insignificant and unable to contend with himself; for he as well as most others was ignorant of the iron strength seated in those long, brawny arms, which gripped with the tenacity and effect of a bear. Neither was it in the nature of the generous giant long to bear ill will against the brother, whose grievous deformity excited much acerbity of temper,—or to mistrust where bound by such close ties of blood.

One evening, the brothers after a longer space than usual, met in the room in family use at old Laurence's, which, bright with shelves of delf and pewter ware, and rendered comfortable by a good fire and the perfect neatness prevailing throughout, was, at once, (except upon high-day occasions, when their best apartment was opened) parlour and kitchen. William had just returned from Richmond, and at his mother's instigation—indeed according to credible authority, she furnished the purchase-money in the shape of an extra-pot of first rate butter—and some flax-thread, which she was famous for spinning fine,—he brought his early friend, whom they all were so anxious to see converted into a closer relation, a set of pink ribbons, some strands of showy beads, and a horn hair-comb of immense size, and the highest polish, and as precious in the eyes of a primitive upland girl, as a carved coronet of tortoise shell, price fifty dollars, to the élégante of a city. As with the bashful complaisance of a country-bred youth, half awkward, half consequential, he produced his offerings, Love transported out of herself at such a mark of interest from one, hitherto so careless—and whom, both her own father and old Mrs. Godefrey, with a view to keep off other fancies and flatterers, assured her was soon to be her husband, sprang up, oversteering her flax-hemp in the hurry, threw her arms about the donor's neck, and kissed him, as she might have done her own brother, by way of thanks. Surprized, as most youths would have been into a momentary glow, by the suddenness and vivacity of the action, the person so frankly dealt by, returned the caress with redoubled energy, and compound interest, both, in the ardour and confusion of the moment (for, upon the first glimpse of recollection, Love was deeply, painfully confused,) being entirely forgetful that there was a witness to their fond interlude; which witness, pretending to be occupied in one corner of the room, with the huge tome—a tattered volume of the Encyclopedia Britannica—constituting old Laurence the man of letters in these parts, eyed the couple from over his ponderous screen, as did Saran, our original parents in their paradisaical state of love and innocence. As Dominic, his eye-balls seared by the sight, beheld the transient but close embrace—the fair form he so coveted and so despised of pressed in the arms of that brother, already cursed as his evil genius—the mouth rich with the hue and perfume of roses, first touching his cheek and then profaned by his eager kisses—he uttered a yell of mingled rage and agony so piercing and unearthly that, it was heard, as averred, full a mile off,—and according to William's after report, could be compared only to that most singular and appalling of sounds, bursting forth from "Steeds that shriek in agony."

He made one step towards the startled pair—then abruptly turned and fled; nor was he visible to mortal eye for several days thereafter.

Those he threw into such a tremour of consternation, by his wild cry and phrensied retreat, continued some time together; she, confounded by her drawing a happy augury from this hasty betrayal of her secret—and the gallant, beginning to feel somewhat impressed in favour of the fair one so openly and naïvely throwing herself upon his mercy. For as Shakespeare makes his favourite Henry V. talk of witchcraft in the lips of the French princess, our young Dutchman (we are aware that this national term is a solecism—but use it as a local and generally received phrase) found something similar in those which had just been indulged in saluting. Yet though he was not so far gone in love as to overstay his ordinary time,—still as he wended his way home (a distance of two miles) through the darkening twilight, he found the Laurence heiress much oftener in his head than had ever been the case before. On he went through the deep and loney woods, his fancy lingering over a half-formed vision of the pretty Love, in the high-crowned bronze cap of matronage, seated by his side in her father's snug homestead, and on the endearing position, just enacted by her. Suddenly his spirits, which owing to the pleasant stimulus of the past scene, in addition to their usual state of animal exhilaration, were uncommonly high fluttered and fell like a bird from its utmost pitch of flight prone down to earth; a slight shudder ran through his paralyzed frame;

"Along his bones the creeping flesh did quake—
His damp hair stiffened."

With fright and horror, as something, he knew not, saw not, that seemed to glide grim and ghastly across his path. "All formless but divine," indistinct as awful it passed before him; and at the same instant, a low wild wail, sadder and more musical than the voice of the winged winds, floated slowly along the twilight air, and re-echoing from wood to glen, from glen to rock and cavern, in solemn murmurs died away. William, who, without a fancy excitable enough, to originate such phantasies, was yet a devout believer in the superstitious so rife around him, stood mute and motionless for many minutes after the apparition, real or imaginary, had resolved itself into the thin element of which it was made, and that long mournful shriek, the symphony of its transit, was hushed into the stillness of death. The trance of terror, binding limbs and faculties slowly subsided; the phantom struck, fetching his breath short and quick, his stout breast shaken and reason almost waning, ventured one glance around the now silent and solitary scene. It fell only on the grotesque boughs and shadows of the huge trees, waving wise and dim, and susceptible in that pale light, and at a moment so appalling of every dubious interpretation; so our visionary, gaining no courage from the hurried sweep of his vision, and his feet no longer glued to the ground, serving him well, fled as if by hate pursued, without pause or backward look, till he hailed the cheering lights of home, and found himself fairly housed. Mynheer and the good dame, who were cozily seated in either chimney-corner, the one dozing with pipe in mouth—the other knitting as if for a wager, were roused into astonishment—indeed alarm, at the paleness of their son's countenance, and the velocity of his breathless advance, but when apprized of the portentous cause they no longer wondered at, but partiedly at—indeed out-did paroxysm. Adrian, with many a hearty high Dutch observation, to clench it withal, repeated a short Latin prayer, stolen by the Lutherans from the Catholic ritual, and deemed a sovereign spell against ghostly intruders,—while his worthy Wilhelmina, sage indeed, yet not above the bewildering fears proper to the times and her own peculiar lineage, piously raised her hands and eyes, blessed and bewailed herself in the same breath,—and, with many a sigh and shake of the head, wished that some evil might not be brewing; for, oh! dire bodement, the hen had that very morning laid an egg in William's bed. However, when the panic had a little abated, and he came to make known after a course of entreating, which would have done credit to one of Lord Brougham's cross examinations, the state of matters between himself and the fair—and what was still better, rich daughter of old Clem Laurence, all ill presages and impressions vanished at such bright prospects like mist before the morning sun; and the two conversed long and cheerily upon that, and various subjects connected with it, and naturally diverging into the labyrinth of plantation concerns and neighborhood news. The absence and disordered state of Dominic, hardly gave rise to a single comment, so used were they all to his uncertain comings and goings, and irregular ways. At the usual hour, the family retired to rest.

But the slumbers of the ancient couple, who generally nored in concert were now strangely perturbed. Old Godefrey moaned and gibbered in his sleep, as if oppressed by dismal phantoms, or a fit of the nightmare; and three several times, an ominous number! did his wife awake with a panic start, her heart beating, and limbs trembling under the idea that she gazed upon some dreadful sight, the nature whereof she could neither comprehend nor define. The last time she was thus stirred and after having put up a prayer and turned heavily over, was trying to compose herself again to rest, a deep, hollow, prolonged sound like the swell of a rising or sinking storm seemed to sweep over and around, and through the house, as if some spirit, with wild funeral dirge, came rushing and shrieking on the wings of the wind. At the same moment, the cuckoo-clock in the kitchen struck one! The single chime struck upon her heart like a death-knell. Again that long, doleful, deepening murmur came howling and raging, by shaking every door and window, as if a whirlwind hurled on the midnight air. As the wild wail rose shrill and sad, then sunk into low, sullen sounds like the sobs of despair, the old woman muttering to herself: "The good God be merciful to us sinners! how awful it blows to night," got out of bed with many a groan and shiver, and going to the little casement that enlightened their sleeping shed, unbuttoned the wooden shutters, and looked out upon the lonely scene. There was no sign of storm or seath abroad; not a leaf quivered, or shadow stirred: the stars shone calm and bright in the blue depths of the high heavens, and the night and all nature slept serene, as at the first day in Eden, ere the elemental fury was let loose to desolate our world. Marvelling at such strange contradictory stillness, and whence came that wild, unearthly sound still ringing in her ears, the harassed Wilhelmina, her mind musing in her that all was not right—but that some evil chance impended over the family or the neighborhood, returned to her husband's side, whom, under the influence of such dreary and excited feelings, she endeavoured, though to no purpose, to rouse; and after a long interval of restless and melancholy musing, haunted by vague and nervous apprehensions, she at length fell a deep, and continued undisturbed during the rest of the night.

Morning came—and with it a wail like that which went forth over Egypt, when the first born perished. Azrael, the angel of death, had been abroad in the night of his destruction, and smitten down the prop of an humble and honest house. Our farmer whose repose had been gravely disquieted by a dream purporting that he saw the roof-tree of his dwelling felled by a single blow—and that Dominic's was the hand that held and aimed the axe, was, nevertheless up and about, and, in some sort, rid by motion of his troublesome fancies—his tidy putner, again herself, brushing hither and thither, getting the breakfast—and Ulrica's house-hold matter in full activity; yet of the farm-work, all that it was William's province to attend to, remained undone, and he himself missing. How came he, who was always stirring with the dawn, thus unaccountably a sluggard? That he was not risen and gone out, ought to have been evident to them from his hat and coat yet lying on the table, where he had hastily thrown them the previous night after the heat of his homeward race. Still they chose to believe—so incredible seemed the contrary supposition—that he was employing himself about some job or other at a remote part of the farm; and again and again did the impatient Adrian, deeming that he heard his merry whistle, or caught a distant glimpse of his comely form, ejaculate, "Thanks to God! here comes my boy at last! and now, Wilhelmina, let's have up the breakfast." But several such disappointments destroyed this idea of his absence; and the mother, hoping it just possible that the loiterer had overslept himself, went up to ascertain. Minutes, that appeared hours elapsed, and she came not down: so Adrian after reiterating her name half a dozen times, accompanied by sundry sonorous oaths (for he was hasty and tough of speech) followed into the off, where—for the more spacious accommodations were reserved for strangers—stood the joint bed of the brothers, swelling with feathers, heaped up with quilts and comforters, and spread with sheets white as the driven snow. The door was shut and something heavy lay against it impeding entrance: old Godefrey drove it open, with a stroke of his foot, all the while loudly invoking Wilhelmina, and pushing his way into the narrow chamber, sunbling at the threshold over her senseless body; apparently she had fainted away across the foot of the bed, and thence sunk down on the floor, thus breaking the noise of her fall. There was, however, no need of questions, had there been any to answer them. The cause of that swoon lay before the father, in another lifeless figure stretched out in that last, long sleep, whence there is no awaking at least in this world. It was William!—his son—his first-born! it was William, still cold, gone forever!—His blood-shot eyes were open and protruding out of their sockets—his face not much convulsed, but black with the blood forced upward by a strong struggle, and now settled there—his hands clenched, and arms thrown out, as if he had died hard. The old man uttered no groan, no exclamation, not a word, as his glance fell on the blasting object; he staggered to the antique and iron-bound chest, that served the purpose of a seat, and there sat himself down, his look still fixed on that dead body, as though the sight had hardened him to stone. His wife was left on the floor unscourred—assistance uncalled; and yet he continued to gaze and gaze

"In helpless, hopeless, brokenness of heart."

The mother, so overcome by the sudden sense of her loss, began to evince some signs of life; her husband neither noticed nor stirred to her aid; what did it now import to him, who lived, or who died since the best half of his heart—the dearest of God's creatures—the hope and mainstay of his age, lay there insensible as the clod of the valley—cut off in the first flush of youth? Ulrica, however, wondering that none of them reappeared below—and judging that something must be the matter, came unsummoned, and directed her immediate efforts to the recovery of her wretched mistress. We attempt not to describe the tremendous burst of grief, which succeeded this first deadly shock, but proceed to the steps taken in consequence of an event so cruel and unexpected.

Old Laurence, one of the nearest neighbors, and also a special friend, the faithful domestic forthwith sent for. He came, and with him several other respectable householders, for the news of William Godefrey's sudden demise, soon spread far and wide. At this delicate and melancholy crisis, it fell upon Clement to assume the direction of affairs, as it was in vain to apply to the stricken sire: he sat beside the corpse, holding one of the clay-cold hands in his, and gazing piteously on the distorted face; and in reply to all queries of condolences, could only shake his head with an expression of such abject, ineffable woe as would have moved a heart of stone. This perfect quietude of grief, this humility of heart-broken despair, was the more remarkable since our Dutch patriarch was naturally a man of quick passions, partaking much in the fierce temper so fatal in his youngest offspring. But it seemed that the death stroke dealt to his darling boy, had crushed every energy, physical and mental, and left him too weak and weary even for tears. In one thing, however, he showed himself resolute to resistance: this was not to be severed from these precious remains, which still seemed to him a son, even while they were dressing them in the grave-clothes; and the coroner was compelled to make the examination, deemed necessary in consequence of the inexplicable death and posthumous appearances, in Adrian's presence. He seemed, however, but little moved by it: his grief being too profound, too absorbing to admit of aggravation, even from seeing that admirable frame, so lately enclosing the best and bravest of spirits, handled and turned over by curious strangers—subjected to the cold, judicial inspection and comments of a jury of inquest. Besides the marks already mentioned, and which were as well attributable to a convulsive fit as to violence, there was one less equivocal,—a livid circle around the neck such as would be produced by a cord tightly drawn, and cutting deep into the flesh. One other token seemed to hint at strangulation, which was a lock of hair gripped so strongly that it was found impossible to unclench the fingers from their spasmodic hold without breaking them. From the colour and texture of that hair, its rich shade of auburn, its curling and silky softness, it was no breach of charity to suppose it plucked from the head of one, too near in blood to be so much, as thought of on the present unnatural occasion; but though little was then said about it, and that little indirectly—brows darkened, mysterious looks and gestures implying more than words, were freely exchanged—and suspicion thus fixed in a quarter whence it was never to be removed! The father, though present fortunately took no note of this, or any other horrid circumstance; and the inquest over, he was left again, though not alone, with the dead. The verdict rendered was "Death from some cause unknown."

On the third day, the funeral took place: a matter very different in a remote and lonely vicinity, from what it becomes in town, where the frequency of the occurrence, necessarily deadens the effect (except in the loss of a very dear friend) of all its impressive and monitory circumstances. In a rustic community, where there is little to occupy the minds of men, and but few mutations diversifying the quiet tenor of existence, every trifle, whether an incident of feasting, feud, or mourning—a birth, a marriage, or the final departure of a fellow being, becomes matter of interest to the merest acquaintance. Death, whose doings are mostly unnoted in crowded cities, here seizes on all the sympathies of our nature, and from the chief sufferings to the humblest human breast, is linked the electric chain of that shock, which mortality must feel whenever it is brought seriously to contemplate, even in the instance of another, its own inevitable and not far distant end. There is a great deal too in the time and place of an interment; it is one thing when happening amid the throng and stir of men, surrounded by their works and their vanities, the emblems and efforts of their pride and their littleness, where all is made to wear an aspect of pomp and parade, gloomy indeed, but not the less ambitious,—and every accessory of splendor, bustle and etiquette is lavished to throw a false grandeur around the relics of perishable humanity and the closing grave. A pompous burial passes along the streets of a lively city,—the plumed hearse, the pallied and velvet coffin, the mourners with their scarfs and sables, and the long stirring of stately carriages, glow on the eye; the passer-by gazes a moment, as on any other pageant—and then turns away, the memory and mystery of the thing, the melancholy mortal of man going to his long home, making no more impressions on his listless mind than a dull and cold tale. But mark the countryman who comes suddenly upon such a spectacle, even though far more unpretending in its accompaniments; how long and wistfully he gazes after the funeral array! a strange thrill of fear, feeling, and prophetic sense, making his heart a moment still and he goes on his way, with a subdued step, and a spirit softened by this exemplification of the divine sentence that "dust we are, and unto dust we shall return." In the country which it has been happily said, that God made, the stillness and seclusion of all surrounding objects, lifts the soul into more immediate communion with him, that made it a living spirit; there is room for reflection which comes in aid of nature, and her holy and moralizing influences; and in such "sweet retired solitude" the thoughts of death, and the judgment recur more solemn and familiar, more frequent, yet more awful. Amid the eternal hills, the placid waters, and all the magnificent creations of Almighty power and goodness, destined to last while aught earthly shall endure, the sense of human nothingness, and evanescence is more deeply felt; and when the natural body, that we have lately seen living and moving, and having its being amongst us, is there to be laid in the bosom of our mother-earth, the ceremony, stript as it may be of all its fantastic and vain glorious apparel, excites other and more abiding emotions and meditations, and the most indifferent by stander feels and owns that a funeral in the country is another and far more imposing thing than the same rite performed in a populous and busy place.

Here in a settlement, where instances of mortality were chiefly confined to the aged and infirm, and rare even then,—for among the simple and moral inhabitants of the mountains, longevity was the order of the day, the sudden extinction of life, in one who seemed to hold it by the surest tenure—the removal in the twinkling of an eye, of the comeliest, the healthiest, and strongest of them all created a vast sensation. It was as though a star, the brightest and loftiest of the planetary train, had been stricken from its sphere; and as the plain, black coffin, unornamented by pall or plate, and supported on three silk handkerchiefs passed beneath it, a youth near the age of the deceased, holding each one of the six ends, was borne out of the house which that deceased had mainly upheld, and along the grave-yard path,—there was not a dry eye among the large concourse, assembled to wait upon the obsequies of one, who, though of humble degree had been pre-eminent over his mates. The parents came next; the father, "grey-haired with anguish," and almost forcibly separated from what that coffin contained, moving as if unconscious whither or wherefore he went; the mother, wringing her withered hands, and sobbing with hysterical violence, as she tottered along towards that "narrow house appointed for all living," wherein her poor William was now to be laid. These two were followed by a long procession of both sexes, walking two and two, and as they wound along the dreary way so seldom trodden, save by the solitary cow-herd or hasty laborer, making a near cut, seeming from their deep silence and measured movements, like a train of shadowy spectres gliding through the gloom and sepulchral stillness of a lone and haunted waste.

The few intervening fields were crossed—and the funeral-train reached the spot, where "Each in his narrow cell forever laid,

The rude forefathers of the hamlet slept;"— and where the grim grave was prepared for their young and suddenly summoned descendant. A circle was formed around it, and the bearers resting the coffin on its brink, after a few words of solemn admonition from their venerable pastor, to lay the scene to heart, a hymn, of which the following is a strict translation—was sung with much natural harmony and effect, (music in their extreme passion for it making a part, even of the burial service among the Germans.)

Peace to the parted soul—

The soul to judgment gone!

Peace to ye, who linger here!

But soon to follow on!

Ye labor still in darkness drear;

That rest hath found in higher sphere.

Brother! thy warfare's o'er—

Thy race is briefly run;

Death's shadowy bourne thou'st past.

Eternity is won:

And thou hast stood arraign'd alone,
Fore him that fills th' eternal throne.

To him, the way, the truth,

The life, in ransom giv'n

For man, thy cause we trust;

Thro' faith, we enter Heav'n.

Christ saves the soul by sin else lost;

Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost!

A short prayer was then put up—the coffin lowered, and all was over.

While this tragedy was enacting at the paternal residence, where was Dominic? the miserable Dominic—he who had so mislaid and wished ill to his brother, that brother now low in the silent dust. None saw or heard of the absentee for several days after the funeral; but while some opined that he had fled from fear of conviction, and others that some accident must have happened to him in the course of his venturesome rambles, he, all at once reappeared in the desolate dwelling. Adrian, in the apathy, in which senses and feelings seemed alike sunk, neither took heed of his absence or his return; but his mother, who felt a gleam of joy warm her withered heart, at the sight of this now sole, and always fondly regarded child, learned in answer to her anxious questionings, that he had wandered into the neighborhood of the natural bridge, that grand natural curiosity of Virginia—and so on to gratify his curiosity, by a view of this stupendous piece of mountain scenery. This was plausible enough, as our enthusiast was in the habit of making similar excursions without warning or preparation. But this last one had wrought a change in his appearance, which could not fail to furnish food for wonder and conjecture. He was attenuated—worn down almost to a skeleton state by fatigue, or it might be, the corrosions of some inward and eating care—squalid from suffering and almost savage in his deportment. He heard the news of his brother's death with a vain and fruitless attempt at surprise and sorrow; he was agitated—but it was the agitation, not of grief, but a darker and sterner emotion; and eyes were upon him to remark, tongues ready to report his manner, under the unexpected, if indeed it were so, announcement. There was nothing conclusively condemnatory of Dominic; nothing certain even of William's having come unfairly by his end; but there had always existed a prejudice against the first—not, as he falsely imagined on account of the vile defection of his form, but, by reason of his wild and sullen temper, his ways so overbearing and unlike the ways of others, and his supposed communion with beings immortal and unblest. Then there was the testimony of Love Laurence, who raving on her bed under the loss of her young lover, and recurring to the last scene betwixt herself and the brothers, had at once and loudly accused the youngest of having compassed the other's death, and in spite of all the dissuasion and remonstrances of her more prudent father, persisted in affirming his guilt—the remarkable appearance of the corpse—and, last, not least, the lock of hair, which might have been sworn to as his, who was famous as Absalom for the beauty of that appendage, altogether forming a sort of chain of circumstantial evidence, which, although it might have weighed nothing against a more popular person of like affinity, sufficed to bring the singular and unamiable being, looked upon with so little favour, into at least present disrepute. There was, nevertheless one thing tending to exculpate him in the estimation of those disposed to judge dispassionately, which was his absence previous to and after the melancholy catastrophe; but with the majority, whose minds were already made up, this exonerating circumstance availed him nothing. It was however, of a nature to exempt him from the cognizance of the law, since there were several credible witnesses ready to depose to having met Dominic on the night of his brother's death, so far up among the mountains as to preclude the possibility of his agency in that unfortunate and most mysterious affair. Still the neighbors, many of them wavering in their belief of his criminality, supported, as they were, by circumstances, which, if too slight to be held proof positive, were, nevertheless strong enough to deserve investigation.

The unhappy object of these too probable surmises seemed bowed down under a weight of internal woe, heavy enough to crush the strongest, and scarce susceptible of increase, by any accumulation of outward evil.

Yet there remained one ordeal for him insupportable even in idea; an ordeal where all observation was likely to be upon him; for though none dared provoke the hostility of a creature so malignant and perchance powerful, by hinting to him a title of the mistrust of him abroad (and not ungrounded) he was haunted by a vague, instinctive apprehension of it. The funeral sermon of the late William Godefrey was to be preached; a sad commemoration, which all relations must, of course attend, and whence Dominic could not absent himself without the most glaring impropriety, and disrespect to the memory of the departed. And strange to say, this piece of irreverence was (not to mention the ill reports it might give rise to or confirm) more repugnant to his feelings than a darker and more deadly deed. It was a choice of evils not yet imperative; but in the interior, the wretched and remorseful youth was exposed to a trial still more severe in the great change, which had taken place in his father, and that father's conduct towards himself. The old man, who seemed fast dying by an atrophy of the heart, had no longer relish for any of his former associates and avocations. "Tis true he still roused himself to see after the farm, and to go through the routine of his old employments; but it was mechanically, unconsciously as a puppet might have done that was wound up for it. The salt of existence had been spilt; all earthly things had lost their savour; still he showed himself tender of having Dominic by his side,—and his only solace was in the music now utterly abhorrent to the ears of the compulsory minstrel. Adrian spoke not to him of his lost William, that name so loved and hallowed, alike engraved on his memory and his heart, rarely passed his lips even to Wilhelmina; but there was a little air, "most musical, most melancholy," that the deceased had delighted in, and which his father was never weary of hearing. He would keep Dominic playing it to him over and over again, he sitting the while with his hands clasped, his head depressed, and his rough yet not homely features quivering with nervous twitches,—till his horror-struck son, unable to bear it any longer, would spring up and dart away as if pursued by demons; and so he was, by the demons of a guilty conscience.

The day for the last religious commemoration of departed mortality came; and the father, the mother, and the brother, who had been deemed capable of a misdeed so monstrous, were in the meeting-house seated, and striving the two first to maintain that decent composure of aspect, incumbent on all in the house and worship of God,—and the last to undergo the rack of ten thousand tortures with the fortitude, though not the holy fervour of a martyr. A text, suitable to the solemn occasion, was taken, the fourth verse of the 144th Psalm, "Man is like a thing of naught; his time passeth away like a shadow,"—and an excellent and affecting discourse delivered by the Rev. Mr. Weidemyer, who, in life and lecture approved himself, indeed "a legate of the skies." During the sermon (at the pathetic parts especially) all eyes turned upon Dominic, who, nerved by pride to the endurance, and exerting such command over himself as absolutely brought on a strong spasmodic fit, repressed every change of countenance—every convulsive start, every thrill of agony, such as the patient under amputation feels, when the red-hot iron is applied to the raw and bleeding stump.

"The lip's least curl, the lightest paleness thrown, Alone his govern'd aspect spoke alone," and almost imperceptible of the thousand throes, that only searched him. A mien so calmly, melancholy, so unconscious of guilt, and fearless, because undeserving of the stigma attached to it, yet so expressive of feeling, went a great way in destroying the ill impressions existing against him: for few could conceive of an actual criminal, wearing so artfully the semblance of innocence. But there was one person present, whose looks, the counterfeiter dared not encounter, since he felt that the slightest glance of her eye, would probe him to the quick; one whom he shuddered to think upon much more to meet. This was the blighted daughter of old Laurence, the object alike of his love and his loathing—the direct cause of his crime and his curse, abroad for the first time since her heart had been widowed, as she affirmed by his deed, she now sat within a few paces of the Godefrey's that opportunity at hand for which she had longed with the thirst of vengeance.

"That haunts the tigress in her whelpless ire."

She believed herself the commissioned accuser of an assassin—the avenger of righteous blood most foully spilt; and deluged in tears, agitated almost to insensibility as she was, during most part of the service, her looks never left him, her wild resolve never faltered. At last the closing hymn (Luther's fine Anthem on Death) was sung, and the final blessing dismissed the congregation. Dominic saw and sought to evade her, more terrible to him than a thousand embodied fiends; but equally bent on her purpose, and aided therein by old Mrs Godefroy, who felt like a mother seeking the sympathy of a daughter—the mistress and the brother—the culprit and his denouncer, were brought together. With a burst of passionate vituperation, which shamed that bitter and vehement, yet most feminine piece of railing, the lady Anne's in her dialogue with the crook-back Richard—Love Laurence, the once timid and gentle Love, who seemed too soft for an angry word or thought, stood forward, her pale features working with the energy of abhorrence and determination, her right hand open, and rigidly raised in attestation of Heaven—the finger of her left pointing with all the emphasis of truth at the object of her hostile spirit—and charged him, in the name of the Most High, with the murder, the cruel and treacherous murder of his own and only brother. Dominic, trembling more with rage than terror, was not taken by surprise; his "coward conscience" had forbidden something of the sort on this occasion, though scarce from that particular person. Like a bear tied to the stake and baited into fury and self-defence, he stood his ground with dogged self-possession, and repelled the crimination with a torrent of eager and overwhelming eloquence, that might well have passed for the inspiration of indignation. But the popular sentiment sided with the excited Love, who, now flushed and faltering through excess of impatience, her eyes fixed on him as if they could scorch by their living fire—her whole men evincing such scorn and shrinking, such dread, yet defiance, as might move a saint exorcising Satan in his proper form, so ill faced the defendant, and flashed on him that arraignment, which she lacked breath to put again into words. The general and long-stifled suspicions of the many, who wanting moral courage to originate an attack upon one supposed to deal with unonly influences, now boldly followed the lead of a weak but enthusiastic girl, vented itself in hisses and groans, which sounded in the ears of Dominic like a sentence of eternal condemnation. All that followed was confusion and difficulty, disorder and dismay; the parents as much incensed as overcome by a charge so monstrous and incredible, clung confidingly to their son as the best means of protecting him; but none could make themselves heard or heeded, till the voice of their minister, "loud as a trumpet with a silver sound," pealed through the tumult, proclaiming that solemn verse of Scripture, "The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him!" In an instant every voice was hushed, and the most reverential stillness prevailed, while the holy man in few, but forcible words set forth to them the great sin and sacrilege, of which they, in their pharisaical spirit and presumption, had been guilty, in profaning Jehovah's house, by their carnal clamour and contests. He charged them to return in peace and penitence to their respective dwellings, and striving by a life of humility and charitable forbearance to make their own election sure, to leave this awful matter to the hand of God; a man date, which was immediately and implicitly obeyed—and the more readily since she make-bate, Love Laurence had been already borne off by her father, who burned with shame and anger at what he styled her insane and unfeminine conduct,—and the Godefroy's desired by the revived pastor, to wait for his company home.

From this day, the current of public opinion set more strongly against the younger Godefroy, and people were no longer at the pains to conceal from him their conviction of his enormity. 'Tis true, some used discretion in their denunciations of the formidable being, permitted according to their sage belief to commune with the abstruser and mightier powers; but for one thus prudent, there were scores of the plain-spoken; and the life of the accused was more embittered by this display of general and open detestation, than by the sight of his affected parents, or his own inward pangs. For of all persons living, Dominic was least calculated to bear contumely or humble himself before the laughtiest of his kind; how much less, then to those over whom he had once exercised, and enjoyed honorable if not exclusive supremacy! The praise of man was the breath of his nostrils; his desire for that grateful oblation, had first excited him against his more pleasing brother; and that presence removed, which had overshadowed him, he deemed himself sure of receiving his due—the due of a wondrous and worshipped intellect. Alas! he dreamed of reaping the reward appertaining to virtue, where he had earned only the wages of sin. From his birth, a restless and unhappy spirit—the child of fancy and ambition,—his very sense so profound and pervading, of the beautiful in nature, taught him to hate himself as a blot on the face of this fair universe, and unblest with equal perceptions of the beautiful in men, he sought not to make the mind within a tone for and efface the stain of outward deformity, under which he writhed and banded. But hiding himself amid solitude and savage scenery, from the scoffs and pity of the more fairly gifted, he nourished the thoughts of wrongs, sufferance, and the sense of enormous injustice awarded him alike by Heaven and men, till he became ripe for ruthless deeds. He had sinned and he had suffered, but he had sinned for a price, which he had found would not be paid him; and spurred by Love Laurence, and condemned by the common voice.

"Here stood a wretch, prepared to change
His soul's redemption for revenge."

Willingly, in the dark and desperate impatience of a perverted mind, would he now have fled to those unhalloved allies, whose slave and instrument he was reputed to be.

Then in addition to the general odium, the poor wretch was haunted by a spectre fiercer than any raised by remorse, in a fond female wrought into frenzy by her loss, and as she continued to aver his act. Love appeared to have lost all the awe, which she had, at times regarded her wild and wayward lover; and he now looked upon her with a mixture of such strange and fiendish sensations, as the Lady of Wheelhope is said in the wild legend of the "Brownie of the Black Hags" to have entertained towards her appointed tormentor—a delirium of malice and vengeance, a depth, not of love or hatred exclusively, neither of disgust or desire—but a combination of them all into such a longing as the great enemy of mankind feels after the souls of the just, redeemed from his infernal thrall. Nor was this inveterate malevolence entirely unprovoked. In spite of all the remonstrances and stern prohibitions of her father, vexed that a wild fancy of his grief-crazed daughter, should be the means of alienating him from the family of his old and tried friend, Godefroy,—she stuck to her vow of active enmity against the person, whose innocence he was equally ready to avouch,—and at home and abroad, in church, or he'd, whenever they met, or his name was pronounced in her hearing she renewed the accusation, and reviled him in a strain, that outdid Queen Margaret's shrewish flow of tremendous maledictions. At no sense of her own proper and imminent peril could she be deterred from this; though her friends, one and all, from the sage crone, who had numberless wild tales to tell of young women, spirited away and misused, and sacrificed by those in compact with "the dwellers in dark abodes," down to the young and scary maidens of her acquaintance, all believing the same as firmly as their Bible, warned her to beware of the dangerous wrath of the servant of the evil one. And in good sooth, had he been tempted with a fair opportunity, there is no saying whether the enraged, and vindictive Dominic, would have stuck at doing her a mischief even at the risk of bringing his neck to the gallows; for, though he did not shake off the existence, which clung to him as a curse, he would have held it a cheap exchange for the deed of complete revenge.

The decree of public opinion irreversibly pronounced against their son, did not in the slightest degree shake the confidence of his parents in him. So far from that, it only led them to mistrust their neighbours, as being some of them in league for the destruction of their sole remaining child: the elder and more important of the two, they were firmly persuaded, had fallen a victim to this diabolical conspiracy! To live exposed to the machinations of such miscreants, was impossible; and Wilhelmina, daily incited thereto by Dominic, who would gladly have wandered to the world's end, was bent upon emigrating far her west, and exerted all her influence over her husband to move him to such a step. But though he readily consented to all she suggested, there was no prevailing farther with him; "all hoar with time and trials," one darling son laid in an untimely grave—the other held up to scorn and ignominy, his very life involved by a capital impeachment,—the old man, become

"Like the blasted pines,
Wrecks of a single winter, barkless, branchless,
A blighted trunk upon a cursed root,
Which but supplies a feeling to decay."

thought of nothing, coveted nothing, but to droop in dull vegetation, through the few remaining days assigned for his continuance upon earth. His wife, seeing there was no hope of nerving him to active measures for the task of removal, and indeed loth to tear herself away from the homestead, where she had spent so many quiet hours, and which was, moreover hallowed by its proximity to the spot where William rested, next bethought her how to eradicate the almost unanimous prepossession, which unaccountable, as it was in her eyes, unfounded, had nevertheless, power disquieted them. There was a way—and but one—for Dominic to clear himself in the sight of the world; yet how to sway one of his peculiar turn of temper to it? could she but do this—would he but descend to redeem himself by the proposed ordeal, all doubts and reports of his unworthiness were at once quelled; and none of Dutch blood or nursed in Lutheran faith, would dare to deem him less than absolved, and his name—the honest name of Godefroy, restored to all its former credit.

There existed among this primitive people, a mode of justification appointed for the especial benefit of those accused, and outlawed upon mere suspicion. It was a relic of the olden and barbarous time, a modification of the chivalrous practice of trial by battle,—and something similar to the Jewish ordeal of the waters of jealousy. The person, aggrieved by the public pre-judgment, after giving due notice of his intent, was in the presence of God, and the congregation in church assembled, to lay his hand on the Holy Scriptures, while declaring himself within the strongest imprecations of instant punishment if he spoke not the truth, guiltless of the offence alleged against him,—and then seal the attestation by the solemn sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Among a community imbued with the deepest sense of religion, it was supposed that no one actually guilty would dare profane its most sacred ordinance, and taste the communion-cup under a pledge so awful, since the most signal vengeance would immediately follow such blasphemous audacity; any one doing it with impunity, was therefore, to be considered as acquitted, and restored to his place in the esteem and society of his fellows. Such were the means, by which Dame Godefroy, holding him as immaculate in this matter as herself, yet unable to hold up her head under the sense of his public shame, wished her boy to purge himself of the imputed stain; but long she begged and prayed, wept and expostulated without finding herself one bit the nearer to her aim, till she had recourse to an expedient and an auxiliary not to be resisted. At any other time she might have shrunk from it, but now, the peace, the reason, the very life of her injured offspring were at stake. To old Adrian, become as docile to her guidance as a child, she stated the urgency of the case, and prompting him to the petition, she had preferred in vain, led the father to the son's feet, and consent was won. Dominic, who shuddering at the impious act of perjury, had wrestled sorely with his own desire, thus to retrieve his character, was subdued by the sight of his father, a supplicant before him; that father whose tractable passiveness, was the surest and most touching sign of his heart-break and mental prostration. Besides as much a slave to the "bubble reputation" as Goodwin's Falkland, Dominic even when buoyed up with the hope of leaving the country forever, deemed death hardly worse than a memory consigned to perpetual infamy: so pressed on all sides he went to the good pastor, who, more than once had visited and ministered to him with ghostly advice,—but in a way so soothing and delicate, that the words of admonition dropped, like the gentle rain from Heaven, on the parched place beneath; and in brief, yet not unseemly phrase, signified his intention to resort to the pledge of the Eucharist (as it was called) in order to destroy the foul charge not judicially but generally preferred against him to his great injury and agonizement: Mr. Wendemyer, who had studied the character and habits of the youth before him with attention, but whose strict watch over himself, in order to hinder the growth of an uncharitable spirit, rendered it almost impossible for him to form a harsh judgment, spent some time in laying before him, the full nature and sanctity of the divine Institution, whereof he desired the benefit, and which, while the spiritual sustenance and support of those, in all faith and humility, partaking of it, if unworthy received, caused the person so offending in the strong language of the apostle "to eat and drink damnation to himself;" he therefore warned his agitated auditor against the danger of tampering with a rite so hallowed—but with as little effect as is usually attendant on these official discussions. The applicant was resolute, and the third Sunday therefrom was assigned as the period of his solemn appeal from man to Heaven.

Accordingly on the next Sabbath, notice was given from the pulpit, that on such a day one, wrongfully suspected of a most unnatural atrocity—being entirely clear of the same, and having no way of redress against the ill thoughts and conversation of his neighbours,—was advised and had come to the resolution of making public profession of innocence, previous to his approaching immediately after the Lord's table. The person so complaining, and appealing from the false judgment passed upon him, was farther stated, to be Dominic Gottlob Godefroy, youngest, and now only son of Adrian and Wilhelmina Godefroy of the Gorefenhau: and the reverend speaker closed by saying, that in compliance with the usage and indulgence of the Church, he should, then, and there, admit the so named Dominic to the pledge of the Eucharist, as the means of justice to one, according to his own showing, grievously wronged.

The interval betwixt this announcement, and the day of trial, went by to the principal character in the dismal drama, like a dream, vague, endless and terrific. In vain he strove to comprehend and realize his situation; it was exactly that of a person, walking in utter darkness amid pitfalls and perils of every kind, with the consciousness that each step might plunge him into irremediable destruction, and yet that he must on!—on!—since to linger was as fatal as to advance. Rest, appetite, and strength forsook him; still his demeanor was (unlike his former mood) strangely, horribly, gay; and there was a wild and varying sparkle in his eye, that spoke not of natural mirth, but of the fierceness of incipient insanity. Since his last return home, after his brother's interment, he had entirely relinquished his far roving propensities,—and, like some forest animal, half domesticated, roamed all night about the house, which all day resounded with his bursts of savage glee. No more did the witching notes of the flageolet

"Like a stream of rich distilled perfume," come floating and breathing around the farm, from the far-off nook, in some "bosky dell, where the idler dreamed away his hours;" the music was silent, the sequestered places that had once known his wandering footsteps, knew them no more; and at his mother's elbow, he was everlastingly to be found, as if some holy spell shielded and soothed him there. She—that fond, erring, deceived mother—sympathized with every turn of her son's temper, and essayed with all her simple art to impart to him, and move him to seek out comfort for himself from that sacred source, which is the well-spring of eternal life. But all useless were her zealous efforts to recommend religious studies and consolations to his intractability; he shrunk from meddling with the Bible, as some unclean spirit, such as "believe and tremble," might have done; and at this particular conjuncture, when they ought, had he been what he professed himself, so much to have engaged his attention,—eschewed all mention or memory of divine things, as the worst of abominations in his sight. Dame Godefroy, baffled and bewildered by such profane and perverse mockery, desisted from her pious efforts, and her heart bleeding for the poor boy, half crazed as she thought him, by insult and ill-treatment, resigned herself and him into the hands of a righteous and overruling Providence. Thus passed the time to them both till Dominic was to go forth to his awful act of self-justification.

The church, the scene of this solemn novelty, was crowded to suffocation by sunrise. Such an incident, though of traditional occurrence in the father-land, had never been witnessed among the Cis-atlantic Dutch. From a country baptizing in America, the least imposing of such ordinances, to the Spanish ceremonial of the August Auto-da-fé, religious spectacles are, of all others attractive to the multitude; and this was enhanced by every observance reconcilable with the simplicity of the established worship. On one side, the elders of the church were to be seen ranged in God's array; on the other, the principal persons in the settlement, old Clem Laurence pre-eminent among them, sat in state as if composing the supreme tribunal of judgment, and the table "covered with a fair cloth," and holding the holy elements, in a chalice and plate of richly-chased silver, said to have belonged originally to the monastery, whence the great reformer seceded, was set out, not in its usual place near the pulpit—but in front of the dignitaries, and nearly in the centre of the assembly. The parents of the neophyte were in their accustomed seats, commanding the pity and esteem of all present; old Adrian hardly aroused from his habitual apathy, by what was going on around him; Wilhelmina, pale but composed, triumphant yet trembling; for, though her faith in the guiltlessness of her boy was perfect—yet the time, the place, the occasion—the heavy remembrance of her dead son—the dreadful suspicions defiling the good name of the one in presence there,—over whom her bowels yearned—the obloquy attached to his hitherto unspotted name, the awful pledge about to be given in redemption of it—all combined to flurried nerves, which had stood of late such tremendous shocks. Dominic sat alone, like one doing a public penance, in the most conspicuous part of the holy house, and wearing a look of spectral ghastliness—of rigid immobility, almost approaching to stoniness; it might be the tranquility of innocence—it might be the enforced calm of hardened despair. But none of the many, who scanned him with eager eyes, were now free to scrutinize and animadvert upon one, entitled by all their prejudices and practice to stand superior to unjust accusation.

The service was duly performed: a sermon upon the approaching rite in its usual acceptation, and also its present purport was delivered; during which, the individual, whose soul was harrowed up by a repetition of all circumstances connected with the late tragic dispensation in his father's family, and his own large share in it, sat mute and motionless as if he had "forgotten himself to marble." The pastor, his discourse something of the longest, ended, proceeded to celebrate that holiest mystery, common to all Christian churches; and all in the wide old building leant forward, or half rose, breathless with suspense—almost dizzy with intense and straining observation. Among the most eager of these gazers, was Love Laurence, who with eyes endued with such powers as that ascribed to the fabled basilisk, rivetted with the fixedness of fascination, the sharpness of lightning, upon him she so abhorred, seemed to freeze him, as they pierced into petrification. But though the communicant seemed bewildered under her steadfast and scathing gaze, it was only a momentary confusion; he was summoned to advance; slowly and sternly he did so; the sacred volume was tendered to his touch, the form of exculpation repeated by him deliberately, and distinctly after the clergyman, and with the concluding asseveration "So help me, God!" he kissed the book, uttering at the same time, a long, deep sigh, that ran echoing along the old walls like a hollow and unearthly whisper. The minister then withdrew to the altar, and himself first receiving the consecrated bread and wine, presented the first with the usual formula, "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for thee! Take and eat this in remembrance that he died for thee, and feed on him in thy heart by faith with thanksgiving." Dominic, after a protracted pause, obeyed; the holy morsel passed his ashy lips, a minute elapsed, and the whole congregation saw and trembled. A strong spasm shook his shrunken limbs; pale before, he now grew livid and verous; he gasped, he reeled; a purple flush passed over his convulsed face; there was a swelling and rattling in his throat—a stiffening of the muscles cord like form tension, and choked by contending emotions and the hasty attempt to swallow, he fell at length on the pavement, and was taken up stone-dead, under a doom as sudden and awful as that provoked by Ananias and Sapphira.

To the simple and superstitious apprehension of our mountaineers, there was no need of inquest or investigation, as to the cause of a death so manifestly proceeding from "the visitation of God." One thus judged and executed by the divine justice, was, like the Hebrew rebels of old, decreed to be buried "out of the camp"—that is, far from the place of interment, common to his name and race. They made the grave of Dominic Godelroy, the fratricide, the sacrilegious and perjured wizard, in one of the wild haunts, where he was supposed to have invoked the aid of those demons under whose deluding instigation, such a tissue of foul crime was wrought; and long and fearfully, through all the region of the Allegany, did they talk of and tremble at this true, and most terrible JUDGMENT.

YOUTH RECALLED.

BY J. G. PERCIVAL.

In deepest shade, by fountain sparkling clear,
High o'er me darkly heaved the forest dome,
Sweet tones, long silent, melt upon my ear;
They soothe my spirit like the voice of home;
And blended with them, floats a beam of light,
Radiant, but gentle, through the shadowy night.
My heart, that sunk in dim oblivious dream,
Wakes at the tones, and feels its life again;
My downcast eye uprises to the beam;
Softly untwines my bosom's heavy chain:
A stream of melody around me flows;
Anew the smothered fire of feeling glows.

The charm, long lost, is found; and gushing pours
From Fancy's heaven, its beauty, as a shower:
The mystic deep casts up its wondrous stores;
Mind stands in panoply of fullest power;
Heaving, with wakened purpose, swells the soul;
Its barriers fall; its gathered treasure roll.

Light covers all around—light from on high,
Soft as the last retiring tint of even,
Full as the glow that tints the morning sky,
Pure as the midmost blue of cloudless heaven:
Like pillared bronze, the lofty trunks aspire,
And every leaf above is tipped with fire.

And round me still the magic music flows;
A thousand different tones dissolve in one:
Softer than ever gale of evening blows,
They blend in harmony's enchanted zone:
With pictured web and golden fringe they bind,
For higher flights, the renovated mind.

I feel it round me twine—the band of power;
Youth beats in every vein; life bursts in bloom;
All seems, as when at twilight's blissful hour,
Breathed from the flowery grove, the gale's perfume;
The laugh, the shout, the dance, and then the strain
Of tenderest love, dissolves the heart again.

Ye greet me fair, ye years of hope and joy,
Ye days of trembling fears and ardent loves,
The reeling madness of the impassioned boy—
Through wizzard wilds again my spirit roves,
And beauty, veiled in Fancy's heavenly hue,
Smiles and recedes before my longing view.

The light has fled; the tones that won my heart
Back to its early Heaven, again are still:
A deeper darkness broods; with sudden start
Repelled, my life relapses from its thrill:
Heavier the shades descend, and on my ear
Only the bubbling fountain murmurs near.

MEMOIRS OF COM. MACDONOUGH.

Our materials for the early life of Commodore Macdonough are scanty: but that circumstance is the less to be regretted, as in common with many of his youthful companions in the naval service, his characteristics are merely an unremitted perseverance in the paths of duty and of glory. Our authorities, however, enable us to state one characteristic, which though perhaps not peculiar to him, appears to be more deeply imprinted and more strongly marked.—That habitual devotion to, and that firm persuasion of, the constant operation of the providence of God, by which he now appears to be actuated, have long been conspicuous in his life.

The battle on lake Champlain, in the vicinity of Plattsburg, on the 11th September, 1814, by the skill and courage with which it was conducted, and by the importance of its effects upon the state of the war on the northern frontier of the United States, first conferred distinction on his name, and pointed him out as the object of national curiosity, inquiry and pride.

THOMAS MACDONOUGH is a native of the State of Delaware, and at the date of the battle just mentioned, was about twenty-eight years of age. He entered the service at an early period of his life. At the siege of Tripoli, he was a midshipman under Lieutenant Decatur, and was one of those brave volunteers, by whom the frigate Philadelphia and the Turkish gun-boats were destroyed. Of his meritorious conduct on this occasion, we may be sufficiently persuaded, from his having been recommended, by Mr. Decatur, to Commodore Preble; by whom he was promoted. Of his subsequent progress, we have little information, until the affair of lake Champlain.

It had become an object of solicitude with the beligerent parties on the northern frontiers, to obtain the superiority on the lakes. Indeed, the success of the land operations was considered to be entirely dependent on that of the marine. Commodore Perry had already established our dominion on lake Erie; and that of lake Ontario had been successfully disputed by Commodore Chauncey with Sir James Yeo. The states of Vermont and New York were threatened from lake Champlain. To counteract hostile attempts from this quarter, the command of the American squadron on this lake was entrusted to Commodore Macdonough; while the defence of Plattsburg, depended upon the exertions of Gen. Macomb and his gallant little army; and in September 1814, an attack was anticipated upon these youthful commanders. Accordingly, on the 11th of that month, the expected event took place.

For several days the enemy had been on his way to Plattsburg, by land and water, and it was well understood that an attack would be made at the same time by his land and naval forces. Com. Macdonough determined to await at anchor, the approach of the latter.

At 8 o'clock in the morning, the look-out boat announced the approach of the enemy. At 9 he anchored in the line ahead, at about 300 yards distance from the American line: his flag ship, the Confiance, under Com. Downie, was opposed to Commodore Macdonough's ship the Saratoga; the brig Linnet was opposed to the Eagle, Capt. Robert Henckley;—the enemies' galleys, thirteen in number, to the schooner, sloop, and a division of galleys, one of his sloops assisting his ship and brig; the others assisting his galleys: the remaining American galleys being with the Saratoga, and Eagle.

In this situation, the whole force on both sides became engaged; the Saratoga suffering much from the heavy fire of the Confiance, though the fire of the former was very destructive to her antagonist. The Ticonderoga, Lieutenant Commander Cassin, gallantly sustained her full share of the action. At half past ten o'clock, the Eagle, not being able to bring her guns to bear, cut her cable and anchored in a more eligible position, between the Saratoga and the Ticonderoga, where she very much annoyed the enemy, but unfortunately left her commodore exposed to a galling fire from the enemy's brig. The guns of the Saratoga on the starboard side, being nearly all dismounted or not manageable, a stern anchor was let go, the bower cable cut, and the ship winded with a fresh broadside on the Confiance, which soon after surrendered.—The broadside of the Saratoga was then sprung to bear on the brig, which surrendered in about fifteen minutes after.

The sloop that was opposed to the Eagle, had struck some time before, and drifted down the line; the sloop which was with the enemy's galleys, having struck also. Three of them were sunk, and the others pulled off. While Macdonough's galleys were in the act of obeying the signal to follow them, all the vessels were reported to him to be in a sinking state; it then became necessary to countermand the signal to the galleys, and order their men to the pumps.

At this time there was not a mast standing in either squadron, in a condition to hold up a sail; the lower rigging being nearly all shot away, hung down along the masts.

The action lasted without intermission two hours and twenty minutes. The Confiance had one hundred and five round shot in her hull. Her shot passed principally over the heads of her antagonists, the hull of the Saratoga received but fifty-five shot, and there were not at the close of the action, twenty whole hammocks in the nettings. The Confiance had 199 men killed; and one of the captured sloops, the Club, had but five men alive. The British Commodore Downie was killed at the first broadside. Commodore Macdonough was three times knocked down, by the splinters and falling spars and blocks, but escaped with trifling injury. The Saratoga was twice set on fire by hot shot from the enemy's ship.

The following is the statement of the killed and wounded on board the American squadron, and of the force engaged on each side; taken from Commodore Macdonough's letter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated, "United States ship Saratoga, at anchor off Plattsburg, September 13, 1814," accompanying the flags taken from the enemy.

An attack by the British army, under the governor general of the Canadas, Sir George Prevost, upon General Macomb, commanding at Plattsburg, was made simultaneously with that of the British squadron on the lake, upon Commodore Macdonough.

Sir George having collected all the disposable force in Lower Canada, with a view of conquering the country as far as Crown Point and Ticonderoga, entered the territories of the United States on the first of September, with fourteen thousand men, and occupied the village of Champlain. As was before intimated, the co-operation of the naval force constituted an essential part of the arrangement. The consequence was, that instantly on the discomfiture of the fleet, the army retired with great precipitation, having lost two thousand five hundred, in killed, wounded, and missing.

Thus, by the valor and conduct of two young commanders, joined to the exertion of the forces under their command, the enemy was expelled from lake Champlain and its vicinity, his cherished enterprise miscarried, and the prospect of future success was rendered more distant and hopeless than ever.

This victory was announced to the department of war, by Commodore Macdonough, on the day it was obtained, in the following brief and modest communication: "The Almighty has been pleased to grant us a signal victory on lake Champlain, in the capture of one frigate, one brig, and two sloops of war of the enemy."

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Fisher's Drawing-Room Scrap-Book (London) for 1836, contains an exquisite portrait of youthful loveliness entitled 'The Golden Age,' to which the Quaker Minstrel, Bernard Barton, has appended the following characteristic stanzas:

I MARVEL not that the artist's pride,
When he finish'd this lovely page,
With Innocence, Beauty, and Youth supplied,
Should have named it 'The Golden Age.'
'Tis the portrait of one in her girlhood's prime,
Unclouded by Care, and unsullied by Crime.

And an age so blissful, and pure, and bright,
In a weary world like ours,
With its spirits as gay, and its heart as light,
As a butterfly round Spring flowers,
May bring forward tides manifold,
A bearing so happy and high to hold.

'Tis the age when the heart in its blithesome glee
Can at each glad impulse bound;
When all that the young before them see
Has a halo of beauty round;
When grief is pangless, and joy is pure,
And the whispers of Hope seem true and sure.

It may chance in a volume like this, design'd
For the joyous young and fair,
That these hasty and artless lines may find
A reader as free from care,
As lovely a type of Life's Golden Age,
As the being portray'd in the perishing page.

Maiden! think not I would cloud thy brow
By a bidding of future ill;
Or that bosom which throbs so lightly now
With a warning voice would chill;
Unworthy the bard of his calling high,
Who would wake in that heart a causeless sigh.

'Tis the morning of Life? Be blithe and gay
As the birds which around thee sing;
Yet remember that morn is but part of the day,
That evening's shadows must bring,
And the darkness of night must soon follow that eve
When the fast-fading twilight hath taken its leave.

But fear thou not! Let thy morning be spent
So that eve may its course approve;
And when stars come forth in the firmament,
Thou shalt view them with hope and love;
And mark unappall'd the gathering night
Waiting a morning of endless light.

'Tis the Spring-time of being; yet bear in mind
Its Summer will soon be here;
That its autumn will linger not long behind,
When the flowers and leaves turn sere;
And that Winter will come, which comes to all,
When the flower must die, and the leaf must fall.

So guard the blossoms thou bearest now,
That when Summer shall be o'er,
The fruitage of Autumn on every bough
May prove thy Winter store;
And when Time's brief seasons no changes bring,
Thou shalt know an everlasting Spring.

Now in thy youth beseech of Him
Who giveth, upbraiding not,
That his light in thy heart become not dim,
And his love be unforget;
And thy God, in the darkest of days, will be Greenness, and beauty, and strength, to thee!

THE FIERY VAULT.

A TALE OF ITALY.

"The story's still extant, and written in very choice Italian,"— Hamlet.

VENICE! The word frights editorial ringlets from their place, the revising pen flutters with revived terror, and the ink rolls in troubled waves from its silver stand. The echo of a hundred tales rings in the ear—gondolas, red masks, daggers, cowls, tortures, and poison, float in an undistinguished mass before the eye. The Sea Cybele fresh from the ocean—would she had left her historians at the bottom!—But let us see.

"Truly, my son, thou sayest rightly; there will be feasting, and music, and mirth, in the proud palazzo to-morrow. But by the wings of the lion—" and old Carruchio paused, his eye fixed on the white towers of the Morentali mansion, but not in listlessness.

"The duke, my master, is a gallant gentleman, father, and liberal; and I warrant me, has done wild deeds. I have often, when steering his gondola, seen him glance among female faces as though—"

"Silence, my son, would better become a faithful servant. Nay, were the duke to hear thee judging his looks, there are warmer places for tattling spies than even these stones at noon. Forget not thy friend, Miollano, who for merely recognizing a trinket in a maiden's hair, had the pleasure, as every body believes, of shrieking out of his life in one of yon fiery prisons."

"True, father, but his master was not the Duke Antonio di Rezola, nor, after all, is it quite certain that it was Miollano's scorched body that we fished up."

"Santi! if thou thinkest the doubt worth solving, the burning chamber is still there. For me, I love a cooler abode. Farewell, I see a fare yonder;" and the old gondolier stepped upon the prow of his dark and elegant boat, a vigorous effort brought her round, and in a few moments he was far from the marble stair. His companion, a muscular young man, with features strikingly handsome, yet on a second look bearing a sinister expression, removed his broad slouched cap from a brow of bronze, and fanning himself therewith, soliloquized.

"Dungeons, and death—mayhap it may be so, yet I am free to think. That same proud Count of Morentali, too whose daughter is to wed Lorenzo the duellist, might thank me for keeping his secret. By St. Mark, I am inclined to let him know his obligation. He would, perhaps, repay me with a lodging under the eave of the Three, as he favored poor Miollano. Truly the prospect is pleasant, but how am I to blame! A grandee visits a woman who lives near me, doubtless on an errand of charity; nay, I am sure of it, for he gave her money, and what of it? If, indeed—"

"If what, friend?" said a third person, advancing.
"If I could get a fare this morning before my hour of attending my employer, it would lighten my heart, and load my pocket."

"What noble of Venice is happy in the service of so prudent and veracious a gondolier?"
"He must be a stranger here who knows not the badge of the Duke di Rezola."

"I am one," said the masked speaker; "I would see somewhat of your city; give a cast of your office along the most notable streets, if you call them so, and enlighten me as to some of the owners of these gorgeous piles."

They are floating on the deep blue waters; the stranger reclines under the half-drawn awning.

"Who inhabits that beautiful building?" said he, as the bark glides near one of the palaces of Venice. The stone front, interspersed with marble-edged openings, long and narrow; the first and second stories centred each by a large window, richly ornamented with arabesque tracery; the terrace projecting a few feet from two doors appropriated to visitors, ascended by short stairs, the two other entrances at opposite sides, level with the water which flowed into them to dark platforms beyond, one for the domestics and humble citizens, the other for the more secret movements of the master of the mansion; the lofty turret-looking chimney, and the shaded verandahs, bespoke the haughty abode of a wealthy noble.

"That is the palace of Count Morentali."

"I have heard the name, I think. What character does he bear?"

"It is not for such as myself, signore, to talk of those so far above me."

"Nay, thy words need not flow so niggardly to me—What care I for the Count or his affairs? I ask but for curiosity, and methinks thou mightest oblige me."

"You can be silent, signore?"

"I shall be forgetful, in a week, of thy whole history, which is the same thing. There is an earnest of my secrecy."

"Thanks, signore," said the gondolier, taking the piece of gold. "All I can tell you of this count is, that he is considered haughty and cruel. We know he is rich; and that he is merciless, was shown in the fate of a fellow-boatman, who, for some trifling indiscretion of the tongue, was put to a horrible death in a dungeon of the Council."

"How is that known?" said the stranger.

"I myself, with my father, dragged up the burned and mangled body from the canal."

"Were there witnesses of your discovery? Such a sight is not often seen, I should think."

"None, signore; for we speedily replaced the corpse, not choosing to meddle with the business of others."

"A prudent course, friend. Play, is the count married?"

"His lady died many years ago, in giving birth to a son and daughter. The young countess is now in the palace, as beautiful as Venus. Her wedding is to take place to-morrow, to Lorenzo di Castiglia, the duellist, as he is called."

"Ah! and the son?"

"That part of the tale is most surprising, signore; the child disappeared when about three years old, and has never since been heard of. Some say that he must have fallen into the canal, and that seems most probable."

"Do you ever see the count abroad?"

"Not frequently, signore; the last time I saw him was a few days ago, and then by accident."

"How? and where?"

"You seem interested, signore; and as a stranger, I do not fear telling what to a Venetian ear it would be hazardous to disclose. I live in a street to the right of yon church—the Church of St. Mary—and nearly opposite reside an old woman and her daughter. The girl is very beautiful, and the count, I suppose thinks so; for I saw him enter the house a few evenings since, where he remained nearly an hour."

"How could you know him? I thought the fashion of Venice was to go masked on such adventures."

"So did the count, signore; but as he was leaving the house, in putting up his purse, his mask fell off. He seemed terribly angry at the chance, and instantly restored it."

"No wonder. Men of his age and rank should be careful. Can a stranger have access to the noble?"

"Not usually, signore; but if you were to introduce yourself as wishing to be present at the wedding of the Lady Giulia, the count's courtesy might be taxed to welcome you."

"I am determined to try friend. So turn about, and make for the palace. Here is for thy pains."

A second piece of gold chinked in the pouch of the gondolier, as he dexterously swung round his boat, and a succession of vigorous strokes again brought them to the mansion.

"Where will you enter, signora?"

"Oh! the servants' gate. I must begin modestly."

The gondolier shot through the dark passage, and reached the landing platform. The stranger sprang from the boat.

"You will ascend those stairs, signora, and turn to your right, where you will find a porter who can bring you to the count."

"He thanks you."

The door above flew open, and a strong light fell upon the stranger's form. He removed the mask, and the terrified gondolier quailed before the sneer of the Count Morentali. The next moment the gates through which they had entered, closed, the noble waved his hand, and the unfortunate boatman found himself a prisoner.

"Remove the gondola, and place the fellow in the dungeon," and Morentali ascended the stairs without deigning another glance at his victim.

The Lady Giulia sat in her chamber. Before an enormous mirror, in a rich gold and flower-enamelled frame stood an exquisitely inlaid marble table, on which reposed the awful instruments of the toilet of an Italian damsel.—The odour of several delicate plants filled the apartment, a young girl rested on a low couch near her mistress, mingling the sound of a guitar with the plaintive notes of an oriental ballad, while another maiden assisted the bride.—Both, seen alone, had been esteemed pretty, but by the side of their lovely lady were forgotten. If the poet's dream of the incarnation of beauty were ever fulfilled, it was in person of Giulia. Proudly lofty was her snowy brow, which had seemed even haughty, but for the soft large blue eyes below, which carried their eloquent pleading into the very soul. Her long, glossy, dark hair now hung loosely around her face, heightening the effect of an exquisite complexion. She raised to her ruby lips a cross of pearls, which were far surpassed by those her kiss disclosed. A dark robe, which she wore at the toilette, left bare her lustrous arm and shoulder, and flowed to the little feet resting uncovered on a velvet cushion. She raised her hand, its tiny form is hidden in her ringlets, she leans upon her arm and weeps.

And why flow the tears of Giulia Morentali? Are they for her bridal on the morrow? Why should the ceremony, the thought of which, and of the feast and ball to follow, turns the heads of half the maidens of Venice, moisten the eye of the bride? Perchance those tears are the usual tribute of love to modesty—perchance the lady thinks of the horrible screams which sounded on her ear, as, some months before, when, with a party of companions, she visited the Doge's palace, she had missed her way, and wandered alone towards a part of the building unknown to her. Perhaps the agonized supplication she heard, "One drop of water for the love of God!" was not forgotten. Perhaps the bridal dress had not been made to please the wearer. We will not waste time in conjecture.

"Do not weep, signora, it will make your eyes red.—Let me sing you a merry song."

"You make so much noise with your guitar," said the other maiden, "that you have given my lady the head-ache."

"Trust me, Claudine," said the laughing songstress, "it is rather your great hands in the signora's hair."

"Your's are not so small, Maria, but they can hold a love-letter," retorted the elder; "which, I thank the saints, mine never d.d."

"I believe you, Claudine; but father Anselmo says, that a person who has had no temptation, deserves no praise."

Claudine was far too dignified to reply; she tossed up her head, and having completed adorning her lady's head, inquired whether in signora was satisfied.

"It is very well, Claudine; but as I shall not leave the palazzo to-day, you need not stay to dress me. I will send for you in a short time. Maria, you will remain with me."

"And now, signora," said the latter, as the door closed, "how can you be so melancholy on the eve of your wedding? I'm sure if I were going to be married I should do nothing but laugh, and dance, and sing, for a month. Pray signora, tell me, are you unhappy?"

"O Maria, if I might tell you!" and the lady burst into a violent flood of tears. Her attendant caught the infection, and clasping her mistress in her arms, they mingled their sorrows.

The Count Morentali entered the apartment.

"What! daughter, weeping, and at such a time as this! For shame, for shame, up and be dressed, or the gondola races will be over, and the chains awarded, before Giulia di Morentali has left her chamber."

"I cannot join the party at St. Angelo to-day, my father, nor would you wish it, I am sure."

"Not wish it, when my word was pledged to Lorenzo that I would bring you to the terrace myself, as the only means of preventing his fetching you in person; which you so earnestly desired he might not do. By St. Mark, I think thou art offended that he has not disobeyed thee—a maiden had rather be surprised by a young gallant, than by an old father, perhaps."

"Dear father, do not ask me to leave the house to-day."

"Ask thee! faith, not I; asking twice suits not my humour. Either be dressed and accompany me immediately, or Lorenzo shall do his errand himself."

"What I cannot do for you, my father, I will not do for another," said Giulia, with the flashing eye which spoke her Italian birth.

"Pretty, forsooth—and dutiful too," returned Morentali, with a half laugh; "but even with all, by your leave, we will try our youth's skill at persuasion—an art he may not need long," he added, waving his hand, as he departed.

"He may not, indeed, as far as poor Giulia is concerned," said the lady; "but he will surely come, and we must prepare for his reception."

A forced smile was on her lip, but her eye swam in moisture. We will leave her for the present.

Terrible indeed, was the secret council chamber of the Doge of Venice. A large and lofty room, lighted not by the sun, but by several lamps carefully arranged, to throw their strong lustre away from the judgment seats, and upon a central point, surmounted by a low massive rail, was rendered utterly impervious to sound, by means of doubly quilted arras, and treble doom. The floor was thickly carpeted, save in the space alluded to, which was about twelve feet in diameter, and appeared to be boarded. Within this room deeds were whispered to have been done, at the mention of which human blood is freezingly arrested. A concealed door behind the arras led to a smaller apartment, where every engine for wrenching the joints, crushing the flesh, and grinding the marrow of their fellow mortals, had been stored by the relentless agents of Venetian tyranny. Those boards surrounded by the rail could be raised, and the half-breathing body, which had undergone the agonies of that chamber, was thrown into an abyss of appalling depth, at whose bottom, it was rumored, years before a machine had been placed, which the falling mass set in motion, and by which it was mangled to atoms. A winding staircase, entered from a corner, also hidden by the tapestry, conducted down to a spot where a more hideous torture than all was prepared. A small low roofed room was there, built entirely of iron, not sufficiently large to enable the inmate to stand erect, but allowing the full range of limb in every other direction. Below was a furnace. Stripped to the skin, the victim was led thither, and though in utter darkness, ventilation was supplied him.—For some hours, perchance, he was thus left, until he began to dread a perpetual imprisonment. But the atmosphere grows more confined, still more so, and the blood is thrown violently to his head. Air is again admitted, he breathes again,—it must have been a fancy. But no, this time there is no deception, the heat is stifling, the floor below him is unbearable, he raises himself on his extremities, he raves, he screams for mercy. Anon his scorched limbs become blistered, and writhings and shrieks proclaim his excruciating agony. A few minutes, and all must cease in death. No. The tormentor's craft has been better taught. Suddenly the iron floor is drawn from beneath him, its place is supplied by a slab of the coldest marble, while gushes of icy water from above fall upon his burning frame. The transition is exquisite, almost too delicious for mortal bearing. For a time he lies in semi-insensibility, but not long. The chill comes over him, and the relief becomes another torment. Then is accomplished the crowning efforts of the fiends, who know too well the indescribable effect of the unexpected substitution of one agony for another. The marble bed is drawn away, and the wretch is writhing on a red-hot floor. Then scream follows scream, and the body is drawn into every form and posture conceivable, with terrible swiftness. Malice has now done its utmost, a few more struggles, and a few more groans, and a blackened and undistinguishable corpse is withdrawn from its fiery cavern, and hurled through a trap-door near, eventually to find its way into one of the canals of Venice. Such had been the fate of that Miollano, whom the gondoliers have mentioned as one of the last victims of Count Morentali. Who is to be the next?

The count sat alone in the secret council chamber, reclining with Italian indolence upon a richly cushioned couch. The lamps were lighted, and beneath them stood two half-dressed muscular men, in visors, the executioners of his pleasure. "Bring in the hound!" and the ill-fated gondolier, Speranza, heavily manacled, stood before Morentali.

"So, thou art here. Hast any more tales of the cruel and merciless count to tell?"

The prisoner, pale as death, muttered only, "My lord! my lord!" and convulsive breathings seemed to drown his voice.

"Thou shalt know another," continued Morentali, in the same cold, sneering tone, "ere long. Pity that thou wilt not be able to tell it."

"My lord? remember—your promise—"

"Was of secrecy, I believe; and it shall be kept. Look around, whom dost thou fear can overhear thy stories of the count, or thy screams which may follow them?"

"Recollect, my lord, I am servant to the Duke di Regola."

"I do not forget that; on the contrary, it shall add to thy reward. For the rest, dost thou think Antonio, though beardless, will discover thee here? Should he indeed recognize thee floating before his palazzo, perhaps he might be amazed, to prevent which surprise thou shalt find thy way down the abyss below thee, which, I think, does not lead to the canal."

"Oh! mercy, my good lord, as you hope for it yourself hereafter, as you—"

"So! menaces and remembrances having failed, thou wouldst now try prayers—'tis well, but address them elsewhere, while thy worthy friends on each side remove thy superfluous dress, preparatory to a pleasure thou hast not dreamed of."

At a sign from the count, some of the chains were removed, with the upper portion of Speranza's garment.—Morentali then spoke again.

"If there is any peculiar torment thou wouldst select, name it, and we, to the best of our poor abilities, will humor thee. There is the rack, or the screw, or the sharp pendulum, or the bath of molten lead. Or thou mayst prefer the barrel of razors. Or, as thou art a man of a friendly disposition, there is the burning chamber, in which thy companion Miollano some few weeks since expiated the crime of noticing a jewel in a lady's hair, as being once the property of a Venetian noble. Thou didst find the body, and therefore knowest something of the sentence he underwent. Truly he did our machinery credit; his cries were loud, and his agonized struggles and contortions vigorous. I myself was present at the operation of reducing him to a cinder, and have seldom been more delighted.—What sayst thou, wilt try that room, in a spirit of friendly emulation?"

During the count's speech, the gondolier stood as a man half awakened, but at its conclusion, as the noble's taunting laugh rang on his ear, he staggered from his companions, and sank at the edge of the rail in complete insensibility. Terror had benumbed him.

"Nay," said Morentali, "twere hardly worth while to submit the fool to the torture in this state. Remove him, let the surgeon attend, and see him prepared for my visit this night."

We will, briefly trace so much of the life and situation of the count as is necessary to elucidate this careful and veracious history. He had been raised from low rank to sudden nobility, when young, by the rapid successive deaths of the various heirs to the title which occurred with such unexampled speed as to excite widely-spread notice, and almost suspicion. But the glittering circlet having once wreathed his brow, the new count effectually silenced all slanderous tongues—some by the splendor and liberality of his entertainments, others by a more certain method. He married a young lady of great beauty, and the gorgeous nuptial ceremony was for a month the theme of Venice, but the countess dying within a year, the noble widower retired in a great measure from the pursuit of pleasure to that of ambition. Wealth and intrigue here, as elsewhere, crowned his wishes with full success, and Morentali became a member of the Council of Ten, and, as men whispered with fearful caution, of another tribunal none dared to name in public. One misfortune only had befallen the count, and, independently of its own severity, it became the more galling from novelty. His children, in giving birth to whom their mother had been sacrificed, were one day playing on the terrace before the mansion, when their attendant's eye was withdrawn from her charge by a passing gondola. On again reverting to the terrace, to her unbounded dismay the young Adolpho had disappeared, his terrified sister knew not where. Every search was made without success, the boy was never again heard of, and the general rumor of the count's power and severity produced such an effect on the female attendant, that in a moment of agony she threw herself into the canal, the noble's last hope of eliciting information as to the fate of his child perishing with her. There was one trivial circumstance, however, which, years afterwards, when his daughter had grown up into womanhood, and the name of his son was all but forgotten, had produced a powerful impression on his mind. Deprived of his wife, it was not surprising that the count should, in the pride of manhood, and with every advantage around him, occasionally seek female society, although he abstained from forming a second matrimonial connexion.

For other purposes than those of enjoying air, or of dispensing charity, was Morentali supposed to visit the more retired streets of Venice.

For some time a singular and costly jewel was observed to glitter in the hair of a very pretty black-eyed damsel, residing in the strada, now known by the name of St. Ginseppe. The fair wearer seemed by no means desirous of concealing her ornament, and one evening as she wandered along the bank of a neighboring canal, shooting those roguish glances so well on the Adriatic, a young gondolier, who accidentally approached her, incautiously exclaimed, "Saints of heaven! I could risk my soul on the identity of that jewel with—" and the rough hand of a friend which was suddenly placed upon his lips, did not prevent the remark from being overheard. That night Miollano found himself in one of the dungeons of the Council of Ten.—He was subsequently examined by Morentali, who appeared to take an interest in the trinket, but the gondolier could give no satisfactory replies, save that he persisted in recognizing the jewel, though unable to say to whom he supposed it to belong, or upon what his suspicion were grounded. His silence was judged to be contumacious, and a severe application of the rack ensued, but without better success. It was then considered that he had seen too much for liberty, and at the instigation of the count, who witnessed the perpetration, he underwent the horrible agonies and death of the Fiery Vault. His fate, in itself, would have produced no effect upon Morentali, who was far too much inured to similar scenes for pity or remorse, but a short time after the occurrence, a thought arose in the noble's mind too startlingly hideous to be borne. For days and nights it never left him, until the uncertainty could not be sustained, and as a last resource, the haughty Venetian resolved to seek a celebrated magician, or astrologer, who resided in a wing of the Doge's palace, retained for the purpose of imposing a more fearful and undefined idea, of the power and knowledge of the Council upon the popular mind, than could be preserved by mere human agency. But the skill of Columbo Asprenici, did not exist in report alone. Difficult of access, even the count was compelled to request as a favor, admittance to the astrologer. It was towards midnight, when wrapped in a large cloak, armed, but unattended, Morentali entered the awful abode, around which the very air seemed filled with terror.

Few of the appendages, with which romance and superstition have invested the communer with other worlds, were to be seen in the small and gloomy apartment where the magician pursued his tremendous studies. The chamber or rather vault, to which name its stone walls and arched roof would better entitle it, was reached by the count after he had traversed several spacious halls, and darkened galleries, admirably adapted to secure seclusion, not by gate and barrier, but by the far more powerful agency of fear.—The calculating mind of Morentali armed him with courage as he pursued his dreary way, nor was the astrologer's reception of his visitor such as to strike awe, or even unusual respect. A slightly formed, middle-aged man, with a countenance of delicate and precise outline, shaded by the tuit and moustache of the age, simply but neatly apparelled in a dark dress, rose to meet the Italian noble, with the air rather of a retired and satisfied man of the world, than with that which might have been expected in a sage of such undoubted fame. A transparent globe, in the centre of which a light seemed glowing, a few mathematical instruments scattered around among numberless papers and parchments, with a low black marble column, inscribed with foreign characters, were all the uncommon features of the room. Behind Asprenici was a large window, but no moonlight was visible through it, although the queen of heaven was silvering all Venice as Morentali entered the palace. The count removed his mask, and bowed, and the astrologer first spoke.

"To what fortunate circumstance is the humble student to ascribe the visit of the noblest senator in Venice?"

"After craving pardon for my intrusion, learned sir, I have to beg from you the assistance which none other in the world can give me."

"Even had I known nothing of the Count di Morentali, the hospitality I have received in your glorious city would compel me to do all the little in my power for any of her sons. Speak, signore, and my service is with you."

"Learned Asprenici, to one to whom the past is so well known as to yourself, I have only to name an incident, to bring it to recollection. A short time ago an unhappy man, for an insult to myself, died in a dungeon of this palace. In his examination he named a jewel, with which strange ideas are connected in my imagination. If it please you, I would have the whole event cleared up, that I may at least know my doom."

"The victim bore the name of —?"

"Miollano, among his fellows," replied the count, in a stifled voice.

"The jewel was given by yourself, signore, to a damsel of the city," said the astrologer, with a half-smile; "from whence did you obtain it?"

"It was among many that have long been in my family. I have no particular recollection of it, however, but took it for my purpose, as being elegant and of small value."

"Thus far, signore, my knowledge extends, but beyond this the answers of another must be sought, if you are resolved on gaining the information. I would caution you, here, against pursuing the inquiry, for it will be fearful in its following out, and its end may be fatal. Can you not rest satisfied with the belief, which appears to me most probable, that Miollano had made an empty boast, which obstinacy prevented him from retracting, or that he was totally mistaken in supposing that he knew the trinket?"

"I have not sought you, Asprenici, for the mere opinion of a lawyer, and I am not to be terrified by the dangers of the pursuit. I pray you immediately to satisfy me by those means which you alone possess. I will not offend you by naming the reward," added the count, as he placed carelessly a heavy purse on the table.

"I have said, signore, that I will obey you, but beware of shrinking when he appears, who must answer the questions you must yourself propose. Be seated for the present, and be silent."

Columbo Asprenici arose, and from a box near him took a small silver dagger, sheathless, and exquisitely chased. Retaining this in his left hand, he proceeded with the other to withdraw from the same cabinet a light long chain of dark metal, occasionally studded with crimson spots, which glistened like spangles, as the links were shaken. The astrologer, attaching one end of the chain to the upper part of the black column before mentioned, placed the other below the transparent globe, which continued to glow with internal fire. His next movement was to a corner of the apartment, from whence in a few moments came the sound of an enormous bell, and it appeared to Morentali that sparkles of light were bursting from Asprenici's hand, as it struck the wall. If so, they were speedily extinct, and the magician returned to the globe, and with the silver dagger touched the chain near its centre. The flame in the globe was instantly extinguished, an appalling roar, neither of thunder nor animal, ensued, and the vault was for an instant in utter darkness. Then a light green flame arose from the summit of the column, and its inscriptions were seen in characters of fire. As this subsided, the same horrible roar was again heard, and the chamber was once more dark. The astrologer took his guest's hand, and guiding him to the column, placed him at a short distance from the window. As Asprenici raised the latter, the dreadful sound arose for the third time, and Morentali gazed forth upon an open plain. It appeared to be night, but there was no moon in heaven. All seemed as objects we behold in a feverish dream.

"Now be firm, and fear not," whispered Columbo.

A wide expanse of dark blue sky was before them, and it was without a cloud or star. A rustling, as of dried leaves before autumn winds, commenced, and gradually increased. Then meteors danced before the eyes of the count, and successively expired. Two long lines of red light, apparently descending from above the building, and reaching the plain at a distance, were next visible. The space between them became filled with various colored fires, until a broad belt was formed from the heaven to the earth. The deafening bell sounded—once—and the lights changed their places among themselves, glowing with the utmost brilliancy; twice—and a dark form was seen to pass rapidly down the fiery arch, to its termination in the distance; thrice—and the fearful, yet half-defined shape rushed rapidly to the window, as the appalling roar again echoed around. Morentali dared not look at the hideous object, but enveloped his face in his ample cloak. Asprenici again whispered.

"Speak, boldly and to the purpose; three questions only may be heard."

In a faltering voice, the once haughty noble asked, while he trembled for the answer, "Does my son live?"

"He is dead," was the reply, in a low, thrilling, unearthly tone, which penetrated to the soul. The count was silent, his last hopes were blighted, and he half-turned away, with a deep sigh, when his companion reminded him that two more questions were yet to be demanded. In a firmer voice he inquired, "What jewel was it that I gave Julia Venyas?"

"Thy wife wore it on the last day she ever wore ornament."

"How did Miollano recognize it?" said the count, in a tone of but little concern.

The answer was given, and the Italian nobleman, with a shriek of the direst anguish, sank insensible upon the ground. * * * * *

Lorenzo di Castiglia led his beautiful bride from her wedding gondola to the steps of the church of Saint Anne. In the prime of life, with a noble person and large wealth, all admitted that the bridegroom was worthy of Giulia di Morentali. The soubriquet of the duellist, which he had acquired, told of the numberless exploits of the sword, and the chamber of many a Venetian lady might have testified his skill in the science of love. His influence, too, was great, and it was this which had given him favor in the eyes of Morentali, before all the other suitors for his daughter's hand. In obedience to her father's commands, Giulia had accepted the offer of Castiglia, though with a heavy heart, for though her virgin affections had not centred elsewhere, she abhorred the man for whom she was about to swear to love. The bridegroom was not blind to her feelings, but he cared not for them, the rather that he intended to put her affections as a wife to but little proof, for he married principally because the fancy seized him, and possibly because his libertine career had in some measure rendered it needful, even in Venice, that he should retrieve a little of his reputation. Such were the feelings of those who stood that lovely morning, at the head of a magnificent bridal train, on the steps of the church of Saint Anne, awaiting the appearance of the Count Morentali.

The count arrived, and the procession entered the church. The organ poured out a full tide of melody, the censers waved, the pennons glistened, and the bridegroom reached the altar, with his lovely companion. A wide semi-circle was formed by the friends of each, and the priest stood forth to record their vows. Morentali advanced and confronted them.

"Stay, father, I have a word to say to our friends, and to those children too, ere thou joinest their hands. Lorenza and Giulia, and you around, listen. It was this day month that a gondolier, named Miollano, was seized by the agents of the Council at my command, and brought before me, in the torture chamber of the palace, for the crime of recognizing this jewel. Daughter, have you ever beheld it before?"

The lady Giulia received the trinket, and burst into tears. Her father proceeded.

"Ha! thou knowest it. But, my friends, I am to inform you that it once belonged to my wife, and that I gave it to an easy damsel of this city, for good reasons, and from whom I have regained it. Miollano saw it in her possession, but as he refused, when before me, to say why he recollected it, I broke every limb in his body on the rack, and then roasted him to death in a fiery vault."

The effect which this horrible communication produced, delivered as it was by Morentali, with a cool and almost flippant manner, may be imagined. Lorenzo was the first to speak.

"Methinks, signore, this tale were better fitted for the secret archives of the Council, than for the holy church, at least of all is it suited to the ear of Lady Giulia."

"Why not, Lord of Castiglia, seeing the sufferer was my son, and her brother?"

A loud and maniac yell followed these words. The Count di Morentali pressed a pistol to his temples, and the report mingled with the dying cry of Giulia, as she sunk, broken-hearted into the arms of Castiglia.

From the Southern Literary Messenger.

The following beautiful reply to the stanzas of Mr. Wilde, published in the first number of the Messenger, is attributed to Mrs. Buckley, the wife of a distinguished citizen of Baltimore, a lady whose fine taste and poetic capacity are most happily displayed in these touching lines. The answer is a very perfect counterpart of Mr. Wilde's stanzas, and it we are called on to decide upon their relative merits we do not know which of the two would most demand our admiration.

ANSWER,

TO "MY LIFE IS LIKE THE SUMMER ROSE."

The dews of night may fall from Heaven,
Upon the wither'd rose's bed,
And tears of fond regret be given,
To mourn the virtues of the dead:
Yet morning's sun the dews will dry,
And tears will fade from sorrow's eye,
Affection's pangs be lull'd to sleep,
And even love forget to weep.

The tree may mourn its fallen leaf,
And autumn winds bewail its bloom,
And friends may heave the sigh of grief,
O'er those who sleep within the tomb:
Yet soon will spring renew the flowers,
And time will bring more smiling hours;
In friendship's heart all grief will die,
And even love forget to sigh.

The sea may on the desert shore
Lament each trace it bears away;
The lonely heart its grief may pour
O'er cherish'd friendship's fast decay;
Yet when all trace is lost and gone,
The waves dance bright and gaily on:
Thus soon affection's bonds are torn,
And even love forgets to mourn.

THE FORTUNES OF THE MAID OF ARC,
DEATH OF LA PUCELLE.

Warwick—And hark ye, sirs; because she is a maid,
Spare for no faggots, let there be enough;
Place barrels of pitch upon the fatal stake,
That so her torture may be shortened.

Shakspeare.

Three months had elapsed—since, in the flower of youth and beauty, in the flush of conquest, and in the accompaniment of her own, or all her country's aspirations, the Maid of Arc had fallen, through the envious treachery of the Count de Flavy,—he who had shut the gates, and raised the bridges of the Compiègne against her—into the hands of John de Ligny-Luxembourg,—since he, false gentleman and recreant knight, had sold the heroine of France—sold her, despite the prayers, despite the tears and the reproaches of his high-minded lady,—sold her for base and sordid ruse to the unsparing loemen. Three months had elapsed of wearisome confinement—not in a guarded chamber;—not with the blessed light of heaven streaming, albeit through grates of iron, into her prison-chambers;—not with the miserable semblance of freedom that might be fancied to exist in the permission to pace the narrow floor;—not with the wonted dungeon-fare of the worst malefactor—not with the consoling religion, vouchsafed even to the dying murderer;—not even with the wretched boon of solitude! No—in a dungeon many a foot beneath the surface of the frozen earth, with nought of air, but what descended through a deep-cut funnel; with nought of light, but what was furnished by a pale and winking lamp; loaded with a weight of fetters, that would have bowed the strongest man-at-arms to child-like helplessness; bound with a massive chain about her waist, linking her to the rocky floor; led on the bread of bitterness, her thirst slaked with the waters of sorrow; her feelings outraged by the continual presence of a brutal soldier, violating the privacies, alike by day and night, of her sad condition; the noble girl had languished without a hope of rescue, without a dream of liberty or life; taunted by her foes, and persecuted, deserted by her friends and utterly forgotten. Yet, though her frame was shrunken with disease and worn with famine, though her bright eyes were dimmed with weariness and watching, her dark locks streaked, as it were, by premature old age, her stature bent to half its former height, and her whole appearance deprived of that high and lustrous beauty that had of yore been peculiarly her own; her confidence in Him, whom she believed, erroneously perhaps, but not therefore the less fervently, to have sent her on that especial mission which she had so gloriously accomplished—her confidence in that Being whose decrees are, of a truth, inscrutable—was all unshaken. If she had formerly displayed the courage to inflict, she now exhibited, and yet more forcibly, the nobler courage to endure. If she had proved herself the equal of men in the mêlée of active valor, she now showed herself to be endowed in no secondary degree with the calm fortitude of her sex, the uncomplaining, patient resignation to inevitable pain or inconsolable affliction which is so much harder to put on than the bold front which rushes forth to meet the coming danger. Day after day she had been led forth from her cold dungeon, to undergo examination, to hear accusations the most inconceivably absurd, to confute arguments, the confutation of which aided her cause in nothing; for when did prejudice, or—yet worse than prejudice—fanatic bigotry, hear the voice of reason, and hear it to conviction? Night after night she had been led back to the chilly atmosphere of that dark cell, hopeless of rescue or acquittal; harrassed by persecution, feeble of frame, and and sick at heart, yet high and firm in her uncompromising spirit as when she first rode forth, with consecrated blade and banner, to raise the siege of Orleans. From the very commencement of her protracted trial she had felt a sure foreknowledge of its termination! She had known, that in the hearts of her judges her doom was written down already; yet, with a calm confidence that would have well become a Socrates, nay, or the apostle of a holier creed, she had striven to prove her innocence, to posterity at least if not to the passing day—to eternity at least if not to time! When reviled, she answered not—when taunted, her replies were meek but pertinent—when harrassed by the simultaneous questioning of her hard-hearted judges, seager to confuse by clamor the weak woman whom they could not confound by sophistry, she was collected as the sagest jurist, undisturbed as though she were pleading another's cause and not her own. The base Cauchon, the Bishop of Beauvais, the bigoted, bribed fanatic, to whom had been committed the conduct of her judicial murder, strove hard, but strove in vain, to wring from her pale lips some evidence of unholy dealings, for which he might condemn her to the stake, some word of petulance which he might construe into treason.

"Swear"—he cried in haughty and imperious tones, from his crimson chair of state, to the fair trial girl, who, clad in sackcloth, with bare feet and discolored hair, stood at his footstool, upheld by the supporting might of conscious innocence—"Swear to speak truth—question thee as we may!"

"I may not swear, most holy Bishop," she replied, and her eye flashed for a moment, and her lip curled as she spoke, so that men deemed it irony—"I may not swear, most righteous judge—since you may question me of that, which to reveal would be foul perjury—so should I, if I swore, stand perjured in the same by speech or silence!"

"Swear—Joan of Domremi, most falsely styled of Orleans and of Arc—Swear to thy judges, that thou wilt seek no rescue—attempt no escape!"

"Be not your letters strong enough?"—she asked in answer; and she half raised her feeble arm, to show the weight of rusty steel that had already well nigh crippled it—"Be not your letters strong enough—your rock-hewn vaults, where never comes the first-created gift of natural light—your iron cages, and your steel-clad warders?—This will I not swear, O thou most merciful, so shall you not condemn me of faith broken."

"Then thou dost look to rescue—dost hope for liberty—wouldst evade, hadst thou the power, the bonds of Holy Church?"

"To whom should I look for rescue, save to Him who has abandoned his frail servant for her transgressions."

"Ha! she confesses!"

"Mark well the words—Sir scribe."

"No need for further question!"

"She has avowed it!"

Such were the disjointed clamors that burst at once in fiercest exultation from the lips of that holy-seeming conclave; but ere the wily Bishop could express his sentiments, the Maiden again took up the word.

"I have confessed—Great Sir—I have confessed it an-gression—And make not ye the same—at prime, at matin, and at vesper—the same avowal!—Kiddle me then the difference, ye holy men, between the daily penitence ye proffer, for the daily sins which even ye confess; and this the free confession of a helpless, friendless, persecuted prisoner!—Tell me, Lord Bishop, what am I, that I should suffer judgment to the utmost, for the same avowal that thou makest daily, if thou dost obey the bidding of Him whose cross thou has uplifted!—But ye did ask me if I hope for liberty—if I would exchange the prison-house—the hall of condemnation, and the bread of tears, for the free air, the blessed sunshine, and the humblest peasant's life!—Go, ask the wild herds of the forest, will they prefer the yoke and the goad, the halter and the stall, to the green woods and liberal pastures in which their Maker set them!—Go ask the eagle, will he endure the jesses and the hood of the trained goshawk, will he choose the perch and mew before the boundless azure, will he list to the whistle, or regard the lure of the falconer when the thunder is rolling beneath him, when the lightning, which he alone can gaze upon undazzled, is flashing round the æthereal Creator made him to inhabit. If these shall answer yes—then will I do your bidding, and swear to keep my prison, though the chains should be stricken from my limbs and the door of deliverance opened; though the fagot were kindled to consume me on the one hand, and the throne of your monarch were tendered on the other!—then will I swear—Sir Priest—and not till then."

Such was the tone, and such the tenor of all her speeches; ever submissive to the forms, to the ordinances, and to the spirit of religion; ever professing her faith in holy writ; her whole and sole reliance on the Virgin and her blessed Son; ever denying and disproving the charge of witchery or demon worship—offering to confess under the sacramental seal—to confess to her very judges—she yet suffered them to know, at all times, to perceive, by every glance of her eye, to hear in every word of her mouth, that it was the religion they professed, and not the men who professed it, to which her deterrence was paid, to which her veneration was due.

Still tho' they laboured to the utmost to force her into such confession as might be a pretext for her condemnation, the court could by no means so far confuse her understanding, or so corrupt the judges, as to effect us uncharitable purpose. With a clear understanding of her own cause she refused, at once boldly, to answer those questions on nice points of doctrine which she perceived to have no bearing on her case. On every other matter, she spoke openly and with the confidence of innocence, maintaining to the last, however, that "Spirits, were they good or evil, had appeared to her;" but denying that she had ever by sign or priap, by spell or charm, invoked the aid of supernatural powers, otherwise than by the prayers of the Church offered in Christian purity of purpose to the most Holy Virgin and her everlasting Son. It was at length proposed that the question should be enforced by the means of torture! But by Cauchon himself the proposition was overruled—not in mercy, however,—not in charity toward a weak and suffering woman, but in the deepest refinement of cruelty. Confident, as he then was, that she should be condemned to the fierce ordeal of the fagot and the stake, he spared her the rack lest by exhausting her powers of endurance it might diminish the duration of her mortal agonies. Bitterly, however, was that corrupt judge and false shepherd disappointed when the decisive verdict was pronounced—"Perpetual chains—the bread of sorrow and the waters of misery!"—The courts ecclesiastic had no weapon to afflict her life, and for the present the secular arm had dismissed her beyond the reach of its tyrannic violence. The sentence was heard by the meek prisoner in the silence of despair—she was remanded to her living tomb—she passed through the gloomy archway—the bolts groaned heavily behind her—she deemed that all was over, that she should perish there—there, in that dark abyss, unheeded by the fresh air or the fair daylight, unimpeded by her relentless foemen, unassured by her faithful friends; and she felt that death—any death, so it was but speedy—had been preferable to the endurance of that protracted torture which life had now become to her, who lately fought and feasted at the right hand of princes.

Not all the sufferings however, of the wretched girl; not all the mental agonies and corporeal pains, that she must bear in silence, could satisfy her fears of England, or the policy of England's Regent. It was not in revenge, much less in hatred, that the wise Bedford urged it on the court that they should destroy—not her body only, but her fame. He well knew that it was enthusiasm only that had thus far supported her and liberated France;—he deemed not, for a moment, that she was either heavenly messenger, or mortal champion;—but he felt, that France believed in joy—England in trembling!—he felt, that dead or living—so she died a martyr—Joan would be equally victorious. Her death, it attributed to vengeance, would but stir up the kindling blood of Gaul to hotter anger, would but beat down the doggedness of Saxon valor with remorse and superstitious terror!

"Ill hast thou earned thy See," he cried at their first interview, "false Bishop!" As well she were a horse and in the field, as living thus a Junius prisoner! She must die! die, Sir Priest, not as a criminal, but as a witch and a heretic! Her name must be a scoff and a reproach to France—her death an honor to her slayers—a sacrifice acceptable to Mother Church, and laudable throughout all Christendom! See it done, Sir,—Nay, interrupt me not, nor parley; an thou mayest not accomplish it, others more able, or perchance more willing, may be found and that in fit speedily; the revenues of Beauvais's Bishopric might serve a Prince's turn! See that thou lose them not!" And he swept proudly from the chamber, leaving the astounded churchman to plot new schemes, to weave more subtle meshes for the life of the innocent. Nor did it occupy that crafty mind long time, nor did it need deep counsel! The sentence of the Church decreed, that she should never more don arms, or masculine attire! The Bishop's eye flashed as it lighted on that article. "Ha!" he muttered—"Here then, we have her on the hip! Alas, what ho! Let them bid Gaspard father—the warden of the Sorceress—and let us be alone!"

He came; and with the closed doors they sat in conclave—The highest officer, save one, of Holy Church; the lowest and most truculent official of state policy! Ear heard not, nor eye saw, the secrets of the meeting; but on the morrow, when the first glimpse of sickly daylight fell through the tunnelled window of her dungeon, the Maiden's female garb was gone, and by the pallet bed lay morion and corslet, chishes, and greaves, and sword—her own bright azure armor! At the first moment, ancient recollection filled her whole soul with gladness! Joy, triumph, exultation thrilled in her burning veins; and the tears that rained down full and frequent, tarnished the polished surface, were tears of gratitude and momentary bliss. Then came the cold reaction—soul-sickening terror—the prophetic sense of danger—the certainty of treachery! She donned them not—she rose not from her wretched couch, though her limbs were cramped, and her very bones were sore with lying on the hard and knotted pallet. Noon came, and her guards entered; but it was in vain that she besought them, as they would not slaughter a poor maiden—slaughter her soul and body—to render back the only vestments she might wear in safety.

"Tis but another miracle, fair Joan," sneered the grim warden. "St. Katharine of Fierbois has returned the sword, she gave thee erst, for victory. Tête Dieu! 'tis well she felt thee not the destrier, to boot of spurs, and espaldron, else wouldst thou have won through wall of stone of grate of iron! Don them, then, holy Maiden, don the Saint's gift, and fear not; she will preserve thee!"

And, with a hoarse and chuckling laugh the churlaid down the scanty meal his cruelty vouchsafed her, and departed!

Thus three days passed away; her prayers for fitting raiment were unheeded, or, it heeded, scoffed at.—Meantime the chill air of the dungeon paralyzed her as she lay, with scanty covering, cramped limbs and curdling blood, on the straw mattress that alone was interposed between her delicate frame and the damp rock-hewn pavement.—On the third day she rose; she donned the fatal armor—all save the helm and falchis—she might not otherwise enjoy the wretched liberty of moving to and fro, across the dungeon floor.—Scarce had she fastened the last rivet, when the door flew open! A dozen men-at-arms rushed in, and dragged her to the chamber of the council! The board was spread with all the glittering mockery of judgement—the brass-bound volumes of the law; the crosier of the church; the mace of state; the two-edged blade of Justice, and the pointless sword of Mercy! The Judges were in session—waiting the moment when necessity should force her to don the fatal armor! From without, the clang of axe and hammer might be heard, framing the pile of execution, prepared already ere the sentence was pronounced on that doomed victim, condemned before her trial.

"Lo! there—my Lords," cried Bauchon, as she entered, dragged like a lamb to the slaughter. "Lo! There, my Lords! What need of farther trial? Even now she bears the interdicted arms, obtained as they must be by sorcery! Sentence, my Lords; a judgment!"

And with one consent, they cried aloud, corrupt and venal Frenchmen, "Judgment; a sentence!"

Then rose again the Bishop, and the lust of gain twinkled in his deep gray eye, and his lip curled with an ill-dissembled smile, as he pronounced the final judgment of the Church:

"Joan of Domremi—sorceress, apostate! Liar, idolater, blasphemer of thy God! The Church hath cast thee from her bosom, excommunicated and accursed! Thou art delivered to the arm of secular justice. And may the temporal flames which shall, this hour, consume thy mortal body, preserve thy soul from fires everlasting! Her doom is said; hence with her, to the fagot!"

Steadfastly she gazed on the face of the speaker, and her eye closed not, nor did her lip pale, as she heard that doom, the most appalling, that flesh can not endure.

"Ye have conquered," she said slowly but firmly; "ye have prevailed, and I shall perish. But think not that ye harm me; for ye but send me to my glory! And believe not, vain that ye are, and senseless, believe not that, in destroying me, ye can subdue my country. The fires, that shall shrivel up this weak and worthless carcass, shall but illumine the blaze of vengeance in every Frenchman's heart that will never waver, nor wink, nor weary, till France again be free! This death of mine shall cost thousands—hundreds of thousands of the best lives of Britain! Living, have I conquered your best warriors heretofore! Dead, will I vanquish them hereafter! Dead, will I drive ye out of Paris, Normandy, Guienne. Dead, will I save my King, and liberate my country! Lead on, assassins—lead me to the pile! The flesh is weak and fearful; yet it trembles not, nor falters, so does the spirit pine for liberty and bliss!"

Who shall describe the scene that followed; or, if described, who would peruse a record so disgraceful to England, to France, to Human Nature? England, from coward policy, condemned to ignominious anguish a captive foe! France, colder and more cruel yet, abandoned without one effort, one offer of ransom, one stroke for rescue, a saviour and a friend! and human nature witnessed the fell deed, pitying perhaps in silence, but condemning not, much less opposing the decree of murder, sanctioned as it was, and sanctified by the assent of Holy Church.

It is enough! She perished—perished as she had lived, undaunted and nobly. Her fame, which they would have destroyed, lives when the very titles of her judges are forgotten! The place of her torture is yet branded with her name! Her dying prophecy has been fulfilled! A century had not elapsed, ere Flanders, Normandy, Guienne were free from England's yoke; and every battle-field of France hath reeked, from that day downwards to red Waterloo, with blood of England, poured forth like water on the valleys of her hereditary foe.

The Maiden perished, and the terror-stricken soldiery, who gazed on her unnumbered agonies, beheld—or fancied they beheld—a saintly light, paler but brighter than the lured glare of the fagots, circling her dark locks and lovely features; they imagined that her spirit—visible to mortal eyes—soared upward, dove-like on white pinions, into the viewless Heaven—and they shuddered, when they found, amid the tinders of the pile, the heart which had defied their bravest, unscathed by fire, and ominous to them of fearful retribution!

TO

Apart from thee I only feel,

How much of life with thee remains,
Not only in the hours I steal,

From daily pleasures, toils or pains,
To muse of thee in waking dreams,

By memory and hope inspired,
While o'er the sea of absence gleams,

The cheering lights that love has fired;
Nor in the visions of the night,

Alone, does thy lov'd form appear—
Thine image is a part of sight,

Than even light itself more dear,
With age, the feeble sense grows dim;

But thou, the light that fills my soul,
And mantling to its widening brim,

O'erflows with bliss life's golden bowl,
Shall live—when e'er thy fading star

By time and sense to darkness given,
Seems but a halo from afar—

Shall glow the radiance of heaven.

Apart from thee my bosom bounds,
To the fond hour our lips shall meet,

And feel in all "life's varied sounds,"
There's not a moment half so sweet,

As when two hearts that truly love,
By doubts and fears of absence tried,

Seal with a kiss—hope's fairy dove—
The union blest so long denied,

From feelings deep o'erflowing well,
Pour countless thoughts in rushing tide,

Mingling a rapture and a spell—
The sympathy of hearts allied.

Alas—I know not what of fate,
May intervene the hour between,

I know not whether soon or late,
That hour—through distance dimly seen,

As faintly o'er the dark'ning wave,
Gleams the white wing of bird afar—

May be, an omen of the grave—
May be, of hope the rising star,

Where'er it be in earth or heaven,
When'er it come in weal or woe—

This heart from thine forever riven,
Would fondly, vainly seek to know;

But in the doom that bears me on,
Unfading hope still lights the way,

For love like thine—not vainly won—
Is wealth that passeth not away.

LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL.

LETTER XI.

An unpleasant report has prevailed here for several days that the cholera has come over from Europe to Oran.—For that city it was my intention to have taken shipping by the first good opportunity, as travelling by land is out of the question; but I thought, in the event of the news proving true, that it would be imprudent to go out, as it were anticipating a meeting with so redoubtable a personage as the cholera, which would be interpreting rather too strictly the medical maxim, "venienti occurrere malo." In order to ascertain what credit the rumour deserved, I called on General Voirol, and finding that he did not believe it, I requested his assistance to obtain for me a passage on board of the first government steamer that might be going to Oran. "That," he said, "is not so easy as it may seem, there are so many applicants for passage; however, we must see what can be done for you. Come, if you please, and dine with me to-morrow; you will meet General Demicels, who is to embark the next day as commandant for Oran, and I hope he will be able to take you with him." I went accordingly, and we had a very pleasant party, everybody agreeing to despise the report of the cholera having come to Oran. General Demicels told me he could not give me a passage unless I was invested nominally with some office in his suite. "Then, make me your Latin Secretary," I said, and it was agreed to in-lanter that I should write all the Latin letters he might have occasion to send to the Arabs. After a cheerful evening, however, I awoke to hear serious news in the evening. I called at an early hour on General Demicels—his countenance was very serious; the intelligence of the pestilence having broken out at Oran had arrived at Algiers about midnight. "It is my duty," he said, "to go to the infected place, but if I were you I should not go." I told him that such was my resolution, not merely from apprehension of cholera, but from the fear of being shut up in Oran for an indefinite time by the embargo that would be imposed upon the place. I took leave of him with rain, to see a brave man going off to the chance of an unglorious death.

Well, but the cholera at Oran is but a prelude to its being at Algiers, and Heaven knows how soon that itinerant performer may be leading the dance of death amongst our alleys of darkness and dense population! His revels here will be frightful: shall I fly from the infection and return to Europe? Nay—no, I thought, in communicating with myself: curiosity brought me hither, and fear shall not drive me hence, with my curiosity balked. In this mind I called at the house of the Intendant-Civile, the Baron Bondurant, and found his lady in her drawing-room, surrounded by all the world. She showed her friendly interest in me, by inquiring what were my intentions as to remaining at Algiers? I told her I meant to stop; but instead of complimenting my courage, as I expected, she replied, "You are a perfect madman." As for me, I must remain, as in duty bound, by my sick husband, but if you have a grain of sense left, get off immediately to Marseilles." Hem! I thought, you are perhaps in the right. After her lecture I turned round to Madame de Verger, the wittiest and the most musical of French women. "And what do you think of me, Madame de Verger?" "I think," she said, "that you are a poltroon." "Why so?" "Because you did not go to Oran." "Oh, how I admired your beau courage when we dined at General Voirol's, but where is it all now?" She added, with laughing compassion, "Pray take Madame B's advice, and get over to Marseilles." If Jem Smith had seen me under her quizzing, he would have said that I looked more like a Sheepie than a Leo Africanus. I said, "Ladies, you are really too hard upon me, but I am neither a madman nor a coward—I belong to the juste milieu."

To be serious, I am not sensible to the danger of remaining here; but it provokes me to think of having come so far and of going away after seeing so little, and thus my crossness performs the part of courage: so I shall stop here, waiting for a change of visiting other parts of the Regency. Boujah and Bona, on the sea-coast, I am sorry to say, are the only accessible places at present, and into the interior there is, alas, no hope of safely penetrating beyond twenty miles from Algiers; for though the French once took possession of Belida, Colabah, and Medea, they were obliged to quit them, after learning from the natives some hard lessons in the tactics of retreat.

I find the society of the French very agreeable; but it would be more so if they would not so constantly and ignorantly boast of their resemblance to the Romans. For the present, at least, nothing can be more unfortunate than this comparison, in as far as relates to Numidian colonization; both Rome and France have left ruins here, but those of France are the work of destruction, whilst the Roman ruins are vestiges of what they created. About the distance of fourteen miles from Algiers, on the side of the river Aratch, there are still visible the ruinous traces of a Roman city, which is supposed to have been the Rustonium mentioned by Ptolemy, and named Rusucrum by other geographers. Here, scarcely emerging from brushwood and brambles, there are fragments of walls, vaults, porticoes and arches, and trunks of columns, bits of Etrurian pottery, and sprinkling of mosaic pavement. There are traces also of a jetty which sheltered the shipping. To judge by its remains, Rustonium must have been a mile in length, and about half as broad. The Emperor Claudius bestowed on it the privileges of a Roman city; but what a shadow is human existence!—the hyena now laughs at the fallen glory of Rustonium, and the tortoise crawls over its tassellated floors.

There is a stone with a Roman inscription in Algiers itself, which I do not find mentioned either by Shaw or by any other traveller. It is a part of the outside wall of the mosque nearest to the marine. I can make out upon it the words "Sulpicius Rufus Donum Dedit." Other letters are irretrievably obliterated; what remains, however, proves that the existing mosque was built partly with stones which had been formerly used by the Romans, and it probably stands where a Roman temple once stood.

Among the antiquities near Algiers may be mentioned some large unhewn stones, erected evidently by the hand of art, a few miles to the west of the city, in the direction of Sidi Ferruch. They stand by threes and fours, with a stone of equal size surmounting the rest. The French call them Druidic tombs. That these erections may be Phœnician I can imagine, though their being Druidic is a different question. I remember to mention of Druids in any ancient author, either Caesar, Strabo, Mela, Diolorus Siculus, Tacitus, Lucan, Pliny, or Ammianus Marcellinus, which alludes to stones of this description forming their sepulchres. We have all concurrent testimonies that they performed their religious rites in the depth of groves, and cemeteries have had among all people more or less of a religious character. Around erections given out to be Druidic, both in France and Britain, we have no tradition of woods having ever existed; and if such stones be Druidic, it is strange that there should be none in the isle of Anglessea. It has never been more than dimly conjectured that Druidism came from Phœnicia, and it may be more than conjecture that such stones, whether in Africa, England, and elsewhere, are of Phœnician erection. The data for reasoning are so faint and few, that although the sage in the academy can say a great deal more about the matter, he knows in reality little more than the child in the nursery. Still, if you let me choose one guess more, feasible than another, I should follow the opinion of those who ascribe such monuments to the Phœnicians. Strukely, the most rational of our old antiquaries, thinks so with regard to the piles at Stonehedge, and I have heard my friend Gwilt, the learned translator of "Vitruvius," maintain the same opinion.

From the table-land containing these supposed Druid tombs, you may ascend in an hour's walk or ride (though a horse's footing is scarcely secure on these steep, stony pathways), to the top of Mount Bonaria, which is 1000 feet above the level of the sea, and behind it commands a view of the Metedjah plain, as well as of the whole range of the Lesser Atlas. This bird's-eye prospect gives wings to the imagination, leading it by sea over the waves that roll to Spain and Italy, and overland to mountaintops that overlook the path of the caravan towards the zone of our planet. It is merely a prospect, however, and not a landscape for the painter. Looking down to the Metedjah plain, I said to M. Descousses, who was riding beside me, "See, there; there are seven—eight encampments of the Arabs—I can spy their tents, and the smoke ascending from their fires. How I long to see them nearer! Will not you, who were a captain of Napoleon's cavalry, accompany me down to the plain and risk a visit to them?" "Could we not reach them in safety?" "Aye," said Descousses, "we might reach them in safety, but our coming back is a different question."

On the summit of Mount Bousaria, there are the ruins of two small villages, containing some forty houses, out of which, however, only a dozen seemed to be inhabited. On the brow of the mountain, towards the east, a commanding military position, the French have built a large block-house, which is guarded by several pieces of cannon, the pathway back to Algiers, is so precipitous and rocky, that I had serious apprehensions of my neck.

Along all the roads about Algiers the French have established cabarets, where songs reach you without, which indicates jollity within, and the soldiers sometimes circulate the bottle so quickly, as to throw it at each other's heads. Very different from these haunts of revelry are the quiet coffee houses of the natives, which are generally placed in some sequestered ravine, and embosomed in a grove of orange or other fruit-trees. In the porticoes and orchards of these coffee houses, the Moors of the neighbourhood will come to while away an entire day, squatted on mats of reeds, and drinking coffee or playing at draughts; you will see them also counting their beads, an act, which with the Mussulmans as with the Catholics, is supposed to be accompanied by devotion. I was passing one of these cafés the other day in company with a French officer, who recognized and spoke to an elderly native. The Moor was resting beneath a fig-tree, with a rosary in his hand; his beard and turban white as snow, and his gravely placid countenance made him seem to me the most venerable man I had ever seen. An interesting-looking youth sat beside him, whom I took to be his son, and I recognized in the few words that passed between them, the tones of paternal and filial kindness. When we left them, I said to the Frenchman, "How respectable are these cafés of the Moors, compared to our dram-shops of Europe; their pleasures are indolent to be sure, but they are innocent. Is it not pleasant to see your temperate old friend passing the day with that boy, who seems to be his son, and the comfort of his age?" "Boy—son—bah! b.h!" cried the Frenchman; "that companion of his is neither his son nor one of the male sex."

I should avoid alluding to the profligacy of the Moors, like any other impure subject, if it were not illustrative of an important moral truth. I have heard untravelled philosophers defend polygamy, as a safeguard against the grosser licentiousness which fills our streets with degraded women; but Algiers is a proof that this is not a fact. At the occupation of the place by the French, there was found a greater number of such women than could be reckoned, in proportion to its population, in the most profligate town of Europe. The wretched females of this description were not, to be sure, so much incarcerated as the married woman; but they had habitations allotted to them under the surveillance of a magistrate, called the Mezzar, who let them out to Mussulmans, and who punished them with death if they admitted Jews or Christians as their admirers.

This shows that polygamy is no antidote to profligacy; and, indeed, how can it be so? It is true that the Moors, like all frugal Mussulmans, seldom have more than one or two wives at a time, though they can easily divorce them, but can the wife thus married for a moment imagine herself more than a mistress, or can the husband say to her, like Brutus to Portia—

"You are my true and honourable wife,

And dear to me as are the ruddy drops

That visit this sad heart?"

The Mezzars often treated these public women very cruelly. When the French came, it was wonderful how soon they learnt the politics of the day. Though shut up in their houses, they set up yells of joy at the French military music; they were thumped and threatened, but they snapped their fingers at their gaolers, and were finally emancipated.

I fear you will think me an incurious traveller, when I tell you that I have not yet seen any Moorish funeral, except that of a poor person; it is only at the interment of the better orders, that the honours paid to the dead are performed with any imposing solemnity. But it is not so easy, as you might imagine, to get admitted to such a spectacle. Since the cemetery adjacent to the gate of Bab el Oued has been desecrated by the French, and its tombs destroyed, the rich have ceased to be buried in that quarter, though there is a ravine in the same direction stretching upwards to the south, and remote from the high road, where graves are still dug for the poor. There is one burial-ground, and there may be more for aught that I know, within the walls of Algiers; but the Moors, who have country-houses, generally inter their friends in their vicinity. Formerly it was advisable for Christians to keep out of the way of their funerals, and they are still averse to any but the faithful being present at them. I extracted a promise from a young Moor who has been in France, and is no bigot, to help me some day to the sight of a native burial; but he has not kept his word, probably apprehending the prejudices of his countrymen.

I understand that the first ceremony performed over a deceased Moor or Mouress is to wash the corpse all over. Cotton steeped in camphor is then put into the mouth, ears, and nostrils; the body is dressed out in the best attire that can be found, as for a festive day, and is finally wrapped in linen. Those who can afford it purchase linen that has come from Mecca, and is therefore supposed to be consecrated. By the time that the toilette of the corpse has been made, all the female friends of the family have assembled, and they join in a loud lamentation over the defunct. The men take no share in these howlings, and it would be thought weakness if they either sighed or wept, although their countenances often express a deeper grief than that of the noisy complainers. The dead are never kept more than twenty-four hours, indeed, sometimes for a much shorter time; so as to make it but too probable, that persons interred prematurely have often awoke in their graves only to struggle and be suffocated. The tiers of females are curmudgeons, those of male have no covering but the shroud. Women never accompany a funeral to the grave, except in rare instances, when female slaves have been emancipated by the will of the deceased. The procession is attended by an Imam or priest, and it generally stops on the way to the grave at the nearest mosque, where verses of the Koran are chanted chorally. At the place of rest the same chanting is repeated, at least I was told so; but I should think that a sepulchral requiem is a luxury appropriated only to the rich—for at the poor man's funeral which I witnessed, the Arabic words uttered over him were rather a growl than a chant. The corpse is laid in the grave, resting on one side, and having the face towards Mecca; flags of slate or planks of wood are laid over it, to prevent the jackals from making a night's entertainment of it; the earth is then thrown in and the grave is covered with turf and branches of trees, unless the family of the individual be rich, and then his tomb has marble slabs at head and foot, and a regular building over it. The private burial-grounds of the wealthy are kept with extreme care; they are surrounded by walls mantled with ivy and vines, and the graves are shaded by palm trees, or cypresses. Often within the walls there is a covered gallery of white marble pillars, under which there are carpets spread, for those who come to mourn and pray. The Moorish women, otherwise so closely immured, can always repair to the tombs of their relations; and those places, so says report, are resorted to sometimes for assuaging other passions than grief. Medicaments always follow the funerals of the rich, and are distributed to them. Finally, the friends and relatives return home and have a social meal, with plenty of couscous, fowls, and mutton. Your English refinement, I dare say, revolts at the idea of a feast after a funeral; but remember I am a Scotchman, and if you abuse these poor people for this custom, you will cast a reflection indirectly on the recent barbarism of my native land. Alas! I fear these Moorish festivities after funerals are decency itself, compared with those which I have witnessed with my own eyes in Scotland. Not very long ago a Highland funeral, or dregy as it is called, used to be followed by a regular supper to the company and a ball.

"Where hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys, and reels, Put life and merriment in their heels."

I have heard a young Highlander in the rank of a gentleman say, that he never spent a pleasanter day than at his grandmother's dregy; for the mourners had as much whisky and dancing as they could set their faces to. At his death, the Laird of —, in Argyleshire, left a beautiful young widow, of course inconsolable for his loss. After the burial and banquet, clansmen and clanswomen, attended by the piper and fiddler, convened for a dance in the castle-hall, resolving to mitigate their grief with the Highland fling—when unexpectedly the widow herself came in, all weeps and tears, with the tip of her nose scarcely peeping from her crape cap—and she seated herself mournfully on a bench. The gentleman who was to lead down the dance thought that he could not in good breeding ask any other lady than the mistress of the house to stand up with him, and with a deep sigh she consented. He then asked the disconsolate woman to name the spring, i.e. the time she would wish to be played. "Oh," she said, "let it be a light spring, for I have a heavy heart."

The epitaphs of the Moors are generally brief and simple, unlike those sepulchral rigmorles where—

"So very much is said,

One-half will never be believed,

The other never read."

Mr. Tulin, Vice-Consul, who is an excellent Arabic scholar, favoured me with the translation of two inscriptions on a tombstone within Algiers. At the head are two lines of verse on an erected slab of slate, meaning as follows:—

"There is but one God, the Master of all things, the all-potent and all-powerful.

Mohammed is the Envoy of God, the executor of his will, and the beloved."

At the feet there is another upright slab, inscribed to this effect:—

"This is the grave of the deceased,

By the charity of the Ever-living and Ever-lasting,

The Hadjee* Mobarck, son of Mohammed, son of Basel."

The graves of eminent men are surmounted by marble tombs designating their rank. When the French made their road through the great burial-place at Bab el-Oued, they suffered the soldiers to carry off those tombs. I have just returned from an apothecary's shop where one of them stands inverted on the counter, and is used as a mortar by the man of rhubarb.

LETTER XII.

I cannot say that my friends the Israelites are so free from verbosity as the Moors in their sepulchral inscriptions; yet still I am glad that the conquerors have spared them. Farther west from Bab-el-Oued than the demolished Moorish tombs, and happily out of the line of the great road, lies the Jewess cemetery. It has neither flowers nor trees; but it is, to my taste, a picturesque and interesting place: it contains, I should think, though I cannot say I have reckoned them, hundreds of graves, covered with large slabs of pure white marble, with the Hebrew character beautifully engraven and coloured black, and here and there surmounted by sculptured heads, denoting the tombs of rabbis. I need not apologize to you for my interest in the Hebrews; the very characters of their language beget reverence in my heart. Most ancient and ill-used people! it is some comfort to see their ashes undisturbed in a country where they have suffered so much. I often visit this cemetery by clear moonlight, when the many tombs contrast their foreground splendidly with the blue amphitheatre of hills above; and here, as if the ground inspired my memory, I can vividly recollect the brightest passage of that prophetic poet Isaiah, who painted futurity like a present scene. Fifteen years ago I applied with some earnestness, to the Hebrew language; but my knowledge of it is now so much decayed by disuse, that I could only transcribe some of the inscriptions in this cemetery, whilst imperfectly understanding them. I can make out that some of the tombs are those of martyrs who suffered for the Jewish faith, and I think it is indicated that they suffered death by fire. I got a Jew, who speaks a sort of English, to translate them for me, and he agreed with me that one of the epitaphs conveys that meaning. But the Jew's English version is scarcely more intelligible than the original Hebrew; I can perceive, however, that these epitaphs are all in verse, and even in rhyme.

Neither the Moors nor Jews wear black in token of mourning for the dead; but the latter always attend funerals in their worst attire, to denote their grief. The Jewish men weep plentifully at interments. The women sometimes attend them; but not always. When they do, you may be sure their grief is not silent.

A discourse, long or short in proportion to the importance of the deceased, is preached at some little distance from the grave; prayers are chanted; and collections are made for the poor. One extraordinary superstitious custom still remains. When a man dies, they believe that the devil stands in ambush before the house, in order to get possession of the corpse on its way to its last abode. As the rabbis, however, surround it all the way to interment, his infernal majesty is cowed by their presence; but still he follows the procession, in hopes of finding some favourable opportunity, or of slipping into the grave along with the defunct. When the body, therefore, is near the opened grave, the bearers suddenly retreat with it to a certain distance, and a rabbi attending them throws some gold pieces as far as he can in different directions. The devil, who is by this time either in the grave or near it, is tempted by his avarice to go and pick up the money; and whilst he is thus employed, the corpse is hurried back to the tomb, and earth thrown over it. One day that I talked about this custom to a Moor, who has a bigoted hatred of the poor Israelites, I asked him if it was not unlike a Jew to throw away his money? "Ah, yes," he said; "but it is very like a Jew to cheat the devil." In the burials of females this scattering of money is never practised; Satan, it is alleged, has trouble enough upon his hands to wish getting hold of a woman.

On certain days families go out to weep over the tombs of their parents.

To start a livelier subject than tombs and epitaphs—I have transcribed for you a few Algerine melodies. I expressed to you a mean opinion of the native music, and if you heard it fiddled and flageoleted by the minstrels here, I think you would not blame me for fastidiousness. They certainly execute their tones like executioners. At the same time, I imagine I have undervalued the intrinsic merit of their music, from the wretchedness of its performers; for incomparably better judges than myself tell me, that many of the native airs are expressive and pleasing. Madame de Verger says so, and such is the opinion also of my inspired and valued friend, the Chevalier Neukomm, whom I have met in Algiers. Of all happy incidents, that which I least expected in Africa was to meet this great man—the nephew of Haydn, worthy of his uncle—the composer whose touches on the organ are poetry and religion put into sound. He has crossed the Mediterranean merely to visit his friends the De Vergers. Colonel De Verger called on me the other day, bringing the Neukomm with him; I need not tell you how I greeted him—we talked about Algerine music, and he told me that he found something in it which he liked for being natural and characteristic. I said, "You surprise me, Chevalier; then I suppose you can admire even our Highland bagpipes?" "Nay," said Neukomm, "don't despise your native pibrochs; they have in them the stirrings of rude but strong nature. When you traverse a Highland glen you must not expect the breath of roses, but must be contented with the smell of heath: in like manner, even Highland music has its rude, wild charms."

Well, upon reflection, his words seemed to confirm me in the opinion that the greatest artists are the ablest discoverers of merit, be it ever so rude and faint, in works of art. Our poets, Scott and Gray, could discover genius in bar-

* Since returning to England, I applied to Mr. Hurwitz, Professor of Hebrew in the London University, to translate the epitaphs which I brought home, and he very kindly took the trouble to do so. He tells me the style is modern, or corrupted, Hebrew, which has its difficulties to the best Hebrew scholar.

barous ballads that had eluded the obtuseness of common critics. Our sculptor Flaxman walked among the uncouth statuary of old English cathedrals, where defects of drawing and proportion are obvious to the eyes of a child. A surface critic would have derided those monuments; but Flaxman's eye penetrated beyond their shade into their spirit—he divined what the sculptor had meant, and discovered tender and sublime expression. I send you a few native airs. The words are not even an attempt at poetry—but mere nonsense verses to point out the measure.

I. Epitaph on a Female.

Call forth the lamenting women (a) to prepare a mourning, and to weep over the graceful and lovely lady (b) who was smitten with the plague in the day of anger, and descended into the lonely grave through the wrath (of God). She buried her husband after the death of her husband (c). She was of fair form and statue,—agreeable in her deeds to those who knew her. Hannah her name was called, the consort of the Rabbi Joseph, of the family Bulies. In the month Siven (d), in the year of the creation 5517, her blameless soul ascended to the highest heaven.

II. On a Young Man.

(This is) the tombstone of a lovely, upright, and worthy young man—Joseph, the Levite, of blessed memory, who was slain for no crime, but in consequence of false imputations raised against him and his seven companions, who were all killed with him on the same day, on account of an unjust sentence that was pronounced against them by his enemies concerning something. May God, in his mercy, avenge them and the innocent blood which was shed in the land.

Be amazed, ye heavens, at this! How have the righteous thus ceased, and come to an untimely end! Woe to the eyes that have seen this, and woe to the ears that hear this! On the 4th day of Tam-muz (e), in the year of the world 5500, their souls went into the upper Paradise, where they will find rest.

III.

Crown of the Law! faithful Judge!—the crown is fallen from our heads.

Woe unto us that we have sinned!

The tombstone of the sage, the perfect, the distinguished Judge, the Holy Rabbi, who was slain for the sanctification of the law (f)—our instructor and rabbi, Isaac. The memory of the holy and just be blessed! Learning weeps over him, and sheds the bitter tear. With wailing she reproaches reckless, faithless Time (for being) the perpetrator of a wicked deed:—“How durst thou pluck up a monument so fair? There is, indeed, a time to unroot a plant and a time to plant it (g). How shall we drink the bitter cup, or how couldst thou give it to so pious a man, whose mental taste was sweet, like honey and manna—whose extensive wisdom was as that of Asaph and Hymen (h)?”

He was renowned amongst those who possess wisdom and knowledge, filled the chair of instruction, and judged a people not forsaken (i). Noble-minded, generous, and merciful, he often shed agonizing tears for his congregation.

(a) Women whose business was to raise cries of lamentation over the dead.

(b) Literally, a graceful chamois, or wild goat; a form of endearment among the Israelites here, however uncouth it may seem to us. It reminds me of a compliment paid to the ladies of England by a mulatto servant whom I hired at Algiers, after my faithful Kayble left me to return to his native mountains. My mulatto—a cunning, flattering knave, had been in England, and could speak the language. “Ah, mistar,” he used to say, “show me de land like London for good cheese and porter. And den de English ladies—dey are all like she-goats,”—he meant Gentlemen.

(c) That is, she had the two-fold calamity of being deprived of her husband and children.

(d) The third month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year.

(e) The fourth month of the year.

(f) That is, he fell a martyr to his religion.

(g) This line Mr. Horwitz thinks was introduced merely for the sake of the rhyme.

tion, whose sorrows touched his feeling heart as if they were his own; for they (the people) had been delivered over to destruction as the destruction of Shalman. At last the enemy spread the net for him, and smote him with the well-known scourge of his tongue, and tore his neck with the sword. Isaac, of the family of Abulchur, was his signature. On the 28th day of the month Ziv he so departed to enjoy the bliss which God had prepared for him.

IV.

The tombstone of the worthy, esteemed, charitable, pious, and wise Rabbi Jacob Zeror. He rested in glory in the month Nisan (j), 5500.

The stone upon the grave awakens a weeping and a bitter lamentation for a man of a noble and honourable mind. How beautiful and glorious were his works! Faithful in his dealings, of the strictest integrity, a great benefactor to the poor of his congregation, a shield to his numerous offspring, the crown of a good name; treasurer at first, to the Society (denominated) No'sai Mithah (k), and at last their associate; of a holy family, his good name being well known in the cities. And after all his endeavours in this world, there arose against him the sons of Belial, and raised a false imputation against him, for which he was condemned to die an uncommon death. At the hearing of this the ears tingle, and the eyes that saw it weep blood. He amazed at this, ye heavens! How they have shed the blood of a righteous man, on account of the wickedness and falsehood of his accusers! His bones will seek vengeance before God, who dwells on high. As for him, he is gone to Paradise, to dwell in the dew of light. May his soul be tied in the bundle of life!

V.

This stone cries as a woman that bringeth forth her first child to all that pass to and fro, saying thus:—“Alas! all ye that fear God, raise a lamentation with a bitter heart. Put on sackcloth instead of costly garments for the death of R. Abram, of the family Leon, who was an upright and glorious man. He departed this life on the 14th of Kislay, in the year 5441, in a ruin and a burning fire.”

VI.

Alas! all ye virtuous women, come to mourn for Sarah and to weep for her. She was the wife of R. Abram, of the family Leon. She died in the ruin of her own house, in the year 5441, the 14th day of the month Kislay. May God, in his abundant mercy and great kindness, gather her soul in Paradise, with other righteous women!

ORIGINAL.

MELODY.

Come; strike thy harp my pretty fair,
And let it music swell,
With magic sweetness on the air,
And break eve's silent spell.

Oh! how it soothes the aching breast,
And scatters care away!
How sweetly lulls the soul to rest,
And binds with rapturous lay.

Each rising note, like budding love,
So melting and sincere;
Some seraph music from above
Seems lingering in the air.

And when thy voice gives life and rest,
To every fitful glee;
I scarcely know which to love best
Thy music, song, or thee.

Sweet strains of earth! together blend,
And in one concert rise;
While some celestial notes descend
To meet you in the skies.

JACK IN A CHURCH.

“Some of you fellows are looking snoozy,” said a “wide awake” member, addressing the watch one at night. “What say ye to a yarn?”

“That’s right Bob,” cried two or three, starting up.

“Let’s have it!”

“It shan’t be a doleful one, because we’ve runned out our grog—and watery stories, d’ye see! require a dash of the spirits,—ha! ha! that’s good, arn’t it?”

“Humph—tol’rable!”

“And it shan’t be false, ’cause then, you see again, you can’t place no dependance on it. I likes a story that when you’re telling it again you can say, ‘I’m launged if it aint as true as the bible!’ Then the people can’t shake no heads at ye, or if they do you may blow ’em up for it with a good conscience. But this, boys, is as true as you’re all sitting there, so when you’re paying it out again, you may all say that you’ve seen it yourselves; and I’ll be bail for your ‘debility.’”

“Well, you’ve heard what things the Killease, * 40, did in the West Ingy seas, and what a set o’ stiff fellows she had aboard her. I know’d a few on ’em in different places, and was once half inclined to serve aboard her myself; only at the time I wanted, I was serving in the Andrew† Maakie, one of the crack thirty-sixes, and had a skipper what I didn’t want to part company with,—’tall events, as I said afore, I know’d a few of her men, and jolly fellers they were too—capital hands at the grog, and as glib at a yarn, long or short, taught or brightish, sad or merry, true or ‘poetryphal, as ever you’d wish to see. I’ll tell you how I got ‘quainted with Joe Fisher, who was one of the best among ’em. It was at Falmouth, and I was in a public-house, with a pipe in my bow port, and a pot o’ beer afore me, sittivated in one of the inshore reaches. There was a good many coasting crafts, and unregular navigators, brought to an anchor about, and amongst ’em was Joe: he and I, you must know, were the only thorough-breds in the place. Well! I didn’t know nothing of Joe then, in course, and though I could see he was a true ’un—and he must have made me out to be the same—we hadn’t as yet hailed each other. Well! I, and some of the long-shore coveys, got into conversation, and starting some professional subjects, at last, into summat like a breeze.

The fellers hadn’t no right to dispute the ’pinion, certainly, of a man of wars’ man; but, howsomeyer, they did, and afore I know’d where I was, or into what latitude I’d got, I found myself carrying on like the devil, in a stiffish running fight, with a couple of blazers ahead, and some small craft in each bow. They jawed, and I jawed, till their woiise nearly runned me down; for four to one, you know, wasn’t fair play; and I was just thinking of hauling off out of the smoke, when up shot Joe Fisher on my starboard quarter, begannd thundering away on my side. I directly gathered fresh heart, and remanning my guns, peppered away on two of the coveys on my starboard beam, while Joe, already loaded and primed, sent a whole broadside slap aboard, the others. Even now there was four to two—but, Lord! Joe’s metal was fifty times as heavy as his ‘tagonists; and his guns was so well served, that their fire gradually fell off to nothing. By and by, they all begunnd to sheer off, wonderfully disabled in their upper rigging; and when the smoke had a little cleared away, I hailed Joe, and Joe hailed me, and we begunnd to grow wondrous thick. He singed out for biscuit and cheese, and I for porter, and we soon got as comfortable as a couple o’ kings, and know’d each other’s history, from the time we showed off our keels into the ocean of service, to the moment he steered down to my assistance. A generous feller was Joe indeed! for when ‘to pay’ was the word, and the landlord shoved in his warrant, while I was rummaging for small shot, he tossed a handful o’ coppers into his starboard fin, and told him to bear off, and say nothing to nobody. But, howsomever, I was even with Master Joe another time,—but never mind about that. Well, you must know, my lads, that Joe wasn’t going to stay at Falmouth only a very little time, for his skipper had only put in there for a day or two, and was bound for Portsmouth harbour. The day a’ter this, Joe and I shook hands, and steered different courses—he went aboard his craft, and I cut off for Sheerness; and I didn’t hear on him for some time a’ter. But blow me!—if I haven’t forgotten to tell ye that he had been married for a couple o’ years, and his partner—a well-rigged young ’oman, so he said, fond of new clothes in her mainsail, and of mighty genteel behaviour,—he had her from a ‘pectable stock: for her father kept a wholesale crockery shop, and her mother had been cook-maid to an admiral’s lady:—none o’ yer flaunty, fly-away, bunting decked, ginger-bread, tittering las-es, but an orderly tort sailing-craft, that never runned with loose rigging, but had al’ays her spars scrupulously squared, and her cordage neatly rattled down; al’ays answering her helm, and turning lightly to wind’ard, and never missing her stays. She lived in Portsmouth, and, in course, Joe was in a main hurry to join company whilst he stayed in port.

“Well, what’s to come, I had from a very ’edible witness, and when I sawed Joe a’terwards, and axed him about it, he full bored out the other’s testy money, and confessed that no long bow had been drawn in the business. The next day a’ter Joe got ashore, happened to be Sunday, and as his consart was very ‘ligious, nothing would do but he and she should go to church. Joe hadn’t been to no church for a number o’ years, and strived hard to be excused the service. But this only made the young ’oman ten times more dissolute; an, at last, Joe was reasoned down into the voyage, and made to the ship his holiday togger.

Afore they got aboard the praying place, his missus thought fit to give him a little destruction in the way he should behave himself, and amongst the rest, says she to him, says she, ‘Joe’ says she, ‘mind you musn’t say nothing to nobody, till the business is all over, and then only in a whisper.’ ‘Very well,’ says Joe, ‘I won’t.’ ‘You musn’t’ says she, ‘keep rolling your eyes about the deck; and when the people gets up, and sits down, mind you gets up, and sits down too.’ ‘Ay, ay,’ says Joe; ‘I won’t sit down at all, and then I can’t fail o’ being right.’ ‘Well,’ says she, that’ll be better than keeping your seat all the time, says she, ‘and with a little reg’lation from me, you’ll do in that respect tol’rable well. Now, the next thing,’ says she, ‘what I’d have you mind of all things, is that you must remember, no one upon no account whatsomdever must say nothing, except the parson.’ ‘Aye, aye,’ says Joe, ‘I’ll be blowed if I won’t mind that, specially as I know nobody has no right to give no orders, except the captain.’ ‘Well, that’s all, I sposes,’ says he? ‘Yes,’ says she, ‘that’s all, only be sure to remember that nobody’s to speak never a word, except the parson.’ And with that, they cried hands to the lee braces, and stood in.

“Well, my lads, having slackened sail, they brought their helm to port, and espying a sunny anchorage, with only a single craft moored in it, stood across to-ards its nearest end. Then they clued up their courses, and let fall their hedgers. But they’d got so far abaft, that they could see little or nothing of what was a going on; and, as Joe kept every now and then poking up his starboard eye, over the hammock rail, and seemed mighty restless, his missus thought they might get a better berth. So she got under weigh, and with her consart in her wake, doubled a cape, and stood on under an easy sail, through the whole fleet, till at last she brought to, under the bows of the Admiral's ship, and threw out a signal for Joe to do the like. This was a much better situation, for they could hear beautiful, and faced the whole congregation. All went on very well, for some time; the parson was a getting through his log, like an East Indian in a stagger, and Joe seemed very tentative. Well, my hearties! as bad luck would have it, just as the old gentleman, who was a reading, had cut through a tarnation long thim-gum-bob, a strange voice from above singed out—drawing it out as long as the maintop bowline—A—men! My eyes! you should ha' seen Joe; he pricked up his ears directly, and as he didn't know well what to make on it, at first, he said nothing to nobody, but looked very queer, and began to grumble to himself. His missus, who all along been very fearful of his behaviour, heered him saying summat just above his breath, and "What's the matter, Joe?" says she. "Matter!" says he, "blow me! nothing's the matter, only this here feller in the fore-top has been a saying what he should'n't ha' said." Well, the people about began to look rather funny, and Joe's partner told him to let down his bowsprit, and not say no more. The parson, you know, had it all to himself now for some time, and Joe knewed all that was right enough, and so kept wonderful quiet.

"But by and bye, you know, the fore-top feller striked up again, and began to sing out summat considerable longer than the first. Joe bobbed up his truck again, and rather flustered. 'Poll,' says he, 'didn't you tell me afore we comed in, that nobody was to say nothing, except the parson?' 'Hush! for goodness sake, be quiet, Joe,' says she. 'Quiet,' says ne, 'when I sees no discipline aboard the Admiral's ship, d—d if I will!' Joe started up, throwed down his log-book, and primed for action. 'I say, you mister!' he sings out, 'you mister in the fore-top, ahoy! What 'thority have you to cry out when the captain's a speaking, and you've orders to run in your piece, and lash down the port? Pretty regg'lations aboard here, indeed! Don't you see, his honour looks quite dumfounded with your impudence? What bus'ness have you to keep there mocking the skipper, in this here insinivating way, eh—you long-shore toddler? I wish I'd got you aboard the Kill-ease, that's all; I'd see if you play such pranks again. And you, too, old gentleman, why don't you unship your binnacles, and sing out for the master-at-arms. If you won't make your men pay you proper respect why that's your fault, that's all.

"By Jove! but you should ha' seen the church. All in as much confusion, as the cock-pit after a thundering action. The lighter craft screamed, and began to scud from their moorings. The men o' war beared up, and wanted to see what was the matter. The parson dipped down the hatchway, and swunged down to the lower deck; while the charity boys, and the chap what keeps order, comed running through the reaches, to get hold o' Joe. Joe got on the seat, and was singing out like a thirty-two pounder. "I say! you sir" says he, "you chap with the cocked hat, three-penny cane, and laced toggery*, capital order you keeps 'tween decks, when the captain can't say his say, without being put out every minute. I'll warrant you was ogling the young woman alongside, instead of attending to your duty. Clap on more sail, old bottle-nose, and bowl down as you ought to do. Clear away your grappling-irons, and run aboard your chase, or the clipper 'ill clip through your fingers. I've a good mind, only it 'ud be interfering with regg'lations, to bring you down myself. You'll soon heave to in limbo, that's one comfort: so come down, and victual for the cruise, and be d—d to you!"

* The Parish constable.

"Howsomdever, Joe was stopped short in his 'dress to the ship's company, and hauled out by a half-dozen of the hands, into the stern galleries. A few o' those on board, 'specially the parson, and his first and second mate, wanted to march him off for a court-martial, under the charge, as they said, of disturbing the congregation at their 'votions; but one or two of the most 'spectable passengers offered to become bail for his 'pearance, and so they taked off lumbargo, and let him warp away. The damage 'afer all wasn't of no great importance; but often as he's been since in Portsmouth, blow me if you could ever get him into any thing what mounted a steeple, or had a warrant officer torreds with a cocked-hat, cane, and laced jacket."

BILL ROGERS.
LATE H. M. S. "FIRE FLX"

From the American Magazine.

WOMEN ARE FICKLE.

FROM THE FRENCH.

It was about ten o'clock, of a fine bright morning, that the Countess of Salignac awoke. With her lovely white hand she pushed aside the curtains of her bed, and rang for her maid, who leisurely made her appearance.

"You are somewhat tardy, Marguerite," said her mistress.

"My lady, I was receiving a visitor, the Viscount Charles d'Atry."

"What, before twelve o'clock. For a country beau, that is being in a hurry indeed. For my part, I am not at all anxious to see him. I am going to write a letter."

"But the Viscount is waiting, my lady."

"Let him wait, Marguerite."

Marguerite wisely left the room, and the capricious beauty indicted the following epistle:—

"Dearest Matilda.—You are a happy woman not to inhabit this hateful city. I am almost ready to grumble at you, for leaving me here so long. I am in the midst of a racket which will certainly kill me. I am deprived of a sleep even during those hours usually devoted to that purpose.—Pity me, my lovely friend. Pleasure dwells in Paris, and happiness in the country; and trust me, yours is the better lot. But I, too, shall soon share your happiness, if the Hermitage, whither we contemplate returning, is nearly finished. I send you the last opera, which would be prettier if it were less fatiguing. Do you know, dearest, that our retreat will be much talked of. Six pretty widows, with each twenty-five thousand francs a year, and neither of them twenty-five years of age, leaving Satan and the world, and its pomps and vanities, and starting off one fine morning to live in a desert, to pray and weep, without rhyme or reason, like St. Francis or St. Jerome, will, I flatter myself, produce some sensation in Paris. When I say pray and weep, I yield my pen to the guidance of my head, as my old fool of a lover, the academician said, when he laid his heart and laurels at my feet, of which precious treasures I have no idea of depriving my sex. Do not be alarmed, Matilda, you dearest, alone know whom I love."

"Do not be alarmed, I know that men only love well in novels, and Werter has ruined me for any lovers. It is utterly impossible to love in Paris; one has no time for that sort of thing. I have such a capital theory on that subject, that I brave all dangers, and set at defiance the mob of dandies that besiege me. Pray, pray let the hermitage be got ready. The very streets of Paris oppress, distress me. I am dying to roam about the fields with you; to gather violets and daisies and drink milk. I am more than ever convinced, dearest, that true happiness can only be enjoyed, as M. Lamartine so beautifully says, while sitting under a far spreading oak, and looking at peasants dancing on the green."

"To think of love when one has a friend, what a perfect honour. Matilda, I await your orders. Let me have but a line from you, and I set off instantly to join you at our sweet, sweet Hermitage for which we must select a sweet, sweet name. Ah! I had almost forgotten; you must examine our garden, and choose a little shady retired nook where I can erect a pretty little temple dedicated to friendship. My architect has procured me the design of the temple at Turin, which I assure you is the ninth wonder of the world. You shall see it. I have wasted so much money lately, that it is quite time now to think of something useful. Farewell, my only, only love, we shall soon be in each other's arms; until which happy hour, I send you as many kisses as there are miles between us."

HENRIETTA DE SALIGNAC.

This important letter sealed and despatched, the Countess bethought herself of her visitor.

"My lady," said Marguerite quietly, "the Viscount is still down stairs. He would not go away. There he stands, with his letter from your Uncle in his hand. He says he is your cousin."

"First or second cousin, Marguerite?"

"That I don't know, my lady, but he certainly looks like you. He has beautiful dark eyes, and black hair, and a famous pair of mustachios. He is very young, very tall, and very handsome; but for all that I do not admire his mustachios."

"Who asked you to tell me all this nonsense," said the Countess.

"Ah, my lady, my lady, he was standing gazing in perfect ecstasy at your picture."

"Ah, another victim," sighed forth the beauty.

Madame de Salignac found her early visitor as Marguerite had described, with folded arms, and eyes and heart so riveted on the beautiful portrait, that he did not notice the entrance of the lovelier original. It is true that the Countess' pretty little feet touched the grounds as lightly and noiselessly as the falling snow. The interview was a short one. The Viscount presexed his letter, and owing either to the intercession of an uncle, all powerful with Henrietta, or to the title of cousin, or to the graceful reserve of his own manners, Charles received permission to call whenever it suited him. One week's time saw him enlisted among the most assiduous and ardent of the Countess' lovers. His friends saw it with pity and regret. In vain they asked him—"why will you devote yourself to a coquette, who laughs at your affection, and is talking of secluding herself from the world? Why will you swell the number of those whose flame she feeds with smiles and contempt? Do you expect to change her nature, and soften that heart of iron? Charles gazed upon and admired the Countess as you would one of Raphael's lovely Madonnas; but if you want a wife, choose her from among those who do not pique themselves upon shunning love. Madame de Salignac's kingdom is not of this world."

The unfortunate young lover always assented to the truth of these observations, yet every day he grew paler and thinner, and every evening found him at his post: every evening, like a slave, he found himself fast-bound in the fetters, which, in the morning, he flattered himself he had burst for ever. Struggling without subduing such affection, was only feeding it flame. Exhausted at length by his inward struggles, maddened by the sneers and jokes of his friends, and dreading the approaching departure of Henrietta, Charles determined to seal his fate one way or another. He swore that if she was not his wife within a fortnight, all Paris should ring with the tale of a young nobleman's blowing out his brains at the very feet of his cruel mistress. The resolution somewhat restored his peace of mind; he could not believe that his fair cousin would willingly cause his death, and soothed and flattered by his own ideas, his cheek regained its bloom, and his eye its fire. One morning he dressed himself with extreme care, ordered at a fashionable store a rich and beautiful Corbelle de Mariage, and bought an admirable pair of pistols, which having loaded, he repaired to the house of Madame de Salignac.

It was about eleven o'clock, and the Countess was in her boudoir, surrounded by twenty mantuamakers, who were busy displaying loads of hats, capes, blonde, silks and flowers. For a woman on the point of giving up the world, one might have censured the admiring, envying glances she bestowed on all these vanities.—There is a devil which no daughter of Eve can resist, and that devil is love of dress. The coquettish Countess first held up to view a blonde scarf, then a delicate rose-coloured silk, and with heart and hand intent upon the finery, artfully set before her eyes, testified by broken and involuntary sentences, her admiration and delight. In the midst of her pre-occupation the door suddenly flew open, and in rushed the Viscount.

"Henrietta," he said, coming up to her and speaking in a low agitated tone, "I have come to know my fate. Either you or death must be my bride."

"Of these two very similar brides," replied Henrietta coolly, "I am sadly afraid, my handsome cousin, that you will have to choose the latter. But only look at this cape, it is not a perfect love? Charles, was there ever such exquisite work?"

"We will talk of capes some other time, Countess, my answer, my answer."

"Why, what are we talking about now Charles?"

"I am talking about myself, Henrietta, of my life, my happiness, my passionate love. Hear me:—arant me your hand, or witness my death. Answer me seriously, Henrietta, life or death?"

"To be frank and serious, Charles, I would very much like this cape."

"No, no it is my death you seek. You shall be gratified madam. Go on—buy capes—do not think of me. How could I suppose myself of more importance in your eyes than a cape, a new cape. I must have been mad."

"Somewhat so, I admit. Charles. Upon the whole I should prefer this pretty dress. I mean to go to the opera to-morrow evening, and I have nothing to wear. It is a perfect love—the colour, the make, every thing lovely. Come, Charles, do not look so gloomy. When a woman is full of business, you should not come and talk to her about love and suicide. Well, I have quite made up my mind I will buy this sweet dress."

Though Charles felt that his very existence depended upon this frivolous, careless creature, yet could he hardly refrain a smile at her passion for gew gaws. He quietly and silently listened to a long discussion about thread and needles, and though almost choked by contending emotions, appeared perfectly calm and self-possessed.—What a contrast was there between the quiet, graceful manner of the Countess, and the few friendly words she now and then, as if from politeness, addressed to him, and her enthusiasm about a piece of lace, her screams of delight at a feather, her perfect ecstasy at the sight of a wreath of roses; between the attention she bestowed upon all this nonsense, and the perfect neglect with which she treated the devoted, overwhelming passion of the young Viscount. This manner struck Charles to the very heart. At last, to his great relief, the mantuamakers departed, the room was cleared, and Charles exclaimed:

"What an hour of agony have I passed. Was it done purposely, Henrietta? Do you only live to torment me?"

"Why, my dear friend?"

Here the door again opened, and a servant announced the Baron and Baroness de Menvall and General Derville. Charles, disappointed and enraged, flew out of the house. One day had he lost, and one step had he come nearer to his grave. The rest of this miserable day he spent in gazing at the rain, which fell in torrents, writing letters, and loading and unloading his pistols.

The next day at one o'clock, he rang at Madame de Salignac's door; she was dressing to ride in the Bois du Boulogne. The next day he tried two o'clock—the lady was parking. The third day, at three o'clock—the Countess was shopping. Charles had not foreseen all these engagements. His only comfort was loading and unloading his pistols. A few days now remained. "I will try every day," he said, "and yet when, when shall I find her alone, disengaged?" The unhappy youth would tear his hair, then dress himself and hurry to the house, just in time to see her covered with jewels and japonicas, glowing with beauty, step into her carriage and drive off, to delight other eyes, gladden other hearts. One day he took it in his head to go there in the afternoon. He hoped to find his capricious love just returned from the Bois de Boulogne, where, having been flattered into good humour by the compliments of her numerous admirers, and her heart perhaps softened by the sight of some tender lovers enjoying tele-a-tele, amidst the verdant alleys, he hoped to find her more disposed to favour his suit. He congratulated himself upon this happy idea. "Five o'clock," he cried, "that is the fatal hour. At six I shall return home an accepted lover," and he fired off one of his pistols. Some lurking presentiment induced him to allow the other to remain loaded. At six o'clock he came back, pale, haggard, wretched. He had found the Countess, stretched out on a sofa, reading or pretending to read.

He painted his love, and wretched state of suspense, in the most touching terms. The Countess laughed, turned her back, and wondered why dinner was so long coming, and when he urged her to make him happy, she in return urged him to hasten his repast. Charles rushed out of the room a fit of desperation.

The next day was the last, and Henrietta had invited him to attend her to the opera, on condition of being perfectly silent respecting his love. He made an attempt at eight o'clock in the evening to see her, but she was dressing for the opera. Charles, having seen his pistol loaded, and having left it on his table, followed his capricious but lovely mistress to the last scene of amusement he expected to visit on earth.

But, once seated by her side in the brilliant opera, the Viscount became completely absorbed by the music. He forgot his love and his pistol, and intent only on the heroine of the piece, with her he shed tears and with her rejoiced, till all recollections of his own misfortunes were merged in his delighted admiration of the pageant before him.

When Henrietta perceived, by his burning cheeks and kindling eyes, that even her charms for the present were disregarded, she took the alarm and even her flinty nature began to melt. The opera-house had never looked so brilliant, the ladies never so lovely, so beautifully dressed, the music never before sounded so delightfully, the dancers had never displayed such grace, all was enchantment, and the theme of every tongue was love.

The opera out, Charles escorted his fair cousin home. As he took her hand at the door, he felt it slightly tremble, and in her sweetest tones, she said—"Charles, why are you in such a hurry to say good night, will you not come in?"

"It is near midnight, Henrietta, and that is a fated hour." "Why so, my young cousin? Come, walk in, and tell me why it is you dislike the pretty sentimental hour of midnight."

As she finished this sentence, Charles found himself by her side on the sofa of her drawing room.

"Midnight, fair Countess," he said, "is the hour of crime. People steal at midnight, fight duels, commit suicides at midnight. Do not all poets call midnight the hour of spectres, of crime, of error, and were they not correct in doing so?"

"No, Charles, they were wrong. For poet, read liar. Tell me, then, grave Mentor, at what hour you young men leave the opera or the theatre; at what time you go to balls and concerts; at what time you fly to the round table, and empty bottles of champagne? Is not that hour midnight? And yet midnight, says the poets, is the hour of crimes and hobgoblins. P. s. e. Charles; I bet you are only in such a hurry to get rid of me this evening to go to some supper-party."

"You are right, madam, I am going to a supper-party."

"And you dare acknowledge it and you dare admit to my very face, and you prefer a supper-party to my company. Ah, then, for the future, I too shall hate the hour of midnight. But how I would bless, how I would cherish the hour when, abandoning for my sake the follies and vanities of a world, for which you were never made, bidding farewell to the frivolous, dissipated companions of your lighter hours, you would cast yourself at my feet, and as in the days of yore shed tears on my hand, vow that I was your world, and that death, instant death, should be your portion unless I smiled upon your love. That hour I would indeed bless and cherish, Charles; that, to me, would be the hour of unutterable happiness."

"Henrietta, dearest, loveliest, forgive me. I knew not what I said. Midnight is in truth, a happy, a joyful hour. I must have been mad, more than mad. What? dream of the morning, the afternoon, when midnight, dear midnight, was before me? What? hope to woo you—win you, in the very midst of your adorers, your never-ceasing engagements? I was indeed mad. Withdraw not that lily hand, my own bright eyed love. This very night, Henrietta, did I mean to terminate my wretched existence. Even now my pistols are loaded, they await me."

"Let them wait, Charles, let them wait. Do you think I would abet murder?"

And Charles said, and swiftly did the hours glide away, while the Viscount listened to the blushing confessions of Henrietta's love, and her dread of Matilda's censure.

When Marguerite sought her lady in the morning, she found the lovers still tete-a-tete on the sofa, busied framing a letter of excuse to the Countess's fellow hermit. Her waiting-maid held a letter in her hand, which she presented to her mistress, who crimsoned to the very temples when she recognized the hand-writing of Matilda.

But alas! we live in a world of dreams and illusions; we live in a world where truth is not a transient guest, where man lingers but an instant, and where every day offers but a contradiction to its predecessor. The first page of Matilda's letter was filled with dark philosophical reflections; the next was wet with tears; and in the third page she implored the Countess's pardon, but assured her the plan of Hermitage was a perfect absurdity, and could not be carried into execution; because, on the very next Sunday, a young and intelligent lawyer in the neighborhood, was to lead her to the hymenal altar. Alas, alas! women were, are, will be fickle.

THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE AND HIS PRINCESS.

Constantine was invariably dressed and visible at five in the morning; so that it was about half past four, that, uncomfortably rousing myself from a sound sleep, I dressed and accompanied Sass in his carriage to the Belvidere. It was a modern, country-gentleman's-looking villa, within half a mile of the town, and separated from the high road only by the width of its paved court, railed out with palisades and sentinelled by half a dozen soldiers of the regiment of Invalids. Every thing around looked cold, stern, and gloomy; for, though this was the usual hour of the levée, and one officer after another was arriving in order to present himself to the Duke, their demeanor was stiff and silent, and their salutations as cold as those of antagonists at an approaching duel. It was only with a silent smile that congratulations were received, and under their breath that a remark or a joke was ventured to be exchanged. Some half dozen recruits under the command of a serjeant were arranged like the puppets in a corner of the anti-room ready for inspection; while, standing here and there, most prim and starched, their hair, mustachios, stocks, and regimentals arranged to the last exactitude of the regulation, were those officers of the different corps stationed in the city who were on duty for the day; and three or four generals and aides-de-camp of his Imperial Highness moved noiselessly backwards and forwards from the room beyond. At last the folding-doors of the saloon were thrown open—every sound was hushed—every murmur stilled; and the Grand Duke himself, accompanied by those of his staff who were immediately about his person, entered the ante-chamber. In person, the Imperial Bear was tall and stout, very upright, with large limbs and a pair of broad shoulders, surmounted by as truculent a visage as the imagination could suggest;—a deep and overhanging brow, small swinish eyes, a short and upturned nose, through the nostrils of which you might almost look into his brain, a long upper-lip, a thick, heavy, and protruding lower one; so that when he smoked, the cigar was placed perpendicularly in his mouth; and the whole of these unprepossessing features dashed with the fierce and sullen expression of an untamed hyena, save that he showed no fangs: he might be about fifty years of age; for his hair was somewhat grizzled. His dress was the simple green uniform of a Russian general, white breeches, and the long boots of our lifeguards. He bowed slightly to the officers in attendance, passed on at once to Sass, and, glancing at me, addressed some remark to him in an under-tone, which was answered after the same fashion. He then strode over to that side of the room where I stood, and abruptly addressing me in French, asked me with a singular rapidity of utterance, and hardly allowing me to answer the questions he put, Who I was? What were my family? What I was? What I intended doing? Where I was going? What brought me to Warsaw? and a variety of other questions of the same bearing. I answered as quickly and shortly as I could, consistent with due respect; but he did not give me time to stand upon petty ceremonies, or even to make those statements which had been the object of my visit; for, having finished his category without affording me the slightest opening to commence an independent sentence, he strode off to examine the trowser-straps, buttons, mustachios, and general equipment of the recruits at the back of the room. The inspection concluded, and a few orders given to the officers in attendance, we were dismissed without further parley; and, as I accompanied Sass back in his carriage, I said confidently enough that I presumed there would be no further delay about my passport; but the meaning and silent smile which crossed his lips, although I did not interpret it in its true sense, was a sinister enough augury of what I might expect. Yes—day passed after day, and weeks enlarged themselves into months before the passport I had so long and vainly expected was placed in my hands. It was only afterwards that I was made aware that every passport passed under the eyes of the Grand Duke himself, and that every foreigner who might be merely journeying through Warsaw was either required by command, or induced under some specious pretext, to present himself to his Imperial Highness; and he himself, taking the office of political inquisitor into his own hands, catichized the new comer as to his life, habits, education, and intentions; and should he be unfortunate enough to please, he was likely, bon gré mal gré, and almost without being aware, to find himself tricked out one fine morning in all the trappings, lacings, and padding of a Russian uniform. Nor was this all; for once encased in this dress, adieu to home, country, and friends for the best and most active portion of his natural life. If, too, the unfortunate stranger should have been suspected of entertaining liberal opinions, (it was enough that he should be supposed to have come direct from France) he immediately became an object of the secret attentions of the Grand Duke's government: every step was dodged; every motion watched, and every word or opinion uttered by the supposed delinquent carefully registered and reported. Indeed the system of espionage in Warsaw was carried to an extent perfectly wonderful—perfectly diabolical—at the expense too of every natural and social tie: each class, each grade, each department of the State had its overseeing spies; some of whom I believe were the authorized agents of the Russian government, but by far the greater proportion, and particularly that department of the system to which I and persons in my situation became amenable, was an especial and private freak of the Grand Duke's, perfectly unauthorised by the Emperor, unwarranted by the government, and unknown to, or at least unacknowledged by the public. In short, it was a little stretch of his prerogative, if that term could be applied to the powers of one, who, simply commander of the forces in Warsaw, had, in defiance of the constitution, the laws, and the oath of the Emperor, arrogated to himself—in fact, usurped—the whole of the executive power. The constitution which was guaranteed to Poland as an independent kingdom declared, that the viceroyalty should be ever vested in a Polish nobleman of the imperial appointment; but this, like the great majority of the clauses in that unfortunate charter, soon became a neglected theory. Since the decease of the first and last viceroy, who died in 1825, the office has been in abeyance, the duties became a nullity, the place was intentionally left unfilled, and Constantine became the Dionysius of Poland. So much for constitutions manufactured at a congress and guaranteed at convenience by friendly powers. But I turn willingly from so miserable a picture of careless legislation and neglect on the one side, and broken faith on the other, which have made a brave people their victims.

By degrees, and by comparing the anecdotes which now and then flitted in whispers from mouth to mouth with the singular circumstances in which I was placed, it became sufficiently evident to me that my detention in Warsaw was owing, not to any real or supposed irregularity in my passport, but to some designing trickery or connivance on the part of Constantine; for many posts had arrived which might have brought back the expected document, and still the answer to my daily inquiries at the post-office was in the negative. At last the suspicions which I already entertained of some underhand dealing were confirmed, by my being made aware that every private letter which passed through the post-office was opened and read, and many detained or destroyed, under the especial orders, and sometimes the personal interference, of the Grand Duke; but still his repeated and marked attentions to me, the many private interviews with which he honoured me, and the kindness with which he found me a home when I stood most in need of it, (for Sass, at his request, took me into his house) tended rather to lull, when they ought, perhaps, to have awakened, any doubts I might have entertained as to his ultimate intentions towards me. It must be recollected too that, although I was a witness of much of his bearish roughness and intemperance in private, yet no instances of the wanton, and, I may almost say, diabolical spirit with which his public character was so deeply seared, had been brought under my immediate observations; so that it is not wonderful that I forgot, or to speak more correctly, hardly dreamt, that I was little better than a prisoner on parole in Warsaw. But, in spite of his kindness, I feared as well as mistrusted him:—dreading his violence of temper and suspecting his motives, I was never at ease in his presence, and always on thorns lest some ill-considered phrase or doubtful expression should rouse the angry passions of the slumbering bear; indeed, there were times when I almost trembled before him.

Three or four times a week I received commands to attend his levée, and not unfrequently invitations to breakfast,—a meal which he commonly took about eleven o'clock in the day. On these occasions he seemed to take considerable pleasure in all I could tell him of England and its modes and customs—its army, its capital, and its domestic and commercial resources. If on some of these subjects I confessed my ignorance, he would eye me, with a doubting and suspicious glance, urge me again and again on the same point, as if he thought I was unwilling to explain, or expressly reserved that of which I regret I was utterly ignorant; or he would dash up in a towering passion, break into some intemperate expression, and declare that I ought to be ashamed of myself not to be acquainted with statistics, which even foreigners knew well. In these fierce moods, in these sudden and unforeseen accessions of passion, he was with difficulty pacified—a task upon which I never dared venture—I could only look on and listen in silence; but if his elegant and amiable princess was present, as was not unfrequently the case, her graceful tenderness and endearments calmed down the storm: she petted him like a froward child, and with a doubting pause or a half-muttered growl his good-humour returned. This charming and accomplished creature was his wife, by one of those left-handed marriages so common and well understood among the German princes; and it was always a matter of surprise to me by what strange freak of destiny a being so mild and gentle in manner, so graceful, so tender and amiable in all the acts and movements of her life, could have been linked to such a monster; and what seems stranger still, she loved him, and thence, perhaps, the secret of her influence. I have seen him often playing with her long ringlets, or fondling in his great paw the prettiest and whitest hand in the world, or kissing his hand to her at a window with an air that actually approached to tenderness. She, indeed, was the only person who possessed any real influence over his mind, and her gentle ways could sooth the wild beast in his angriest moods; she would follow him as he stamped about the room: she expostulated, she wheedled, she caressed, she would try with a tear in her eye to make him laugh; and it would seem that, almost in spite of himself, the smile she sought so anxiously came at her bidding; he would look into her eyes, kiss her little hand, and seat himself again without another allusion to the cause of the explosion. He seemed almost to encourage her interference, and he played with her as a child would with a doll, but she was a plaything with which he never quarrelled. He seemed proud too of her mental acquirements, and he delighted in the display of her accomplishments. Indeed, I at one time attributed it as a principal cause why I was so often an invited guest at the Belvidere, that it afforded her the opportunity of speaking English,—an accomplishment in which she excelled: she possessed considerable fluency, and that least possible smack of a foreign accent which could not be otherwise than pleasing on the lips of a pretty woman. Constantine took great pleasure in setting us talking in that language,—rubbed his hands, and listened with evident gratification as she prattled away in a tongue which he did not understand, and continued repeatedly to express his pleasure and satisfaction.

His tenderness for this mild and gentle being was at least a redeeming point in his character, and his attachment was repaid on her part by the most devoted and entire affection. Poor thing! his death broke the slight cord which attached her to life;—whether it was that her whole soul, her existence was wrapped up in him who had raised her from comparative obscurity almost to a throne, or whether it was that she missed the being who, however harsh and cruel to others, was always after his fashion kind to her,—whom she had been so long accustomed to cajole, to fondle, to guide, to moderate,—the link was severed—her gentle heart broke under the shock, and, after hardly two months of a painful widowhood, she sunk into the grave which had received her husband.

Meanwhile the term of my acquaintance with this remarkable person, if acquaintance it could be called, between an imperial prince and an unknown foreigner, was fast drawing to a close; and a single act of mine, as I have since had reason to believe, decided Constantine to open to me at last the barriers of Warsaw. At an audience to which I had been expressly summoned, he asked me, without periphrases, or the slightest attempt to lead the conversation to the desired point, whether I would enter the Russian service; and as I almost feared that my immediate and unhesitating refusal would have thrown him again into one of his intemperate fits, I was agreeably enough surprised that, instead of the burst of passion I had anticipated, he only repeated the question in his usual impatient manner, concluding the query with an impatient "Yes or no?" I repeated my decisive refusal, and with a dissatisfied grunt he turned from me and left the saloon—a signal of course for me to leave the Belvidere. My memory does not exactly satisfy me whether this was the last interview with which I was honoured; indeed, one other audience I must have had, though simply to take leave; but of this I am sure,—that in no way was this subject ever renewed, or even alluded to by the Grand Duke; he seemed to have dismissed it from his mind altogether; and if the object of obtaining a recruit to his service had ever been one of the causes of my detention, it appears singular enough that neither in person nor by means of those who through force and fraud were ever ready to do his bidding, should he have made another effort to attain the point which my conjecture has attributed to him.

Be that as it may, a short time only had elapsed after the occurrence I have mentioned, when, on my inquiry as usual at the post-office for letters from Vienna, the packet containing the long-expected passport was handed to me. Young S—, the son of the Prince's favourite, had happened to accompany me on this errand; and as we discovered that the Viennese postmark differed materially in date from that of the delivery, he, evidently not in the secret, questioned the official closely on this remarkable discrepancy; and only to his reiterated questions, and ultimately a threat of complaint to the Grand Duke, was it reluctantly admitted that the packet on its arrival had been detained from me by the express command of his Imperial Highness, and had been forwarded to the Belvidere, where it had remained nearly three weeks! I leave to those, who may have had better opportunities than I of knowing Constantine's character, the task of explaining this infamous proceeding. I leave to his admirers, if such exist, the office of finding apologies for such an unprecedented disregard of the private relations of life, for such a flagrant breach of the social rights of individuals; not that mine was a singular instance, for I have assured reasons to believe that such was the every-day practice in the post-office of Warsaw. But I had no time then for reflection, still less for remonstrance, for I was too glad and anxious to use my recovered liberty; and I hastened to fly from the deadly influence of a government where open violence was abetted by secret treachery,—where tyranny based its throne upon fraud and espionage,—where usurpations mocked at the guarantees of the whole of Europe.

For Constantine himself, I was never able to overcome the disgust with which his character inspired me; for although, as I have said, no striking instances of his violent and wanton cruelty were obtruded upon my observation, evidences there were enough in every corner of the capital of his crushing oppression; and anecdotes were too ripe and too well authenticated not to produce their impression upon my mind. It were useless to relate how he compelled an unfortunate officer of Dragoons to leap again and again over a pyramid of bayonets until both horse and man sunk dead with the last effort; or how he shot a Saxon postillion dead on the spot, with the most Irish intention of inducing him to drive faster:—these with his diabolical treatment of a respectable female who was so unfortunate as to attract his attention, and his systematic persecution of his first wife, with a hundred others, were true tales, which, although only whispered in secret and under the breath in Warsaw, have long since been current through the rest of the Continent. His cowardice, too,—for that vice must always form an integral part of such a character as his,—was sufficiently evinced not only by the low and shameful practices by which he so long guarded his usurped dominion, but by his last exertion of authority in Warsaw. He left his favourite generals and aides-de-camp—those whose attachment to his person gave them at least some claims upon his consideration—to be cut down by an infuriated and successful mob; while he, coward-like, fled the palace through a secret passage from his bed-chamber. The lives of his brave and devoted adherents had gained him time to place his person in safety. Among the first fell Sass. Poor Sass! though circumstance had placed him in a most unenviable position, his heart was in the right place: at least he deserved a better fate than to throw away his life for a tyrant. The master's hour was not yet come: and it was only in the effort to re-acquire by the Russian bayonet what he had lost by his own tyranny and oppression, that perhaps a violent, at least a painful and unregarded death closed a life of violence;—and the character of Constantine now belongs to the history of the Polish Revolution.

We shall say of him, that though he must have possessed some good points in private, (else where could the undoubted devotion of his second wife and the forgotten and overborne in that deadly and all-pervading stain, that wantonness of spirit, which attaining no end of government and adding nothing to his power, can only be termed a sensual appetite for cruelty. Posterity will mark him as the Dionysius, or rather the Nero, of Modern Europe.

For the Poles themselves, an utter disregard of their civil rights and constitutional privileges, a long series of unequalled oppressions, and a wanton trifling with the dearest feelings of human nature, forced them into a last though vain effort for freedom. Smarting with their injuries, heart-seared with a sense of their wrongs, in despite of tyranny and in hopelessness of contumacy, the Poles waged their existence against success, and rushed into revolt. "These were the reasons why the people rose." Who of us can forget how nearly that essay was successful? how boldly and how long the unequal struggle was maintained? Indeed, but for the treachery of some and the timidity of others among the nations of Europe, Poland might now have been numbered among her independent kingdoms. Alas! Le bon jour ne reviendra jamais.

ELEGIAC STANZAS

On the Death of Sarah M. S*.

As our bright summer-birds go back
To some more kindly, constant sky—
With buoyant wing on homeward track,
Singing sweet farewells as they fly—
Leaving us when our summer time
Would almost seem a southern clime;
So hast thou gone! thy pathway brief
Was here a garden-spot of flowers—
With not a fading flower or leaf,
To dim its green, luxuriant bowers,
Where hope in constant sunshine played,
And Eden-like the future made.
'Tis sad, when our sweet birds away,
Flit from the colder breezes near;
But who, O! who would have them stay
Drooping and trembling sufferers here,—
With weary, wet, and folded wing—
And wo in every note they sing!
So, thoughts of thee, should scarce be grief,
Remembering thy far happier lot—
An earthly pilgrimage so brief—
A resting-place, where sin is not;—
A home in the bright spirit-land—
White garments, like the seraph band.
A happy lot! thy spirits' gem,
Scarce sullied from the hand divine,
Beset in Heaven's own diadem
Of sinlessness, shall shine—
With ever-added lustre, given
From the great throne of light in Heaven. C.

"It has been said, that man possesses three natures; a vegetable one, which is content merely to exist; an animal one, which destroys; and an intellectual one, which creates." The animal excels the vegetable nature; the intellectual one soars above both, and this it is the peculiar providence of man to cultivate and improve.

"STOP MY PAPER."—Of all the silly, shortsighted, ridiculous American phrases this, as it is frequently used, is the most idle and unmeaning. We are called an infant nation, and truly we often individually conduct ourselves like children. We have a certain class of subscribers who take the Mirror and profess to like its contents till, by-and-by, an opinion meets their view with which they do not agree. What do they, then, in their sagacity. Turn to their nearest companion with a passing comment upon the error they think they have detected? or direct a brief communication to the editor, begging to dissent therefrom in the same pages where the article which has displeased them has appeared? No. Get into a passion, and, for all we know, stamp and swear, and instantly, before the foam has time to cool on their lip, write a letter, commencing with—"stop my paper!" If we say rents are exorbitantly high and landlords should be too generous to take advantage of an accidental circumstance—round comes a broad hat and gold-headed cane, with "Sir, stop my paper!"—Does an actor receive a bit of advice? The green room is too hot to hold him till relieved by those revengeful words—"stop my paper!" If we ever praise one, some envious rival steals gloomily in—with—"sir, if you please, stop my paper!" We dare not hope to navigate the ocean with steamboats, but our paper is "stopped" by a ship-captain. Our doctor nearly let us die the other day because a correspondent had praised an enemy of "our college," and we expect a "fieri facias" in the office presently, on account of something which we understood somebody had said against some law suit in, we do not remember what court. But all these affairs were out-done the other day by the following:

We were sitting in our elbow-chair ruminating on the decided advantage of virtue over vice, when a little withered Frenchman, with a cowhide as long as himself and twice as heavy, rushed into our presence. "Sair!" and he stopped to breathe.

"Well, sir,"
"Monsieur!" he stopped again to take breath.
"Diable Monsieur!" and he flourished his instrument about his head.

"Really, my friend," said we, smiling, for he was not an object to be frightened about, "when you have perfectly finished amusing yourself with that weapon, we should like to be the master of our own leisure."
"No, sair: I have come to horsewhip you wis dis cowhide?"

We took a pistol from a drawer, cocked it, and aimed it at his head.

"Pardon, sair;" said the Frenchmen, "I will first give you some explanation. Monsieur, if you have write dis article?"

We looked it over and acknowledged ourself the author. It was a few lines referring to the great improvements in rail-roads, and intimating that this mode of travelling would one day supersede every other.

"You have write dat in your papair?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, den, sair—"stop you dem papair." I have live quarante-neuf ans. I have devote all my life to ride de balloon!—c'est ma grande passion. Bien, Monsieur! I shall look to find every one wis his littel balloon—to ride horseback in de air—to go round de world in one summair, and make me rich like Monsieur Astair, wis de big hotel. Well, Monsieur, now you put piece in your dem papair to say dat de rail-road, monsieur, de littel rail road, supersede—voila "supersed." Dat is what you say—supersede every thing else. Monsieur, begar I have de honnair to inform you dat de rail road nevair supersede be balloon—and also, monsieur—ventre-bleu! "stop you dem papair!"

FAREWELL.

261

It tells of pleasure past away,
It tells of future sorrow
That summer smil'd on yesterday,
And winter frowns to-morrow.
Around the heart, it seems to throw,
A melancholy spell,
Of mingled memory and of woe,
Then do not say farewell.

Had anger chid, or doubt mislead,
That word than both were stronger;
It sounds like voices from the dead,
Which can offend no longer.
And when upon the parting hour,
No angry passions dwell,
And love, and grief, alone have power,
Then do not say farewell.

ELNATHAN YARDSTICK.

As the morning sun was exposing his countenance for about the thousandth time since Elnathan Yardstick had left the employment of his old master, and set up in the 'dry goods-line' for himself, the said Elnathan was seen to issue from his father's mansion, and wend his way shopward, with a strap-encircled bundle of account books under one arm, a small leather brass-nailed trunk in his opposite hand, and the iron key to his repository of earthly goods and chattels, peeping from the aperture of his coat pocket. The morning was unusually complacent—dew-drops hung quivering yet upon the grass, the earliest bird had warbled her matins at the azure gate of Heaven, the slumbering waters reflected each contiguous object with all the precision of a polished mirror, and the white smoke from every chimney was ascending perpendicularly and resting on the bright stillness of this placid sunrise. But the brow of Elnathan partook of none of that cheerfulness which so beautiful a scene ought to inspire; his hat was drawn moodily over his eyes, his nankins rested slovenly on the tops of his boots, his strides were long and ungraceful, and his blood suffused eyes, weary from the counting-room duties of the preceding evening, wore now a deadlier aspect than usual.

To-day, said he as he threw back the shutters, and laid by those iron bars, which with the assistance of sundry locks and bolts, usually protected his visible and tangible property from depredation—To-day I hope not to be intruded on by a thousand gossiping customers, who have no inclination to buy, and if they had, lack that very material article in trade known by the common cognomen of cash. If there is any thing truly vexatious in the long catalogue of 'ills that flesh is heir to,' it is this endless haggling with those who do not desire to purchase. So said Elnathan to himself as he earnestly plied the broom, that his floor might be relieved of his dusty diurnal deposits.

He uttered this sentiment, with an actual longing for its fulfilment—hoping for the occurrence of one day in four years, at the close of which he might say that his peace had remained unbroken by certain harpies in the shape of shoppers, who perambulate the streets, infest every retailing store, perplex every trader, and finally go away empty. But such a rarite was never intended to assist in promoting his happiness. Hour after hour, day after day, had he stood behind his counter, bowing in smiles to each visitor, stripping his shelves to complete nudity, brandishing his tripodal wand, and listening for orders to apply it to some of the various webs piled up around him—and almost as often had the heart-rending sound, 'I'll look farther,' rattled in his ear. A sale now and then, it is true, served to mollify his feelings; and notwithstanding he so frequently missed a trade, his hopes brightened at the appearance of each customer.

On this particular morning a glance at his note-book reminded him of a large amount of money to be paid at the Bank on the succeeding day; in default whereof, the fact to be blazed forth by the communicatives, that Elnathan Yardstick's paper had been dishonored! This he could not brook. Any thing reasonable he felt able to surmount; but the idea of a notarial protest was too much for his philosophy.

The two first hours of that morning were devoted to the drawing of bills, and anticipating their payment. Soon the streets began to display all the beauty, wealth and fashion of the town, 'going a-shopping.' Elnathan brushed his hair, rewashed his hands, put on his most smirking visage, and assumed his accustomed position, hoping for sales that might assist him in the discharge of his pending obligation. The visitations commenced—'Good morning, Mrs. B.' observed the knight of the buckram, as the first female apparition took off its silken bonnet and laid it aside for an hour's job—'what a delightful day we have!' 'Very fine,' said the respondent—'has thee any broadcloths?'—'Yes, ma'am—step this way if you please—what color Madam?' 'I'll look at some olive or brown.' A dozen pieces of each were thrown out for examination, and Elnathan moved quietly along to inquire into the wishes of another who had made her appearance. 'I'll see some of your shoes.' 'Yes ma'am; please to be seated; what size, madam?' 'Two and a half is my number.' 'Here are some small threes, that perhaps will suit.' Miss C.—tried them by hauling, stamping, prying with the shoe horn, and various other physical exertions, but to no purpose—the shoes had actually shrunk since their manufacture—Elnathan presented some fours; they were troubled with nearly the same degree of tightness. Some fives were reached, which she tried, and asked for half a size larger! 'Heavens,' thought the astonished shopkeeper, 'she must have a foot like an elephant's, and wants a shoe lasted on a lapstone!'—he handed number six—they fitted—'Good,' thought he, 'now for a trade!' 'What is the price?' asked his customer. 'Six-and-nine, ma'am'—'six and nine'—'six and nine! why they don't ask but a dollar nowhere.' 'But madam, these are of superior manufacture—they cost me six and sixpence.' 'They did, ha? well, I s'pose you'll take off the threepence and give in the facings?' 'Why, sooner than lose the sale you may take them.' 'Well, lay them by, and if I can't do better, I'll call and get them.' So that bargain slipped through his fingers; but, thought he, there is the old lady left yet.

'Well ma'am,' said Elnathan, coming up his foreleg with his fingers, 'do you find any cloths that suit you?' 'Not exactly: this ere piece comes the nearest,' answered the customer, pulling heavily back on the end of a roll, interwoven with about twenty other pieces, which she had tumbled and twisted together. 'What is the price, friend Yardstick?'—'Three and a half, ma'am,' said the elated tradesman, snapping the web between his thumb and finger; 'that ma'am is an English fabric, see what a fine, full, rich shade it has; that piece of goods cost me three dollars in Boston, ma'am, and it was considered the greatest bargain made in Kilby street for a month; there is no mistake about its importation; you may rest assured it is a foreign article.' Elnathan finished his string of praises in a breath, and stood waiting to know the number of yards desired. 'Well friend Yardstick, I'll like to have thee cut me a pattern of each—pin them on a piece of paper, with the price marked below, and let the boy carry them up to our house, for my husband always wants to look before he purchases.' Elnathan stood aghast. 'Ten dollars would not pay the damage done my cloths by the abominable pulling and stretching which they have undergone this forenoon,' he inwardly muttered; 'and now a sample from every piece, and all the other requisitions—and then fifty chances to one she'll buy at another shop.' The old lady had retired; and the merchant used up the remainder of the forenoon in complying with her demands.

The afternoon came, and brought its proportion of troubles; for no sooner had he uttered an anathema on his morning tormentors, and resumed his stand at the receipt of custom, than his counter was beset by a range of smiling faces, which might have been envied under almost any circumstances. One would like to look at some edging, another at some quilting, the third at some gloves, a fourth desired to examine some hosiery. Elnathan exhibited the latter—they would not do, she wanted Merino; he handed more, they were not ribbed; he tried again; they were the wrong color; once more said he, and another bundle was produced; they were of American fabric. 'I wish for an English article,' said his fair customer. Here they are said Elnathan. 'Oh these are not lace ancles, Mr. Yardstick.' Now, thought he why in the name of heaven could she not have asked in the first place for thick ribbed, blue, English, lace-angled, Merino hose, and not create so much trouble for nothing! At length, in this instance a bargain was happily effected.

Elnathan during this examination, employed the intervals of time in supplying various little commands, such as cutting a yard or two of tape for this, selecting a skein of thread for that, and listening to a dirty faced boy who came rushing up to the counter with Mother wallo's celts worth of leadies. 'Yes sir, did she say what size?' 'Lo she did.' 'Well, here they are.' She waits you to give her some elds of broadcloth, cause she's a good customer. 'Tell your mother we sell the ends of broadcloth for vestings.'

By the time this applicant had departed, two pretty little misses stepped up and enquired for calicoes. It was now towards night; Elnathan began to display, and his customers to scrutinize. This piece was a little too dark, this a little too light, that too large a figure, this not quite odd enough, and that they were afraid would wash out.

The tradesman dived away: this again was too gay, that too grave—one had a set figure, another some other fault. Elnathan grew restless, the blood struggle to burst through the epidermis of his phiz, when one of his visitors with a captivating smile, after having been informed she had examined every print in the store, said: 'Well, Mr. Yardstick, if you hain't got any odder calicoes than these, I'll take a pattern of each—and (aside to her companion) you had better get some patterns too, you are making patchwork, aint you?' The merchant breathed aloud, it was growing dark, and here he stood up to his arms in a morass of chintz, and more than one hundred samples to cut immediately.—While playing his scissors, and his teeth also in sympathy, his clerk entered with the intelligence that he had not collected a single bill; one would call one in a day or two, another had no money just at present, one would look over and see if it was right, another offered his note on six months, and so on.

The patterns were prepared and presented; the shutters ordered to be closed forthwith; but while looking for his hat our hero hears at his elbow, 'Here's the needles mother sent back, she wanted drilled eyes.—The furies drill her eyes, thought Elnathan, as he tossed the cent to the boy; and grasping his hat, rushed forth in a state bordering in insanity.

At an early hour he crawled into bed, hoping to bury in forgetfulness, the history of that day's journey towards independence, but he had scarcely fallen into that state, when a thousand hideous phantoms flitted by him in the shape of duns, bank-runners, bailiffs, lawyers and auctioneers; whole pieces of starched prints were rattling and whizzing across his brain; patterns of all kinds of woven merchandize were dropping from the ceiling, giving to his distorted fancy the idea of a calico snow storm; an ape-like figure sat at the foot of the couch, during his yellow eyeballs, and twirling a tail just a yard long, with his grinning visage encircled by a complete halo of lint and feathers; a hundred old women were crawling over him; piles of notes payable, with his own name appended, were dancing about the partitions, and playing about the heads of a couple of demon-faced constables, who had now clenched him and were menacing imprisonment. Elnathan in a frenzy of terror awoke from his horrid reverie; when he found his clerk shaking him by the arm, and stating that day had broke. 'It's not me then, that's broke,' exclaimed the dreamer—and he arose with new determinations, borrowed money to meet his payment that day, and took a solemn oath never to trust another person, or cut another pattern: he held to his vow, and in a few years became independent; showing to the world that it avails nothing to be dreadful clever in a dry goods shop.

"TRAITS OF THE ARABS."

1. The Khalif Omar one day asked Amru, the son of Modikerb the Zobeidee, to tell him the instances of the greatest cowardice, and greatest courage he had ever encountered. "As I was going one time to the chase," said Amru, "I found on the hearth a horse tied to a stake, a spear was standing upright beside it, and a man was lying on the grass, playing with his sword-belt. 'Have a care,' cried I, 'thou art a child of Death.' 'And who art thou?' said he, with a faltering voice. 'I am Amru, the son of Modikerb the Zobeidee, the hero, far-renowned among the Arab tribes.' Scarcely had I spoken these words when the man, with a cry, gave up the ghost. And this is the greatest instance of cowardice I ever met with. I was another time galloping my horse about the heath, here and there, without any fixed object. I met a blooming youth, who was come from Yemama; he greeted me.—I him, and I asked his name. 'I am,' said he, 'Hares, the son of Saad.' 'Have a care,' said I to him, 'thou art a child of Death.' 'And who art thou wretch! that darest to boast in that way?' 'I am Amru, the son of Modikerb, renowned among the Arabs.' 'Thy pedigree shall not protect thee,' cried he. We ran with our set haucers against each other—I struck him direct on the breast, but the stroke took no effect, and I received a severe blow on the head. 'Leave off, Amru,' cried he, 'take that as portion-fee, I will not defile myself with thy blood.' I felt humiliated, and would have preferred death a thousand times to the disgrace. Thrice we broke our lances and thrice was I humbled in the same manner. At length I prayed him to be my friend. 'I want not thy friendship," replied he; and this word humbled me more than all that had preceded. Yet I ceased not to urge him. "Ill fortune be on thee," said he, "thou knowest not that my way lays straight to the bloody death." "Be it so," said I; "I will go to it hand in hand with thee." We rode the length of a day together. In the evening we came to a tent—"Seest thou, Amru," said he, "yonder is the tent of bloody death. Dismount now and hold my horse, that I may get myself ready; or, if thou hadst rather, I will hold thine." I consented to act as groom and hold his horse. He went to the tent and called out a maiden, the most beautiful I ever beheld. He set her on a camel, and giving me the rein, said, "Lead her, I will escort her; or, if thou wilt, do thou escort, and I will lead her." I patiently took hold of the bridle of the camel, and led her. We thus went the whole night long; towards daybreak, the youth asked of me, "Amru, seest thou any thing?" "I see horsemen afar in the grey dawn." "If there be many of them," said he, "it signifies naught; but if there be only a few, the bloody death is among them." "I now see more plainly; there are only four of them." "Well, then, keep to the right, I will keep to the left." The four horsemen came nearer and nearer—it was the father of the maiden and her three brothers. They greeted us,—we them.—"Give up my daughter," cried the old man to the youth. "If I had intended to leave her," replied he, "I would not have carried her off." The maiden's eldest brother ran at the ravisher and fell dead at the first shock; the fate of the two other brothers was similar. The father lamented over his sons, and earnestly once more besought the youth to give him up his daughter. "If I had intended to leave her, I would not have carried her off," was his reply. They rushed on each other; the old man tore open the bosom of the youth, and he cleft the old man's skull. They fell together;—the combat gave me four spears and four horses. The maiden, whether she thought herself more bound to avenge the death of her father and brothers than that of her lover, rushed furiously at me. I was obliged, against my will, to defend myself from her blows—she fell beneath mine. That was the scene of the bloody death, the greatest instance of courage I ever met with."

2. The people of Kufa, in Arabia, had the reputation of being great misers, and every tale of a skin flint character was laid to their account. A traveller said he lodged one time in Kufa, and the master of the house did nothing all night long but turn his children from one side to the other in their beds. He asked him what he meant by it; and he replied, "If they lie on one side the internal heat increases, and digestion goes on too fast; so I turn them that I may save something at breakfast." A father at Kufa said to his son,—"Do as you see me doing,—instead of eating meat, hold your bread in the steam of your neighbour's pot."

3. A miser of Kufa hearing that there was a celebrated miser at Bassora, to whom all other misers might go to school, resolved to go and take lessons of him. He went and told him wherefore he was come. "Thou art welcome," said he of Bassora; "we will go now to the market to make purchases." They went to the baker.—"Hast thou good bread?" "At your service gentlemen, fresh and white as butter." "Thou seest," said he of Bassora to him of Kufa, "that butter is better than bread, which was compared to it; and we shall do better to get butter." They went to the butter seller, and asked if he had good butter. "At your service, butter fresh and sweet as the nicest oil of olives." "Thou hearest, said the host, "the best butter is compared with oil, which must be far preferable." They went to the oil merchant. "Hast thou good oil?" "The very best; bright and clear as water." "Ho! ho!" cried he of Bassora to him of Kufa, "then water is the best diet of all; I have a whole tubful of it at home, with which I will entertain thee nobly." And, in fact, he set nothing but water before his guest; since water was better than oil, oil than butter, and butter than bread. "God be praised!" said the miser of Kufa, "I have not made my journey in vain, but have learned something of value."

4. I came one time (said Asmai, the celebrated poet of the court of Haruner Rashid, to a tribe of Bedouins, in the wilderness. A crowd of women and girls hastened when they saw me, laid hold on the bridle of my camel, took me down, ungirt the beast, and tended and fed it.—For three days they entertained me in the most friendly manner; but, when, on the fourth, I prepared to depart, no one would help me to saddle my camel. I expressed surprise at this; and one of the maidens answered extempore.

"An honour 'tis for us the coming guest to serve,
But if we aid his flight disgrace we well deserve."

"5. The Arabs are in the habit of lighting fires in the wilderness, during the long dark nights, to direct travellers who are gone astray, and lead them to where they will be entertained. The name given to these fires is 'Fire of the Villages, or of Hospitality.' Asmai said that, one wild stormy night, he came to one of these fires, and found at it an Arab, who was cheering his slave to keep it up with these verses:—

"The night is bleak, the storm whirls high the sand,
Let then the blaze be seen wide o'er the land:
If wandering Sons of the Way it brings to me,
Thou shalt, my son, straightway a freeman be."

Asmai approached, and was received with the utmost hospitality. The slave who had kept up the fire was given the promised freedom on the spot. He abode there three days; every day a camel was killed, and Asmai was never troubled with the usual questions as to who he was, whence he came, and whither he was going. He expressed his surprise at this liberality to his host, who replied—

"If I ask not my guest whence and whither his way,
'Tis because I would have him here with me to stay."

"6. A well-known Arabian horse-stealer once related, as follows, what had befallen him in the desert:—I once, as I was astray in the desert, came to a tribe of Bedouins. They received me with great hospitality, and killed a camel every day on my account. I prayed them not to put themselves to such inconvenience, but to let me depart. Still they would not suffer me to go, and every day they killed a camel. At length one day I got an opportunity, drove off a fleet camel, mounted it, and went away with all speed. The owner, who saw me going off with his camel, mounted and pursued me. When he brought me back, he pointed to a snake that was lying in the sand, 'Seest thou,' said he, 'the tail of that snake there? I will hit it with this arrow.' He shot, and the arrow pierced the point of the tail. 'And with this arrow,' said he, as he drew forth a second, 'I will hit its head.'—He shot the snake's head in two. 'Thou seest now,' said he, 'that with this third arrow I should not miss thy breast, and thou dost deserve it for rewarding our hospitality with flight and robbery; but, since thou art our guest, go hence in God's name, and choose twenty camels to take with thee.'

"7. A hungry Bedouin, passing by where a rich Arab was eating his meal, thought how he might get a share of it. 'Whence comest thou, Bedouin?' said the Arab.—'From the tents of thy tribe.' 'Hast thou seen my son Osman?' 'He is jumping about like a young lion.'—'What is his mother about?' 'She is proud of her new clothes, and grows fatter and fatter every day.' 'And my red-haired camel?' 'Oh, he is as well as he can be and runs like the lightning.' 'And my trusty dog?'—'He lets no stranger go by in the dark, and he barks so loudly that it is a pleasure to hear him.' 'And my house?' 'It stands firmer and is more stately than ever.' The Bedouin, seeing that the inquirer was meantime finishing his meal without offering him a bit, changed his plan, to try if he could not reach the food by some other way. A dog happened to run by, 'What a difference,' said the Arab, 'between that dog and mine!'—'Ay' responded the Bedouin, 'if he were still alive.' 'What! is he no more?' said the Arab, 'and hast thou deceived me?' 'I did not wish to deprive thee of thy appetite,' said the Bedouin 'he is no more, and that because he ate too much of the flesh of thy camel.' 'Oh, heavens and is my camel dead, too? and how did he die?' 'He was killed at the grave of thy wife, the mother of Osman.' 'Great God! my wife, too, lost! what a calamity! and what then did she die of?' 'Of grief at the death of thy son.' 'Unhappy man! what sayest thou? my son?' 'Yes, thy son was killed by the house falling upon him.' The Arab cast himself in desperation on the earth, and rolled in the sand; while the Bedouin quietly despatched the rest of the food."

THE QUAKER.

In patriarchal plainness, lo! around
The festive board, a friendly tribe convene
Chaste, simple, neat and modest in attire,
And chaste simple in their manners too.
To them her gay varieties, in vain,
Fashion displays, inconstant as the moon;
Them to allure, in vain does cynic art
For human vestments multiply its dyes.
One mode of dress contents them; and but few
The colors of their choice—the gaudy shunn'd
E'en by the gentle sisterhood. In youth,
The rose's vivid hue their cheeks, alone,
Wear dimpling—shaded by a bonnet plain,
White as the cygnet's bosom—jetty black
As raven's wing—or, it a tint it bear,
'Tis what the harmless dove herself assumes.
The harder sex an unloop'd hat, broad-brimmed,
Shelters from summer's heat and winter's cold;
That from its station high ne'er deigns to stoop,
Obsequious nor to custom nor to king.
Yet, though precise, and primitive in speech,
Restrain they not the smile—the seemly jest—
Nor e'en the cordial laugh, that cynic's grave
Falsely assert "bespeaks a vacant mind."
Serenely gay, with generous ale they fill
The temperate cup; no want of new coin'd toast
To give it zest—Good fellowship and peace
Their sentiments—their object, and their theme.

From the Montreal Gazette. THE FALLS OF THE PASSAIC. BY WASHINGTON IRVING.

In a wild tranquil vale, fringed with forests of green,
Where nature had fashioned a soft sylvan scene,
The retreat of the ring dove, the haunt of the deer,
Passaic in silence roll'd gentle and clear.

No grandeur of prospect astonished the sight,
No abruptness sublime mingled awe with delight;
Here the wild flow'ret blossom'd, the elm proudly waved,

And pure was the current the green bank that laved.

But the spirit ruled o'er the thick tangled wood,
And deep in its gloom fixed his murky abode,
Who loved the wild scene that the whirlwinds deform,
And gloried in thunder, and lightning, and storm;

All flushed from the tumult of battle he came,
Where the red men encountered the children of flame;
While the noise of the war-whoop still rang in his ears,
And the flesh bleeding scalp as a trophy he bears.

With a glance of disgust, he the landscape surveyed
With its fragrant wild flowers, its wild-waving shade;
Where Passaic meanders through margins of green—
So transparent its waters, its surface serene.

He rived the green hills, the wild woods he laid low;
He taught the pure stream in rough channels to flow;
He rent the rude rock, the steep precipice gave,
And hurled down the chasm the thundering wave!

Countless moons have since rolled in the long lapse of time—

Cultivation has softened those features sublime;
The axe of the white man has lightened the shade,
And dispelled the deep gloom of the thicketed glade.

But the stranger still gazes with wondering eye,
On the rocks rudely torn, and groves mounted on high;

Still loves on the cliff's dizzy borders to roam,
Where the torrent leaps headlong embosomed in foam!

View of the Columbia Rail-road Bridge, over the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia.

The construction of this bridge, designed to carry across the Schuylkill, the Philadelphia and Columbia Rail-road, was commenced in 1831, under the direction of the Canal Commissioners, the whole work being undertaken by the authority, and at the expense of the State. The first contractors made but little progress before they abandoned the undertaking, probably because they had not carefully ascertained the difficulties of the enterprise, and because their contract price was too low. The second contractors, for these or similar reasons, also gave up the work before any considerable progress had been made. It was then placed in the charge of Messrs. Dodd, Bishop & Britton, by whom it was finally completed in 1834.

The design of the bridge was drawn by Major Long, assisted, as we understand, by H. R. Campbell, Esq. Mr. Babb was the sub-contractor for constructing the frame work. The dimensions of the bridge are as follows.

Whole length	1060 feet
Width	60 feet 6 inches
Height, above the water, about	62 feet.
Height of the roof from the floor, about	15.

Complaints have been made that the roof of the bridge is too low, as individuals seated on the top of burden cars are liable to accident in coming in contact with the upper frame work of the bridge. This defect may, however, be remedied by raising the roof. The frame work is neat and substantial, and the masonry of the piers remarkably imposing. The upper side of the bridge is occupied by two tracts of rails; the lower, or southern side is thrown open for vehicles, and the centre is appropriated to foot passengers.

The piers are six in number, besides the two abutments. They stand in a diagonal position to the stream. In sinking these piers, steam engines were used for pumping the water from the coffer dams. In excavating for the pier nearest the eastern shore, at the depth of thirty feet, the stump of a tree was found completely embedded in the soil. This fact may show that the course of the stream has been diverted, considerably, from its original channel. Below high water level the masonry was laid in Roman cement, rendering the work impervious to water.

The cost of the Bridge has been stated to us as follows.

Wood work	$15,000
Piers, average of each	10,000
Whole cost of piers and bridge	180,000

This plate gives another view of the bridge noticed above, taken from a point that exhibits the inclined plane, a very important feature in the enterprise for the completion of which the Bridge was rendered necessary.

The inclined plane is five-eighths of a mile in length, and has a rise of 184 feet, equal to 1 inch in the foot. Cars are drawn up the plane, upon which there are two tracks, by a steam engine of sixty horse power, stationed at the top. One train ascends, while another is let down, the operations being very skilfully directed by a superintendent occupying the north wing of the arch sketched in the left corner of the engraving.—This superintendent, Mr. Thomas, who lost a hand by an accident at one of the piers, has a py-glass which enables him distinctly to observe all proceedings at the bottom of the plane, and to tell when the cars are ready for the ascent. His signal regulates the steam engine, and all the operations on the plane, which, to those not familiar with works of this description, are of a very interesting character.

The great expense and labour necessarily connected with the plane, and the detentions and accidents to which passengers and merchandise are liable, are, however, very serious objections against the adoption of inclined planes when they can possibly be avoided. Already a company has been organised for constructing a road from the city, to some point on the Columbia Rail-road, eight or ten miles from the Bridge, so as to avoid the sudden rise of the plane, and dispense with the stationary engine. This company, the West Philadelphia Rail-road company, have satisfactorily ascertained the feasibility of their project, and it will undoubtedly be pushed forward to a speedy completion.

The scenery on the Schuylkill, in the vicinity of the bridge, is of a very interesting and picturesque character. Peters's Island, immediately above the Bridge, is a beautiful little spot, and the rich foliage on the undulating banks of the river, and the many fertile farms and handsome country seats, extending in all directions as far as the eye can reach, give this neighborhood strong attractions for those who love the quiet, romantic and fascinating scenery of the ever-delightful Schuylkill. The river is enlivened, upon almost every fair day, by the crews of some of our numerous boat clubs, who row hither for recreation or pleasure, and their merry and enlivening sports, together with the spirit-stirring notes of the boatman's horn, proceeding to the city with the rich produce of the interior, or to the west with a valuable cargo of merchandise, give life and animation to the whole scene. As a place of resort for a leisure afternoon, there are few places in the vicinity of our city, more agreeably diversified by attractive and exciting associations.

THE JUVENILE PROFESSOR.

Ah, who can trace the March of Mind,
Its rapid strides, its light'ning joggings;
Driven on by IMPETUS behind,
The pedagogue's unwearied floggings.

With what delight a future race
The mental triumph will behold,
And every branch of science trace
In chubby boys of five years old.

Then tender little babes at nurse
Will warble music's mellowest tunes,
An infant's string heroic verse,
As modern lads string cherry-stones.

Then thirst for knowledge nought shall tame,
And genius will require no spur;
While unbreech'd bantlings shall exclaim,
"How ignorant our fathers were!"

If then thy grizzly ghost O Brougham!
A ghost so grim that none would quiz it,
Should steal at midnight from the tomb,
The pale moon's glimpses to revisit.

How it will cheer thy dingy sprite,
The "Boy Professor" to inspect,
And hail, with unalloy'd delight,
The wond'rous walk of intellect.

"Three centuries back (says History's Pages)
Science was darkness all and doubt;
Yet, even in that vile barbarous age,
The Schoolmaster was peeping out.

My studies I awhile must drop—
Grotius! a slice of gingerbread,
And let me have my humming-top!"

REVOLUTIONARY PAPERS.

No. I.

Reception of the Declaration of Independence at New York, July 11, 1776.—This day, the Declaration of Independence was read at the head of each brigade, of the continental army, posted at and near this city, and every where received with loud huzzas, and the utmost demonstrations of joy.

In the evening the equestrian statue of George III, which tory pride and folly raised in the year 1770, was, by the sons of freedom, laid prostrate in the dirt; the just desert of an ungrateful tyrant! The lead wherewith this monument was made, is to be run into bullets, to assimilate with the brain of our infatuated adversaries, who to gain a pepper corn, have lost an Empire.*

Trenton, July 8, 1776.—This day the "Declaration," was proclaimed here, to the evident satisfaction of all that heard it read. The members of the Provincial Congress, the gentlemen of the committees, the officers and privates of the militia under arms, and a large concourse of the inhabitants attended on this great and solemn occasion.

Princeton, July 10.—Last night Nassau Hall was grandly illuminated, and Independancy proclaimed under a triple volley of musketry, and universal acclamation for the prosperity of the United States. The ceremony was conducted with the greatest decorum.

On the 15th of July, 1776.—The Declaration was read at New York, at the State House, to a numerous and respectable body of freeholders, and principal inhabitants of the city and county, which was received with general applause and heartfelt satisfaction, and at the same time, our late king's coat of arms was brought from the Hall, where his courts were commonly held, and burned amidst the acclamations of thousands of spectators.

Boston, July 25, 1776.—Thursday last, (18th,) pursuant to an order of the honourable council, was proclaimed from the balcony of the State House in this town, the Declaration of the American Congress, absolving the United Colonies from their allegiance to the British crown, and declaring them free and independent states. There were present on the occasion, in the council chamber, the committee of council, a number of the honourable house of representatives, the magistrates, ministers, selectmen, and other gentlemen of Boston, and the neighbouring towns; also the commission officers of the continental regiments stationed here, and other officers. Two of these regiments were under arms in King street, formed into three lines on the north side of the street, and in thirteen divisions; and a detachment from the Massachusetts regiment of artillery, with two pieces of cannon, was on their right wing. At one o'clock the Declaration was proclaimed by Colonel Thomas Crafts, which was received with great joy, expressed by three huzzas from a great concourse of people assembled on the occasion. After which, on a signal given, thirteen pieces of cannon were fired from the fort on Fort-hill; the forts at Dorchester-Neck, the Castle, Nantasket, and Point Alderton, likewise discharged their cannon: Then the detachment of artillery fired their cannon thirteen times, which was followed by the two regiments giving their fire from the thirteen divisions in succession. These fires corresponded to the number of the American States United.

The bells in town were rung on the occasion, and

*Lord Clare in the House of Commons, declared that a pepper corn, in acknowledgment of Britain's right to tax America, was of more importance than millions without it.

undissembled festivity cheered and brightened every face.

On the same evening the king's arms, and every sign with any resemblance of it, whether lion and crown, pestle and mortar and crown, heart and crown, &c. together with every sign that belonged to a tory was taken down, and made a general conflagration of in King street.

To heighten the general joy, a large ship captured by an American privateer was brought in during the ceremonies.

Portsmouth, N. H. July 20. On the 18th inst. the Independent company under Col. Shelburne, and the Light Infantry company under Col. Langdon, were drawn up on parade, in their uniforms, when the Declaration of Independence from the grand continental congress was read, in the hearing of a numerous and respectable audience; the pleasing countenances of the many patriots present spoke a hearty concurrence in this interesting measure, which was confirmed by loud huzzas, and all conducted in peace and good order.

In Baltimore on the 29th of July.—The Declaration was read at the Court House, to a large body of militia and inhabitants of the town and vicinity, which was received with great joy. At night the town was illuminated, and the effigy of the king carted through the town and committed to the flames amidst the acclamations of many hundreds. The just reward of a tyrant.

Ticonderago, N. Y. July 28.—To-day, immediately after divine worship, the Declaration was read by Col. St. Clair, and having said, "God save the Independent States of America!" the army manifested their joy with hearty cheering. It was remarkably pleasing to see the spirits of the soldiers so raised, the language of every man's countenance was, now we are a people! we have a name among the nations of the world.

At Charleston, S. C. Annapolis, Md. Williamsburg, Va.—The Declaration was received with universal joy.

Declaration of Virginia, May 18, 1776.—For as much as all the endeavours of the United Colonies, by the most decent representations and petitions to the king and parliament of Great Britain, to restore peace and good security to America under the British government, and a re-union with that people upon just and liberal terms, instead of a redress of grievances, have produced, from an imperious and vindictive administration, increased insults, oppression, and a vigorous attempt to effect our total destruction. By a late act, all these colonies are declared to be in rebellion, and out of the protection of the British crown, our properties subjected to confiscation; our people, when captured, compelled to join in the murder and plunder of their relations and countrymen, and all former rapine and oppression of Americans declared legal and just. Fleets and armies are raised, and the aid of foreign troops engaged to assist these destructive purposes. The king's representative in this colony hath not only withheld all the powers of government from operating for our safety, but, having retired on board an armed ship, is carrying on a piratical and savage war against us; tempting our slaves, by every artifice, to resort to him, and training and employing them against their masters. In this state of extreme danger, we have no alternative left but an abject submission to the will of those overbearing tyrants, or a total separation from the crown and government of Great Britain, uniting and exerting the strength of all America for defence, and forming alliances with foreign power for commerce and aid in war; wherefore, appealing to the Searcher of Hearts for the sincerity of former declarations, expressing our desire to preserve the connection with that nation, and that we

MRS. TROLLOPE'S WORK ON FRANCE.

Paris and the Parisians, in 1825.

Mrs. Trollope has here produced two pleasant enough gossiping volumes—though occasionally rather wire-drawn, and containing much commonplace in the way of opinion. Still, there is a good deal of amusement of the following cast.

Suicide à la mode.—"It is not long since two young men—mere youths—entered a restaurant, and bespoke a dinner of unusual luxury and expense, and afterwards arrived punctually at the appointed hour to eat it. They did so, apparently with all the zest of youthful appetite and youthful glee. They called for champagne, and quaffed it hand in hand. No symptom of sadness, thought, or reflection of any kind, was observed to mix with their mirth, which was loud, long, and unremitting. At last came the café noir, the cognac, and the bill: one of them was seen to point out the amount to the other, then both burst out afresh into violent laughter. Having swallowed each his cup of coffee to the dregs, the garçon was ordered to request the company of the restaurateur for a few minutes. He came immediately, expecting, perhaps, to receive his bill, minus some extra charge which the jocund but economical youths might deem exorbitant. Instead of this, however, the elder of the two informed him that the dinner had been excellent, which was the more fortunate, as it was decidedly the last that either of them should ever eat; that for his bill, he must, of necessity, excuse the payment of it, as, in fact, they neither of them possessed a single sou: that upon no other occasion would they thus have violated the customary etiquette between guest and landlord; but that, finding this world, its toils and its troubles, unworthy of them, they determined once more to enjoy a repast of which their poverty must for ever prevent the repetition, and then—take leave of existence forever! For the first part of this resolution, he declared that it had, thanks to his cook and his cellar, been achieved nobly; and for his last, it would soon follow—for the café noir, besides the little glass of his admirable cognac, had been medicated with that which would speedily settle all their accounts for them. The restaurateur was enraged. He believed no part of the rhodomontade but that which declared their inability to discharge the bill, and he talked loudly, in his turn, of putting them into the hands of the police. At length, however, upon their offering to give him their address, he was persuaded to let them depart. On the following day, either the hope of obtaining his money, or some vague fear that they might have been in earnest in the wild tale that they had told him, induced this man to go to the address they had left with him; and he there heard that the two unhappy boys had been that morning found lying together hand in hand, on a bed hired a few weeks by one of them. When they were discovered, they were already dead and quite cold. On a small table in the room lay many written papers, all expressing aspirations after greatness that should cost neither labour nor care, a profound contempt for those who were satisfied to live by the sweat of their brow, sundry quotations from Victor Hugo, and a request that their names and the manner of their death might be transmitted to the newspapers."

Old Maids.—"Several years ago, while passing a few weeks in Paris, I had a conversation with a Frenchman upon the subject of old maids, which, though so long past, I refer to now for the sake of the sequel, which has just reached me. We were, I remember, parading in the Gardens of the Luxembourg; and, as we paced up and down its long alleys, the 'miserable fate,' as he called it, of single women in England was discussed and deplored by my compaare driven from that inclination by their wicked councils, and the eternal laws of self preservation:

Resolved, unanimously, That the delegates appointed to represent this colony in general congress, be instructed to propose to that respectable body, to Declare the United Colonies free and Independent States, absolved from all allegiance to, or dependence upon the crown or parliament of Great Britain; and that they give the assent of this colony to such declaration, and to whatever measures may be thought proper and necessary by the congress for forming foreign alliance, and a Confederation of the Colonies, at such time, and in the manner, as to them shall seem best. Provided, that the power of forming government for, and the regulations of the internal concerns, of each colony, be left to the respective colonial legislatures.

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to prepare a Declaration of Rights, and such a plan of government as will be most likely to maintain peace and good order in this colony, and secure substantial and equal liberty to the people.

Edmund Pendleton, President.

In consequence of the above resolutions, universally regarded as the only door which will lead to safety and prosperity, a number of gentlemen of Williamsburg, where the convention was holden, made a handsome collection for the purpose of treating the soldiery, who next day were paraded in Waller's Grove, before Brigadier Gen. Lewis, attended by the gentlemen of the committee of safety, the members of the general convention, the inhabitants of the city, &c.—The resolutions were read aloud to the army, and received with acclamations by all present. Several toasts were given, among which was the following,—"The American Independent States."

The Union Flag of the American States waved upon the Capitol during the whole of this ceremony. Every one seemed pleased that the domination of Great Britain was now at an end, so wickedly and tyrannically exercised for these twelve or thirteen years past, notwithstanding our repeated prayers and remonstrances for redress. The evening concluded with illuminations and other demonstrations of joy. The number of members present at the adoption of the above was 112.

Scarcity of Lead.—In consequence of the war with Great Britain, almost all the lead in the colonies that could be procured, has been run into bullets for the army. In New Jersey a committee was appointed "to collect all the leaden weights, from windows and clocks, and all the leaden weights of shops, stores and mills, also all other lead in and about houses and other places."

Manner of recruiting, as practised in England in 1775 a "6—Salisbury, May 27, 1776.—On Thursday a number of felons in our goal, under sentence of transportation, were relieved on condition of their entering into the 27th regiment of foot, to serve his majesty in America against his rebellious subjects, which they agreed to, and were enlisted.

United States Lottery.—This lottery was put on foot by a resolution of congress, passed at Philadelphia, the 18th of November 1776, for the purpose of raising a sum of money, on loan, bearing an annual interest of 4 per cent, which with the sum arising from the deduction (15 per cent,) is to be applied for carrying on the present (revolutionary) most just and necessary war, in defence of the lives, liberties, and property of the inhabitants of these United States.

It is a weary thing to look on the game and see how it might be won, while we are debarred by the caprice of others from the power of playing it according to our own skill.

nion as being one of the most melancholy results of faulty national manners that could be mentioned. 'I know nothing,' said he with much energy, 'that ever gave me more pain in society, than seeing, as I did in England, numbers of unhappy women who however well born, well educated, or estimable, were without a position, without an état, and without a home, excepting one that they would generally give half their remaining days to get rid of.' 'I think you somewhat exaggerate the evil,' I replied: 'but even if it were as bad as you state it to be, I see not why single ladies should be better off here.' 'Here!' he exclaimed, in a tone of horror: 'Do you really imagine that in France, where we pride ourselves on making the destiny of our women the happiest in the world,—do you really imagine, that we suffer a set of unhappy, innocent, helpless girls to drop, as it were, out of society into the néant of celibacy as you do? God keep us from such barbarity!' 'But how can you help it?' It is impossible but that such circumstances must arise to keep many of your men single: and if the numbers be equally balanced, it follows that there must be single women too.' 'It may seem so; but the fact is otherwise; we have no single women.' 'What, then, becomes of them?' 'I know not; but were any Frenchwoman to find herself so circumstanced, depend upon it she would drown herself.' 'I know one such, however,' said a lady who was with us: 'Mademoiselle Isabelle B is an old maid.' 'Est-il possible?' cried the gentleman, in a tone that made me laugh very heartily. 'And how old is she, this Mademoiselle Isabelle?' 'I do not know exactly,' replied the lady, 'but I think she must be considerably past thirty.' 'C'est une horreur!' he exclaimed again; adding, rather mysteriously, in a half whisper, 'trust me she will not bear it long!' * * * I had certainly forgotten Mademoiselle Isabelle and all about her, when I again met the lady who had named her as the one sole existing old maid of France. While conversing with her the other day on many things which had passed when we were last together, she asked me if I remembered this conversation. I assured her that I had forgotten no part of it. 'Well, then,' said she, 'I must tell you what happened to me about three months after it took place. I was invited with my husband to pay a visit at the house of a friend in the country—the same house where I had formerly seen the Mademoiselle B whom I had named to you. While playing écarté with our host in the evening, I recollected our conversation in the Gardens of the Luxembourg, and inquired for the lady who had been named in it. "Is it possible that you have not heard what has happened to her?" he replied. "No, indeed; I have heard nothing. Is she married, then?" "Married! alas, no! she has drowned herself!" Terrible as this denouement was, it could not be heard with the solemn gravity it called for, after what had been said respecting her. Was ever coincidence more strange! My friend told me, that on her return to Paris she mentioned this catastrophe to the gentleman who had seemed to predict; when the information was received by an exclamation quite in character,—"God be praised! then she is out of her misery!"

A visit to Notre Dame, to hear a celebrated preacher, is also characteristic.

"The organ pealed, the fine chant of the voices was heard above it, and in a few minutes we saw the archbishop and his splendid train escorting the host to its ark upon the altar. During the interval between the conclusion of the mass and the arrival of the Abbe Lacordaire in the pulpit, my sceptical neighbour again addressed me, 'Are you prepared to be very much enchanted by what you are going to hear?' said he. 'I hardly know what to expect,' I replied; 'I think my idea of the preacher was higher when I came here than since I have heard you speak of him.' 'You will find that he has a prodigious flow of words, much vehement gesticulation, and a very impassioned manner. This is quite sufficient to establish his reputation for eloquence among les jeunes gens.' 'But I presume you do not yourself subscribe to the sentence pronounced by these young critics?' 'Yes, I do; as far as at least, as to acknowledge that this man has not attained his reputation without having displayed great ability. But though all the talent of Paris has long consented to receive its crown of laurels from the hands of her young men, it would be hardly reasonable to expect that their judgment should be as profound as their power is great.' 'Your obedience to this beardless synod is certainly very extraordinary,' said I; 'I cannot understand it.' 'I suppose not,' said he, laughing: 'It is quite a Paris fashion; but we all seem contented that it should be so. If a new play appears, its fate must be decided by les jeunes gens; if a picture is exhibited, its rank amidst the works of modern art can only be settled by them: does a dancer, a singer, an actor, or a preacher, appear—a new member in the tribune, or a new prince upon the throne,—it is still les jeunes gens who must pass judgment on them all; and this judgment is quoted with a degree of deference utterly inconceivable to a stranger.' 'Chut!'—was at this moment uttered by more than one voice near us: 'le voilà!' I glanced my eye towards the pulpit, but it was still empty; and, on looking round me, I perceived that eyes were turned in the direction of a small door in the north aisle, almost immediately behind us. 'Il est entre là!' said a young woman near us, in a tone that seemed to indicate a feeling deeper than respect, and, in fact, not far removed from adoration. Her eyes were still earnestly fixed upon the door, and continued to be so, as well as those of many others, till it re-opened, and a slight young man in the dress of a priest prepared for the chaire appeared at it. A verger made way for him through the crowd, which, thick and closely wedged as it was, fell back on each side of him, as he proceeded to the pulpit, with much more docility than I ever saw produced by the clearing a passage through the intervention of a troop of horse. Silence the most profound accompanied his progress; I never witnessed more striking demonstration of respect: and yet it is said that three-fourths of Paris believe this man to be a hypocrite. As soon as he had reached the pulpit, and, while preparing himself by silent prayer for the duty he was about to perform, a movement became perceptible at the upper part of the choir; and presently the archbishop and his splendid retinue of clergy were seen moving in a body towards that part of the nave which is immediately in front of the preacher. On arriving at the space reserved for them, each noiselessly dropped into his allotted seat, according to his place and dignity, while the whole congregation respectfully stood to watch the ceremony, and seemed to 'Admirer un si bel ordre, et reconnaître l'église.' It is easier to describe to you every thing which preceded the sermon, than the sermon itself. This was such a rush of words, such a burst and pouring out of passionate declamation, that even before I had heard enough to judge of the matter, I felt disposed to prejudge the preacher, and to suspect that his discourse would have more of the flourish and furbelow of human rhetoric than of the simplicity of divine truth in it. His violent action, too, disgusted me exceedingly. The rapid and incessant movement of his hands, sometimes of one, sometimes of both, more resembled that of the wings of a humming-bird than any thing else I can remember; but the hum proceeded from the admiring congregation. At every pause he made, and like the clappings of a bad actor, they were frequent, and evidently faits exprès: a little gentle laudatory murmur ran through the crowd. I remember reading

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

A RUSTIC BALLAD.

A bee, while lay sleeping young Dolly,
Mistook her red lips for the rose;
There honey to seek were no folly,
No flower so sweet ever blows.

It tickled, and wak'd her; when clapping
Her hand on the impudent bee,
It stung her, and Dolly, caught napping,
Came pouting and crying to me.

Said she "take the sting out, I pray you!"
What way I was puzzled to try,
And a trifling wager I'd lay you
You'd have been as much puzzled as I.

I'd heard about sucking out poison—
A sting is a poisonous dart—
So I kiss'd her, the act was a wise one;
The sting found its way to my heart.

A traveller riding down a steep hill, and fearing the foot of it was unsound, called out to a man who was ditching, and asked him whether it was hard at the bottom. 'Ay,' said the man, 'it is hard enough at the bottom, I warrant it.' The traveller, however, had not ridden half a dozen yards before the horse sunk up to the saddle girths. 'Why, you rascal,' said he, calling out to the ditcher, 'did you not tell me it was hard at the bottom?' 'Ay,' replied the fellow, 'but you are not half way at the bottom yet.'

A CODICIL.—Mr. — a very careless man, was sheriff of the courts in Rhode Island some years ago. When the Supreme Court of the United States was held in that district, the sheriff got up and opened the court, ending with the State form 'god save the state of Rhode Island and the Providence Plantations.' 'You forget,' said the Judge mildly, 'this is the United States Court.' 'Nothing daunted, our Sheriff, answered 'Oh yes, your honor,' and bawled out in continuation—and the United States also!'

A DARK ONE.—"O, father! I've just seen the blackest nigger that ever was!" said a little boy one day, as he came running into the house. "How black was he, my son?" "O, he was as black as—black can be; why, father, charcoal would make a white mark on him!"—Norfolk Adv.

"There is often an initial difficulty in the way of courting, which is not easily got over in all cases—that is, in breaking the ice, as it is called. This is more particularly incident to those who do not go to work secundum artem. There is a good practice, regarding this matter, among the Savoyard peasantry. When a young man is first admitted to spend the evening at the house of a maid to whom he wishes to pay his addresses, he watches the arrangement of the fireplace, where several billets of wood are blazing. If the fair one lift up one of the billets and place it upright against the side of the fireplace, it is a sign she does not approve of her suitor. If she leaves the blazing wood undisturbed, the young man may be sure of her consent."

BAR-BARIAN WIT.—The bar is noted for its wit; but it is not always that the best things are said before the bar. A poor fellow, in his examination the other day, was asked if he had not been in that court before, and what for? (He had been up for body stealing.) "It was for nothing at all," said the humorist, "hon'ly rescuing a feller cretur from the grave."—Len. paper.

somewhere of a priest nobly born, and so anxious to keep his flock in their proper place, that they might not come 'between the wind and his nobility,' that his constant address to them when preaching, was, 'Canaille Chrétienne!' This was bad—very bad, certainly; but I protest, I doubt if the Abbe Lacordaire's manner of addressing his congregation as 'Messieurs' was much less unlike the fitting tone of a Christian pastor. This mundane apostrophe was continually repeated throughout the whole discourse, and, I dare say, had its share in producing the disagreeable effect experienced from his eloquence. I cannot remember having ever heard a preacher I less liked, revered, and admired, than this new Parisian saint. He made very pointed allusions to the reviving state of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and anathematized pretty cordially all such as should oppose it. In describing the two hours' prologue to the mass, I forgot to mention that many young men—not in the reserved places of the centre aisle, but sitting near us, beguiled the tedious interval by reading. Some of the volumes they held had the appearance of novels from a circulating library and others were evidently collections of songs, probably less spiritual than spirituels. The whole exhibition certainly shewed me a new page in the history of 'Paris as it is,' and I therefore do not regret the four hours it cost me: but once is enough—I certainly will never go to hear the Abbe Lacordaire again."

Mrs. Trollope dramatizes her dialogues well, and many an agreeable half-hour may be passed with Paris and the Parisians.

Old Gold with New Superscriptions.

Dancing. That action which is to motion what music is to sound—a movement to which misses are trained for leading bachelors near man traps, as decoy ducks tempt wild ones into the snare.

Debt. "The soldier of society;" for men tolerate each other for what they owe each other.

Dun. A more accurate time-keeper than ever Halley made.

Envy. The oxidation of the soul; but it is only the meaner minds and metals that rust.

Face. Not only the title page of man, but often, too, the table of contents.

Faction. Any body of politicians who do any thing opposed to any of the notions of any of us.

Fan. An almost forgotten instrument, which was wont to winnow away the frowns of our grandmothers.

Fascination. The air and manner of one's mistress.

Hair. The foliage of the human tree. The drape of a fine woman's face, and that part of it which is connected with their brains, which youngsters most carefully cultivate. The only crop which many thick soils can produce, and one that fifty thousand people in Great Britain live by cutting.

Imagination. That power which can create without substance, paint without color, and kill without crime.

Jury. Twelve men; seven of whom must be of one opinion, and five of none.

Kissing. The lovers employment of lips when words wont pass over them; the poetry of contract; and the dram drinking of boyhood.

Label. What any body feels to be true, but fears to have known.

Lover. One who loses himself—to obtain possession of another.

Moment. A flap of the wing of time. The life of a thought.

Be slow to give advice, ready to do any service.

KISSING.

And if it were not lawful
The lawyers would not use it;
And if 'twere not pious
The clergy would not choose it;
And if 'twere not a dainty thing,
The ladies would not crave it,
And if 'twere not plentiful,
The poor girls could not have it.

THICK ANKLES.

"Harry, I cannot think," says Dick,
"What makes my ankles grow so thick."
"You do not recollect," says Harry,
"How great a calf they have to carry."

An auctioneer was busy in crying some goods from his stand, as a drunken man passed by—"I say, Mister, may I bid what I please?" said the latter. "Certainly," replied the salesman. "Then," rejoined the other, "I bid you a very good morning."

A MAN WITH HORNS.—Dr. Pocock, of Darlington, Eng., has been publishing what he terms 'practical hints on the treatment of several diseases,' in which is found the following relation: 'A shoemaker, about 50, applied to me for relief from a complaint which he called horns—which were excrescences, very nearly resembling cockspurs, adhering to the skin in all the muscular parts. They were all erect and completely embedded in the skin by the broadest end; the base had a fleshy, cartilaginous feel, which run up to a sharp bony point, resembling nothing so closely as the spur of a cock. They were mostly an inch in length, and some of them exceeded it.'—Boston Med. Jour.

FALS ESTIMATES.—We are overrated by some, and underrated by others. We are rarely rated at what we should be.

"I have lived," said Dr. Adam Clark, 'to know that the great secret of human happiness is this: Never suffer your energies to stagnate. The old adage of "too many irons in the fire," conveys an abominable lie. You cannot have too many—poker, tongs, and all: keep them all a going.'

I hope it will be written on the tablets of your heart, in characters not to be effaced by ambition, avarice or pleasure, that the only sure and certain happiness to be found on this side of the grave, is a consciousness of your own rectitude. All peace and homefelt joy are the reward of virtue. And there is no applause in this world worth having unless it is crowned with our own.—Sir. J. E. Wilmot to his Son.

PATHETIC.—A learned young lady being asked at a tea-table if she used sugar, replied, "I have a diabolical, invincible repugnance to sugar, for to my insensible cogitations upon the subject, the flavosity of the sugar nullifies the flavosity of the tea, and renders it vastly obnoxious!"

"Why don't you wipe your nose, Tom?" said a little officious, pragmatical body, to a tall jolly old codger, with a great blue spindling nose. "Oh! gad," replied the latter, "I have, your honor, as far as I can reach!"

ANECDOTE.—An elderly man, rather shabily dressed, met an individual in Chesnut street a day or two since, and holding before him the superscription of a letter said, "Can you tell me where I will find Mr. —?" "What is he?" asked the person interrogated. The other somewhat pettishly replied, "oh, he's nothing—he's a gentleman!"

A gentleman called for a glass of beer the other day at a noted restaurant, and was served with a very diminutive tumbler. After paying for it, he remarked to mine host, that if he should get larger tumblers he would sell more beer!—N. Y. Spirit of the Times.

TEMPERANCE.—A Deacon, having joined a Temperance Society, refused to drink toddy with his neighbor, but would, for the sake of sociability, just dip a toasted cracker into it and eat that, saying that it would do as well, as he must not allow himself to take rum. The good deacon was a philosopher:—the spirit being specifically lighter than the water, rises to the top and is readily absorbed by the cracker.

An English Earl at a ball at Portsmouth, was struck with the appearance of a lady—was introduced and enchanted, in a breath—made love during the country dance, and an offer during supper. "I should have been very happy," said the lady, "but I have seven deadly reasons against it." So saying, she beckoned a gentleman near; this is my husband, Captain Coffin, and the father of my six little Coffins.—Bost. Post.

RATHER PARADOXICAL.—Victor Hugo, the French novelist, in describing one of his heroines, thus moralizes on one of her qualities in a truly French strain: "Poor girl! she had fine teeth, and she was fond of laughing, that she might show them the better. Now the maiden who is in too great a hurry to laugh, is on the high road to tears: for fine teeth spoil fine eyes."

Diogenes being asked of what beast the bite is most dangerous, answered, "Of wild beasts, that of a slanderer; of tame, that of a flatterer."

One of the speakers at the Reform dinner at Hackney last year, in talking of the House of Lords, said, figuratively, that it should be cleansed like the Augean stable. One of the crowd cried out "Wot stable was that? how was that stable cleaned?" "Oh," said the speaker, "by turning a river into it." "Nonsense," replied the man, "wouldn't it be a great deal easier and better to turn the Lords into the river?"

New Year's Anecdote.—A little girl was despatched by her mother on New Year's day, to wish a grocer a "Happy New Year," with directions to tell him that she would "take the gift in molasses." Accordingly she took a jug and went to the store and did her errand as follows: "Marm told me to come and wish you a happy new year, and here's a jug to put it in."

"What's the matter with our pump, daddy?" said a little chap, one cold morning this week. "O child, it's sick, with a cold in his head." "Well," continued the lad, as he drew his sleeve across his nose, "when it gets better it will run at the nose, wont it daddy?" "I s'pose so—use your handkercher you blockhead."

Pun Military.—A young ensign complaining of the smallness of the apartment at the barracks, after many attempts at a simile, compared them to a nutshell; on which a friend congratulated him, as by dwelling in a nutshell, he had attained the rank of Kernal.

Polite manners add lustre to merit. Whatever talents we possess, if we have not politeness, we shall fail of that esteem which otherwise those talents might procure. Some people are uncommonly dexterous at portraying the foibles of others, and giving fuller scope to their own impertinence. This is a propensity quite the reverse of true politeness, which is careful never to offend, and which fails not to apologise for the conduct of others, or at least to justify their intentions.

THE COW'S DIRGE.

Air.—"Tune the Old Cow died of."
The cow! the cow!—that butcher, death,
In her hay-day appears,
And interrupts her sweetest breath,
Amid the cable tiers.
No more she'll stretch her dew-lapped neck,
To low in thundering stave;
She's gone from the deserted deck,
Too low beneath the wave.
The cow! the cow!—and must our tea
Go all unwhitened now?
No more in teat-a-teat shall be
The milker and the cow;
No more the cud, with look sedate,
She'll, all contented chew—
Alas! we now must ruminate—
On what we are to do!

The cow! the cow!—she's in the sea,
A thousand fathom deep;
And sharks have joined in revelry,
That carnival to keep.
Oh! 'twould have cheered this mournful note,
And soothed the general grief,
Had timely knife across her throat
Transformed her into beef.

The cow! the cow!—the zodiac weeps,
And—oh lugubrious "sign!"
Yon bull, whose eye moist sorrow steepes,
Augments th' entombing brine.
She little dreamed that Taurus bent
On her his glances keen,
For, bashful still, she only went
To sea, not to be seen.

The cow! the cow!—she died that day,
And tearful skies deplore her;
Her death obstructs the "milky way,"
Though cream-topped waves roll o'er her.
Her moans were sad, her eyes aghast,
One faint whisk gave her tail;
And she the bucket kicked at last,
Who'd often kicked the pail.

The cow! the cow!—a few weeks more
Had she contrived to stay;
Her death had then been less a bore,
That what it is to-day;
For though we've one, "by'r lady," yet
In vain for milk we try:
The best has overboard gone wet,
The other has gone dry!

THE NEGRO WHO REFUSED TO BE FREE.

In the Yemassee, there is quite an interesting, as well as amusing passage, illustrative of the attachment of a slave to his master. Hector had been the means of saving his master's life; and for this good service he resolved to emancipate him. Accordingly he made a signal to Hector, who came forward with the dog Dugdale, which had been wounded with an arrow in the side, not seriously, but painfully, as was evident from the writhings and occasional moanings of the animal, while Hector busied himself plastering the wound with the resinous gum of the pine tree.

"Hector," said his master, as he approached, "give me Dugdale. Henceforward I shall take care of him myself."

"Sa! massa," exclaimed the negro, with an expression of almost terrific amazement in his countenance. "Yes, Hector, you are now free. I give you your freedom, old fellow. Here is money too, and in Charleston you shall have a house to live in for yourself."

"No, massa, I can't sir—I can't be free," replied the negro, shaking his head, and endeavouring to resume possession of the strong cord which secured the dog, and which Harrison had taken into his own hand.

"Why can't you, Hector? What do you mean? Am I not your master? Can't I make you free, and don't I tell you that I do make you free? From this moment you are your own master."

"Wha' lor, massa? Wha' Hector done, you guine turn um off dis time o' day?"

"Done! You have saved my life, old fellow—you have fought for me like a friend, and I am now your friend, and not any longer your master."

"Ki, massa! enty you always been a frien' to Hector? Enty you gib um physie when he sick, and come see and talk wid um, and do ebbery ting he want you for do? What more you guine to do now?"

"Yes, Hector, I have done for you all this—but I have done it because you were my slave, and because I was bound to do it."

"Ah, you no want to be boun' any longer. Da's it! I see. You want Hector for eat acorn wid de hog, and take de swamp wid de Injia, enty?"

"Not so, old fellow; but I cannot call you my slave when I would call you my friend. I shall get another slave to carry Dugdale, and you shall be free."

"I dam to hell, massa, if I guine to be free!" roared the adhesive black, in a tone of unrestrained determination. "I can't loss you company, and who de debble Dugdale will let feed him like Hector? 'Tis impossible, massa, and dere's no use to talk about it. De ting aint right; and enty I know wha kind of ting freedom is wid black man? Ha! you make Hector free, come wuss more nor poor buckrah—he tief out of de shop—he get drunk and lie in de ditch—den if sick come, he roll, he toss in de wet grass of de stable. You come in de morning, Hector dead—and who know—he take no physie, he hab no parson—who know, I say, massa, but de debble find um fore any body else? No, massa—you and Dugdale berry good company for Hector. I tank God he so good—I no want any better."

The Negro was positive, and his master, deeply affected with this evidence of his attachment, turned away in silence, offering no further obstructions to the desperate hold which he then took of the wounded Dugdale.

BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

A RIFLEMAN.—A daring Tennessean, with a blanket tied round him, and a hat with a brim of enormous breadth, who seemed to be fighting "on his own hook," disdaining to raise his rifle over the bank of earth, and fire in safety to his person, like his more wary fellow soldiers, chose to spring, every time he fired, upon the breastwork, where, balancing himself, he would bring his rifle to his cheek, throw back his broad brim, take sight and fire, while the enemy were advancing to the attack, as deliberately as though shooting at a herd of deer; then leaping down on the inner side, he would reload, mount the works, cock his beaver, take aim, and crack again. "This he did," said an English officer, who was taken prisoner by him, and who laughingly related it as a good anecdote to captain D* * *, my informant above alluded to,—"five times in rapid succession, as I advanced at the head of my company; and though the grape whistled through the air over our heads, for the life of me I could not help smiling at his grotesque demi-savage, demi-quaker figure, as he threw back the broad flap of his castor to obtain a fair sight—deliberately raised his rifle—shut his left eye, and blazed away at us, I verily believe he brought one of my men at every shot."

As the British resolutely advanced, though columns fell like the tall grain before the sickle at the fire of the Americans, this same officer approached at the head of his brave grenadiers, amid the rolling fire of musketry from the lines of his unseen foes, undaunted and untouched." "Advance, my men!" he shouted as he reached the edge of the fosse—"follow me!" and, sword in hand, he leaped the ditch, and turning, amidst the roar and flame of a hundred muskets, to encourage his men, beheld to his surprise but a single man of his company upon his feet—more than fifty brave fellows, whom he had led so gallantly on to the attack, had been shot down. As he was about to leap back from his dangerous situation, his sword was shivered in his grasp by a rifle ball, and at the same instant the daring Tennessean sprang upon the parapet and levelled his deadly weapon at his breast, calmly observing, "Surrender, stranger, or I may perforate ye!" "Chagrined," said the officer, at the close of his recital, "I was compelled to deliver to the bold fellow my mutilated sword, and pass over into the American lines."—South West by a Yankee.

A REMINISCENCE.

From Captain Marryat's Diary of a Blase.

I was observing that I here met with a person whom I could not recollect, and, as usual, I continued to talk with him, trusting to my good fortune for the clue. At last it was given me. "Do you recollect the little doctor and his wife, at Bangalore?" I did, and immediately recollected him. As the story of the doctor and his wife has often made me laugh, and as I consider it one of the best specimens of tit for tat, I will narrate it to my readers.

A certain little army surgeon, who was stationed at Bangalore, had selected a very pretty little girl out of an invoice of young ladies, who had been freighted out on speculation. She was very fond of gaiety and amusement, and, after her marriage, appeared to be much fonder of passing away the night at a ball, than at the home of her little doctor. Nevertheless, although she kept late hours, in every respect she was very correct. The doctor, who was a quiet, sober man, and careful of his health, preferred going to bed early, and rising before the sun, to inhale the cool breeze of the morning. And as the lady seldom came home till past midnight, he was not very well pleased at being disturbed by her late hours. At last his patience was wearied out, and he told her plainly, that if she staid out later than twelve o'clock, he was resolved not to give her admittance. At this his young wife, who, like all pretty women, imagined that he never would presume to do any such thing, laughed heartily, and from the next ball to which she was invited, did not return till half-past two in the morning. As soon as she arrived at home, the palanquin-bearers knocked for admittance, but the doctor, true to his word, put his head out of the window, and very ungallantly told his wife she might remain out all night. The lady coaxed, entreated, expostulated, and threatened, but it was all in vain. At last she screamed and appeared to be frantic, declaring that if not immediately admitted, she would throw herself into the well which was in the compound, not fifty yards from the bungalow. The doctor begged that she would do so, if that gave her any pleasure, and then retired from the window. His wife ordered the bearers to take her on her palanquin to the well; she got out, and gave her directions, and then slipped away up to the bungalow, and stationed herself close to the door, against the wall. The bearers, in obedience to her directions, commenced crying out, as if expostulating with their mistress, and then detaching a large and heavy stone, two of them plunged it into the water, after which they all set up a howl of lamentation. Now the little doctor, notwithstanding all his firmness and nonchalance, was not quite at ease when he heard his wife express her determination. He knew her to be very entêtée, and he remained on the watch. He heard the heavy plunge, followed up by the shrieks of the palanquin bearers. "Good God," cried he, "is it possible?" and he darted out in his shirt to where they were all standing by the well. As soon as he had passed, his wife hastened in doors, locked, and made all fast, and shortly afterwards appeared at the window from which her husband had addressed her. The doctor discovered the ruse when it was too late. It was now his turn to expostulate but how could he "hope for mercy, rendering none?" The lady was laconic and decided. "At least, then, throw me my clothes," said the doctor. "Not even your slippers, to protect you from the scorpions and centipedes," replied the lady, shutting the "jalousie." At day-light, when the officers were riding their Arabians, they discovered the poor little doctor pacing the verandah up and down in the chill of the morning, with nothing but his shirt to protect him. Thus were the tables turned, but whether this ruse of the well ended well, whether the lady reformed, or the doctor conformed, I have never since heard.—Metropolitan.

OLD GRIMES'S SON.

Old Grimes' boy lives in our town,
A clever lad is he;
He's long enough if cut in half.
To make two men like me.
He has a sort of waggish look,
And cracks a harmless jest;
His clothes are rather worse for wear,
Except his Sunday best.
He is a man of many parts,
As all who know can tell,
He sometimes reads the lists of Goods,
And rings the Auction bell,
He's kind and liberal to the poor,
That is, to number one;
He sometimes saws a load of wood,
And piles it when he's done.
He's always ready for a job;
(When paid,) what ere you choose,
He's often at the Colleges,
And brushes boots and shoes.
Like honest men, he pays his debts,
No fears has he of duns,
At leisure he prefers to walk,
But when in haste he runs.
In all his intercourse with folks,
His object is to please,
His pantaloons curve out before,
Just where he bends his knees.
His life was written sometime since,
And many read it through,
And makes a racket when he snores,
As other people do.
When once oppressed he proved his blood,
Not covered with the yoke,
But now he sports a freeman's cap,
And when it rains, a cloak!
He's dropped beneath a southern sky,
He's trod on northern snows,
He's taller by a foot or more,
When standing on his toes.
In church he credits all that's said,
Whatever preacher rise,
They say he has been seen in tears,
When dust got in his eyes.
A man remarkable as this,
Must surely immortal be,
And more than all because he is Old Grimes' posterity.

Specimens of a Modern Dictionary.

For the use of those who wish to understand the meaning of things as well as words.

"A noble standard for language! to depend upon the caprice of every coxcomb, who, because words are the clothing of our thoughts, cuts them out and shapes them as he pleases, and changes them oftener than he changes his dress!"—The Tattler.
Absurdity.—Any thing advanced by our opponents, contrary to our own practice, or above our comprehension.

Accomplishments.—In women, all that can be supplied by the dancing-master, music-master, mantua-maker, and milliner. In men, trying a cravat, talking nonsense, playing at billiards, dressing like a groom, and driving like a coachman.

Advice.—Almost the only commodity which the world refuses to receive, although it may be had gratis, with an allowance to those who take a quantity.

Ambiguity.—A quality deemed essentially necessary in diplomatic writings, acts of parliament, and law proceedings.

Antiquity.—The youth, nonage, and inexperience of the world, invested, by a strange blunder, with the reverence due to the present times, which are its true old age. Antiquity is the young miscreant who massacred prisoners taken in war, sacrificed human beings to idols, burnt them in Smithfield, as heretics or witches, believed in astrology, demonology, witchcraft, and every exploded folly and enormity, although his example be still gravely urged as a rule of conduct, and a standing argument against any improvement upon the "wisdom of our ancestors."

Ape.—The author of the fall of man according to Dr. Adam Clarke, who informs us that the tempter of our first parents was an orang-outang, not a serpent.

Appetite.—A relish bestowed upon the poorer classes that they may like what they eat, while it is seldom enjoyed by the rich although they may eat what they like.

Argument.—With fools, passion, vociferation, or violence; with ministers, a majority; with kings, the sword; with men of sense, a sound reason.

Bait.—One animal impaled upon a hook, in order to torture a second for the amusement of a third.

Bar. The independence of the—Like a ghost, a thing much talked of and seldom seen.

Barrister.—One who sometimes makes his gown a cloak for brow-beating and putting down a witness, who but for this protection might occasionally knock down the barrister.

Bed.—An article in which we are born and pass the happiest portion of our lives, and yet one which we never wish to keep.

Beer, Small.—See Water.

Bishop.—The only thing that gains by a translation.

Blushing.—A practice least used by those who have most occasion for it.

Book.—A thing formerly put aside to be read, and now read to be put aside.

Box, Opera.—A small enclosure wherein the upper classes assemble twice a week for the pleasure of hearing one another, and seeing the music.

Brain.—An autographical substance, which, according to the phrenologists, writes his own character upon the exterior skull in legible bumps and bosses.

Breath.—Air received into the lungs for the purposes of smoking, whistling, &c.

Bumper-toasts.—See Drunkenness, Ill-health, and Vice.

Cabbage.—See Tailor.

Calf.—The young John Bull.

Can.—The characteristic of Modern England.

Capers.—A remedy for boiled mutton, and low spirits.

Carbuncle.—A fiery globule found in the bottom of mines and the face of drunkards.

Chicane.—See Law.

Cider.—See Champagne, American.

Coffin.—The cradle in which our second childhood is laid to sleep.

Cottage.—Supposed to be the abode of happiness by all except those who live in it.

Dandy.—A fool who is vain of being the lay-figure of some fashionable tailor, and thinks the wealth of his wardrobe will conceal the poverty of his ideas; though, like his long-eared brother in the lion's skin, he is betrayed as soon as he opens his mouth.

Debates.—An useless wagging of tongues where the noses have been already counted.

Dice.—Playthings which the devil sets in motion when he wants a new supply of knaves, beggars, and suicides.

Ditch.—A place in which those who have taken too much wine are apt to take a little water.

Duty.—Financially, a tax which we pay to the public excise and customs; morally, that which we are very apt to excise in our private customs.

Echo.—The shadow of sound.

Edition third or fourth.—See the title page of the first.

Egotism.—Suffering the private I to be too much in the public eye.

Elbow.—That part of the body which it is most dangerous to shake.

Enthusiasm.—Spiritual intoxication.

Envy.—The way in which we punish ourselves for being inferior to others.

Epicure.—One who lives to eat instead of eating to live.

Etymology.—Sending vagrant words back to their own parish.

Extempore.—A premeditated impromptu.

Fables, Æsop's.—Giving human intellects to brutes, in imitation of nature, who sometimes gives brutes intellects to men.

Face.—The silent echo of the heart.

Faction.—Any party out of power.

Fashion.—The voluntary slavery which leads us to think, act, and dress according to the judgment of fools and the caprice of coxcombs.

Felicity.—The horizon of the heart, which is always receding as we advance towards it.

Fishery.—The agriculture of the sea.

Foot.—What a top sees in the looking-glass.

Foxhunting.—Tossing up for lives with a fox.

Friend, real.—One who will tell you of your faults and follies in prosperity, and assist you with his hand and heart in adversity. See Black Swan.

Frown.—Writing the confession of a bad passion with an eyebrow.

Gaming.—See Beggar and Suicide.

Gastronomy.—The religion of those who make a God of their bellies.

Glory.—Sharing with plague, pestilence, and famine, the honour of destroying your species; and participating with Alexander's horse the pleasure of transmitting your name to posterity.

Gold.—Dead earth, for which many men sacrifice life, and lose heaven.

Goosequill.—A little tube which, in the hands of modern dramatists, seems to have the power of reproducing its parental hisses.

An ill-looking fellow being asked how he could account for Nature's forming him so ugly. "Nature was not to blame," said he, "for when I was two months old, I was considered the handsomest child in the neighborhood, but my nurse, the slut, one day swapped me away for another boy just to please a friend of hers, whose child was rather plain looking."

LITERARY PORT FOLIO.

CLASSICAL FAMILY LIBRARY.—The Harpers have just published Nos. 18 and 19 of their Classical Family Library, containing the translation of Horace, by Dr. Francis. An appendix is added, containing translations of various odes, &c. by Ben Johnson, Cowley, Milton, Dryden, Pope, Addison, Swift, Byron, Chatterton and others.

The merits of Horace, as a classic writer, are too well known to require even a passing remark. From his biography, prefixed to this work, we learn that this great poet was born at Venusia, a town on the frontiers of Lucania and Apulia, sixty-three years before the Christian Era. His father was a freedman and a tax-gatherer, who nevertheless gave him a liberal education at Rome. During his abode in that city, the assassination of Cæsar and the consequent troubles occurred; and Brutus, on his march to Macedonia, took with him Horace, then in his twenty-third year, and gave him the rank of military tribune. After the war the paternal estate of Horace was confiscated, and the young poet was thrown upon the world dependant upon his own resources. His early talents procured for him the intimacy of Virgil and Varius, through whose influence he was noticed and patronised by Mæcenas. By Mæcenas, Horace was recommended to Augustus, who loaded him with honors, and selected him to compose the hymn to be sung in honor of Apollo and Diana at the Secular Games. This poem is said to be a composition of high intrinsic excellence.

Horace died A. C. 9, in the 57th year of this age, and three weeks after the decease of his early friend Mæcenas, leaving all his earthly possessions to Augustus. His works have always been numbered among the most valuable remains of antiquity. It we may rely on the judgment of his commentators, he has united in his lyric poetry the enthusiasm of Pindar, the majesty of Alcaeus, the tenderness of Sappho, and the charming levities of Anacreon. Many of his odes are varied with irony and satire, delicacy and humour, and ease and pleasantry, and his diction is invariably pure, his expressions animated, and his numbers harmonious.

From the appendix we extract two translations of Homer's ode to the Fountain Bandusia, to exhibit the character of the original and the varied style of the translators.

ODE.

BY JOHN CAM HOBBHOUSE, ESQ.

Oh fount! with fair unruffled face
More clear than crystal and more bright than glass;
To thee my only bowl shall pour
The sweet libation crown'd with many a flower.
To thee a sportive kid shall bleed,
Proud of the spreading honours of his head;
Who meditates the angry shock,
For some first love the fairest of the flock.
In vain! for Venus will not save—
His youthful blood shall tinge thy azure wave.
Not Phœbus, with his summer beams,
Can penetrate thy shade, and gild thy streams;
But ever from the dogstar's heat
The wearied herds require thy green retreat.
Let other bards their fountains sing,
A bard shall love and celebrate thy spring;
The secret shelter of thy wood,
And bubbling rills that fall into thy flood.

SAME ODE.

BY J. J. WARTON.

Ye waves, that gushing fall with purest stream,
Bandusian fount! to whom the products sweet,

Of richest wines belong,
And fairest flowers of spring;
To thee a chosen victim will I slay,
A kid, who glowing in lascivious youth,
Just blooms with budding horn,
And with vain thought elate
Yet destines future war: but, ah! too soon
His reeking blood with crimson shall enrich Thy pure translucent flood,
And tinge thy crystal clear.
Thy sweet recess the sun in midday hour
Can ne'er invade, thy streams the labour'd ox
Refresh with cooling draught,
And glad the wand'ring herds.
Thy name shall shine, with endless honours graced,
While on my shell I sing the nodding oak,
That o'er thy cavern deep
Waves his imbowing head.

TANNER'S AMERICAN TRAVELLER.—Mr. H. S. Tanner, of this city, has just published, in a neat 18 mo. of 150 pages, "The American Traveller, or Guide through the United States," embellished with a beautiful engraving of the Falls of Niagara, views of Breed's Hill, near Boston, Mauch Chunk, Pa. West Point, N. Y. Water Works, Pa. Brandywine Light House, a large and complete Map of the United States, and smaller Maps of Baltimore, Boston, New York and Philadelphia. The present is the second edition of this work, enlarged and improved. The large map contains references to all the prominent canals, rail-roads and travelling routes in the United States, with tables of distances, &c. and the letter press of the work, furnishes a great variety of information, valuable to travellers. The whole compendium forms an interesting companion for all who travel, either for business or pleasure.

From Carey & Hart, we have the Naval Sketch Book, by the author of "Tales of a Tar," and Random Recollections of the House of Commons. The first is an admirable sketch of the incidents and adventures usually connected with the service, so served up to us to be delightfully interesting to a landsman; and the second is a well written sketch of all the leading members of the British House of Commons. From this book we make a short extract, exhibiting the degree of disorder which sometimes prevails in well-regulated legislative bodies.

A Scene in the House of Commons.—I shall allude to one more scene of this kind. It occurred towards the close of last session. An Hon. Member, whose name I suppress, rose amidst the most tremendous uproar to address the House. He spoke, and was received as nearly as the confusion enabled me to judge as follows:—"I rise sir,—(ironical cheers, mingled with all sorts of zoological sounds.)—I rise, Sir, for the purpose of stating that I have—(oh! oh! Bah! and sounds resembling the bleating of sheep, mingled with loud laughter.) Hon. Gentlemen may endeavour to put me down by their unmannerly interruptions, but I have a duty to perform to my country—(ironical cheers, loud coughing, sneezing, and yawning, extended to an incredible length, followed by bursts of laughter.) I say, Sir, I have constituents who on this occasion expect that I—(cries of 'should sit down,' and shouts of laughter.) They expect, Sir, that on a question of such importance—('O-o-a-u,' and laughter, followed by cries of 'Order! order!' from the Speaker.) I tell Hon. Gentlemen, who choose to conduct themselves in such a way, that I am not to be put down by—(groans, coughs, sneezing, hems, and various animal sounds, some of which closely imitated the yelping of a dog, and the squeaking of a pig, interspersed with peals of laughter.) I appeal!"—(cock-a-leer-o-co!) The imitation in this case, of the crowing of a cock, was so remarkably good, that not even the most staid and orderly Members in the House could preserve their gravity. The laughter which followed drowned the Speaker's cries of 'order, order.'

"I say, Sir, this is most unbecoming conduct on the part of an assembly calling itself do—('I bow wow wow,' and burst of laughter.) Sir, may I ask, have Hon. Gentlemen, who can—('mew-mew,' and renewed laughter.)—Sir, I claim the protection of the Chair. (The Speaker here again rose and called out 'order, order,' in a loud and angry tone, on which the uproar in some measure subsided.) If Honorable Gentlemen will only allow me to make one observation, I will not trespass further on their attention, but sit down at once. (This was followed by the most tremendous cheering in earnest.) I only beg to say, Sir, that I think this a most dangerous and unconstitutional measure and will therefore vote against it." The Honorable Gentleman then resumed his seat amidst deafening applause.

From Carey, Lea & Blanchard we have received Agnes De Mansfeldt, a historical tale, by Thomas Colley Grattan, author of "Highways and Byways," and several other popular novels; and The Heavens, by R. Mudie, being a popular treatise on Astronomy. Grattan's new work is highly commended by the leading English critics, and the few chapters we have been enabled to read, have left a very favourable impression, as to the skill and power of the author. The treatise on the Heavens, is a deeply interesting production.

The Harpers have sent us Rosamond, with other stories, by Maria Edgeworth, and The Club Book, being original tales, by a number of the best English writers—each complete in one volume. Rosamond is one of Miss Edgeworth's best works; it is adapted to the comprehension, and designed for the improvement of youth, in promoting which no modern writer has been more successful than Maria Edgeworth. The stories are fascinating to children, and not less amusing in incident than they are instructive in advice.

The Club Book is a collection of original tales, seventeen in number, by James Galt, Tyrone Power, Picken, Jerdan, Gower, Moir, Cunningham, Hogg, Ritchie and others. The volume comprises upwards of five hundred pages of close reading matter, of the most popular character, and is sold at the low price of fifty cents per copy. Mr. Power's tale of the "Gipsy of the Abruzzo," is alone worth double the money.

The Harpers have also issued, as numbers 75 and 76 of their valuable Family Library, "A life of Washington," by James K. Paulding, Esq. embellished with engravings. This work is addressed particularly to the youth of our country, for whose moral improvement the author seems especially anxious. He states in his preface, that in penning this work, "his desire was to enlist the affections—to call forth their love as well as their veneration, for the great and good man whose life and actions he has attempted to delineate; and in so doing he has appealed rather to the feelings of nature than to the judgment of criticism." We most heartily commend the work to our readers, as a truly valuable production.

All the publications of the Harpers, may be obtained in this city of Mr. H. Perkins, Chesnut street.

ANTIQUITIES OF AMERICA.

It is announced in the Providence Journal, that the Danish Royal Society of Northern Antiquities, are about to publish a work on the Antiquities of America, containing a collection of the accounts extant in ancient Icelandic and other Scandinavian manuscripts, relative to voyages of discovery to North America, made by the Scandinavians, in the 10th and following centuries.

It is stated that the Rhode Island Historical Society has been in correspondence, more than five years, with the Danish Society, upon some of the topics to be treated of in the proposed new work.—It will no doubt prove a work of singular interest, especially to antiquarians and all others who feel an interest in the early history of the American continent. The annexed paragraphs are extracts from one of the last letters from the Danish Society.

The intelligence which our ancient literary monuments embody respecting the discovery of AMERICA, BY THE SCANDINAVIANS, and their voyages thither at a period long antecedent to the era of Columbus, has not hitherto received that consideration which it merits, it occurring but to few to look to the North of Europe for information on that head. It is, however, unquestionable that those remains comprise testimony, the most authentic and irrefragable, to the fact, that North America was actually discovered by the North men towards the close of the 10th century, visited by them repeatedly during the 11th and 12th (some of them even settling there as colonists,) rediscovered toward the close of the 13th, and again repeatedly resorted to in the course of the 14th; and that the Christian religion was established there not only among the Scandinavian emigrants, but, in all probability, likewise among other tribes previously, or at all events, then sealed in those regions.

What serves in no small degree to enhance the value of the ancient writings, is the great apparent probability, amounting indeed almost to certainty, that it was a knowledge of these facts that prompted the memorable expedition of Columbus himself, which terminated in his discovery of the New World—for it is a well authenticated fact, that the great navigator visited Iceland in the year 1477, on which occasion he could scarcely fail to obtain some information from its inhabitants, particularly its clerical functionaries, with whom, according to the custom of the time, he probably conversed in Latin, respecting the voyages of their ancestors to those regions.

A neat little volume has just been published by Carey, Lea and Blanchard, under the title of A Lady's Gift, or Woman as she ought to be, from the pen of Jane Kinsley Stanford, author of "The Stoic." This work has for its motto the annexed sentence from the writings of Hannah More:

"I am acquainted with a great many very good wives who are so notable and so managing, that they make a man anything but happy; and I know a great many others who sing, and play, and paint, and cut paper, and are so accomplished, that they have no time to be agreeable, and no desire to be useful."

The object of the Gift appears to be to expose and illustrate the folly of such conduct, and to inculcate sound precepts, calculated to enhance the female character and render woman what "she ought to be." We commend the little work to the earnest attention of our female readers.

Messrs. Key & Biddle have just published a small volume entitled "Sacred History of the Deluge, illustrated and corroborated by Tradition, Mythology and Geology, adapted to courses of scripture study in colleges and higher seminaries, and to general use, by Francis Fellows, A. M., with an introductory essay by the Rev. Chauncey Colton, D. D., President of Bristol College." This work evidences much attentive research, and the elucidation of the text is full of profitable remarks. The subject is most skillfully handled, and the whole production is eminently creditable to the names associated with its authorship.

Key & Biddle have also just published the first number of a new musical work, entitled "Sacred Melodies, adapted to the Psalms and Hymns of the Protestant Episcopal Church." It is arranged in four parts, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Piano Forte. The number before us is beautifully printed, and is dedicated to the Right Rev. William White, D. D.

The same publishers have also issued the first number of a similar work, entitled, "Gems of Melody, adapted to the versified extracts from the Psalms of David; and also to a selection of Devotional Hymns." The whole have been prepared by E. Ives, jun., Principal of the Philadelphia Musical Seminary, a gentleman who deserves great credit for his zealous labours in increasing the taste for music in this city. Both publications cannot fail to be generally acceptable to those who have an ear for melody.

Carey & Hart have in press, and are about to publish, a number of new and interesting works, among which are the following—My Aunt Pontypool—Memoir of Grammont—The Disinherited and Ensured, by the author of "Flirtation"—The Man of Honour—Capt. Back's Journal of the Arctic Land Expedition—Tales of a Sea Port town, by Chorley—Agnes Serle, by the author of "The Heiress"—Tales of the Wars of Montrose, by the Ettrick Shepherd—The Magician, by Leitch Ritchie—Snarleyvow, or the Dog Fiend, by Capt. Marryatt, and the Actress of Padua, and other Tales, by R. Penn Smith, Esq.

The annexed notice of Lewis's Arithmetic, a third edition of which has just been published by Kimber & Sharpless, of this city, is from the pen of a gentleman well qualified to judge of the merits of such a work. The Arithmetic is divided into two parts, the first treating of all the most useful practical rules of the science, and the second of the less useful practical rules, with a general view of the theory, and solutions of all the difficult questions in the work.

"The Arithmetical Expositor; or a Treatise on the theory and practice of Arithmetic, suited to the Commerce of the United States, by Enoch Lewis."

The third edition of this excellent and scientific work, much improved by its ingenious and worthy author, is just published by Kimber & Sharpless, No. 8 South Fourth street. The work presents in addition to the rules of Arithmetic, which are laid down with great clearness and illustrated by adequate examples, a general view of the theory of the science, and concise solutions of the most difficult questions. It is perhaps as well calculated to make sound and scientific arithmeticians, as any book extant. But it will do more than this. By interweaving in the problems a great variety of important facts relating to almost every subject, the author imparts to the learner of Arithmetic, something more than the mere principles of an abstract science. He becomes acquainted with much statistical information, many curious facts, and the dates of historical eras and remarkable events. Nothing perhaps could be better suited to excite in the youthful mind that intense curiosity for general knowledge, which leads to such valuable results in after life. No intelligent parent, no competent teacher can examine this work without being convinced of its happy superiority in these respects over the books in vogue.

But it is not only to parents and teachers that this performance can be warmly recommended, but to the merchant and lawyer, for its full information upon the subject of coins, exchanges, and the legal tonnage of ships. To supply what is desirable upon these and other kindred topics, the respectable author is well qualified by his own liberal attainments. That part of the work which relates to gold coins, has, with much intelligence, adapted the values of foreign coins to the Act of Congress of 1834, fixing the standards of American coins. The section of exchanges, contains extensive and accurate tables of the values of the various coins used in the different countries of Europe. The mode of ascertaining the legal tonnage of vessels is set forth in a satisfactory manner and with great simplicity. The writer expresses the opinion, with much confidence, that the present work must be eminently useful, as a book of reference to the professional and business man, at the same time that it must be greatly serviceable to the cause of general education.

A few examples are subjoined of the mode in which various and useful knowledge is imparted in the problems through the treatise.

EAPH GRIMES.—Some thirty or forty years since, there lived in the "Heart of this Commonwealth," a notorious character by the name and style of "Crazy Grimes," familiarly called "Eaph Grimes," whose sole study and delight was mischief. One day Eaph took it into his head to disturb the Court of Justice, towards which he harbored a deadly enmity, for having on a former occasion, caused his ears to be cropped on the pillory; and with this view, mounting his horse with boots and spurs, and pressing the latter into the sides of his steed, rode him furiously into Court, then sitting on the ground floor of the old Court House, driving the court, bar and jury, from their peaceful seats, and filling the house with terror and consternation—the rider all the while leaning back on his saddle, and apparently reining in his horse with all his might, cried out, "wo, wo, wo, you headstrong, lawless devil, I'll see that justice is done you, if I can ever get you out of this court house."—Lynn Record.

OR GEMS OF
LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

Five hundred souls in one instant of dread
Are hurried o'er the deck;
And fast the miserable ship
Becomes a lifeless wreck.
Her keel hath struck on a hidden rock,
Her planks are torn asunder,

And down comes her mast with a reeling shock,
And a hideous crash like thunder,
Her sails are dragged in the brine
That gladden'd late the skies,
And her pendant that kiss'd the fair moonshine,
Down many a fathom lies.

THE WRECK AT SEA.

BY H. F. GOULD.

The struggle is over! The storm-cloud, at last,
Has emptied itself, and the fury is past!
The ship is a ruin! the mariners wait
Their summons to enter eternity's gate.
The remnant of canvass that flaps in the wind,
Their signal of woe they may soon leave behind,
To give its last flutter above the wild surge,
As all it betokens, the deep shall immerge.
They see rising round them a chill, restless grave,
While death loudly calls them from out the hoarse
wave!

"Come to me! come! ye have no where to flee,
But down in the waters, for quiet with me!
My thin, winding arms, ever naked and cold,
Have nothing to warm them, but what they infold.
My being unlawful, I have to sustain,
By feeding on life that from others I drain.
The sweet buds of childhood, youth's beautiful bloom,
And age's ripe clusters, I pluck and consume!
I traverse the world by the light that I steal
Alone from the eyes that in darkness I seal!

"In ocean's black chambers, I welcome the forms
That pass to my kingdom, through shipwreck and storms.

The babe never prattles, nor climbs on the knee
Of him who is low in the cold, deep sea!
The eye of his widow grows sunken and dim,
With looking, and wailing, and weeping for him!
The parent's fond heart slowly bleeds for the son,
Till I, for my throne, a new trophy have won!
Come! and the mourners away on the shore,
Shall never behold you, or hear of you more!"

Hush! hush! thou pale monarch! A voice from above!

It chides thee—its tones are of mercy and love!
Away! king of terrors! In silence retire!
Though high is thy throne there is one that is higher!
The sinking have looked from the billows, that swell
Around them, to Him, who the surges can quell.
And, he, who before, has the tempest allayed,
And said to the mariner, "Be not afraid,"

24, 1836.

Is now walking over the waters, to tread
Upon the white spray that is pluming thy head!

A sail! ho! a sail, in the moment of need!
On yonder mad breakers she's riding with speed.
A rescue! it comes in the light little boat,
That's lowered and manned o'er the perils to float.
While, life for the perishing, hope for despair,
And joy and reward for affection are there,
With rocking and tossing, as onward she steers,
And shooting, and plunging the wreck as she nears,
One moment! and then the last wave will be crossed!
Yet, all is too late, if that unit be lost!

The helper and helpless, while panting to meet,
Have sent forth their voices each other to greet,
And when did these voices go out on the air,
An import so great, such an errand to bear?
Emotions too mighty for sound to convey,
Or, long for the spirit to feel in the clay—
A pulse never known in their bosoms before,
Is each proving now, at the dash of the oar.
And, sweet to their hearts will the memory be,
Of these clasping hands on the wild, deep sea!

For the Saturday Evening Post

REVOLUTIONARY PAPERS.

NO. II.

Some years before the commencement of the war,
a society was established in the Province of Pennsylvania, for promoting the culture of silk. It was founded on the same basis, as our beneficial associations, by contributions of individuals. Premiums were offered by the managers each year during its existence, with the object of exciting emulation in the growers of the mulberry tree, and the raising of the worms.—
The condition of the managers were, as appears by their printed circulars, as follows—

1st. For the greatest quantity of cocoons, not less than sixty thousand, a premium of FIFTEEN POUNDS.

2d. For not less than fifty thousand, TEN POUNDS.

3d. Forty thousand, FIVE POUNDS.

4th. Thirty thousand, a SILK REEL AND COPPER KET-TLE, on the best construction, &c.

Besides these premiums, others were offered, which no doubt were a great aid in establishing the numerous individual silk factories, if I may be allowed the term, that at one time existed in the province, now State of Pennsylvania. The claimants were desired, and in fact, it was demanded, that the cocoons brought, should be merchantable and all single. As the culture of silk is now eliciting that attention which its importance demands, it may perhaps be proper to observe that the managers of this society gave liberal encouragement not only to the raisers of silk, but also the growers of the tree; this last description of persons should not be neglected, as they in the manager's view of the subject, were the main springs of the whole affair—with their countenance, the culture of this valuable article would be increased—without their aid, it must be altogether destroyed. The objects of the officers, in requesting single cocoons, was that the double balls might be kept for seed. A society, at this time, having the same objects in view as the above, would doubtless be of infinite service. The efforts of the society were greatly retarded, by the protracted state of the war.

Chivalrous conduct of the Generals Clinton and Cornwallis.—In the year 1776, the whigs of North Carolina, had by persevering efforts, effected the lodgment of a considerable quantity of gun powder, at a place designated by the name of Orxon's mill, near Brunswick, in that province. To secure this more effectually, a guard was raised among the farmers of the neighbourhood, to whom was given the guarding of the mill. Cornwallis, having been notified of the circumstance, determined on seizing the place; accordingly he despatched a large body of men, with positive directions to arrest or destroy the guards, and secure the ammunition, and no doubt was entertained by him, but that they would succeed; as the force of the English, numbered some five hundred men, and the American about one hundred, though the mill was not, at any time, guarded by more than twenty. The enterprise was not difficult, and they marched on their way, in the confident expectation of securing plunder for themselves. Unfortunately, however, for them, the Americans were informed that the enemy were on the road to attack—preparations were immediately made to meet them, and if possible, drive them back. This they easily accomplished—the English not expecting an attack, were met in ambush some miles below Orxon's, and quickly routed; leaving twenty dead on the field of battle, and two prisoners, in the hands of the successful party. The enemy in their retreat, determined to retrieve the character, which until this unjust war they had secured to themselves—that of being brave men—barbarously shot one poor old woman, stabbing another, and beat out the front teeth of a third. If these old women had been possessed of some weapon of defence—this disgraceful set of men would not even have dared to attack them. "Clinton and Cornwallis, when they saw the women (who were in Brigadier Howe's house) very generously gave them ten shillings each, as an ample compensation for what they had suffered."

It is possible, that it may not have been observed, and it is worthy of special notice, that the 14th of June, 1774, was the last day allowed for trading vessels to leave or enter the port of Boston, having been debarred their usual privileges by an act of the parliament of Great Britain; and that the 14th of June, 1776, through the blessing of God, upon the operations of a much injured and oppressed people, was the last day allowed for British vessels of war to remain or enter the same port. Thus Providence retaliated.

Expensive Provisions.—It became necessary for the British Government, to supply the army with provisions from Europe—the enemy in America being either too subtle, or the farmers of the country, unwilling to supply the invaders with the requisite articles of subsistence. Under these circumstances, the government in the spring of 1776, sent over a large quantity of provisions to that detachment of the army stationed at the town of Boston. Hogs and sour crout formed a considerable item of the amount despatched. The vessels containing the provisions had a very long passage, as the result was that the live stock was nearly destroyed, ere they arrived at their destined port. Of the whole number of hogs only four were landed, which after paying all expenses, stood government in the extremely moderate sum of eleven hundred pounds, or near five thousand dollars per hog. The sour crout, from similar circumstances, cost seven hundred pounds per barrel. A writer in one of the London papers, published in that year, desired to ascertain the amount it would cost to maintain an army of fifty thousand men, at the same rate, and provided they were victorious, asked the question, "is it not paying too dear for such a conquest?"

Continental Money.—The Honorable Continental Congress, during the war of Independence, in order to sustain their credit, had recourse to the issuing of paper money, of various denominations. This description of paper was declared, in all of the United Colonies, a legal tender in payment of all sums of money due from one individual to another. The expenses of the war had so greatly increased, that the first issues were found insufficient for the purposes intended. The British at New York and other places, were determined if possible, to discredit these bills of credit; various measures were proposed, but not one so effectual as the counterfeiting of the different issues. The genuine notes were printed on thick brown or dark colored paper, having more the appearance of slips of wrapping paper, rather than the circulating medium of a great nation. The object of the enemy was, in a great measure defeated, by the fact of the spurious bills being engraved; these made quite a respectable appearance in comparison with the former. In a short time the country were flooded with these spurious emissaries; and it was found necessary to adopt some decisive measures to stop the evil. The Province of Pennsylvania was one of the first that moved in the step, as we learn from the following extracts from an ordinance passed on the 1st August 1776, "Whereas great mischief may arise to the United States of America, and the property of the good people, inhabitants thereof, rendered precarious and insecure, by wicked and designing persons, counterfeiting the paper bills of credit, issued by the Honorable the Continental Congress, or by any of the United States. For remedy whereof, be it ordained and declared by the Representatives of the freemen of the state of Pennsylvania in General Convention met, That if any person or persons shall presume to counterfeit the bills of credit issued, or that may hereafter be issued by the Continental Congress, by printing, or procuring the same to be printed, in the likeness of the said genuine bills, or shall forge the name or names of the signer or signers of the true bills; to such counterfeit bills, or shall with such bills, knowing the same to be so counterfeited, and being thereof legally convicted by confession, by standing mute, or by verdict of twelve men in any Court of Oyer and Terminer; hereafter to be enacted in this state, he, she, or they shall suffer death." This was not the only penalty inflicted by this state, for the issuing of these spurious notes—for altering the denominations, "the offender shall be sentenced to the pillory, and have both his or her ears cut off, and nailed to the pillory, and be publicly whipped, on his or her bare back, with thirty-one lashes well laid on."

"And moreover, every such offender shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds, to be levied on his lands and tenements, goods and chattels; and in case the offender hath not sufficient to pay the forfeiture, the offender shall, by order of the court, be sold for any term not exceeding seven years, for satisfaction."—These punishments were regarded by the British, as nullities, and in fact so far as they concerned them, they were so.

Extract from the speech of the King of G. Britain, May 23d 1776.—"I still entertain a hope that my rebellious subjects may be awakened to a sense of their duty. They will justify me in bringing about the favourite wish of my heart, the restoration of harmony and the re-establishment of order and happiness, in every part of my dominions; but if a due submission should not be obtained, from such motives and such disposition on their part, I trust, that I shall be able under the blessing of Providence, to effectuate it by a full exertion of the great force with which you have entrusted me. We can have no security but in that CONSTITUTIONAL SUBORDINATION for which we are contending. I am convinced that you will not think any price too high for the preservation of such objects." The boasted force of the king was of none effect—the disorder which reigned throughout, the kingdom was not restored until American Independence was acknowledged.

Patriotism of the American women.—Among the many instances of patriotism of the American women, I do not recollect any more affecting than the following. "A woman of this city, (Philadelphia) in a situation of life in which liberal sentiments are not often looked for, or if they are, the search is generally fruitless; being told that one of her sons had returned from the flying camp near Amboy, said, "I am sorry to hear of it, I fear he has come away before his time was out; if this be the case I will not see him, I will shut my doors upon him; I had rather have heard that he and my other three sons, who are all in the army, were slain in battle, than one of them should have thus disgraced our cause." A reply worthy of a Spartan.

Before the action at Brandywine, all or nearly so, of the able bodied young men of Chester county, joined their countrymen, with the intention of partaking of all their perils and privations, leaving the fall crop unattended to. The patriotic young women of the county, feeling that with themselves alone rested the averting of a great evil, no less than the entire destruction of the crops—having a knowledge of the importance of their trust, joined the few labourers that remained in the county; and laboured diligently in gathering the crop—indeed they did not rest here. Some of their fathers, brothers and lovers, were detained with the army a greater length of time than was anticipated, so that it became incumbent on the ladies to prepare themselves for the necessary task; the ground was ploughed and the seed sown by them, and thus they succeeded in effecting their design, and securing to themselves for the next season the usual crop, which would, except for their exertions, have been lost.

Yankee Stratagem.—The Yankees having always been proverbial for their cunning. During the war a large body of privateers were manned and sent out by different individuals, and all met with more or less success. One of the most successful, was named the Hancock, a small privateer, belonging to Philadelphia. During one of her cruizes, the Hancock, being at the time, poorly manned, having only about twenty men on board, met with a large ship, (carrying fourteen guns, the same number as the H.) having on board seven hundred lbs. of sugar, and two hundred do. of rum, besides other valuable articles.—The captain of the H., was sorely puzzled how to proceed, as he was certain the ship was more than a match for him in his present condition—his disposition blended all of the requisite desideratum in a commander, in perfect harmony one with the other. His resolves were soon taken—the command was given, and instantly obeyed—the union flag of Britain was hoisted to the mast head—the object was attained—the officers of the ship were thrown off their guard—they were delighted to meet a friend in one they had suspected of being an enemy. Capt. C., of the H., was invited to partake of breakfast, on board the ship Cora, (the name of the vessel). Capt. C., replied that his hands were so few and sick, that he had not enough to man his boat and work the vessel, but that he would be pleased to have his friend, dine with him on board the H.—In the intermediate time all the preparations for decoying the unwary Britains, were completed. At the hour appointed, the Cora's boats were manned by about twenty men, on reaching the H., they were all requested to enter the cabin of the captain—again the order was given and obeyed—the hatches were closed, and the men made prisoners. The H., commenced a heavy cannonade against her enemy, the fire was returned for a few minutes, when the English flag at the Cora's peak was lowered, and she surrendered to the subtle power of the pleasant commander of the Hancock. The Cora shortly afterwards entered the port of Portsmouth, under the command of the prize master of the Hancock. Thus was a large ship of fourteen guns, and fifty men captured by a small vessel of the same number of guns, and only twenty men. The officers and men of the H., were well recompensed for their successful effort in capturing this vessel. Each individual securing to himself a snug little sum of prize money. M.

THE VICTIM.

From the Notes of a Town Traveller.

I was sitting in a corner of the traveller's room at a small inn on a road to Northampton, comfortably smoking my pipe, and carelessly listening to the conversation held by my fellow travellers, about five or six in number, when one of them, a very genteel-looking man, of the middle age, suddenly rose out of his seat, and after a few hems and has-to gain the attention of the company, said, "Gentlemen"

"Hear, hear," responded those around him.

"You've each told some wonderful tale to-night, gentlemen," continued he, "and I have listened to them with pleasure; because I believe them to be true, though I must confess some of the situations were, in my opinion, mighty marvellous."

"Oh, oh!"

"Now, gentlemen, what I'm going to relate to you, is not an everyday occurrence, simply because it happened to me in the night."

"Morrison's pills!" whispered one.

"I was travelling from Devonshire to London, in the year 1794, in the month of December. On the first day's journey, I arrived, about nightfall, at a small inn, or rather public-house, the only habitation of the kind for ten miles round. It being a dark winter's night and a heavy shower of rain coming on at the same time, I was glad enough, as you may suppose, to meet with this accommodation, bad as it seemed. After seeing my horse and gig put into safe and happy keeping, I entered the traveller's room, as they were pleased to call it, but which to me, having been accustomed to the delightful and roomy parlours in London, appeared nothing better than a common tap or pot room. A bright fire was burning in the grate, which in some degree compensated for the shabbiness of the room, but which sadly contrasted with the dark features of three men, who were sitting in the farther corner.

"I cannot say that I am an extraordinary brave man, nor do I think I am actually a coward; but I must confess, the appearance of these threw a damp upon my spirits and I almost began to wish I had gone on to the village, notwithstanding the rain.—I rang the bell.

"Waiter, bring me a glass of brandy and water and a pipe."

"Yes, sir," replies a grinning dirty-faced bumpkin, who

I suppose on occasions served as waiter, ostler, and every thing.

"'Damned unfortunate!' exclaimed one of the men in an under-tone, though sufficiently audible for me to hear him; 'no other way but through the window,'—and they all fixed their eyes upon me.

"I shivered, cold sweat ran down my forehead—my knees knocked against each other, and I positively believe I could have fainted, and indeed perhaps I should have done so, had I not at the moment tossed off nearly the whole of the brandy and water.

"'Well,—it can't be helped,—must be so,—and damn me, if I care who knows it,' exclaimed the same man, as he, with the other two rose to leave the room.

"'Good night, sir, they all gruffly exclaimed, as they passed me.

"'Good night, gentlemen,' said I, 'a wet walk home, I fear.'

"'Oh! we have not got far to go,' replied one. 'Where's my dog?—Bess, have you seen my dog?'—he continued, as he shut the door upon me, and addressed himself at some personage at the bar. I heard no more.—I was alone. I filled my pipe, and having desired the boy to replenish my glass, I turned my chair round, and seated myself in front of the fire.

"'Dog!'—'far to go!'—'window!'—I pondered in my mind. Ominous words!—oh, I'm marked!—I'm a victim!—going to be murdered—butchered in cold blood!—pleasant reflection. I sipped my brandy and water. What's to be done, thought I,—I've no fire arms about me; never carried any!—I've no doubt but that one of them has already gone off with my horse and gig!—oh! what a miserable dog I am.

"I was about to rise in order to see if my predictions were in truth realized, when a gentle voice suddenly arrested my attention.

"'Would you like to have a pan of coals run through your bed, if you please, sir?'"

"'Eh?'—I turned round, gentlemen.—As pretty a little flower as ever you would wish to set eyes on, stood before me. Rich tresses of the deepest jet flowed gracefully about her neck,—eyes, dark,—face, beautifully fair,—figure, splendid. I'm no poet,—but, positively, her tout ensemble beggared all description. This was the glance of a moment.

"'Somehow or other, I have a great horror of a pan of coals; I don't know why, but so it is,—and I modestly replied, 'Thank you, my dear, you are very kind, but when travelling, I never accustom myself to it, and therefore, my dear—'

"She had gotten her answer, and was leaving the room. To lose the society of so charming a creature in such a dull place, and so soon too, was more than my weak nerves, from the state they were in, could support. I looked at my watch,—stammered out—'My dear!'—she returned.

"'My name is Betsy, if you please, sir,' she blushing replied, which made her look ten times more beautiful.

"'Well, then, Betsy, my dear. You are a—very—pretty girl.'

"'Gentlemen, you will recollect I had taken two glasses of strong brandy and water.

"'Did you please to want anything, sir?'

"'Yes, my dear;—I want a kiss from these sweet coral lips of yours.'

"'Do you?' exclaimed a stentorian voice, as the door opened, and in walked a tall powerful-looking fellow, whom I had not the pleasure of seeing before. 'What are you doing here, Bess—can't Lukin answer the bell? Come, trudge off, and go to bed. As for you, sir,' he continued, turning to me, and looking as fierce as a tiger, if you don't know how to behave in a body's house on the roadside, you'll find one, perhaps, who will teach you, and that in a very short time.

"I could almost fancy I saw the blade of the dagger glittering before me;—the ill-omened words rushed to my recollection; new fuel seemed added to the flame.—'That is a very short time.'

"The appearance of the men, their course manners, the loneliness of the house—nay, every thing, tended to confirm my suspicions. The poor girl, too! some deluded victim, no doubt, brought from London. Romances, legends of old, in which I had read, in my boyhood, of bravos capturing princesses, and obliging helpless beauty to serve them as their cup-bearer, and in some instances to become their wife, in a moment rushed to my imagination. I shuddered at the thought. Could such a creature as Betsy be the wife of such a wretch?—There was a modesty, a purity in her manners, which plainly convinced me she was not his sister, and, by her features, no relation.

"Brought back, as it were, to a scene of honour, from the stern manner in which I had been addressed, I blamed myself for the inconsiderate manner I had acted towards her, and I now thought, I pursued a different course when she first entered the room. I might have learned her history, perhaps saved her from a life of misery and shame, and myself from being murdered. It was now eleven o'clock—the door opened, and Lukin entered.

"'Your light, sir,' meaning my bed-candle. 'What time would your honour like to be called in the morning? Being such a quiet place, gentlemen who stop here generally sleeps very long.' I thought I could distinguish a smile of triumph on the fellow's lip.

"'Indeed!' I replied.

"'He was leaving the room, but before he reached the door, suddenly turning round—'

"'Oh! I beg pardon, sir,' he said, 'but master—that is as how, master's son,—the old gentleman's up stairs, laid up with the gout—'

"'Oh! the person whom I saw just now was your master's son, eh?'

"'Yes, sir, Master Gregory. He desired I to say he hoped as how you would not be very much offended with what he had said just now; he's had one or two friends here to-day, sir, and they've had a little brandy together. The latter part of the sentence was said in a half-whisper, as an excuse for his master's abrupt address to me.

"'Well,' I replied.

"'He begged I to say, sir, that if you would have no objection, the old gentleman would take a bit of a lift with you in the morning.'

"'Oh! no objection in the least?' I quickly replied. My spirits begin to revive. After all, they might be honest.

"'How far will he go?' I inquired.

"'As far as the church-yard, sir.' A sudden chill came over me.

"'He's going to try the change for the benefit of his health; his brother Nicholas—Old Nick, as I call him, will be main glad to see him, I know; besides, its warmer for the old gentleman a little way before there, and your master thinks as how he'll be better able to keep up his spirits there than up here in this dull place, and as you was going that way in the morning, he said, he thought he'd make bold to ask you.'

"I was standing with my back to the fire, holding the candlestick in my hand, as the fellow finished his tale, and glided out of the room. 'The rascal's been roasting me,' at length I exclaimed. 'He is also an accomplice. Alas! I sighed as I left the room, 'no hope! no escape!'

"The lovely form of Betsy crossed me as I passed the bar. I would have apologised for my rude conduct, but that I saw the stern eye of Gregory fixed upon me. As it was, I simply and civilly wished her good night.

"'Good night, sir.'

"'Oh! the tone of her voice—the manner—the look she gave me, struck to my very heart-strings. I shall never forget it. 'This way, if you please, sir,' said a voice. It was Gregory's, and he led me to an inner room, separated only from the bar by a partition. Now, thought I, as I threw myself into a chair, 'what's to be done?' I had not an implement of defence about me, nor was there even so much as a poker in the room. Suddenly the words, 'Through the window!' flashed across my mind. I examined it,—not a fastening of any kind about it; and, to add to the misfortune, it was a casement window reaching down to the ground—no shutters, and, in one or two instances, paper substituted for glass.

"By the side of the window, in a sort of recess, was a door which led—Heaven knows where; but it struck me, if I could but contrive to force it open, it might eventually lead me into the stable, where, with a very little difficulty, I could—But no; it resisted all my efforts, and I was compelled to leave my task unfinished. I took off my coat,—laid it upon a chair,—looked under the bed. All was safe there.—I was just about to undo my straps, when suddenly I heard a low moaning, like the groans of a person struggling to shake off the weight which oppressed him. The noise evidently proceeded from the bed. Gracious God! I saw the bed clothes move! It's all over with me, thought I; and there I stood, in the attitude of taking off my straps, expecting every moment to see the floor open and the bed gradually descend. A growl—a shake,—the very clothes were moved, or were dragged off the bed. My head whizzed round like a teetotum; my eyes grew dim, and I was about to call out murder, when out jumped—Oh! God!—

"'A man!' exclaimed the company.

"'A dog!' reiterated the speaker. 'A damned large Newfoundland dog.'

The company gave a hearty laugh. Fresh glasses were called for, and in a few minutes the gentleman resumed his story:—

"I was not long, you may be sure, gentlemen, in opening the door and letting the beast out. It was the animal before mentioned, and which, as I afterwards learnt, was very fond of taking a nap in that particular room, and on that particular bed. It had very ingeniously crept under the counterpane, which prevented my perceiving it when I first entered the room." The company smiled.

"I now hoped, indeed, to enjoy a little rest. All my fears seemed satisfied. Once more, however, I took a survey round the room, and then, consigning myself to the care of Providence, threw myself fearlessly on the bed.

"I had reposed in the soft embraces of Somnus about two hours—it might have been less,—when I was suddenly awake by the noise of a scratching at the door by the side of the window. I looked,—could see nothing. The clouds were driving rapidly through the sky, and the pale moon, breaking at intervals from behind them, threw a fitful and uncertain light upon the spot. As it gleamed upon the old-fashioned walls, my fevered mind could almost discern the figures which were marked upon the paper, dancing before me, sometimes throwing up their hands as if in triumph at my capture, and at others beckoning me by various gestures and grimaces to follow them.

Again I heard the noise,—it now proceeded from the window! I fell back, and lay for some time in breathless suspense. How, gentlemen, how shall I describe to you my astonishment, my agony, when on again opening my eyes I beheld the figure of a man standing before the window? By his dress, and the light of the moon, which shone directly upon him, I easily recognized him to be one of the three before spoken of. He was beckoning to the others. The window presently opened! In about a minute, the other two men appeared, carrying what seemed to me to be the body of a man. Oh! thought I, how easily now can I account for the use of the door. It is into that cell they convey the bodies of the murdered victims! Alas! how soon might I be one of their number! and I felt as if I could freely and without a murmur have given up every farthing about me, if gain was their purpose, so they would spare my life. My heart almost came up into my mouth; there was a choking in my throat,—I could scarcely breathe. They entered the room. The first was furnished with a dark lantern, and led the way to the door.

"'Hush! softly! This way, my boys; the chap's sure to be asleep by this time.'

"He took from his pocket a key, unlocked the door, and they all three entered the place. 'Now,' thought I, 'now is the time,—and I was about to spring out of the bed and lock the door upon them; when I perceived by the light of their lantern they had deposited their burden, and were returning. 'Lord have mercy upon me!' I inwardly prayed. They approached my bed,—my eyes involuntarily closed.—I saw no more, I heard no more. I was gone—fast—dead as a door-nail! How long I had remained in this happy trance, I know not; but when I again opened my eyes, how changed was the scene!

"It was a fine beautiful morning,—the sun was riding high and gliding with its brightest beams the prospect around. I was soon dressed and in the parlour. Breakfast was brought in by Lukin, who, with one of his usual grins, said, 'Master Gregory would be happy to speak with your honour, if as how your honour could spare him a moment.' I told him I was perfectly at leisure, and in a few moments the said Gregory appeared, bowing profoundly as he entered.

"'I beg pardon, sir, he said, after satisfying himself no one besides ourselves was in the room,—'I beg pardon, but I hope you were not very much disturbed last night.'

"'Why, not very,' I replied, endeavouring to make the best of the matter, now that I had got safe through the night with my life, and even without the loss of a shilling. 'And yet, I added, 'there was something rather strange!—'

"'True, sir,' interrupted Gregory. 'we are honest enough with our travellers and customers, and try to serve them well, and I hope sir, the brandy and water you tasted last night was to your liking. I replied in the affirmative.

"'Well, sir,' he continued, 'that's the way we live; we do a little in the smuggling way, and if any one's robbed—it's only the king.'

"I expostulated with him on his want of judgment, in not having informed me of this ere I went to bed; for had I been provided with fire-arms, I should certainly have been inclined to have a pop at one of them.

"'You see, sir,' he replied, 'it happened very unfortunately for me, for Black Sam and his two mates had got a long keg of whiskey, of the first sort, on shore yesterday, and had agreed with me in the afternoon about price; and you know, sir, it is necessary for the safety of all parties, that such an article should be off their hands as soon as possible, and if I didn't yield pretty quickly to their fancies, they would soon find a ready customer for their goods, and ten to one if they'd ever bring me another keg of whiskey or brandy. Now, you see, sir, that little cellar in your room is the only place in my house where I can stow any thing of the kind away,—for I don't even let my boy, Lukin, know of our little trade, for it's dangerous, as the old saying is, "to let too many cooks make the broth." I tried to persuade them to leave it somewhere till you were gone; but no, they were obliged to be off to another place to-day. However, sir, I hope you'll forget the circumstance, and pardon my boldness.'

"Saying which, he made a low bow and withdrew. 'Gentlemen, I could have brought forward many arguments against the impropriety of the affair,—but I was so satisfied with finding myself in propria persona again, that I freely forgave them all, and there was a frankness of manner about the fellow which pleased me vastly. He was certainly not that wretch I at first thought him. One only thought threw a momentary damp upon my joy. Where was Betsy? Her lovely image was still wandering in my mind. I had not seen her, and from motives of prudence, did not dare ask for her.

"'Chaise is ready, sir—' exclaimed a shrill little voice, and Lukin entered the apartment, bowing and scraping. 'Every thing's ready your honour,—the wheels were main dirty,—but I've made 'em look as bright as a looking-glass, and the harness too, your honour.'

"I took the hint, and threw him a shilling for himself, with which he appeared delighted.

"'The old gentleman is not so well this morning, your honour, he continued, as he was leaving the room, 'and Master Gregory thinks as how he'd better not attempt the journey. Mainly obliged at the same time, your honour.'

"This last speech brought to my recollection the last night's roasting, and I was glad to see the back of him.

"'Here's a small keg of brandy, sir, said the landlord, in a half whisper, as I was stepping into my chaise, 'which the men left, with their compliments, for you, sir, as a small recompense for last night's business. They warranted it good. I think it will just go under the seat of your chaise,—and if you should, sir, at any time want a gallon or so for a friend or two, I hope you will not forget 'The Hole in the Wall.'"

"I thanked him—told him such a remuneration was quite unnecessary—promised the strictest secrecy,—and drove off.
